Teen Project to Change the World

by animeloverhomura

Summary

Lan Sizhui, Lan Jingyi, Jin Ling, and Ouyang Zizhen listened attentively as Wei Wuxian explained his newest invention: a way to send memories to the past. Satisfied that he dealt with all possible paradoxes and running on -2 hours of sleep, he didn't make note of his sons' frankly concerning expressions.

"We could change everything!" they shouted simultaneously.

For better or worse, only time will tell.

Four Radishes Learn About Time Travel

Lan Sizhui winced as Lan Jingyi opened the door, hearing the hinges squeak deafeningly in the otherwise-silent night. Head disciple or not, causing a ruckus so close to curfew was just asking for Lan Qiren to find them.

Jin Ling seemed to have similar thoughts, and (with a fear that had never been completely erased even after becoming sect leader) quickly pushed Ouyang Zizhen inside while Sizhui ushered Jingyi in. Luckily, it seemed everyone was too far to notice them.

Or, in the case of Wei Wuxian, too distracted.

“Xian-gege?” Lan Sizhui asked, peeking around the wall his senior disciple was hiding behind only to find enormous stacks of scrolls, notes, and books blocking his sight.

“A-Yuan? Is that you?” a voice asked from behind the mountain. “Come in, come in! I’ve got something to show you!”

Exchanging a skeptical glance with Jin Ling, Lan Sizhui navigated his way through the man-made canyon and finally found his target buried knee deep in papers.

“Wei Wuxian!” Jin Ling bustled forward, paying no mind to the precariously placed books he was knocking over. “Hanguang-jun ordered us to make sure you didn’t stay up all night working while he’s gone! This can wait until tomorrow!”

“In a minute~” Wei Wuxian complained, not even pausing in his rushed flurry of notes. “If I stop now I won’t remember my train of thought in the morning!”

“But Xian-gege-”

“What are you working on anyways?” Lan Jingyi asked, peering over and trying to make sense of the rushed scribbles Wei Wuxian was pouring out.

“Are you interested? Maybe you can help me out.” Wei Wuxian suggested, turning to them with a mischievous look (which was much less scary when combined with the gargantuan dark circles under his eyes).

“If you’ve stayed up several nights in a row for this I doubt we’d be much help,” Jin Ling scoffed, but settled down regardless.

Soon all four boys were seated in a semi circle around their teacher, tired but captivated by the promise of an interesting lesson. Not only was Wei Wuxian the best teacher they’d ever had, more often than not he was teaching them something no one had ever seen before.

Though, considering Wei Wuxian created nearly every advancement the cultivation world had in the last two decades, maybe that wasn’t surprising.

Wei Wuxian observed his captivated audience, then swung his arms open for a dramatic reveal.

“I’m mastering time travel!”

The juniors stared, blinked, and sat in befuddled silence.

“...What?” Jingyi finally asked.

“Time travel! Traveling through time! I found some notes in Jin Guangyao’s library on a book I’d made on the subject, and I think I’m really on to something!”

The juniors slowly nodded in understanding, contradicting the blank looks in their eyes. Surely, they must have misheard?

“Like… through time?” Ouyang Zizhen checked. “As in, you could walk around in the past and see your past self?”

“Ah… not exactly. See, transporting matter through time would take a whole lot more energy than we’re actually capable of. If every cultivator in the world sacrificed all their spiritual energy to send things back, we… might be able to transfer a flower petal.”

“Then what’s the point!” Jin Ling demanded.

“The point, my young disciple, is that we wouldn’t have to send back someone. We could send… some*thing*.”

“...You just said we could barely send a petal.”

“No, no, no. Think of it like this, if we send back matter, it wouldn’t really change that much. We’d just be duplicating something and probably wouldn’t cause any significant changes. If we send back memories, however…”

Trailing off and allowing his students to fill in the blanks, Wei Wuxian turned back to his writing and added a few more points.

“Wait, but then what will happen to us?” Jingyi asked, looking left and right as if the embodiment of time would jump out and attack him.

“No need to worry, I already tested it. I sent back a message to Lan Zhan, but when I talked to my Lan Zhan he had no memory of it. I did a bit more testing, and realized that there was still a Lan Zhan who remembered the message I gave them and…” he trailed off, noticing the lost expressions on his student’s faces. They blinked at him a few times, still not understanding what he had discovered.

“...And that means…?”

“Basically, this method of time travel works off something called multiverse theory. Any memories I send back create a new timeline that serves as a parallel world, and thus there’s no risk of a paradox wiping us all out of existence regardless of how we use it. It's all perfectly safe!"

"Wait, you were messing with something that could have wiped us out of existence?!" Jin Ling interrupted.

"I just told you that isn't a concern."

"But you didn't know that when you started, did you?"

"Well…"

Instantly he was met with four identical, disapproving looks.

"I promise I was very careful!"

"I'm not sure you know the meaning of that word, Xian-gege," Lan Sizhui informed him without once losing his smile. Wei Wuxian pouted. It wasn't fair; his little radish was becoming more and more terrifying every day! He missed the little three year old he could burry in holes!

Interrupting his silent mourning, Ouyang Zizhen asked, "Wait, if you already know all that, then what are you still working on?"

"Something I'll need your help to test! So far I've seen it work mostly like empathy, involving first-person views and a one-on-one experience. It's just wasteful to use energy to create a new pack of memories for every person, so I'm trying to make it so that people can simultaneously watch the same thing and even interact with each other while they watch. I think, so long as I have more than one memory of the event, they'll combine to create a 3D simulation of whatever the memory is. Will you guys help me test a few things?"

Shining with excitement and interest, all four teenagers nodded enthusiastically.

"Of course!" they shouted.

"Tomorrow," Sizhui added, reminding them all of why they had come in the first place.

Laughing at the sudden looks of disappointment on the other three, Wei Wuxian nodded easily and began packing up, sending the teenagers on ahead.

Minds still consumed by the possibilities Wei WuXian had revealed, the group dragged their feet on their way back, trying to prolong their journey and indignant at being sent away when they were just starting to get excited. Jin Ling and Ouyang Zizhen knew breaking sect rules would get him blacklisted from further diplomatic invitations (not playdates, regardless of what Wei Ying said), but were too preoccupied to care.

"Can you believe it? Time travel?" Ouyang Zizhen whispered, looking over his shoulder in case Lan Qiren was patrolling nearby.

"I can," Jingyi declared proudly. "If anyone can figure it out, it's senior Wei."

Jin Ling nodded distractedly, then muttered “Imagine what we could change with that.”

“What do you mean? Xian-gege told us it wouldn’t change anything for us. We wouldn't be able to cheat on tests or anything.”

“Right, but… maybe then there’d be at least one universe where my parents are alive.”

All four suddenly stopped mid-step, and Jin Ling blushed when he realized what he had just said. He was practically an adult (and a Sect leader on top of that)! He shouldn’t still be caught up in daydreams of his parents.

“I mean, I just think Wei Wuxian isn’t valuing what he could do enough.”

“No, you’re right,” Lan Sizhui murmured, a contemplative expression on his face. “If we could do this, maybe we’d be able to make a world where people actually listened instead of just assuming things about Xian-gege. He wouldn’t have to die, and Hanguang-jun wouldn’t have had to spend years in seclusion.”

“Nie Mingjue wouldn’t have been killed-”

“And Lan Xichen wouldn’t be in seclusion now after the betrayal of his sworn brother!”

Jin Ling nodded, his enthusiasm rising again.

“And Uncle’s parents might not have been killed during the Sunshot campaign!”

The teenagers turned to each other, no longer bothering to keep their voices down despite the late hour.

“Sect Leader Jiang and Senior Wei wouldn’t misunderstand each other!”

“Senior Wei wouldn’t have lost his core!”

“Hanguang-jun and Senior Wei could have gotten together sooner!”

“Wen Ning wouldn’t have to die either!”

“We could change everything!” they shouted simultaneously.

One week later — which, according to Wei Wuxian, would have only taken two days if he’d been allowed to make a couple all-nighters! — and the prototype was done. Wei Wuxian had designed it into a red, crystalline orb which would accept memories from whoever touched it and read the user's intentions to figure out the time period it was sending them back to. The quartet of teenage troublemakers (or 3 troublemakers plus Sizhui) had their opportunity quickly approaching with Hanguang-jun’s impending return (signaling a night where Wei Wuxian would be otherwise occupied).

Their operation would commence at dusk.

“Shouldn’t we figure out what memories to send back first?” Sizhui asked them on the night before the Second Jade’s return. “I mean, I’d rather just use the night he’s back to send everything along. It’ll be difficult if we need to figure that out first.”

“Well, we should definitely include my memories of Jin Guangyao’s death since everything was revealed right before then.”

“I guess we could include a history class of learning about the sunshot campaign?” Zizhen suggested uncertainly.

“Right, exactly. The main problem is that we weren’t there for most of it! Should we ask Hanguang-jun and senior Wei for their memories?”

Sizhui frowned, then shook his head.

“I don’t think I’d like to force them to remember those things. It’d be more accurate, but… I don’t think I can do that to them.”

The others nodded in reluctant agreement, scowling in frustration. Lan Jingyi sat down on the grass, beckoning one of the nearby rabbits over to himself. A soft, light brown one crept over and nuzzled into his lap, relaxing as Jingyi ran a finger through its fur.

“Wait, that’s it!” he shouted, startling the bunny into jumping off him.

It ran directly over to Sizhui, who asked, “What’s it?”

“They weren’t the only ones there!”

Jin Ling looked over sceptically. “I don’t think the bunnies can transmit memories.”

"And Sect Leader Jiang will probably kill us if we ask him."

“No, no. Remember what Senior Wei said? It’s like empathy. If we combine the memories of a bunch of different ghosts, we’ll be able to get a view of everything that happened between them. Besides, Senior Wei is basically their master, so maybe they’ll even be willing to put the memories together for us!”

As he continued to speak, his friend’s faces quickly brightened in realization. Jingyi was right! If they did that, they wouldn’t even need Wei Ying’s memories. All they had to do was ask the spirits for help.

Immediately, Lan Sizhui rushed out of the cloud recesses and pulled out his guqin, playing inquiry with as wide a range as he could. Although no spirits could exist inside the Lan clan’s protective barrier, there was a strong chance the spirits could either see from the outside, or had been present when they were still alive. As sobering as that was, perhaps an alternate version of themselves would survive with the information offered.

And, most interestingly, Wei Wuxian used music to order the spirits around. The commands were transmitted through sound, yes, but the intention transferred telepathically. They might have even greater insight into Wei Wuxian’s mind than ~~his~~ the kids had.

A second later, a spirit responded.

“They think they can do it!” Sizhui reported, brimming with happiness. This way, they’d be able to get a truly complete version of the story to all the people who need it.

“Who should we send it to?” Ouyang Zizhen asked nervously.

“My parents and grandparents, obviously,” Jin Ling declared, though he wasn’t as sure about his paternal grandparents given the rumors about Jin Guangshan.

“The Jiangs too, for both your uncles.” Sizhui added. “And the Lans.”

“Nie Huaisang and Mingjue will need to know too,” Lan Jingyi added. “Maybe we should just send it to the main-line of the great clans back then. Senior Wei said it was based off intentions, right? We'll just 'intend' to send it to the most important figures in the most famous clans.”

The quartet nodded in excitement, continuing to conspire with each other towards their shared goal of creating a world without the stupid, stupid misunderstandings people kept having about Wei Wuxian.

However, in their haste, they overlooked two important facts: First, Wei Wuxian was never officially adopted by the Jiangs, and therefore would not be included. Second, in the time period they were aiming for, there were five great families.

After Careful Consideration, He Decided to Panic

The blood-red glow of resentful energy filled the back of the Cloud Recesses, before finally fading into the black of night. In a desolated training ground, four teenagers had finished transporting the spirits' memories into the past using a device created by the one and only Yiling Patriarch.

"...Do you think it worked?"

"Of course! Senior Wei's inventions never fail!"

"But what if they somehow break out before they're done watching?" Lan Sizhui asked, glancing nervously at the orb before them. "They'll miss the information about Jin Guangyao and Nie Huaisang's abilities."

"Don't worry about it!" Lan Jingyi laughed, clapping Sizhui on the back. "This was made by the greatest cultivator ever. No one's made even close to the impact his inventions have, even with the 13 year vacation he took. Who could possibly break through something created by Wei Wuxian?"

"I bet I can break through this," declared Wei Wuxian as he looked down at his messily thrown-together notes. This was not the Wei Wuxian who had created the time travel talisman, but rather one nearly twenty years younger, living in the parallel dimension the four teenagers created with the talisman.

Five hours ago, a truly unprecedented event occurred: the main families of all five of the great clans had collapsed simultaneously, sent into a coma for no identifiable reason. From the Jiang clan, Jiang Fengmian, Yu Ziyuan, Jiang Cheng, and Jiang Yanli; from the Jin clan, Jin Guangshan, Madam Jin, and Jin Zixuan; from the Nie clan, Nie Mingjue and Nie Huaisang; from the Lan clan, Lan Qiren, Lan Xichen and Lan Wangji. The Wen clan tried to hide the information pertaining to them, but word soon got out that Wen Ruohan, Wen Chao, Wen Xu, and Wen Qing had all fallen unconscious at the same time as the other leaders.

In every clan except Jiang and Nie (who retained their head disciples), all the sect's leaders were taken out, leaving the cultivation world in temporary pandemonium. Luckily, the collapse happened right before Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian left for six months to the cloud recesses, and Wei Wuxian was able to take charge of both the sect and his family's health.

Things were falling apart at the lotus pier, but at least it was worse everywhere else.

The Lan elders had taken control of their sect and were the main force working to contact the other great clans. That said, every elder had grown used to using either Lan Qiren or the Twin Jades to relay their orders, and were fumbling as they tried to find a new spokesperson.

The Nie sect, despite having its head disciple, wasn't doing any better. Said disciple had gotten injured in a night hunt the day before, and was now on bed rest. Luckily, most people in the Nie clan were independent enough to come to their own decisions.

The Wen sect had done a complete lockdown on Nightless City, having lost both their leaders and their most trusted doctor to the incident. No further information had gotten out.

The Jin sect had been overrun by various half-brothers and cousins of Jin Zixuan, each creating a faction vying for greater control during the temporary lapse in power. They hadn't come to blows quite yet, but Wei Wuxian wasn't confident that would last for much longer.

Meanwhile, the Jiang sect happily cooperated under Wei Wuxian's instruction, easily allowing their head disciple to manage the situation. Wei Ying had a reputation of playing around and relaxing in frivolous entertainment which hadn't been available when he was just a poor orphan. He could have tried to gain more authority in the sect, but had never had any motivation to lead.

That wasn't true now.

Wei Wuxian had taken to the leadership suddenly thrust upon him like a fish to water, using his confidence and charisma to keep the sect from falling apart. Some of the older disciples had objected to his authority, but even combined he wasn't a fight they could win.

It hadn't taken long for Wei Wuxian to identify the spell attacking them as a product of both spiritual energy and resentful energy, seemingly operating under a master rather than the chaotic mess most fierce corpses and resentful ghosts had. If he could just find a way to bend it to his will instead, he might be able to break everyone out or, at the very least, find a way to contact them and make sure they're still alive.

Wei Wuxian had sent his findings over to the other sects, but none of them seemed interested in (or unified enough to try) helping him test his theory.

(It was a good thing Yu Ziyuan was among those asleep. She would have strangled him if she knew he was going to try manipulating resentful energy, and Yanli would have been disappointed. But, with them both asleep, he was running out of options.)

If only he could figure out why this was happening.

"Where are we?" Nie Huaisang squeaked, turning to his brother. Nie Mingjue looked around, but couldn't see anything except his brother in the darkness.

"Huaisang? Is that you?" a voice asked from Nie Mingjue's left, and he quickly recognized it as the Jiang sect's heir.

"It's me!" Huaisang responded. "When did you get here?"

"Just now!"

"Keep your voice down," Yu Ziyuan growled. "We don't know what's going on."

“How many people are here?” Lan Xichen asked from behind Nie Mingjue, nearly making him jump in surprise. It seemed their spiritual senses were dulled as well.

Several shouts came from every direction, until they were silenced with a low growl.

“Enough.”

Nie Mingjue clenched his fists, glaring in the direction of the voice who ordered his father’s death. It seemed Wen Ruohan present as well.

Nie Huaisang squeaked again.

Under Wen Ruohan’s growled orders, they soon determined that there were 16 people, all with blood lineage or marriage linking them to the five most famous sects. Lan Qiren tried using a flame talisman to create light, but it was as if their golden cores had been sealed, and no spiritual power came to them.

Nie Mingjue had originally thought it was a plot by the Wen clan, but they seemed to be just as stuck as everyone else. Yu Ziyuan initially hissed to her husband that it was Wei Wuxian’s fault, but no one bothered discussing that idea. Madam Jin accused her husband of sleeping with a God’s servant, and he was now cowering near the Wens to escape her wrath. Nie Mingjue was seriously considering trying to knock himself out when light abruptly filled his eyes and he saw where they were.

“Is this… the cloud recesses?” Jin Guangshan asked, looking around at the open pavilion surrounded by a thin layer of cloudy mist. On the grass, sixteen chairs were set down for them in a circle.

“Hello there,” a voice said to them, and in the center of the circle of chairs a boy dressed in the robes and headband of a member of the Lan Clan flickered into existence.

Lan Qiren frowned, not recognizing him. Nie Mingjue growled in annoyance.

“Who are-”

“This is a prerecorded message,” the boy said. “I’ll try to answer as many of your questions as I can.”

A Jin disciple to the boy’s left appeared next, along with two other boys. The Jin boy turned to them, allowing them to see several of Jin Guangshan’s features on him.

Honestly, how many illegitimate children did the man have? Madam Jin looked to be seriously considering murder for the third time that day.

“My name in Jin Ling,” the boy introduced himself, then gestured to the boy who spoke first. “That’s Lan Sizhui, and the people behind him are Ouyang Zizhen and Lan Jingyi.”

The boy who had smirked at them when “Lan Jingyi” was introduced stepped forward next.

“I understand if you’re suspicious, but I can assure you that we have your best interests in mind. You may not believe this, but we’re from about twenty years in the future.”

He paused dramatically, as if waiting for them to react with gasps and applause.

“Who are they trying to fool?” Yu Ziyuan demanded, annoyed that they were being made to sit around and listen to utter nonsense. Nie Mingjue scowled and continued looking around for the spirit causing the mass-hallucination.

“Maybe we should just get on with it,” Ouyang Zizhen whispered, leaning in closer to his friend.

“Just a little longer. If there’s a standing ovation, we’ll need to wait for them to finish,” Lan Jingyi hissed back.

Thankfully, before they could delve into a petty argument and waste everyone’s time further, Lan Sizhui cleared his throat and took over his friend’s part.

“I understand if you’re skeptical, but please listen. In the future, numerous events happen that shake the cultivation world to its core. We’re trying to prevent this in your timeline by educating you all on what mistakes were made in our world, and I can assure you each and every one of your lives was made worse by not having this information. We used a modified version of empathy on numerous spirits to create a 3D model of everything we want to show you. You won’t be able to physically interact with each other or the scenes you see, but you’ll be able to talk to each other whenever you want.”

Curious at the last comment, several people tried grabbing whoever was closest to them, only to pass through as if they were both made of air. Nie Mingjue relaxed slightly, knowing that even if he wasn’t able to kill Wen Ruohan right now, at least his brother wasn’t in danger.

“We’ll be showing you things in the hope that you’ll react differently than your counterparts in our world did, mainly in terms of how they treated one person,” Sizhui continued, pausing there to allow his words to sink in.

“To us, this person is known by his official title as The Yiling Patriarch. To you, his name is Wei Wuxian.”

“What?” Jiang Cheng demanded, despite knowing the boys couldn’t respond. He turned to his father, and the Jiang sect leader looked to teens with an additional layer of caution added on to his already displeased expression. Wen Chao scoffed, muttering something about wasting time on an inconsequential child, and, although she didn’t say it, Wen Qing seemed to be feeling much the same.

Yu Ziyuan scowled at the boy being brought up, mentally berating him for, as she expected, being the cause of all her trouble. Jiang Fengmian's disapproving gaze did nothing to temper her rage.

"The memories will be shown in segments so as to not overwhelm you. In the meantime, your bodies will be put to sleep and spiritual pressure will be flowed in, allowing your inedia and defensive cultivation to temporarily become even stronger. I can personally assure you that your bodies will be safe; please focus on what we present to you."

"Not that you have much choice," Jin Ling added. Ouyang Zizhen stepped on his foot, silencing him.

"The memories will begin in two minutes."

The teenagers disappeared as their explanation ended, and the cultivators moved around the chairs to form groups divided by sect. Nie Mingjue noticed instantly that they were the smallest percentage of the population, with the Jin and Lan clans following shortly after with their groups of three. The Lans seemed to be discussing why their Clan head wasn't present, turning their gazes to the influential but distantly-related Wen Qing as evidence.

Bloodline wasn't the only factor. Whoever those boys were, they were connected to the cultivation world. Perhaps demons, malicious ghosts, or, less likely, minor gods who were prayed to by cultivators. It didn't explain the odd strategy being used to affect them, but at least they had some information.

"Da-ge," Nie Huaisang whined, walking closer and reaching out, only to pass through with the no-touch limitation imposed on them.

"Calm down Huaisang," Nie Mingjue hissed, motioning for his trembling brother to step even closer.

"Do-do you think they're telling the truth? That we're about to see the future?"

"Of course not, don't be stupid. But we can't get out of here while our golden cores are sealed, so we don't have much choice except to watch for now."

Being reminded of that last fact scared Nie Huaisang even further, and he seemed to curl in on himself in fear. Still trembling, his gaze turned to his friend Jiang Cheng.

"What do you think?" Huaisang asked. "About Wei Wuxian. I mean… what do you think his Yiling Patriarch title means? I-why him? Why are we being shown him when they could just as easily make it about any of us?"

"You know him better than me," Nie Mingjue said. "Does he have any connection with Yiling?"

"Well, he lived there for a little while after his parents died, but I'm not sure why he'd be called that."

Nie Mingjue glared at the empty spot their captors had stood in, hating his own helplessness. If he could just get his brother out of this mess-

But there was no point in worrying about things that weren't possible. All he could do was work to impact what was happening, not what already happened. And right now….

"I suppose our only choice is to wait and find out."

"I told you that boy would bring nothing but trouble!" Yu Ziyuan growled, but Jiang Fengmian only looked down with a troubled expression.

"Mother, please. They even said he was just misunderstood by a lot of people!"

"And you're just going to believe they're from the future?" she asked with a single raised eyebrow, and Jiang Cheng sank in on himself.

"We can't be sure of anything, including whether this is actually about Wei Ying," Jiang Fengmian corrected. "We should hold our judgement until we have more information."

"Oh, of course you'll take his side in this. I sure he could murder A-li and you'd write it off!"

"Mother!" Jiang Cheng nearly shouted, astounded by her proclamation.

"Mother, please, enough. We don't know what's going on." Yanli spoke, ending the conversation. To her side, Jin Zixuan watched her with a slightly surprised gaze, not having expected her to speak up. Before Jiang Fengmian could add anything, the cloud recesses pavilion shifted into pure white.

"It's starting," Wen Qing observed calmly.

"Wen Clan ran amok, and people suffered," Lan Sizhui's voice read aloud. "Righteous Clans launched the Sunshot campaign to oppose the Wen."

Nie Mingjue frowned at the mention of his sect's enemies, but — despite his sons perking up at the words — Wen Ruohan had clearly decided to ignore the information given in favor of watching reactions. Fair enough; the only beneficial thing about watching the fiction would be gaining insight into the other members of the audience.

"Wei Wuxian, the Yiling Patriarch, contributed heavily during the campaign."

Several gazes turned to the Jiangs, interested in how the head disciple they raised would play a part. It was truly unusual for a spirit to make up a story about someone not present.

"However, due to his demonic path and great power, some feared him, and had him set up. He was thusly despised by the public, his home destroyed by his beloved shidi, and he died miserably."

Jiang Cheng flinched at the final words, and Nie Huaisang immediately lifted a hand to his face, holding in a gasp and hiding his stunned expression. Despised by the public? Died

Miserably? That couldn't be further from the Wei Ying they knew.

Did the beings who created the hallucination not know anything about him? Perhaps they simply picked a person the majority were familiar with?

"Demonic path?" Wen Xu wondered.

"If anything could trap all of us here, it would be someone who had access to that power," Lan Xichen observed calmly. "Is the ghost or demon using Wei Wuxian as a vehicle for conveying what happened to them?"

Lan Wangji hummed in consideration.

"The 20th year of the reign of Xuanzheng. The year of Gongchen."

Crows squawked and the moon shined overhead, and those furthest to the back were suddenly rushed through as men wrapped in shadow passed by them.

"It seems we really can't touch them," Lan Qiren observed with distaste, no doubt displeased with the mention of demonic cultivation. Nie Huaisang jumped every time he was passed through by a shadowy figure, but Jin Zixuan seemed fairly interested in the realistic vision before them.

Even without walking, the watching cultivators were brought along as a small regiment made its way through a bamboo forest, carrying lanterns bearing the words "Wen Clan." Then, suddenly, the men in front stopped, their eyes widening in fear as the sound of a flute creeped through the woods.

"What's that?" Jin Guangshan demanded as Lan Wangji tried to close his hand around a sword he didn't have. Even knowing they couldn't be touched, their instincts screamed at them to move.

Resentful energy assaulted their senses like a tidal wave.

Hundreds of crows took flight at once, circling around a figure who stood in a distant tree. His long hair swayed freely in the wind behind him, but his appearance was masked in shadow under the moon's glow.

The music continued, and its effects were soon obvious. The corpses which had been laid around the small army suddenly twitched, then moved in earnest as they stood.

"Controlling — creating — fierce corpses?" Jin Guangshan asked, lifting a single eyebrow and trying to hide the fear in his eyes. "My, how far the Jiang clan has fallen, to have their head disciple associate with such a vile form of cultivation."

Yu Ziyuan glared at the man, hissing, "Don't pretend to believe their story just when it's convenient."

The hauntingly beautiful music continued as the corpses turned towards the mortal army.

“The ghost flute, Chenqing?!” a man revealed, shaking as he spoke.

Their view of the situation changed until they were directly in front of the man, allowing the moonlight to illuminate a portion of his handsome features.

Jiang Cheng’s eyes widened in horror.

“Is that-”

“It couldn’t be-”

“That’s the Yiling Patriarch Wei Wuxian!”

“Wei Wuxian?” Jiang Cheng asked, recognizing his shixiong immediately. Jiang Yanli took a step back, falling down onto the chair behind her. She clasped her shaking hands together, and willed them to stop.

Even knowing it wasn’t real, that it was just a vision, she couldn’t stop the fear that crept through her bones. The man was so, so similar to her A-Xian.

Except, instead of childish joy, light, and charisma, there was only a dangerous, cold hate.

Lively skin was deathly pale; bright silver eyes had become deep gray; his warm, teasing smiles were now frigid, malicious smirks. The boy they loved had been ripped to shreds in this fictitious future.

“That… does look like an older version of him,” Jiang Fengmian admitted at last, refusing to add more.

With a crackle of red energy, the nearly-unrecognizable man’s eyes glowed with crimson light. In an instant, the Wen-robed corpses attacked, surging forward in an enormous wave toward the now-outmatched army.

The Wens were easily devoured.

Wen Ruohan narrowed his eyes, taking in the massacre before him. It was true that he was the strongest cultivator alive, capable of defeating anyone in one-on-one combat. Even if several of the strongest cultivators were to team up, it would be difficult to say who would win. A single show of his power could force an army of weak cultivators to their knees.

But the scene before him was beyond even his wildest imagination.

Each cultivator killed joined the army of the undead. Friend against friend; brother against brother; every fallen soldier fell to the influence of Wei Wuxian’s music. The corpses could continue fighting even as their limbs were chopped off and their heads were crushed to dust, but whenever the same happened to one of the Wen cultivators, the army of corpses had a new recruit.

No one had ever mastered resentful energy. Some thought it couldn’t be mastered, being too wild and dangerous for a cultivator to ever use.

But if what he saw before him had even the slightest bit of truth….

Perhaps this would be worth his time after all.

“The 25th year of the reign of Xuanzheng: the year of Yiyou.”

A cup fell, spilling onto the table below it.

“Yiling Patriarch Wei Wuxian is dead!”

Jiang Cheng and Jiang Fengmian flinched away, and even Yu Ziyuan frowned at the tone. It was fake — it had to be — but it was hard to remember that when the scenes before them were so realistic.

“Really? Who killed him?”

“No.” Jiang Cheng muttered breathlessly. “No. No, no, no, no, no-that’s a lie! It’s wrong, and lying and I wouldn’t-”

“A-Cheng,” Yanli whispered, turning to him. “Don’t worry, we know you’d never do that. I don’t know why the spirit is trying to make us think you would, but we know you better than it does.”

Jiang Fengmian stepped closer, trying to offer a comforting shoulder, only to pass through his son’s body as if he wasn’t there. He frowned and dropped his hand.

“Jiang Clan of Yunmeng, Jin Clan of Lanling, Lan Clan of Gusu, and Nie Clan of Qinghe have all taken the lead, and burned the Burial Mounds to the ground.”

Wen Ruohan calmly noted the lack of his clan in the list.

“Burial Mounds?” Lan Xichen asked. “But it’s suicide to go there.”

“Mn,” Lan Wangji agreed, and glanced around the room. Four of the great clans had united to take down just one person? What on earth had Wei Wuxian done in this supposed timeline?

“I heard, since he cultivated the dark path, his powers backfired during the battle and he was torn to a fine powder by his own ghost soldiers. If so, serves him right. The ghost soldiers he had were like mad dogs, biting everyone that they came across. In the end, they turned their fangs on him!”

Jiang Yanli scowled at the cruel comparison.

“Huh? But the Yiling Patriarch and the four Clans were allies during the Sunshot Campaign, right?”

“You call that being allies? The Jiangs raised him like their own, but almost all of them were killed because of him!”

“I told you,” Yu Ziyuan hissed, but even her words lacked their usual bite. Wei Wuxian killed nearly all of the Jiang clan? Why? How? She might not like the boy, but even she had never expected that.

Jiang Fengmian, on the other hand, stood stock still as he listened to the villagers speak. It had been odd, he noticed, how they had described Wei Wuxian. An “ally” of the Yungmeng Jiang sect. Not head disciple; not son; not student; ally. How could the spirit think he would become so isolated? What had Wei Ying done?

(No, not him. Not the real Wuxian. It couldn’t be.)

“I heard that he has another evil weapon. The Stygian Tiger Seal!”

At the revelation of the unfamiliar name, the 3D memory shifted into a far away red ball of energy collapsing in on itself into an explosion.

“Yes, don’t forget that he has that. Or how he killed three thousand cultivators overnight.”

“Five thousand if I’m not mistaken.”

Wen Chao huffed. “Foolish peasants. To believe such a thing.” Not even his father could kill five thousand in such a short time. Civilians always exaggerated.

“He destroyed the Seal before he died. At least he did one good thing.”

Jiang Cheng growled, wanting to protest the phrasing, but finding he couldn’t speak after the revelation about his clan’s fate. He knew it was fake, but-

“They say he has powers beyond imagination. What if he steals someone’s body and comes back?”

“Heh. Various clans spent months trying to summon him, but to no avail. It seems the Yiling Patriarch has truly left nothing behind.”

A sigh.

“Back then, Wei Wuxian was also a prominent figure from an established Clan.”

“He also helped destroy the Wens. He made a name for himself at a young age. But how did it end up like this….”

“Destroy the Wens?” Wen Chao repeated. “Preposterous. This segment is entirely fictitious Father! There’s no need to listen to such slander.”

“Quiet,” Wen Ruohan growled, no longer interested in his son’s empty pandering. It wasn’t as though they could do anything to escape, so those words were useless.

What would he have to do to get a capable heir?

“You’re sure he can’t be brought back?”

“Aside from himself, who else would be capable of that?”

In the next instant, the world turned misty, and the memories momentarily halted.

“Perhaps this is one of the breaks they brought up earlier?” Lan Xichen suggested, and his brother made a short sound of acknowledgement.

Nie Mingjue watched the Wens for a moment longer, before turning to Huaisang.

“That was your friend?”

“I-um, it seemed to be? But he hasn’t-he would never use… I don’t know why he’s a demonic cultivator. He’s great at spiritual cultivation, so there shouldn’t be any-I mean….”

Nie Huaisang stuttered off, and his gaze turned to the Jiang heir, kneeling on the ground beside his parents.

“I told you he would be trouble!” Yu Ziyuan hissed. “This whole mess is probably because of him! Think of the shame he’s thrust upon our clan! We would have been better off leaving him in the streets.”

“But Mother, he didn’t actually do-”

“You must have heard them,” she interrupted, looking again at her husband. “The great ‘Yiling Patriarch.’ Only he would find a mess like this entertaining-”

“We don’t know everything. Calm down,” Jiang Fengmian spoke, raising his voice at last. “All we can do right now is continue watching.”

“Mother, arguing won’t solve anything right now,” Yanli explained. “Please, sit.”

Once again, Jin Zixuan found her calm and mature handling of the situation at ends with the weak and average impression he had of his fiance. He had thought, when faced with a figure as imposing as the Jiang matriarch, she would cower away and remain silent, but instead….

Perhaps getting to know her wouldn’t be so bad.

“Mo Village, 13 years later. Mo Xuanyu.”

They were brought to a dark room, and, in the center, was a lone youth using his finger to sketch symbols on the ground.

Jin Zixuan frowned at the disgusting state of the room. Jiang Cheng barely bit back a laugh when he saw the peacock’s reaction.

“With my blood, drawn by my hand, I sacrifice my body to you. My soul shall disappear. Humbly I await you, Yiling Patriarch, Wei Wuxian!”

“What? Resurrecting someone is impossible!” Madam Jin declared, wondering why the scene they were shown was venturing so far from reality. Surely the spirit would at least want them to believe it was real?

Wind howled, and a donkey outside whined at the disturbance, but, in the center of the array, resentful energy gathered to a level few cultivators had felt before. In the fluttering pages of the nearby book, the words “Written by Wei Wuxian” were visible.

The array finished glowing, and Mo Xuanyu collapsed onto the ground.

Time passed quickly as the spirits' memories zoomed ahead to the following morning, when the boy before them finally blinked his eyes open.

“Where am I?” Mo Xuanyu asked, tilting his head in confusion.

For a moment, Lan Wangji thought he might have failed the procedure. After all, demonic cultivation was extremely volatile and dangerous; given that Wei Wuxian hadn’t appeared from thin air, it was possible the failed attempt had taken memories in exchange.

Then, he took a closer look at the boy sitting up.

The body was the same, but — even considering the short time he had to observe Mo Xuanyu — there was obviously something different about the aura the newcomer gave off. It was peaceful, content, confident, inviting….

Almost… cute.

An apple rolled towards maybe-Mo Xuanyu’s feet, and from the side, the voice of a child called out.

“Madman. Madman!”

Maybe-Mo Xuanyu rubbed his eyes as a large man lumbered in, chasing the children away.

“What do you think you’re doing?” A rude voice interrupted. “You sleep in my house and eat my food. I took some of your magic items, so what? And you snitched on me?”

“You must be out of your mind,” another man’s voice added. “You’ve got balls!”

“Don’t think you’re so great because you father’s a Clan leader. You’re just a bastard! A bastard who’s been kicked out like a dog.”

Many people frowned in consideration, trying to theorize who the mentioned father could be.

Madam Jin frowned at her husband, feeling certain she knew the most likely option.

With those final words, the unknown man applied a kick to Mo Xuanyu's side, ignoring how the boy was already laying down. With a final, raspy growl, the fat man grabbed Mo Xuanyu's hair and pulled him up so they were sitting face to face.

"Mo Xuanyu, listen carefully. My Mom is the leader of Mo village. She didn't recognize your Mom as her sister, and we are not family!"

Nie Mingjue scowled, grumbling "spoiled brat" under his breath. Lan Xichen glanced over disapprovingly, but made no outward objection to the comment.

Mo Xuanyu was thrown to the side, and he finally turned over to see his own makeup-covered face in the water. When he stared down at his reflection, he gasped in shock, eyes widening in disbelief.

"A self-sacrificial summoning ritual," he whispered. "And this blood. How miserable must he have been to do this to himself?"

The use of "he" confirmed it. The man before them was no longer the boy named Mo Xuanyu.

Instead, it was quite likely that it was Wei Wuxian. Or at least the version of Wei Wuxian being depicted in the spirit's artificial hallucination.

He lifted his arm up, pulling back his sleeve to reveal numerous cut marks made on it.

"He was summoning a heinous spirit? But it couldn't have been me… it must have been some lunatic."

His laugh was cut off as he was hit from behind again by the fat young master.

"Your mother is just a servant girl. You too are a servant!"

Only Yanli's hand near his arm kept Jiang Cheng from running over and futilely trying to attack the young master before them. Despite her actions, her gaze held only contempt for the cruel young master, knowing just how close his words were to some of the things which had been whispered about Wei Wuxian when he first came to the Yunmeng Jiang sect.

They knew it wasn't real, but-

"We have important guests today, don't let him embarrass us." The young master ordered to the servant beside him. A quick bow showed respect to the young master, before he turned to Wei Wuxian and began to hiss out insult after insult.

"Stupid lunatic. Stop playing dead! Get to work."

'Playing dead?' Wei Wuxian repeated internally. 'I've been dead for many years. It's not an act.'

They were hearing his thoughts, several people realized.

"...Perhaps the power of the spirits who made this allowed them greater insight," Jiang Fengmian suggested, noting the deep glower Yu Ziyuan and Lan Qiren adopted at his reference to demonic cultivation. That, at the very least, was better than the amused fascination on both Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan's expressions.

Getting up into a kneeling position, Wei Wuxian continued his thought process.

"Spirits summoned through this ritual must fulfill the summoner's wishes. If not, the spell will render them unable to be revived. Mo Xuanyu, since you've summoned me, you should have told me what it is you want. Shall I humiliate them? Beat them down? Kill them all?"

For a moment, everyone who personally knew Wei Wuxian stopped breathing. It was true that there was genuine competence and skill behind his playful demeanor, but there was never this. Never a calm, desensitized reaction to the suggestion of mass murder, whether on innocents or criminals.

Obviously, the spirits didn't know the first thing about Wei Wuxian.

Standing up, Wei Wuxian laughed for a moment. Then, when the young master turned to face him, kicked him to the ground with a satisfying thump.

Not even Jiang Yanli could resist snickering at that.

"Do you want to die? How dare you?" the servant demonded. "I'm about to give you the beating of a lifetime!"

With an entirely-too-cheerful giggle, Wei Wuxian finally stood upright so he was looking down on the people seated before him.

"Who do you think you're talking to?" he asked, playfully.

The young master spluttered half-threats, but, after only being met with a deepened smirk, quickly ran away. His servant followed like a dog barking at his master's heels.

Wei Wuxian giggled at the scene, then climbed on a donkey's back to chase after them. When his attempts at ordering the animal around proved fruitless, he grabbed a nearby apple and used it as bait for the donkey to chase after.

Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang relaxed slightly and blinked in confusion at the instantly-altered demeanor. Despite the words just before, the boy they saw now was certainly similar to the Jiang head disciple they remembered. Could the spirit know more than they realized?

Lan Wangji was perplexed and intrigued by the shameless, carefree joy in the supposedly terrifying cultivator. He had never seen anyone act so playfully.

Their view switched to a different spirit's memory, bringing them to the center of town where the local civilians discussed the arrival of cultivators.

"Demon hunters are really coming?"

“Of course. Zombies have been seen in the back hills. Many have died. The demon hunters are coming for them. I hear they’re from a prestigious Clan.”

Jin Guangshan leaned forward in his seat, hoping his clan would get a chance to be in the spotlight.

“Look out!” was shouted from behind shortly before the young master from before began barreling through the street, knocking over tables as he went.

One cut of alcohol thrown into the air was caught by Wei Wuxian mid flight, and he greedily drank it down.

Lan Wangji frowned at the destruction they caused.

“Isn’t that the crazy elder son of the Mo family?” someone asked.

“The abuse he suffered drove him mad,” a woman confirmed. “The Mos are cruel. I pity him!”

Frowns marred the faces of Lan Xichen, Jiang Fengmian, and Jiang Yanli. Even with their near-unrivaled positions, they were always prone to sympathy.

In the next second, they were inside a building. While not as fancy as many of the palaces sect leaders owned, it was obviously fairly well off.

“I hear disciples of Lan Clan are great heroes,” an elderly woman said. “And here you are. Every one of you is so handsome.”

Lan Qiren and Lan Xichen perked up at the announcement, and even Lan Wangji refocused his eyes for a more thorough analysis.

“So high spirited, so bright, so brave. The cream of the crop!” she continued, layering on the praise as thickly as she possibly could.

The moment the Lan sect disciples came into view, nearly everyone did a double take.

“Those are some of the ones who trapped us here!” an indigent Wen Chao announced. At this, the trio of Lans took an even more speculative look at their representatives.

“Mrs. Mo, you’ve told us the zombie epidemic is a recent occurrence?” the one who had introduced himself as Lan Sizhui asked. He was the epitome of calm grace, and, regardless of what he ended up doing later, even Lan Qiren couldn’t complain at what was before them.

“Yes, some have even invaded the village,” the woman continued. “And lately demon hunters have come around, talking about a night-hunt.”

Lan Sizhui nodded once. “Cultivators enjoy traveling and demon hunting. They often appear at night. Thus, the name.”

“Oh, I see,” she continued, unable to pick up the approaching heavy breathing a cultivator's enhanced senses allowed them to notice. “Actually, my son has always dreamed of hunting demons. He’s very refined and intelligent. I think he would make a great cultivator. Pity there are no opportunities-”

A second later, young master Mo broke open the doors, cries of “Mom!” still on his lips.

“That stupid Mo Xuanyu bullied me because he knows some magic,” the man continued, collapsing into his mother’s arms like a child despite having no problems being on the opposite end of the spectrum. “He must be punished for this!”

'Childish hypocrite,' Jiang Yanli’s eyes seemed to say. Jiang Cheng’s mouth spoke the thought aloud, growling in indigent rage which overwhelmed his amusement at the shameful display.

Yu Ziyuan turned a disapproving glare on her children, but Nie Mingjue approved. There was very little he hated more than having to cater to those sorts of people while working; he wondered how the Lan clan always worked up the energy to do it.

“He-he hit you?” she demanded, checking her son over. “Are you hurt? Please forgive me!”

His whimpers continued, but the Madam quickly turned to the cultivators and covered her mouth to prevent her lips from being read.

“Ziyuan, hold it together,” she whispered.

Shouts from outside proved the servants were trying to prevent someone from entering, but their use proved negatable when, shortly after, a poorly running Wei Wuxian outran the two servants chasing after him and entered the main hall, cackling gleefully as he went.

Nie Huaisang, Jin Zixuan, and Jiang Yanli were trying to muffle their laughter at the ridiculous act, but many of the adults did not look upon it as kindly.

“He’s trying to humiliate them,” Lan Xichen observed, placing a hand on his uncle's shoulder in an attempt to calm the man down, only to have it pass right through thanks to the no-touching rule the area maintained.

Lan Qiren was still displeased by the utter lack of shame on display, but conceded to his nephew’s point.

“I suppose that’s better than jumping right to killing them all, demonic cultivator or not.”

As backhanded as the complement was, Jiang Cheng was comforted by the hope that perhaps his shixiong wasn’t quite as far gone as he had initially appeared to be.

Wen Ruohan found it amusing that even Lan Qiren couldn’t remember what they saw was only a spirit’s illusion. Seeing it so realistically before them made even the illogical events seems possible.

Suddenly, Wei Wuxian tripped on a raised edge in the door, flailing around and crashing towards the ground.

"Watch out!" Lan Jingyi called out, grabbing his arm and stopping his descent.

'A cloud pattern?' Wei Wuxian thought, gazing at the headband on Lan Jingyi. 'He must be from the Lan clan of Gusu. Hm, what a coincidence.'

Wei Wuxian laughed and excitedly leaned over, startling Jingyi. "Are you the one that's hiding my things?" he asked, exaggeratedly.

Nie Huaisang snickered at the show his friend put on for them, pleased that Wei Wuxian's nearly legendary enthusiasm hadn't been lost even in the fake vision. Both Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli also seemed to find the performance amusing, though their fear of their mother kept them from being too obvious.

On the side, Lan Wangji watched with fascination. He could understand the logic behind humiliating the family, but found the boys actions so different — so shameless — that he remained befuddled nonetheless. It was truly astounding that anyone could be so full of life and humor and confidence and everything unacceptable in the Cloud Recesses.

His smile was infectious.

"Somebody!" The house's matriarch called. "Get this lunatic out of here!"

Wei Wuxian shook his head and climbed onto a nearby pillar, shouting that he wouldn't leave. The servant tried to pry him off with both physical force and threats, but nothing seemed to work.

Finally Wei Wuxian turned a teasing gaze over, smirking like his greatest joke was finally about to reveal itself.

"I'm willing to leave if he gives me my things back!"

"Nonsense! When did I take your things?"

"Right, right. You didn't "take" them. You stole them! And you did it in the middle of the night! You disgrace!" Wei Wuxian shouted back, still clinging to the pillar.

Enraged by the boy's words, the young master hefted up a table and threw it, leaving his servant and cousin to dodge just in the nick of time.

"Murderer! He wants to kill me!" Wei Wuxian cried out as he ran and hid behind the young masters of the Lan sect. The two looked at each other, silently communicating their complete bewilderment.

The young master lunged towards Wei Wuxian, but Lan Sizhui caught his hand, stopping it from making contact. Even as big as the Mo's young master was, no non-cultivator could ever hope of defeating one in a contest of strength and skill.

“Please,” Lan Sizhui began. “Friend, we can talk.”

“Hm,” Lan Qiren hummed, watching his student calmly deal with the situation.

“Huh, he kinda takes after you, doesn’t he Xichen,” Nie Mingjue asked, focusing in on the smile. Though there were undoubtedly differences between them. The attitude, while friendly, had a greater emphasis on calming people down rather than being silently encouraging. It was more like someone took a mini Lan Wangji, and added a little happiness into his life.

Young Master Mo pulled his hand away from Sizhui, but his mother quickly moved in, dragging her son away and apologizing to the cultivators.

“I’m sorry, my son is just upset about being falsely accused of theft. As for Mo Xuanyu, he has some mental problems. He’s always spouting nonsense. Ignore him.”

Jiang Cheng growled at the accusation, even if she wasn’t technically talking about his shixiong when she said that.

Wei Wuxian gave a laughing scoff at those words.

“Who says it’s nonsense? Try stealing from me again. I swear, I’ll cut off his arm!”

“Mom! Are you going to let him bully me?”

“Shut it!” The Madam growled, but turned when Sizhui interrupted.

“Your family issues don’t involve me. The sun is close to setting-”

Lan Wangji looked closer, noticing his own mannerisms in the boy. Perhaps he ended up being a teacher or mentor to Lan Sizhui.

“- Our priority is summoning spirits and eliminating zombies.”

“Summoning spirits?” several people demanded, speaking simultaneously with Wei Wuxian’s thoughts.

“Please make sure all the villagers close their windows and doors tonight, and avoid the backyard. Do not break any of the seals.”

As he spoke, the crowd was brought outside to watch a seal be set up. Wen Ruohan stared at the unrecognizable talisman with interest.

“Has anyone seen something like this before?” Madam Jin asked with interest.

“I’m afraid not,” Lan Xichen responded. “And I don’t believe there are any records of such a thing. Perhaps the spirit doesn’t have a great understanding of modern cultivation practices.”

Wen Chao, meanwhile, seemed to not understand the significance of the invention and rolled his eyes in disgust. This was wasting his time.

All the while, Wen Ruohan studied the symbol drawn and committed it to memory. It was similar to the spirit-repelling talismans they already had, but would still have taken quite a bit of work to develop. If it was even remotely real, whoever invented them was truly brilliant.

He wanted them.

In the backyard, Wei Wuxian washed his makeup-covered face in a small stream. Setting his hands down, he observed the face Mo Xuanyu left him with intrigue.

“Ho. I’m not looking too bad. Why do you always look like a corpse? Although, looking like a lunatic is alright. What should a lunatic look like?” Trying out several different angles to watch his reflection, Wei Wuxian began stretching and squeezing his face into different shapes.

Jiang Cheng would have joined Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisung in laughing if he wasn’t so caught up in the shock of seeing the uncovered expression. Mo Xuanyu was shorter than Wei Wuxian had been, and there were traces of Jin in his features, but he otherwise looked nearly identical to Wei Wuxian — even down to the nearly-silver eyes. If he changed Mo Xuanyu’s hairstyle from the odd bun, they could pass as brothers.

Though he hadn’t seemed similar when they saw his body with Mo Xuanyu’s soul. Perhaps it was Wei Wuxian’s smile and personality that made them look identical.

Losing his laughter, Wei Wuxian pulled forward his left arm to observe the numerous cuts.

“But this forbidden ritual should have been lost. Where did Mo Xuanyu learn it? And why did he choose to summon me? Although I have a bad reputation, I did no evil nor took any revenge. Am I that fierce of a spirit?”

That was true. The ritual had apparently been written by Wei Wuxian, but if he was as infamous as he seemed to be, there should have been no reason for a destroyed, failed cultivator to have access to his notes. How had he found them?

Illogical things like this and the demonic cultivator’s proclaimed innocence were helpful; if they didn’t pay attention to them, they might get lost in the realistic scenery and forget it was a spirit’s illusion.

Calmly, Wei Wuxian began walking back to his hut, before suddenly halting mid-step. Large black flags coated in red energy had been lain out through the courtyard.

“Oh, the blackwind flag? All the clans wanted to kill me, yet they use my inventions all the same," Wei Wuxian observed.

“What?” Jiang Cheng shouted, and even Lan Wangji felt his eyes widen in surprise. Wei Wuxian had not only created an entirely new branch of cultivation, but had also invented things used thirteen years later?

He knew Wei Wuxian was brilliant, but-

Right. It was fake. It had to be.

Jin Guangshan looked at the flag with interest. He knew it wasn't real, but if it was….

How much money would Wei Wuxian have gotten from the invention? Judging by his reputation as the Yiling Patriarch, it must have been quite a substantial sum. The boy wasn't present now, but would he be able to replicate it once they got out? There must be a reason he was the subject of the vision.

Wen Chao turned his head and laughed. "If someone like that idiot made those flags, it can't have been too hard! He was, what, twenty one when he died? It seems the Lan Clan has fallen quite a-"

He cut off, seeing his father's narrowed eyes turn on him with disapproval. Wen Xu followed along, copying Wen Ruohan without entirely disagreeing with his brother.

Wen Qing held back a sigh, disgusted by the people she was related to.

'The flags use living Qi as bait," Wei Wuxian thought to himself. 'Looks like those Lan disciples plan to use themselves to lure the zombies and spirits here in order to take them out.'

"Leave," a voice commanded, and the watchers turned to see Lan Jingyi staring down at Wei Wuxian. "You shouldn't be here."

However, rather than running off, Wei Wuxian jumped forward and snatched one of the flags, pulling it down with him.

Lan Qiren scowled further at the disorderly behavior.

"Freeze! You're not supposed to take that!" Jingyi shouted in vain.

Wei Wuxian turned to face him, then whined "No, I'm not returning it!"

"No? I'll beat you up!"

"No! I want it!"

Lan Qiren knew it was unbecoming of a Lan disciple to threaten a civilian in such a manner, but he couldn't help internally sympathizing with the boy. Wei Wuxian disobeyed every common curtesy known to mankind.

"Jingyi, forget about it. Just get it back politely," Lan Sizhui advised, grabbing his friend's arm before a fight broke out.

"Sizhui, I didn't hit him! And look! He's messed up our flag array!"

Laying on the ground, Wei Wuxian, gleefully observed the flag he had stolen.

'Correct strokes, complete spell, no mistakes in use,' he analyzed.

Wen Ruohan lifted an eyebrow, not having expected such a stark disconnect between the exterior act and the boy's internal capabilities.

"Young Master Mo, it's getting dark. We'll capture the walking corpses soon. Please go back to your room before night falls," Sizhui requested.

'Due to the insufficient experience of the drawer, this will only attract evil beings from within twenty-five hundred meters-'

"Only?" Nie Huaisang asked.

'Still, it can work.'

"This flag," he spoke, then flung it onto Sizhui. "It's just a flag, what's the big deal? I can draw a lot better."

"What a lunatic!" Jingyi hissed as Wei Wuxian ran outside the pavilion. Sizhui's disapproving gaze stalled further comments, but the boy's eyes continued to scream insults at the supposedly-insane Mo Xuanyu. Sizhui directed them into replacing the flag and finishing the array.

'Well organized and well cultured. That boy is going to be quite a celebrated hero someday. I wonder who in a place as dull as the Lan clan can bring out someone like him.'

Lan Xichen laughed slightly at the backhanded compliment, knowing his uncle was internally screaming over how such a promising young man was somehow involved in the spirit which trapped them there.

Wei Wuxian stretched and walked off, not noticing that, some ways behind him, the official young master watched with an enraged expression.

“Lunatic,” he hissed. “Tonight you’ll die.”

Jiang Fengmian frowned at the words and tone, disliking his helplessness both now and during whatever happened to turn the world against his best friend’s son.

Later, in the ashy dusk of night, voices rang out in frenzied shouts.

“Get in and drag him out!”

“Report to the magistrate!”

“Don’t bother! Beat him to death!”

Inside the building the men had encircled, Wei Wuxian dozed lightly from his seated position.

“What did he do this time?” Jiang Cheng grumbled with a half-laugh, broken up with nerves from the merciless and undeserved words shouted by the men.

(But could Jiang Cheng really say they were undeserved? He didn't know Wei Wuxian — not anymore.)

(No, not him. It was fake. It was fake.)

Waking up slowly, Wei Wuxian rubbed his eyes and turned his gaze toward the intruders, wondering "What? Could it be that the flag array went wrong?"

Jiang Cheng relaxed slightly at his shixiong's ignorance, but Yu Ziyuan maintained her glare. The brat was always causing trouble somewhere, whether he meant to or not.

The door slammed open with a bang and the perpetrators who kicked it open barged in.

"Drag the lunatic to the hall! Let him pay with his life!"

Wei Wuxian only blinked, not bothering to resist as people who had clearly stated their intention to kill him dragged him away.

"What I invented can be fatal if not used properly, but the young man drew it right," he thought to himself.

Nie Huaisang knew that group of men would have no chance of killing a cultivator — especially one as terrifying as the adult version of his friend was reputed to be — but he couldn't help reaching to clutch his brother's sleeve to fend off his nerves.

His hand passed right through, of course, but seeing Nie Mingjue turn his powerful gaze to him calmed Huaisang down a little.

In the east yard, a large crowd gathered around a body which lay unmoving on the ground. Upon closer inspection, it proved to be the corpse of the village's young master, sucked empty by malevolent spirits.

Clutching his head tightly, the boy's mother sobbed uncontrollably.

Jiang Cheng looked away, suddenly feeling awkward. He might have hated them for how they had treated Wei Wuxian, but he couldn't imagine losing a member of his family so suddenly.

Yanli looked down, wiping away tears and sending a silent prayer to the family even knowing they were being shown the future. Jin Zixuan lifted his hand, trying to comfort her, but remembered the no-touch rule and quickly put his hand down before someone noticed, cheeks flushing in embarrassment.

Wei Wuxian was brought before them, and the Madam turned a hateful glare towards her nephew. For, where her son's arm should be, there was only an empty stump.

"Try stealing from me again!" Wei Wuxian had shouted only hours before. "I swear, I'll cut off his arm!"

"But he-he wouldn't actually-" Jiang Cheng protested, but found himself unable to continue.

“That man is no longer the boy you once knew,” Lan Qiren lectured, and Jiang Cheng looked away in shame. “If he was willing to turn to — to create — demonic cultivation, there’s no telling what his limits are. Especially now, with the binding contract his summoning created.”

“Not that he had many limits to begin with,” Yu Ziyuan muttered, ignoring Jiang Fengmian’s disapproving glare.

Wen Ruohan chuckled, “If any of this is true.”

All three flinched slightly, realizing that, despite their earlier confident claims, they had indeed forgotten that this was just a spirit’s illusion. Wen Ruohan found their reactions extremely amusing.

“It was you!” the Madam shouted. “You killed him!”

Taking staggering steps closer to Wei Wuxian, the Madam’s resentment and rage built up to dangerous levels.

“How could you, you wretched bastard! He-he was just a child…. Why couldn’t you die, you bastard?” she shouted, running forward intending to choke the boy who shook his head and declared his innocence.

The Madam jerked to a stop, someone preventing her attack while shouting at her.

“Let go of me!” she hissed at them. “I’ll avenge my son! Let go of me!”

“Avenge him? I didn’t kill him,” Wei Wuxian declared.

Jiang Yanli wanted to relax, but knew full well how skilled her brother could be at lying when he wanted to.

“You-What did you say?”

“Madam Mo, your son’s flesh and blood have been sucked dry,” Lan Sizhui explained. “It must have been evil spirits.”

“This lunatic killed him!” the Madam declared again despite evidence to the contrary. “You all heard him today. You heard him threatening my son, saying that he would cut off his arm. I… I’ll kill you! I’ll kill you!”

Wei Wuxian paused, thought for a moment, then panicked.

“Don’t kill me!” he begged, arms flailing.

Nie Mingjue huffed a laugh at the over-exaggerated reaction, though Lan Qiren disapproved of the improper conduct occurring before them.

“Help me!” he shouted, running towards Lan Jingyi for protection. On his way, he clumsily tripped over the young master’s body, flinging his outer robes open.

Lan Sizhui gasped, recognizing the talisman hidden in the young master's robes. It was one of the spirit attraction flags they had set up earlier.

"A blackwind flag," Lan Sizhui declared.

"Idiot boy," Yu Ziyuan hissed, and no one wanted to ask if she was referring to Wei Wuxian's act or the stupid young master Mo.

"Though, if the flag is really powerful enough to cause something like this, it's certainly worth noting," Lan Xichen pointed out. Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan looked closer, briefly considering how much productivity would be increased by having access to such an invention.

If the flag was real, it would change the entire cultivation world.

"What?" the Madam asked. "Why is that here? Why would that be on him?"

In the back, Wei Wuxian sat back onto the railing, relaxing as the young disciples began examining the clues he laid out for them.

"Well, at least he knows how to step out of the spotlight when he has to," Madam Jin observed, her tone tinged with approval. Jin Zixuan's cheeks flushed as he looked away, but Jin Guangshan easily ignored her.

"Mrs. Mo, I believe I know how your son died," Lan Sizhui declared calmly. "This is used to summon ghosts and evil spirits. Your son carried this flag, and, in doing so, he made himself a target. The ghosts this flag summoned killed your son."

Lan Qiren gazed with approval at the boy's conduct, and Lan Xichen smiled at Lan Wangji, silently conveying his overwhelming satisfaction with the future of their sect.

"Mn," Lan Wangji responded. As they learned more and more, it was difficult to remember this was only a vision.

"Nonsense! It's just a worthless piece of fabric!" the Madam declared through her tears, ripping it up. "How could it… how could it…."

She cut off, only able to sob out her son's name in her crushing sorrow. Wei Wuxian watched the scene with a surprisingly solemn expression.

"Perhaps he isn't as changed as we feared," Lan Xichen suggested, hoping to ease the worry in the Jiangs and Nie Huaisang. "He was apparently 'set up.' We should get more information before we make any serious decisions about what actions we'll take."

"Mn."

"Careful, that hope is skirting on the edge of naivety," Wen Qing responded sharply. If the Jiang family thought this Wei Wuxian could possibly be the one they knew, it was possible this wasn't completely a spirit-made delusion. However, there was no reason to be so willingly ignorant about the gravity of the demonic cultivation Wei Wuxian had apparently invented.

Wen Chao jumped, his boredom at the story had allowed his mind to drift away until Wen Qing stern reproach startled him. When Wen Ruohan glared at him, and he paled to a pasty white. His father might not be able to do anything while they were trapped in the simulation, but long-learned fear was difficult to ignore.

The Wen sect leader silently wished he had an heir who leaned closer to the competent side of the scale, and wondered how either of his sons — one useless, and one lacking in ambition beyond following his orders — could be considered to have his blood.

Looking down at his left arm, Wei Wuxian's eyes widened in realization.

"Only two wounds left," he observed. "Three wounds refer to three lives. Mo Ziyuan got himself killed by stealing the flag, but the flag was created by me. In a sense it was me who killed him."

"A bit of a lax definition of responsibility for a ritual," Lan Qiren said, frowning.

"I'm not surprised if that boy made it," Yu Ziyuan scorned, ignoring how unprecedented such an inventions was. Jiang Fengmian sat back thoughtfully. Thinking about the careless, lazy genius Wei Wuxian was made it seem almost possible for Lan Sizhui's explanation to be true.

They knew it was idiotic to believe this was actually the future, but some part of him couldn't help but think that if anyone could do it, it would be him. Against her wishes, Madam Yu felt the same.

That only made her scowl more ferocious.

"You worthless fools!" the Madam screached. "Talking about cultivation and demons! You can't even protect a child. What good are you to me?"

Jin Guangshan huffed in disgust. "Cultivators aren't there to serve you."

The statement wasn't technically correct, but the sentiment was close enough that no one objected to it.

"It's all because of your stupid flag, that my son is now dead!" she continued, shaking Lan Sizhui's collar. "You should pay with your lives!"

Sizhui clenched his fists, but both junior cultivators were careful to not respond violently to the distraught civilian before them.

"You famous Lan courtesy isn't very useful now, is it?" the now-focusing Wen Chao asked with a smirk. "And to think all the non-cultivators commend your clan's righteousness! It seems all they mean is that it's easy even for the powerless to push you down!"

All three Lans felt their expressions darken at the tone, but knew better than to respond. A discomforting parallel between the watching Lans and the juniors in the simulation formed.

Wei Wuxian huffed, watching the hysterical mother order the cultivators to bring her son back.

“All these years, and Lan Clan still hasn’t changed. Why bother being so polite. Hilarious!”

Lan Qiren barely resisted growling at the words, already having been mocked by Wen Chao.

Getting off the rail he sat on, Wei Wuxian approached Lan Sizhui and Madam Mo, shouting “For shame!”

Lan Xichen tilted his head uncertainly, hoping the demonic cultivator wouldn’t do anything to the to-be juniors of their sect.

“A child? How old was your son? He was at least 17, right? But he still wouldn’t listen. They said again and again to not break any of the seals. Your son snuck out at night. Is that my fault? It’s his fault!”

Lan Xichen relaxed, grateful the Yiling Patriarch didn’t seem inclined to attack his sect’s disciples. He was slightly surprised Wei Wuxian was willing to turn the Madam’s anger onto himself to help them, but was grateful nonetheless. Lan Qiren felt similarly, but made an effort not to show it.

“And why did my son have a Blackwind flag on him?” the Madam demanded. “It was you! It must have been! You killed Ziyuan, you little bastard. You snuck that flag into his pocket! It must have been you!”

Several cultivators turned, feeling a presence coming from behind them.

There was the sound of motion in the grass, and the servant who had helped Young Master Mo attack Wei Wuxian earlier turned toward the noise.

He tried to scream, but the noise was cut off as the being disguised in shadow attacked.

“What was that?” Nie Mingjue asked with a shout, but apparently none of the spirits whose memories created the simulation had been able to see it, so the image was fairly blurry. Even with their senses enhanced by cultivation, no one could tell what it had been.

“You, give my son back, you filthy bastard!” the Madam shouted, this time grabbing Wei Wuxian’s collar. “You’re just as repulsive as your mother, you-”

“Be quiet,” Wei Wuxian ordered, paying the Madam little mind and instead focusing on the malicious power gathering before them.

Offended by the command, the Madam continued, “What? Who do you think you are, giving me orders?!”

But, following Wei Wuxian's line of sight, the watching cultivators realized there were more important issues than one woman's pride. Behind the gathered servants, a figure moved with sudden jerks of speed and power, erratically mimicking the movement of a human.

A fierce ghost.

"Oh, no," Jiang Yanli whispered, and Nie Huaisang watched the scene with growing worry.

With a crazed groan, the corpse jumped over the watching servants to attack Madam Mo and Wei Wuxian. Having seen the corpse already, it was child's play for Wei Wuxian to push the Madam and himself out of the way.

The corpse landed in a broken position, but, feeling no pain, quickly righted itself without hesitation, seemingly being led by its left arm.

Lan Wangji frowned as he watched, trying to determine the reason for the corpse's odd movement.

"Run!" the servants screamed, fleeing the scene. The body turned toward Wei Wuxian, who watched the dangerous monster with an amused smile.

The creature attacked, but Wei Wuxian dodged instantly, easily maneuvering his way around the attacks with the skill expected of the head disciple of a major sect.

"Help me!" Wei Wuxian cried, keeping up his defenseless act.

"He obviously knows the footwork taught by the Lotus Pier," Lan Qiren observed. "Though I hope those screams aren't common practice there."

Jiang Fengmian smiled in calm amusement, and Jiang Cheng blushed at the implied reproach. On the other hand, Lan Xichen frowned, feeling like the stressful situation didn't excuse the near-blatant disrespect his Uncle exhibited. With Sect Leader Jiang's easy acceptance, however, pointing the rudeness out would only spark conflict, so he remained silent.

The simulation followed Wei Wuxian as he ran behind a row of shrubs, crying for help as he went. In an instant, an arm reached through the shrubs, but Wei Wuxian dodged the corpse easily.

Behind his back, two fingers glowed an unnatural red.

Wen Ruohan smirked in anticipation.

Before any action was necessary, however, a gleaming silver blade attacked the corpse. Lan Sizhui floated through the air elegantly, re-summoning his sword for combat.

The ensuing battle easily displayed Sizhui's combat prowess and skill as he defended against the corpses attacks. The moment he got an opening, he slapped a talisman on the corpse's head, freezing it momentarily.

Resentful energy poured out of the corpse, until it finally collapsed as the talisman burned away.

“Not bad,” Nie Mingjue commented, excited by the prospect of getting to watch a fight.

Lan Xichen beamed, proud of the disciples despite never having met them.

“Flesh and blood… all completely drained. It seems….”

“Yes, exactly the same as Mo Ziyuan.”

Wind continued to blow, snuffing out lights all throughout the courtyard.

“Ghosts…. It’s true,” Madam Mo spoke, trembling with fear as she backed up.

“Mrs. Mo, stay there!” Lan Jingyi ordered as Sizhui prepared three additional talismans. Hitting their mark, the three talismans created a protective array above the center of the courtyard.

“A ghost repelling barrier?” Wei Wuxian observed. “Impressive for someone this young.”

If excessive displays of emotion weren’t forbidden and unbecoming, Lan Qiren would have preened.

“It was set up before, but it wasn’t damaged,” Lan Jingyi noticed. “Maybe, it wasn’t a fierce ghost?”

“Eh? How are they so sure?” Nie Huaisang asked. Even his brother had no answer.

Lan Sizhui nodded. “Yes, one victim in seven days, it could be an unsuppressed fierce ghost. It’s the standard set by the Yiling Patriarch."

Every watcher immediately turned to look at the simulation of Wei Wuxian, who lounged comfortably against the wall as he observed the juniors' deduction.

“A new, standardized system still used 13 years after his death,” Lan Xichen summarized to his uncle. Lan Qiren wanted to write off the accomplishment, but no one could deny how many of Wei Wuxian’s inventions had been appropriate for the everyday assignments cultivators had.

He might be an uncouth monster who fell into madness, but it seemed unquestionable that he was, at the very least, a mad genius.

That, or the vision was just nonsense the spirit who trapped them enjoyed.

“But this thing has killed three people in a row,” Sizhui continued. “It’s far more ferocious than a fierce ghost.”

“This is tricky. What should we do?” Jingyi asked.

“Send the signal.”

“Even if we send the signal now, if there’s no one nearby to back us up, then we….”

“It’s our only option. As members of the Lan Clan, we can’t let these people die. Even if we’re to die, we must wait for backup.”

“Exemplary students,” Jiang Fengmian acknowledged, bowing slightly to the twin jades and Lan Qiren. Lan Xichen smiled and all three bowed back, pleased that, even with two wars supposedly occurring, the Lan Clan had not fallen short. Lan Qiren hoped that meant the Gusu Lan sect was not heavily involved in the conflict.

The signal was shot into the air, and the firework exploded into the sect’s symbol.

“Huh? Is my luck that bad?” Wei Wuxian asked. “What if my old friends show up….”

“He has friends in the Lan Clan?” Jin Guangshan asked, wondering how the Jiang sect’s head disciple had come to know them.

“Not as far as I know,” Jiang Fengmian answered. “But, given that this occurred right as they were about to leave for Gusu, I assume they haven’t met yet in our world.”

Lan Wangji stared at Wei Wuxian curiously, trying to guess who the man was talking about.

“Okay.”

Wei Wuxian huffed, “Forget it, let’s just be quick. Before I fulfill the summoner’s wishes, I can’t leave even if I want to.”

However, when he lifted his arm to look at the marks, he jolted back in surprise.

“The two wounds are gone?”

Jiang Yanli squeaked in worry.

“Wait, Mo Ziyuan and that servant have been killed. Why did the deepest cut also disappear? Unless… Mrs. Mo… has already died? And the thing that has possessed her….”

The Madam’s corpse’s eyes blinked open.

Nie Huaisang turned toward his brother, desperate for comfort.

“What now?” he asked. “Will those kids be okay?”

Nie Huaisang, Jiang Cheng, Lan Wangji, and Jin Zixuan were probably younger than the two Lan juniors before them, but the knowledge that they were older in that time made the disciples appear to be children regardless.

“Depends on how much Wei Wuxian is willing to interfere. There’s no way to disguise a cultivator's involvement, so if he wants to keep his identity hidden the kids’ll be on their own.”

“Wei Wuxian wouldn’t do that!” Jiang Cheng protested, but Jin Zixuan disagreed.

“It’s pretty obvious that he’ll be killed if he’s found. He could pretend to be just adequate, but I’m not sure whatever’s attacking can be stopped without his full power.”

Lan Xichen frowned, feeling a wave of concern for the young disciples he would one day have.

Inspecting the servant’s body, Lan Jingyi felt along until he noticed the suspiciously missing limb.

Behind the boys, the Madam’s corpse stood up, groaning as resentful energy filled her body.

“I knew it,” Wei Wuxian muttered, then, watching the two attack, continued, murmuring “Those two are pretty good at this.”

Then, he messed up his hair further, bringing tears to his eyes.

“Ah! Don’t leave me alone! I’m scared!”

“Wei Wuxian!” Jiang Cheng hissed despite knowing he couldn’t interfere, burying his head in his hands in embarrassment.

Jiang Yanli laughed at the silly act, and Lan Wangji surprised himself with the pleasure he felt witnessing Wei Wuxian’s obvious, carefree enjoyment in life as he played around with people's reactions. Wangji's expression remained unchanged from its stern disapproval, but when Lan Xichen looked over he noticed the change in his brother’s mood.

“Entertained?” he whispered.

“Ridiculous,” Wangji responded.

Xichen laughed.

“Forgive us,” Lan Sizhui requested as he and Jingyi circled around the Madam and pinned her to the ground. She groaned slowly, sounding every bit as inhuman as she was.

Wei Wuxian quickly crouched in front of her, giggling.

“Wow! You got her!” he said as he reached a hand forward and began playfully shaking her hair. “Let’s see you try to beat me again!”

With a sudden movement, the corpse’s mouth snapped at him.

“Oh my goodness, she’s moving! Help!” he screamed, running away as the two baby Lans sighed in disapproval.

Nie Huaisang snorted, and his brother frowned. Nie Mingjue knew his brother was close to Wei Wuxian — proving the boy had some redeemable qualities — but he couldn’t accept anyone who chose to cultivate with resentful energy. Why was he so obsessed with power that he couldn’t simply put the hard work in to cultivating normally? It wasn’t as if he wasn’t talented enough.

The boy he saw in the simulation before him was plenty charismatic, but that didn’t excuse choosing to cultivate with the demonic path. Nothing did.

Lan Sizhui pulled out a talisman, but, right as he activated it, the corpse beneath them reacted as the arm forced itself out of their hold and attacked Sizhui.

With a quick turn, Wei Wuxian back kicked Jingyi forward, putting him between the corpse’s extended arm and Lan Sizhui.

“What is he doing!” Lan Qiren demanded, raising his voice above the standard the Cloud Recesses kept to. Wen Ruohan smirked in amusement at the reaction.

However, rather than damaging Jingyi, the corpse’s hand made contact with his robes. With a golden glow, the protective enchantments were activated and the arm was surrounded by a blue, spiritual fire. The corpse reared back as it was encompassed in the light.

Lan Qiren very pointedly made no further comments. Jiang Cheng wanted to demand an apology on behalf of his shixiong, but had enough respect for the elder’s position to remain silent. Besides, with Yu Ziyuan present, there was no way he would get away with making a scene.

“You lunatic! Why did you kick me?” Jingyi demanded. “You almost got me burnt.”

“It wasn’t me!”

“The spell on the clothes works,” Lan Sizhui reported. Lan Jingyi turned away from Wei Wuxian, and both moved to put their new knowledge to the test, using their robe’s spell and their blades to create an attack against the being they faced.

It wasn’t enough.

With a terrifying pulse of resentful energy, the corpse broke the seal, leaving the Lan juniors with few other options.

“She broke out?” Wei Wuxian calmly observed.

“What do you think he’ll do?” Jiang Cheng asked his sister, subconsciously turning to her for guidance like he had when he was young. The layer of calm indifference in the face of such a battle was widening the divide between the boy he knew and the demonic cultivator before him.

As the gap grew larger, it transformed into a terrifying abyss of possibilities.

She tried to send a reassuring smile towards her brother, but could only bring herself to say “I’m sure A-Xian will think of something!”

“Will he?” Wen Qing countered, not faltering even under the glare Jiang Cheng sent her way. “If he uses power beyond what the disgraced Mo Xuanyu holds, he’ll likely have to face questioning. I doubt he’d risk execution for a couple of strangers.”

Jiang Cheng continued to glare, but a glance back from his mother kept him silent.

However, instead of attacking with righteous cultivation, Wei Wuxian calmly walked towards the abandoned corpses lying on the ground. Picking it up by the collar, Wei Wuxian leaned close to whisper in his ear.

“Still sleeping?” he asked, his eyes flashing red.

Numerous cultivators jumped at that, and even Wen Ruohan narrowed his eyes at the echoed tone.

With the groan of a fierce corpse, the body stood up.

“Oh, A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli whispered, heartbroken.

Another corpse followed soon after, and the two turned to face the one the junior cultivators were fighting.

“Nice and powerful. Good,” Wei Wuxian spoke calmly, showing none of the insanity he had been playing up earlier in the day. “Do you see that left arm on your Mom?”

The corpses focused in on the arm that was engaging in combat with the two juniors, holding them off easily.

Once again, Wei Wuxian’s eyes sparked with red light.

“Go get it.”

The two corpses blasted towards the Madam, instantly fighting her with far more power than they should have had as new fierce corpses. They worked together, focusing only on attacking the arm — on following Wei Wuxian’s order to strike.

“Demonic power!” Lan Qiren hissed.

Jin Guangshan shivered at the unprecedented ability being shown before him, while Wen Ruohan trembled with excitement. Most everyone else was too shocked by what they saw before them to form a full opinion on the power; they could only watch in awe.

“Just three words? A few seconds and a few words, and-and he could take on a huge number of disciples.”

“And he’s trying to stay hidden now! What if he was willing to show his power?”

“Wait, is there anything we can do to stop him from attacking if he wants to? What-what about the Lan silencing spell? That’d work, right?”

Lan Xichen frowned in consideration, then shook his head. “It seemed like that was using sounds coupled with intent, rather than words, specifically. Remember the flute from the first event we saw? I have no doubt that, for something of this level, simply clapping his hands would work just as well. And that’s assuming he hasn’t already found a counter, given what we know he’s invented.”

Lan Wangji nodded once in agreement.

Wen Chao sneered at the analysis, asking “Well, then, how do you propose we deal with him?”

“You don’t need to ‘deal with him!’ He’s my-”

“Enough,” Madam Yu hissed, not wanting her son to attract Wen Ruohan’s attention over the boy of all things. She had always known Wei Wuxian would be the end of them. At least her son’s future self had finally wisened up to that fact and went to kill Wei Wuxian.

“He has already fallen low enough to create this art,” Lan Qiren agreed. “There’s no saving him now. Nothing could possibly excuse using this power.”

Wen Qing couldn’t help but notice that none of them were remembering their shared agreement that this was simply a spirit-made illusion. It was so realistic and similar to what the Jiangs knew of Wei Wuxian that that excuse was falling apart before their eyes.

“How did those corpses suddenly come alive?” Lan Sizhui asked, then turned a speculative glance at Wei Wuxian hiding behind a pillar. ‘Could it be… but it’s not him.’

“Eh? We can hear other people’s thoughts too? Not just Wei Wuxian’s?” Nie Huaisang asked, torn between being glad his friend was safe and worried about what they would hear.

Jiang Fengmian hummed, answering, "We don’t have enough information. It’s entirely possible whatever was used to create this amplified the spirit’s powers or somehow connected to the time each event was taking place at. According to this, it seems like dozens of new inventions were created in just twenty years. It’s possible that a more powerful form of inquiry was created too.”

“It does no good to speculate,” Lan Qiren argued. “It’s demonic cultivation. This nefarious power should not be looked into.”

Jiang Cheng's protest at the phrasing died under his mother's gaze.

With a bone-shattering crash, both corpses Wei Wuxian summoned were thrown to the side and collapsed as they rammed against the walls.

'Not even with two fresh corpses? What on earth is that arm?' Wei Wuxian wondered. 'If no backup arrives, those two boys will be in trouble. Should I use those corpses again? If I do… I could be exposed.'

Once again, those who knew Wei Wuxian as a boy were torn: saving the juniors was important, but those who knew Wei Wuxian personally didn't think it was worth his life.

The arm ran forward, lunging on the juniors, and Wei Wuxian prepared to act.

As the note rang through the air, earth shattered beneath the corpse's feet. The guqin's music continued, and the watchers followed the direction of the sound, tracing it back to the player.

Before them, the Second Jade of Lan stood calmly in the moonlight.

Even Wei Wuxian could only watch him in shock.

"Wangji," Lan Xichen whispered breathlessly, staring at a version of his younger brother who was now his senior. Despite barely changing physically, the long-held grief in the future Lan Wangji's expression made him appear far older than the boy Xichen knew. Even those who weren't able to read his brother's expressions could tell the man before them was different from one standing beside them.

The Jiangs had started being convinced of its authenticity by Wei Wuxian. Recognizing his brother's unique tells in the man were persuading Lan Xichen of the same.

"Hanguang-jun!" the boys shouted with relief.

"Hanguang-jun?" Jin Zixuan repeated, turning to the Lans for clarification.

Qiren frowned at the screen.

"I've never heard that title before."

"Nor have I."

"Mn."

To have earned a title like "Lightbearer" on top of his title as the Second Jade of Lan? Something must have happened in the years between them and the simulation. Could Lan Wangji have been more involved in the wars with the Wens and Yiling Patriarch than Lan Xichen hoped? Their clan was meant to exemplify righteousness, but there was a layer of grief in his brother that momentarily outweighed their civic duty in Lan Xichen's mind.

The music continued as the scene before them disappeared, bringing them back to the Cloud Recesses' garden they had been standing in during the junior quartet's explanation.

This time just Ouyang Zizhen stood before them, clearing his throat before saying "We'll give you all a short time to talk about what you've seen, and start the next segment in about five minutes."

"Okay, end scene!" was said by Jingyi, whose voice rang out despite the boy himself not appearing in the vision.

"I don't think we need to say that. The spirits will figure out what part to stop the memory at when they put everything together," Sizhui reminded calmly.

"But why can't we help out?!"

"You've been annoying them with your constant orders, idiot," Jin Ling responded. "At some point they're just going to start messing with you."

"Oh, like you can talk!"

"Enough," Sizhui commanded, making Ouyang Zizhen (the only person they could see) giggle.

For several seconds, silence permeated the grounds.

"So, what do we think?" Nie Mingjue asked.

"Pardon?"

"The Jiangs and Lans are the only ones who saw people whose behavior they would recognize," he elaborated. "So? Do you think what that Sizhui kid said was true?"

At the beginning, the adults had all been certain the vision was completely fake. However, over time, it seemed as if the Jiangs and Lan clan had been steadily won over by the familiar behavior.

Seeing that the Jiang clan was hesitant to speak, Lan Xichen answered first.

"I think it's certainly evidence in favor of it being real. My brother has various minute details in his expressions that I recognized in the little time we saw him. I understand the doubt, but this whole situation is unprecedented. Unless someone else knows my brother well enough to replicate those quirks, it doesn't seem impossible that this is, in some way, a connection to the future. Wangji?"

"Mn. I saw nothing that could disprove the explanation we were given."

"What about the lies they said about Wei Wuxian?!" Jiang Cheng interrupted. "We can't just believe that he would use — would create — demonic cultivation! And-and even if he was willing to, there's no way he would be able to create all the inventions they said he did. It's obviously lying!"

“And what do the adults think?” Wen Ruohan asked smoothly. Jiang Cheng flushed at his words being so easily written off, but he couldn’t argue with the Chief Cultivator.

Jiang Fengmian paused, then carefully answered “The ability to invent is not what surprised me. He is YunmengJiang’s head disciple, and often gets in trouble for more creative and radical ideas being used for fun. I think it’s possible he would be able to invent spirit attraction flags if an older version of the boy I know truly put his mind to it. As for the rest…”

“It’s certainly possible,” Madam Yu interrupted. “Nearly destroying YunmengJiang, creating demonic cultivation, I always told you he would bring shame upon us. And now look at what’s happened.”

“My Lady,” Jiang Fengmian reproached, but said nothing more. He understood that whatever would be revealed through this would likely reflect poorly on everyone involved. It was simply to be expected of a complete breach in privacy like the one they were being shown, and he could not fault her for her anger. However, like always, she was directing her anger on the wrong person.

“Are we then going to treat it like this is the future — a future — until we see something that proves otherwise? We don’t need to make decisions on how to act for a while, but continuing to think of it like just a hallucination could lead to us missing something important.” Madam Jin interjected, dragging attention away from her childhood friend’s controversial words.

“How could it be?” Wen Xu interrupted. “You can’t really expect us to believe the QishanWen sect could be destroyed, do you?”

With those words, the opening narration which had been forgotten was suddenly recalled.

“I can at least believe the part where they said the Wens ‘ran amok’ and ‘people suffered’ because of them!”

“Da-ge!” Nie Huaisang squeaked as Wen Ruohan turned a blazing gaze toward them.

Everyone braced themselves for an explosion, but Wen Ruohan only hummed in consideration. It had been all but stated that the reason the so-called Sunshot Campaign was successful was because of the actions taken by the Yiling Patriarch, Wei Wuxian. If someone had truly succeeded in creating demonic cultivation, then it was not impossible for that to have changed the outcome of the war.

And, now that he knew it was possible, he could make sure it would never happen again.

“I agree with assuming what we’re shown is the future,” he finally said. “A better question is what we plan to do with the information we’re being given. You yourselves agreed we can’t confirm whether this is really true. So, how will we respond? ”

“Well obviously the demonic cultivator can’t be allowed to live!” Jin Guangshan began, but cut off when Jiang Fengmian turned a sharp glare towards him. For someone who never picked fights with anyone, he could be truly terrifying when provoked.

“You can’t do that!” Jiang Cheng added, bowing quickly after remembering he was speaking to the Jin sect leader. “With all due respect, he hasn’t done anything yet! You can’t punish him for something he might do or no one would ever be able to do anything!”

“Even though he supposedly destroyed your sect?” Jin Guangshan countered.

“I apologise for interrupting, Sect Leader Jin,” Jiang Yanli began, stepping forward. “But my brother deserves to be given the same chance as everyone else. I have faith that he would not act without a reason, so, if we aren’t interested in attacking the Wens over what we see, and the Wens aren’t interested in attacking us, we have no reason to go after A-Xian.”

Jin Zixuan watched in shock, surprised by the courage such a simple, meek girl would show to defend her younger brother. After thinking for a minute, he spoke as well.

“I agree, Father.”

Surprised at the side his son took, Jin Guangshan stepped back. Wei Wuxian hadn’t developed his power yet, so he would be far easier to take out so long as the Jiang sect didn’t back him. However, they all knew they couldn’t attack the Wen sect when they got out without facing enormous casualties, and, with the knowledge that they lost, the Wen sect would most likely hesitate to attack them.

“I see,” Lan Xichen spoke. “Then may I assume we are in agreement to not punish anyone over what we see, but rather to take steps to prevent the tragedies from happening?”

“It would be best to simply make sure Wei Wuxian doesn’t need to invent demonic cultivation,” Lan Qiren agreed. Lan Wangji remained silent, still thinking over the grief he saw hidden in his older self and wondering what had caused it to form.

“The Nie sect also agrees,” Nie Mingjue responded reluctantly, wanting an excuse to go against the man who killed his father, but not willing to kill Huaisang’s friend over a questionably-proven possibility. His brother gave him a blinding smile, and Nie Mingjue knew he had made the right decision.

“Jiang also agrees,” Jiang Fengmian spoke, ignoring his wife’s scowl.

“Wen will allow this.”

“...Jin will also agree,” Jin Guangshan said at last.

All there was left to do was wait and watch.

The simulation started again.

Chapter End Notes

Just in case it wasn't clear, this is going to be a combination of the book/manhua and the donghua because I just want to include my favorite part in both! Have a great day! :)

“Da-shixiong!” a preteen shouted, sprinting across the lotus pier as fast as his little legs could carry him. Following shortly behind, his younger sister carried in her arms a package larger than her torso.

Fifteen year old Wei Wuxian smiled at them, reaching down to take the box from the sister.

“A-Lu, A-Yue, how’d it go?” he asked cheerilly. The two eleven year olds were his shidi and shimei, and had volunteered to help him with his investigation.

“No worries,” A-Yue informed him, nearly bouncing in excitement when he ruffled her hair. “The Nie sect’s head disciple had everything put together already.”

“I signed off the delivery,” A-Lu informed him, beaming and waiting impatiently for his turn to get his hair ruffled. He relaxed into head disciple's hand as Wei Wuxian complied, but backed away when the smile became a teasing smirk.

“Did you? But last I heard the Nie sect was full of monsters!”

“I was never scared!”

“Really? But I seem to remember someone hiding behind my legs last time Nie Mingjue came to visit even though he promised to help me out. Does that sound familiar to you, A-Yue?”

The girl nodded.

“I didn’t!” A-Lu confidently denied.

“...You did, A-Lu,” his sister refuted. A-Lu turned to A-Yue, eyes glistening with unparalleled betrayal. A-Yue simply blinked back, seemingly not understanding what his expression was caused by. A-Lu watched her for several seconds, then turned to Wei Wuxian.

“I want a new sister.”

“But if you don’t have A-Yue, how am I going to know when you’re lying to me?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“I wasn’t lying!”

“Yes you were,” A-Yue added with a smile. Her brother glared, the freckles dotting his cheeks disappeared under the enraged flush.

“I wasn’t!”

“Of course, of course, I’m sorry,” Wei Wuxian allowed. “You were both very brave, weren’t you?”

The two siblings looked at each other sceptically, then nodded at Wei Wuxian, accepting the truce.

Eager to get the topic away from his shameful past, A-Lu quickly asked “What is the package for? Did the Nie sect send over candy?”

“Tragically, no,” Wei Wuxian bemoaned. “It’s just some boring old scrolls I asked for. It’s about the effects of resentful energy on the mind. The thing affecting Uncle Jiang and his family uses resentful energy, and I want to try and confirm it isn’t hurting them before I do anything to it.”

“Welcome back, Wei-shixiong!” several voices called, bowing low. Wei Wuxian waved them off with a laugh, hiding his discomfort behind a smile.

That bow was from student to sect leader. It had started out as a joke — “Hello ladies and gentlemen, I’m your substitute Sect Leader today. Bow down before me!” — but, as the hours went on, the disciples started doing it less for irony’s sake and more as a serious reaction.

Instead of looking for a cure, they were adapting to a new normal.

That only increased his determination to succeed. He was a disciple of the Yunmeng Jiang sect; it was his job to do the impossible.

A guard he had stationed bowed at him as he entered the building where the Jiang family was being treated. Inside, their most trusted medical professionals were hard at working making sure everything was stable. Wei Wuxian privately mourned that Wen Qing was also knocked out by this; she would have been the best person to ask for a second opinion on his theories.

Setting the scrolls down on a nearby table, Wei Wuxian quickly looked over the quartet with worry. Like before, their conditions appeared to be perfectly stable, and, if not for the resentful energy clinging to their bodies, they would simply look asleep.

Messing with resentful energy to solve the mystery was risky. First he should improve upon a talisman so that he could figure out what the different pieces of the spell were, but he would need to study the Nie texts on resentful energy before that. Not only would it be dangerous to do anything more than joke about it, no sects would allow him to treat their clan leaders until he was an expert.

It didn't help that he was using the adult disciples to run the sect, so his only helpers were children. A-Lu and A-Yue were the most responsible eleven year olds (too young for real responsibility, but old enough for simple tasks), but, as great as they were, Wei Wuxian couldn’t help but feel somewhat understaffed.

(It would be much easier if the Lan elders were willing to lend a hand, but they were too busy arguing amongst themselves to be of any help.)

(Wei Wuxian was almost glad he never made it to the Cloud Recesses. He wouldn't have lasted a week.)

Lan Wangji's music began again, and Madam Mo covered her ears, curling in on herself in pain. The beautiful sounds were loaded with spiritual power, easily trapping the corpse where she stood.

Wei Wuxian continued to stare, frozen in shock. Resentful energy curled around his fingers as he paused in the commands he had been giving.

'Why is he here?' Wei Wuxian thought.

"Eh? You know each other?" Nie Huaisang whispered to the teenage Lan Wangji standing near him. The two made eye contact for a moment, before Lan Wangji shook his head.

"We have not met."

"I assume they met during the so-called Sunshot Campaign," Lan Xichen continued, knowing the words his brother was trying to convey. Wei Wuxian was going to come to the Cloud Recesses for the exchange, but Lan Xichen knew his brother's icy aura prevented him from ever getting close to his fellow students. The war was by far the most likely explanation.

Turning quickly, Wei Wuxian sped away from the Lan's second young master while Lan Sizhui and Lan Jingyi approached their Hanguang-jun, bowing in deep gratitude.

Wei Wuxian ran back to the shack he had woken up in, relaxing slightly when he saw that the donkey was still present. He paused to remove all evidence of the summoning ritual Mo Xuanyu had done, then turned to glance back at the direction he came from.

"I need to get out of here."

Jiang Cheng frowned.

Based on the reactions of the two junior Lans, it seemed likely that Lan Wangji had grown up to be even more respected and righteous than he was already reputed to be. For Wei Wuxian's initial reaction to be running….

What exactly did this future-cultivation-world do to demonic cultivators?

The scenery around them shifted into a bright sky above an empty plains, speeding through the passage of time in an instant. Wei Wuxian and several other travelers stood gathered around a well, temporarily resting in the shade of a lone tree.

"Hey, boss, make due with this straw and hit the road!" Wei Wuxian ordered his donkey, who turned away in disgust at the food being offered to him.

Jiang Cheng's eyes ventured toward Jin Zixuan, and he had to turn away to contain his laughter. If the other boy got offended at being called a peacock, he was sure to explode at being compared to a donkey.

(A haughty, prideful, unhelpful donkey, but still.)

Nie Mingjue rolled his eyes at the "terrifying demonic cultivator" arguing with an animal, but privately noted how no one was scared of Wei Wuxian anymore. They had all backed up in fear when they saw his power against the arm, but his easy charm had won them over yet again.

Though, if there was one person Nie Mingjue would really rather didn't remember Wei Wuxian's power, it was Wen Ruohan. By the look in the his eyes, he doubted that would happen any time soon.

"Why is the compass not working when we're almost at the foot of the mountain?" one of the waiting travelers bemoaned.

"Compass? Are they lost?"

"Quite an elaborate design for a compass," Jiang Fengmian observed, noticing the complex carvings on the bottom. It seemed like the kind of meaningless intricacies he would expect of the Jins or monarchs, rather than poor travelers.

"Compass?" Wei Wuxian repeated, surprise dancing across his eyes before settling into understanding. "Rogue cultivators on a night hunt?"

"Huh?" Nie Huaisang asked, tilting his head in childish confusion. Internally, his mind rapidly sped through different reasons why his friend would have come to that conclusion.

Perhaps that compass design had become common for cultivators. Rogue cultivators weren't overly wealthy, but they could usually live more comfortably than the poorer farmers. It could be a symbol of status signifying them as cultivators, or a symbol connecting them to a sect. At this point, anything was possible; the future seemed radically different from the world he knew now.

"Is your compass broken?" a young man asked as Wei Wuxian approached the tree they stood under. "It's only 5,000 meters from Dafan mountain. We have to set off now."

Wei Wuxian sighed, sitting down so he could lean on the tree.

'I wonder if I'll be able to recruit some great ghosts at Dafan mountain,' he thought, rubbing his eyes tiredly, only to jerk back awake as his shoulder was tapped.

"Here you are," a young woman offered, holding an apple out to him.

Nie Huaisang jumped as the donkey let out a terrifying noise and tried to steal the apple. Unable to help himself, Jin Zixuan snorted at the action, and received terrifying glares from both Nie Mingjue and Jiang Cheng, while Nie Huaisang looked away silently.

Lan Wangji barely resisted sighing at the needless conflict; his brother's amusement at his concealed annoyance wasn't helping either.

Wei Wuxian frowned at the donkey, continuing to hold the apple in the air.

"Hey, this is for me!" he protested harshly.

The donkey frowned, its eyes widening and glistening with tears in the most adorable puppy eyes it could form.

Several people wanted to coo at the image.

Wei Wuxian stared at the donkey, then looked at the apple, then back at him, suddenly recalling the apple he threw to get the donkey to move initially.

His face morphed into a terrifying smirk.

"Oh no," Jiang Cheng sighed.

"Lil' Apple, let's go!" he cried out, holding the apple in front of the hyper-focused donkey like bait on a fishing rod.

Nie Mingjue snorted, and Lan Xichen heard a few snickers from the people around him. In fact, even Wen Qing and Lan Wangji were cracking slight smiles, charmed by Wei Wuxian's joy. It was much easier to trust someone when you got to hear all the thoughts in their head.

Suddenly, it occurred to him how much of a breach of privacy this was. He could only hope it stuck to public activities rather than more intimate ones, especially with Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan watching for any weaknesses they could exploit.

Wei Wuxian huffed a laugh as he and the donkey sped through the forest. "Good boy, that was fast. And they say dogs are a man's best friend. You're the apple of my eye, buddy! Let's go!"

"Oh, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli laughed as well, glad that her little brother's creativity and humor hadn't been destroyed over the years. And, once again, the comment about dogs proved that whoever put this together knew far more than they should about Wei Wuxian.

Soon Wei Wuxian reached a small town at the foot of Dafan mountain. In it, the same group of rouge cultivators all stood, gathered around their compass in confusion.

"All the Compasses of Evil indicate no abnormalities. I don't think there's a soul-eating beast here," one rouge cultivator reported.

"...The compasses of what?" Jiang Cheng asked and turned to Huaisang, who only shook his head in equal confusion. It seemed there was more to the compass than the simple identifier Huaisang had initially theorized there to be. He wondered when it was created.

"Don't be so hasty," his friend reminded him. "The compasses just point out a rough direction. They can't be fully trusted."

“What? Think about who invented the compass of evil! I’ve never heard of anything that could disrupt some of his work!”

“I know it was the Yiling Patriarch, but he couldn’t make everything perfect, could he?!”

There was silence as the watchers tried to connect “the Yiling Patriarch” title they had only just learned about to a face.

Then-

“Wait… he means Wei Wuxian?” Jiang Cheng asked.

“...Apparently,” Lan Xichen confirmed, thoroughly befuddled by yet another world-changing invention being attributed to the Jiang Sect’s head disciple.

“Hah, he probably just used his power to steal the credit from others,” Wen Chao scoffed.

A “like you always do?” was on the tip of Jiang Cheng’s tongue, but was held back by his mother’s gaze. Airing their personal grievances was one thing, but Yu Ziyuan wouldn’t allow her son to be stupid enough to attract Wen Ruohan’s gaze unnecessarily.

The men growled back, “I never said that you shouldn’t doubt or that everything he made was perfect! Calm down!”

“I’m perfectly calm! I’m just saying Wei Ying can make mistakes!”

“Oh shut up!”

A brawl broke out, and the passing Wei Wuxian looked over at the fight, blinking in confusion.

While the people around him laughed at the passing Wei Ying’s ignorance of his role in the fight around him, Wen Ruohan’s mind was consumed by other matters. The only mention of his clan, the strongest clan of the time, was in reference to what Wei Wuxian’s role was in their fall. They were both considered monsters who were defeated over a decade ago, so what was the difference?

Was it simply that Wei Wuxian was more recent?

No, it was more than that. Even in the everyday tasks of a cultivator, he had been mentioned numerous times, and the Wens hadn’t been talked about once.

After the Wens had decimated the four remaining great sects, Wei Wuxian had tried to finish the job. His (disappointing, useless) sons were technically his heirs, but Wei Wuxian was the true successor to his legacy as the world’s most dangerous cultivator.

And yet, he was remembered differently.

The Wens were a piece of ancient history; Wei Wuxian was the monster parents told their children about to make them behave. Even though Wen Ruohan had cultivated to the peak of what was possible, even though he had gotten the nearly-forgotten technique of the Core Melting Hand-

Or perhaps that was it. He had nearly destroyed the cultivation world, but Wei Wuxian had created.

Wen Ruohan had perfected every known technique, and the Lans and Nie and even Wen Zhuliu had unique abilities passed down through generations that set them apart from other cultivators. However, none of them had ever created anything. Wei Wuxian had invented talismans and flags and the compass of evil and the entire field of demonic cultivation all in the few short years he had been alive. All by himself, he had become powerful enough for the world to unite against him.

Something to consider going forward.

Her gaze looked tired, and she stood so, so still that, for a moment, she almost seemed to be a corpse. Soon, she relaxed, closed her eyes, and drooped down.

Then shrieked with laughter.

Wen Chao would forever deny squealing in freight.

With a crazed expression, the woman gleefully began dancing through the busy street, paying no mind to the people walking around her.

“A-Yan!” an elderly woman called with worry, approaching the girl.

Even when she was tightly grasped from behind, “A-Yan” stared dully at the sky. Her smile remained as unchanged as Jin Guangshan’s unsavory habits.

“A-Yan! Let’s go back. Let’s go back!” the woman continued to beg as Wei Wuxian observed silently. Then, suddenly, A-Yan threw the woman to the ground, chuckling to herself as she began to dance once again.

Yu Ziyuan frowned at the scene, not showing a trace of confusion on her face despite her internal bewilderment. It was entirely possible the girl was simply crazy, but, with every world-shattering revelation this simulation had shown them, she feared the answer was not so simple.

If the trend persisted, Wei Wuxian was most likely responsible for this too. To be able to create demonic cultivation, drive people to insanity, resurrect the dead, and, apparently, force the watchers into the simulation they were stuck in was beyond even her wildest fears.

How much had the brat changed in the world her children would one-day live in? Worry gnawed at her mind.

Turning to a nearby merchant, Wei Wuxian asked "Mister, can you tell me what happened to that girl?"

"What? Are you here to catch those creatures as well?"

"No, no, I'm… a storyteller. I'm gathering folk tales."

Another easy, casual lie. Jiang Fengmian knew his best friend's son was capable of them when causing mischief, but he had not forgotten the way Wei Wuxian ran from Lan Wangji's older self. He had faith in the boy, especially considering the opening narration proclaiming him to have been "set up." He trusted the young man he had raised to always do the right thing.

But he still couldn't be sure how much of what he saw was true. No matter what his wife thought, he wouldn't put their children's lives at risk. He believed in Wei Wuxian — trusted their A-Ying — but refused to show blind faith.

"On our Dafan mountain here, there's an old burial mound," the merchant explained. "A few months back there was a dark and stormy night. When the next day came, people found that a few coffins had been brought to the surface. They, along with the corpses inside them, had been burnt coal-black by the lightning. The townspeople were more anxious than ever. After a few rounds of prayer, they restored the burial grounds and thought that everything was over. We never would have guessed the townspeople would start to lose their souls."

"Lose their souls?" Wei Wuxian repeated.

Every watching cultivator remained silent as they analyzed the information, their minds working to sort out the cause instinctively even though there was nothing they could do.

"The first was a sluggard, a poor wretch. Loafing around and doing nothing. On the night of the landslide, he happened to be stuck in the mountain. He was lucky enough to come back safely. The strange thing, though, was that just a few days after he came back, he suddenly got himself a bride, and arranged their marriage with great fanfare, telling people he was settling down and going to start working. On their wedding night, he got himself as drunk as he could. After he collapsed onto the bed, he never got up again. He was all ice-cold and dreary eyed. After lying there for a couple of days, eating and drinking nothing, he finally entered the ground. His poor bride was widowed just after being married.

"The second girl was A-Yan, the girl from blacksmith Zheng's. Her husband was killed by wolves when he was hunting on the mountain. After she learned of this, the exact same thing happened. It's hard to believe, but afterwards her soul-loss cured on its own. However, she'd gone crazy as well, always dancing for others to watch.

"The third was A-Yan's father, blacksmith Zheng…. By now, there's been seven consecutive victims."

Wei Wuxian looked down solemnly, quietly thinking the matter over with the severity it deserved.

Jiang Cheng blinked in surprise. He knew Wei Wuxian could be serious when he had to be — jokes or not, he was the Yungmeng Jiang sect's head disciple for a reason — but it was still odd to see it happen so easily. He knew everyone had to grow up, but part of him had expected "Xianxian is three" to always be true.

Somehow, Wei Wuxian's maturity felt more like something was stolen than gained.

Continuing his ride into the mountains, Wei Wuxian contemplated what he heard.

'The evil thing has devoured seven souls. No wonder many families are gathered here. It's probably an advanced soul-eating fiend. If this night hunt's prey is this extraordinary, it's only natural for the compass of evil to go awry.'

Wei Wuxian trotted off, not noticing a nearby group of rogue cultivators who stood nearby. They were grumbling amongst themselves, one hanging injured over another's shoulder.

"Did the leader of such a big sect really need to fight over a soul-consuming spirit with us?"

"What can we do? If you're going to offend a sect, the last one you should offend is the Jiang sect. If you're going to offend a person, the last person you should offend is Jiang Cheng."

"...Huh? Jiang Cheng asked.

"A-Cheng?" Jiang Yanli repeated in disbelief. It was true her brother could get prickly and temperamental, but it was never serious. He joked around at being annoyed with Wei Wuxian and his other shixiong, but he certainly didn't have a reputation for being vicious.

Jiang Fengmian quietly wondered if his son had grown into a man like his mother.

He hoped that Jiang Cheng's life was at least happier.

The rogue cultivators sighed.

"The only thing we can do is feel sorry for ourselves, huh?"

The watcher's were then brought along with Wei Wuxian, following him deeper into the forest. After traveling for a distance, he suddenly jerked to attention.

Along the forest floor, thin strings and talismans — traps — were just barely visible to a trained eye.

His eyes widened as he pulled Little Apple to a stop with a whispered "Oh no." Unfortunately, he had already gotten too close, and had to jump off the donkey to avoid the trap.

Jin Zixuan frowned in annoyance at Jiang Yanli's worried expression. Honestly, who would be stupid enough to place traps in such a public area? At least Wei Wuxian was skilled enough to avoid it; he didn't want to imagine what her expression would have been like otherwise.

"A spirit net?" Wei Wuxian observed with a chuckle, getting up. "I never thought I'd see one of those in such a remote area. What kind of rich people go night hunting here?"

Unable to resist, Nie Huaisang and Jiang Cheng looked over at the Jin family, and Jin Zixuan flushed in annoyance at the silence accusation standing up straighter. Jiang Cheng thought the response suited a peacock, but knew saying so would turn his already-annoyed mother's displeasure on him.

Little Apple neighed in terror, but all Wei Wuxian did was pick up the apple which had fallen and took a bite.

"Apple, don't get mad at me," he lectured with amusement. "It's a spirit net, so I don't have anything capable of saving you."

He was about to continue, but, suddenly cut off, hearing a scream for help.

"Is anyone there?!"

"Help us!"

"People?" Jiang Yanli asked, growing concerned.

And, indeed, they were. Up high, both male and female voices were crying for mercy from where they were stuck in the nets. Wei Wuxian frowned and was about to take action, but, hearing the approach of another person, quickly backed off.

In the treetops, a boy wearing the golden uniform of the Jins crouched down on a branch to observe what he had caught in his net.

"What? A donkey?" the boy demanded. From his spot hidden behind a tree, Wei Wuxian chuckled at the boy's outrage. "I set more than 400 spirit nets, but I haven't been able to catch one ghost! I just find you idiots every single time!"

Jin Guangshan reevaluated the boy carefully, knowing that, even for the Jin clan, that was an expensive purchase. The unnamed boy must be quite high up in terms of standing.

(He hoped it wasn't another one of his illegitimate sons. No-touching or not, he wasn't sure he would be able to survive his wife's fury.)

The kid tsked, grumbling to himself about the lack of spirits, and allowing the watchers to get their first full view of the boy.

"Hey! That brat!" Nie Mingjue pointed out, recognizing him as the Jin in the quartet of boys who were their "spokespeople from the future."

Lan Xichen wondered how Jin Ling became friends with Lan Sizhui and Lan Jingyi. Perhaps the Lan Clan did another cultural exchange? If so, it was likely Lan Qiren would forbid another cultural exchange for quite some time; his uncle was not pleased with the mess they were stuck in.

Jiang Cheng turned, about to whisper to Wei Wuxian about the hilarity of a mini-peacock, when he remembered Wei Wuxian wasn't there. Scowling, he glared down at the ground as if it was responsible for the simulation's creators deciding Wei Wuxian wasn't a member of the Jiang clan.

(He knew, in reality, it was more his mother's fault than anything. But he also knew better than to argue about it with her, as she was usually right on such matters.)

(Right?)

"Jin Clan of Lanling. A rich guy indeed," Wei Wuxian thought. "In one day I've bumped into both the Lans and Jins. I've got the best luck."

Little Apple cried from where it was hung. Similarly, the people trapped there shouted out again.

"Please, Young Master! Do us a small favor and let us down!"

Jin Ling glared, "You guys should just stay here! I don't want you messing around and getting in my way again."

Jin Zixuan frowned, disliking the fact that the first appearance of his sect was in the form of such a heartless boy.

However, having dropped his guard, Wei Wuxian had relaxed, and made a small sound.

"Who's there?"

Nie Huaisang gulped in nervousness at the tense situation. He moved closer to his brother until he was standing inside Nie Mingjue's chest, the no-touch rule allowing them to be even more intimate than they could in the real world. A fond, amused sigh left his brother's lips at his action, but he allowed Huaisang to stay.

Wei Wuxian slipped out of range just before Jin Ling spun around to find him. The boy had an arrow docked and poised to shoot in an instant, but his target was nowhere to be found.

A snap of a branch came from behind him, and in an instant Jin Ling launched an arrow towards the sound.

It pierced an apple to a tree.

Jiang Cheng snickered, pleased to see his shixiong get one over the annoying rich kid. The expression the peacock was making as time went on was extremely amusing.

Though, he had to admit the kid was a bit cute with how easily annoyed he got. He would never repeat it to anyone, but he knew his sister was drawing comparisons between the kid's personality and his own.

Once again, Wei Wuxian paused, observed the situation, and decided panicking was the best course of action.

"Ah! Don't kill me! Don't kill me!" he took a shuddering breath, then pointed at the boy indignantly. "First you capture my donkey, and now you wanna kill me? You're so cruel!"

"Huh? It's you," Jin Ling noticed, before huffing in disapproval. "What? You lost your memory after you were driven away? You don't even recognize our coat of arms?"

"Lost memory?"

"Oh. He's speaking to Mo Xuanyu…. Uh oh."

While the others worried about whether Wei Wuxian's act would hold up, Madam Jin focused all her energy on remaining silent.

If Jin Ling knew Mo Xuanyu, and described it as "our" coat of arms, then there was really only one possibility for the boy's "Great Sect Leader" father could be.

'Do not say anything,' she thought to herself. 'Do not make a scene. Destroy him all you want once you're back, but Wen Ruohan is here and that parasite will simply hide behind him. You need to be here for Zixuan right now. Do not say anything. Do not say anything.'

"A Jin? Hm... a nice face. A pity the boy was so untalented," Jin Guangshan muttered.

Madam Jin felt something within her snap.

"You don't even care?!"

"Er, now dear-"

"First you go around putting your paws off anything with legs, and now the only thing that matters to you is their appearance?! You're not even remotely ashamed of your actions!"

She reached forward, as if to dig her hand into his heart, only to pass through as if they were both tricks of the light. Her own powerless — in terms of both stopping him and getting revenge — only infuriated her further. She glared with the wrath of a million stars, and simmered with rage as she allowed Yu Ziyuan to stand with her. They moved back to their seats as one.

The Jiang Matriarch would have thrown her chair at the Jin sect leader — potential war or not — but had realized fairly early on that they could only sit on the chairs, not move them. Nevertheless, her and Madam Jin's combined glares would burn a hole straight through the Jin leader's back.

Wen Ruohan found the whole thing highly amusing.

Jin Zixuan backed away in embarrassment, not even paying attention to the simulation's Wei Wuxian realizing the same thing his mother did (and narrating to himself over how his father died during sex). The whole situation would reflect badly on the Jin sect, but, if he was being realistic, it was unlikely any sect would escape shame by the end.

Jiang Cheng looked over and, beside Wen Ruohan's amused expression and Wen Qing's disgusted one, noticed Wen Chao's mocking scorn. The look infuriated him, especially since it seemed to be directed more towards Jin Zixuan than the parents.

He stood next to the Jin heir, who looked toward him with a startled expression.

"Hey, what are you muttering about over there?" Jin Ling demanded, having heard Wei Wuxian's murmurs.

Wei Wuxian ignored him, continuing "At the first siege of burial mounds, Jiang Cheng ranked first, and Jin Guangshan must have been second. How hilarious that I've got his bastard son's body now. What a mess…."

Several people laughed at Wei Wuxian's tired reaction to the situation, but Jiang Cheng was distracted. He had "ranked first" at the siege. He had sent the greatest number of people to the battle to kill Wei Wuxian.

He didn't like the image that provoked.

Jin Ling huffed, muttering "Crazy guy." He turned to leave.

"Hey, don't leave! Let my donkey down first!"

"Get away from me! It's bad enough having to see you. Lunatic."

Jiang Cheng growled at the repeated insult, even if it was technically against Mo Xuanyu.

"Hey, don't forget I'm your senior. Is that how you treat your seniors? I guess your mother didn't teach you any manners."

At these words, the boy started. Then, with clenched firsts, unsheathed his sword and began to attack.

"What did you say?" he demanded, swinging in a beautiful arc that Wei Wuxian easily ducked under. Rather than displaying the boy's ineptitude, his flawless technique instead showed Wei Ying's skill.

Madam Jin frowned at her husband. The poor Jin Ling boy must have a complicated family history if he was another bastard son of her husband's. The riches and exemplary sword technique seemed to imply he was another child of theirs, but she couldn't imagine sleeping with her whore of a husband again.

Jin Ling continued to vigorously take the offensive, but Wei Wuxian got out of the way each time, not even bothering to defend or attack the boy. He leapt and twisted and spun out of range, playing with the boy and showing a style far more unorthodox than YunMeng Jiang's more traditional moves.

For a moment, Jiang Cheng was overwhelmed by a sense of nostalgia. It had only been an hour or so since he was with his Wei Wuxian, but with everything that had been shown, his shixiong's effortless, almost mocking fighting style felt like it was a decade ago.

He supposed, to the Wei Ying before him, it actually was.

"Hm. Not bad," Wei Wuxian acknowledged, pausing. Jing Ling attacked again, not noticing how Wei Wuxian yanked a leaf off a nearby branch.

As Jing Ling lunged forward, Wei Wuxian spun into a side-step, surging power into the leaf and twisting to plant it on the young Jin's back.

"Down you go!" he ordered, as red light sparked.

Lan Qiren unconsciously took a step back, wary of the resentful energy.

The leaf fizzled, changing form until its shape vaguely resembled a human, and crackled with red electricity. Soon, resentful energy burst out of it and congregated above as if drawn in by a black hole. The formed orb then bulged, expanding into the form of an enormous man.

Jin Ling was crushed under it.

"Was that… a ghost?" Lan Xichen wondered aloud.

Nie Mingjue gave a huffed half-laugh, then responded, "It… seemed to be."

None of them had any real idea what the power of demonic cultivation entailed. After all, it had been nothing but a theory until this future-Wei Wuxian invented it; the only clues they had were its ties to death and resurrection. However, the more they saw, the more it appeared to be a widely varied branch of cultivation.

Lan Qiren's fear peaked, knowing that anyone who got their hands on the style would be capable of causing near-unprecedented destruction. He could not allow Wei Wuxian to create it.

Some ways away, Jin Zixuan winced, feeling compassion for Jin Ling and knowing he would have probably reacted the exact same way in that situation. With the knowledge of how young the boy was, it made him feel like he was looking over a younger sibling (though he admittedly didn't have much experience with those; his mom wanted to eviscerate any who came near them).

Soon the dust cleared, and they could see Jin Ling flat against the ground, the summoned ghost nowhere in sight. The boy groaned, trying to get up.

“Huh?”

Despite the lack of any visible object pressing him down, Jin Ling could not rise. He soon collapsed from the strain, instead turning to glare at the approaching figure.

Wei Wuxian giggled, kicking the dropped sword into his hand with the ease of a seasoned fighter.

“Heh. That’s a really nice sword! But it looks so familiar.”

Jin Guangshan took a closer look at the blade when he heard those words, before his eyes widened in realization.

“Wait, that’s mine!” his son realized.

Deciding that train of thought was unimportant, Wei Wuxian instead tossed the sword, allowing it to spin through the air as it cut down Little Apple and the rogue cultivators.

“Mo Xuanyu, are you insane?” Jin Ling shouted. “Studying demonic cultivation? Let me up! Lunatic! You damn gay! When I tell my uncle about this, you’ll be a dead man!”

“Uncle? Why don’t you tell your Dad?”

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli quietly reproached, forgetting for a moment that the Wei Ying before her wasn’t real. Although Wei Wuxian was undoubtedly a genius, he always had a bit of trouble picking up certain social cues. Despite knowing when someone was annoyed, the more specific details usually escaped him.

And, even if the Jin boy had been fairly rude, there was no malicious intent in it. If anything, it reminded her of a mix of her brother’s anger and her fiance’s confidence. It was almost… cute.

“Who’s your uncle?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“I’m his uncle. Any last words?” a voice answered as a man stepped into the clearing, brushing a branch out of his way. At the voice, Wei Wuxian startled momentarily, turning to it with shock.

“Is that-”

“A-Cheng?” Yanli gasped out.

A sharp intake of breath. Wei Wuxian was trembling, his eyes so wide it looked like they’d fall out of their sockets. In them, pain, horror, shock, and fear were clearly etched in.

Jiang Cheng froze, suddenly remembering the first conversation the simulation showed.

“Really? Who killed him?”

"Who else? His old friend Jiang Cheng, leader of the Jiang Clan."

Like Wen Chao, he hadn't put much stock into what the civilians said. Wei Wuxian being capable of — much less willing to — kill 3,000 cultivators in one night was impossible. So, surely, their supposed falling out was also greatly embellished and exaggerated.

He knew his feelings towards Wei Wuxian were complicated (never skilled enough for Mom, never carefree enough for Dad), but, regardless of blood, they were still brothers.

Surely, nothing could tear them apart.

(But none of that explained the haunted look in Wei Wuxian's gaze as he saw his brother for the first time in thirteen years.)

A sigh, and the older Jiang Cheng stepped fully into their view.

"Jin Ling, I didn't come out on this hunt to watch you humiliate yourself. Get up now."

Jiang Cheng stepped forward until he was right in front of his older self, gazing intently at the man he would supposedly become. Behind him, the rest of his family followed, walking unsteadily — as if in a trance.

The first thing Jiang Cheng noticed was how much ~~cooler~~ more mature he looked. His unaging body, like Lan Wangji's, still seemed to develop into an older appearance.

The second thing he noticed was how angry he seemed. Shadows had formed under his older-self's eyes, and the anger towards his nephew, while still affectionate, lacked the teasing nature it had when he argued with Wei Wuxian. His nephew….

"Wait, that's A-Jie's son?!" he shouted, turning to the still-incapacitated Jin Ling.

"He couldn't be! A-Xuan's only fif-" Madam Jin cut off, suddenly remembering what they were being shown. Jiang Cheng and Lan Wangji might have looked slightly older, but they had to be truly observed for those differences to be apparent. If anything, it seemed more like an alternate reality of some sort. It hadn't really sunk in for any of them that this was the future.

"...My son?" Jin Zixuan breathed out, staring at the boy.

Confliction poured over him, nearly suffocating him in a hundred different emotions. First, there was anger. He hadn't escaped; he hadn't gotten out. He was forced into a loveless, arranged marriage like his parents to a girl he didn't even know.

Then, there was guilt. From what he had seen watching the simulation with her, there seemed to be far more to Jiang Yanli than the plain, talentless wallflower he had seen before.

And then came frustration, as he realized he didn't know how he felt about his arranged marriage anymore.

Madam Jin, who had been watching to stop her son if he lost his temper in front of the Jiangs, noticed his internal conflict. Good; perhaps her son was finally learning of Yanli's virtues. She would castrate him alive if she thought he would become like her husband.

Finally, the stare down between the two once-brothers ended, and Wei Wuxian silently began to pull the leaf talisman he had created towards himself with resentful energy.

Purple lightning grabbed hold of it, pulling it into Jiang Cheng's grasp. He observed it for a moment, before clenching his fists and frying it with electricity.

Yu Ziyuan looked on in approval.

Jiang Fengmian wanted to feel the same way — he was certainly pleased his son had grown so powerful — but the anger in the older Jiang Cheng's expression clouded his joy.

"Psycho! I'll break your legs!" Jin Ling shouted.

"Break his legs?" Jiang Cheng asked. "Haven't I told you? When dealing with those without honor, just kill them and feed them to your dog."

Jiang Cheng flinched.

Yanli bit her lip, torn between frowning at the man threatening her brother with something he was terrified of, and crying at how much rage was buried in her other brother.

How could this have happened?

Jin Ling grabbed his sword, lunging forward like an arrow and attacking Wei Wuxian. Rather than playfully dancing around, as he did before, Wei Wuxian blinked in shock at the boy.

'This kid is…'

A blade cut between them.

Nie Huaisang squeaked, and both Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan jumped slightly, lacking the experience the adults had to avoid reacting. Lan Wangji kept still only out of his monstrous diligence, and Jiang Yanli sucked in a breath, having been caught off-guard.

Meanwhile, Lan Qiren observed the attacking blade in shock, recognizing it immediately.

Both Jin Ling and Wei Wuxian had been knocked back by the blade's enormous energy. As Wei Wuxian tried to steady himself, his foot caught on a rock and he fell over.

Jiang Cheng remained still, but observed the blade with surprise.

"It's… Bichen?"

"It's what?" the younger Jiang Cheng asked, not recognizing a sword named "Dustless."

Lan Xichen paused, then carefully answered, “It’s my brother’s blade.”

The resulting glare Madam Yu sent the Second Jade was greeted with an emotionless bow of apology.

The blade began to shake, before picking up off the ground and returning to the so-called Hanguang-jun. White robes swayed as he stepped out of the forest’s shadows to stand directly before the fallen Wei Wuxian.

Wei Ying looked up, making eye contact with the imposing figure blocking off the moonlight.

Several people looked between the Lan Wangji and the older Hanguang-jun, blinking in confusion at both the eerie similarities and minute differences.

Wei Wuxian’s expression hadn’t lost its stunned look, and, if anything, transitioned closer to horror when he realized who was before him.

If Wei Wuxian had been scared enough of Lan Wangji to run away from the Mo compound, then they couldn’t have had a good relationship. Lan Qiren was privately proud of his nephew for doing so much to resist the evil that he’d be instantly recognizable. Lan Wangji would never be tempted by demonic cultivation.

Wei Wuxian finally stood up, watching cautiously as Lan Wangji walked closer and closer, eventually forcing him to move out of the way so the man could approach Jiang Wanyin.

Jiang Cheng frowned at the rude disregard, consciously ignoring the part of him which cheerfully reminded that older-him was about to do something much worse.

“Second master Lan. You live up to your reputation to appear wherever chaos is. I never imagined you’d show up in such a remote place.”

“Elders are speaking. Stop interrupting,” Jiang Cheng responded thoughtlessly. “The Lan Clan sees you as a model for all cultivators. Is this how you teach your disciples?”

Lan Jingyi and Lan Sizhui stepped behind Lan Wangji, and Lan Sizhui bowed to Wei Wuxian.

The Jiang siblings smiled at the respect. With both Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng’s older selves present, it felt like very few people were granting their brother the honor he deserved. Even though the boy wouldn’t have been born yet, Jiang Cheng almost regretted not making it to Gusu Lan for the exchange; he wanted to see what kind of place would raise such an exemplary kid.

“Mr. Jin,” Lan Sizhui greeted. “Night hunts have always been fair game, but casting spirit nets around Dafan Mountain makes things difficult for other clan’s disciples. That’s against the rules, right?”

Jin Ling huffed, “They were stupid enough to get caught. What can I do about that?”

Jiang Cheng scowled at the mini-peacock who had obviously gotten far more from his father than his mother. As if instinctively knowing what he was thinking, Jiang Yanli sent a disapproving glance over, making him look away. He knew he shouldn’t judge Jin Ling (who the older him obviously loved) in just a few seconds, but it was difficult when the boy he didn’t know was pitted against his shixiong. How could someone Jiang Yanli raised be so annoying?

It was probably the peacock’s fault.

“Sect Leader Jiang! Sect Leader Jiang!” a voice called out as a Jiang disciple stepped into the clearing. “Sect Leader.. Jiang.”

“What’s the matter?”

Jiang Fengmian nearly did a double-take at hearing his son respond to his title. The simulation might be 20 years in the future, but that still felt far too soon for his son to have to take up so much responsibility.

The disciple hesitated, “Well… it’s….”

“Speak. What is it?”

“Just now, a blue flying sword destroyed the nets you set for the young lord.”

“How many?”

“All of them.”

Jiang Cheng’s eyes momentarily widened in surprise.

Trees rustled as the wind began picking up, tension between the gathered cultivators growing uncomfortably high. In an instant, the grounds seemed to be devoured by the shadow of a cloud.

Jiang Cheng brought his hands together, playing with Zidian slightly. Cracks of purple lightning began to spark around him as he continued to make eye contact with the cultivators across from him.

Yu Ziyuan’s blinked in surprise, finally realizing the identity of the ring her son was carrying. An instant later, pride filled her at the power she knew he contained. Perhaps she wouldn’t need to worry so much about leaving the Jiang sect to him after all. He could obviously handle it.

In addition, the terrified eep Wen Chao tried to cover up as a cough made the whole situation worthwhile.

'Damn it, things are getting ugly,' Wei Wuxian thought.

Jin Ling reached for his blade.

"Behave!" Jiang Cheng ordered, seemingly snapping out of it. "Did I say to draw your sword?"

Jin Ling huffed again, crossing his arms in annoyance but obeying without question.

"Sect Leader Jiang," Lan Sizhui spoke up again. "We will reimburse you for the nets we destroyed."

"No need," Jiang Cheng responded, then turned to Jin Ling. "Why are you still standing there? Are you waiting for prey to walk into your blade? If you can't capture something presentable tonight, don't bother coming back!"

Madam Jin's eyes had widened at the ultimatum, but Jiang Yanli just giggled. Her brother always made threats he didn't mean, and, from her son's unfrightened reaction, it was obvious he knew his uncle well.

"Thank you for taking care of my son, A-Cheng," she whispered.

"Well, I haven't yet."

"Still."

Jiang Cheng blushed, turning away.

The older Jiang Cheng then walked off without further fanfare. Lan Wangji remained upright and silent despite the slight disrespect, not showing a trace of emotion on his face.

Jin Guangshan paused briefly, looking between the older versions before him and the younger Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng standing with him. Based on their body language, it was obvious the two hadn't met yet, despite their clear familiarity in the future. Some of it could be explained away by the ascension to sect leader and sect leader's brother, but it seemed almost… personal.

Adult Jiang Cheng's anger had always been obvious, but the numerous digs and mentions of Lan Wangji's reputation were going even further than that. Had something happened between them?

Perhaps, if he kept watching, he'd find something he could use.

"You two keep looking," Lan Wangji instructed. "Don't push yourselves too hard."

"Yes, Master Hanguang-jun," the two responded, bowing before running off.

Lan Qiren smiled, pleased to see the well-earned respect his nephew had from the younger disciples. In addition, the final words of warning were far more emotionally-upfront than the boy he knew today was capable of. It seemed the Lan Clan had escaped the worst of the conflict.

Lan Xichen, on the other hand, had the exact opposite impression. It was hidden well, but the bittersweet, nostalgic, commemorative, and mourning air around his brother was so deeply ingrained that all his other emotions were suffocated under it. He made a mental note to watch carefully.

Nie Huaisang was mostly impressed, but his awe manifested as nervousness before the unbreachable wall even the younger Lan Wangji had around himself. It almost made the Nie heir wish Wei Wuxian was there; only he was shameless enough to get past people as cold as this!

Now, only Wei Wuxian was left with Lan Wangji. The latter moved to leave, but paused and nodded to Wei Wuxian with respect. Startled, Wei Ying hurried to bow in response but continued gazing after the departing cultivator even after.

“Back then he was strongly against my cultivation method. He was desperate to catch me. Why is he so polite now?” Wei Wuxian wondered.

Many people mentally catalogued the information, finally having an explanation for why Wei Wuxian had run off the night before. The Jiangs were grateful Wei Wuxian wasn’t being chased down, but Lan Qiren was confused. He was proud that his nephew had chased and tried to hunt down the demonic cultivator, but didn’t understand why there would be a change in behavior.

Their only choice was to keep watching.

Lan Sizhui abruptly approached Wei Wuxian, having run back once he realized what he forgot.

Bowing, he said, “Thank you for your help at Mo Village.”

Wei Wuxian laughed.

Silently, Lan Xichen tried to hide his pride for the disciple who would one-day be his. It was impossible for anyone else to tell from his expression, but Lan Xichen knew his brother felt the same way.

“Why are you still standing there?!” a voice demanded. The watching cultivators glanced over to see Lan Jingyi and Jin Ling form, facing each other with enraged expressions.

“You-”

“Young master Jin,” Lan Sizhui interrupted, trying to diffuse the situation. “I-”

“I’ll check this area. Don’t follow me!”

Jin Ling's grip trembled with rage as he grasped his sword tightly.

Wei Wuxian gazed towards him with a distraught expression, the wind rustling the leaves and his hair. In an instant, the scene around them changed, and, amidst a pure white background, the people shifted. While the sword Jin Ling held stayed the same, it was no longer him holding it.

Instead, an adult man grasped it firmly, allowing an infant to play with the hilt. Holding him up, the final person there stared down with a peaceful smile.

"A-Jie?" Jiang Cheng asked in shock.

She blushed and looked at the baby in her older-self's arms with awe, but Jin Zixuan was frozen in shock. He saw an older version of himself — longer hair, different clothes, but so unmistakably him that the Jiang and Lan's certainty in the simulation finally made sense — standing with a family. His family.

And they looked... happy.

The older Jin Zixuan pulled his wife closer, and she smiled kindly.

He wiped his eyes, refusing to allow any tears to fall while surrounded by the most powerful people in the world. He had always hated his engagement. He knew what an arranged marriage had done to his parents, and knew what it had done to Jiang Yanli's. He had never wanted to experience it himself.

But, as he looked at the baby held in her arms, a very different fear overtook him.

'What if we don't have Jin Ling,' he wondered. The boy had been annoying, and had contributed to trapping them all, but suddenly the thought that he might not even be born terrified the Jin heir.

Even if he ended up with Jiang Yanli — boring, bland, plain, but happy, kind, warm, sweet, gorgeous, irreplaceable — what if something went wrong? It was a different timeline. What if Jin Ling simply didn't happen at all? What if their baby was someone else?

Their world was already different since they had all been dragged in. It would be nearly impossible to replicate the exact conditions of Jin Ling's birth.

What if he unknowingly killed his future son?

Panic began to sink in, and he mentally cursed the absolutely moronic idiots — his stupid, stupid, beautiful son — who might have destroyed the greatest thing to ever happen to him.

He stepped back into his chair, hands shaking.

What was he going to do?

The happy couple smiled at each other.

A blade pierced through.

Wen Chao shrieked, jumping back from where blood from an invisible source splattered across the ground. This time, Jiang Cheng couldn't even mentally mock the man.

He wasn't much better.

Suddenly, the older Wei Wuxian was there, a hand cupping around his face.

"A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered. Her hand fell, and they could see her lying in a pool of her own blood.

A disembodied voice growled.

"Wei Wuxian is a monster! Yanli treated him like her own brother!"

"I feel so sorry for her child. He was only a month old, and both his parents are gone."

The cries of a baby rang through the air.

"...What?"

"No," Jiang Cheng whispered, shaking his head. "No, no, no, no, no-"

"I told you!" Yu Ziyuan shrieked. "I told you he'd bring nothing but trouble to our sect. And look-look what he's-and now he's-"

Even the proud, furious Yu Ziyuan was in shock. She continued to shout at her husband, but Jiang Fengmian stood still, his eyes open wide.

No one knew what to say.

"At-at least our son finally learned," Yu Ziyuan said at last. "Yes, I should have cut that brat to pieces and fed him to the dogs years ago! Or maybe left him alive so they could slowly gnaw on him until-"

"San-niang, please," Jiang Fengmian spoke sharply, but his voice shook slightly at the end. "We don't know what actually happened."

"Of course you're going to defend him. Of course-"

"Well, I must say, this is quite horrifying," Jin Guangshan mused, his smirk turning conniving. "I never would have imagined your ward might turn my grandson into an orphan. Perhaps, once we're out of here, it would be in everyone's best interest for you to hand him over to the Jin sect as insurance. I'm sure you wouldn't want-"

"With all due respect, Sect Leader Jin," Jiang Yanli interrupted, bowing low but not allowing any trace of apology into her tone. "I believe we already agreed not to punish anyone for things that have yet to happen. In addition, given that we were specifically informed that he was ‘set up,’ I think we should wait until we have more information before making any promises like that.”

“Y-yeah!” Jiang Cheng added. “He would never!”

“Of course, of course, my apologies,” Jin Guangshan allowed, carefully not mentioning how it was Jiang Cheng’s older self that allegedly killed him.

Wen Ruohan, who had remained silent until then, hummed in consideration.

Everyone tensed.

It was obvious what Jin Guangshan had been trying to accomplish. He wanted exclusive access to the mind which had completely changed the cultivation world in only a few years. As a Jin, he was well-versed in the process of obtaining a monopoly over unique resources.

The Wens had more than enough money, but the idea of having exclusive access to that mind was….

Wen Qing very carefully avoided glaring down at her sect leader, having a strong suspicion she knew what he was thinking about.

The vision around them faded, and they were back in the forest with Mo Xuanyu’s Wei Wuxian.

Eyes downcast, the young man clenched his fists with an unusually somber expression.

“How could I say that to him?” he whispered.

Raising a hand up carefully, he then gave himself a hard smack across his face.

“How could I?”

“Hm. So he didn’t know that was his shijie’s son,” Nie Huaisang muttered, making Jiang Cheng blink up from where he had been wiping away any traces of tears.

Wen Qing scoffed, “Obviously.”

“Uh, right, right, but… why not? I mean, he’s been dead, but he hadn’t reincarnated or anything. What’s he been doing as a spirit?”

The elaboration silenced further scornful remarks.

Nie Mingjue smiled at his brother, who glanced down with embarrassed happiness at the implied praise.

“He… might have been avoiding any reminders of what happened? Or worried going near Koi Tower would get him forcefully sent on?”

“The flag too,” Lan Wangji added in. Several people blinked in confusion.

Xichen elaborated, “He didn’t know his creations were commonly used tools until he saw our juniors use the spirit lure flags. Given that those rogue cultivators used his compasses, and his name was brought up several times on this random day thirteen years after his death, I’d say it would be nearly impossible for him to have not been aware of that.”

Jiang Fengmian frowned, “They said ‘the clans spent months trying to summon him, but to no avail. It seems the Yiling Patriarch has truly left nothing behind.’ Perhaps he… couldn’t contact them.”

Madam Yu frowned, scowling to avoid showing even the slightest flake of concern.

“You don’t think… something happened to his soul? Like, he’s Wei Wuxian. He wouldn’t have-couldn’t have… he’s practically impossible to keep down. And-and the ritual worked. It couldn’t have been powerful enough to pull a-to pull him back together. There’s no way he-his soul… it couldn’t have shattered. That only happens when the cultivator wants… that’s not what happened, right?” Jiang Cheng asked, looking to his father for reassurance.

The man had none to give.

‘No matter what prey resides on Buddha mountain, I won’t be able to take it anymore,’ Wei Wuxian decided. ‘I would fight for it with anyone but Jin Ling.’

Yanli smiled, unable to help herself when faced with the obvious love her A-Xian had for her son. She knew her mother would not be pleased — especially given Wei Wuxian’s supposed involvement in her apparent death — but she couldn’t help herself.

“Ow,” a voice downstream bemoaned.

Frowning, Wei Wuxian grabbed Little Apple’s reins and walked over to the injured man.

“Where does it hurt?”

Hearing the voice, the man turned towards them, and revealed his face.

“Gah!” Huaisang squeaked, turning away and hiding his eyes. No one else had spoken out loud, but all of them frowned when they saw the enormous injury on the man’s head.

“Here. The head. My head!” the man answered.

‘A ghost! Killed by a blow to the head,’ Wei Wuxian observed, then continued. ‘He’s dressed in burial robes both excellent in material and craftsmanship, which means that he’s been buried properly. He’s not the lost soul of a living human.’

Several people blinked. It was one thing to be told Wei Wuxian was a genius who had created nearly-mythical inventions, it was another entirely to witness the speed his mind could move at.

Lan Qiren scowled, internally despairing over the intelligence given to a man who had no moral qualms about delving into forbidden arts.

Continuing his journey, Wei Wuxian heard several people muttering between themselves.

“Are the Jin sect’s people still around here? Hopefully we don’t run into them again.”

The figures carried blades, and were probably more rogue cultivators who had abandoned their hunt after encountering “the last person you should ever offend.”

“We should be fine so long as we stay away from the goddess temple.”

“Goddess temple?” Wei Wuxian interrupted.

“What deity does this temple worship?”

“I-I think it’s a natural stone statue of a goddess.”

‘I see,' Wei Wuxian thought. ‘That’s why the compasses of evil aren’t picking anything up, much less the spirit attraction flags.’

“See what?” Jiang Cheng asked, frustrated he couldn’t follow along with his shixiong's mind. A quick glance around proved a majority of the people present didn’t know what Wei Wuxian meant, but Wen Ruohan, Lan Xichen, Jiang Fengmian, Wen Qing, and, surprisingly, Nie Huaisang all had fairly thoughtful expressions.

They wouldn’t speak until they were sure, but they had their own theories.

“Thanks!” Wei Wuxian called as he sped up. “Stay away from there no matter what!”

“What’s that supposed to mean?” the cultivators grumbled.

“He told us to stay away, while running towards it himself.”

Jin Zixuan scoffed, muttering “Ungrateful peasants.”

Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang nodded in agreement with decisive huffs.

Lan Wangji internally backed them up.

They had to admit Wei Wuxian’s actions were probably grounds for the man’s reaction. However, even the two who didn’t know Wei Wuxian before being trapped in the simulation had gotten to know the young man through it, and, like everyone who got to know the real him, had been lured to his side by his unbridled charisma.

All four teenage young masters were in complete agreement.

Along a different path, Jin Ling gave an annoyed grumble.

“Just my luck running into you. Can you stop following me?”

“We’re not following you!” Lan Jingyi protested. “Dafan Mountain isn’t your home. Knock it off!”

“And the spirit nets aren’t yours! You knock it off. Can you get 400 nets together? If you can’t, then shut up! You really think everyone should follow your lead?!”

“What did you say?!” Jingyi demanded, drawing his sword.

Lan Xichen coughed, then bowed to the Jins, “I apologize for my disciple's immaturity.”

“It’s-no need,” Madam Jin refuted, still shaken by the revelation of her son’s death. “It’s quite obvious that all of them are children. We apologize as well.”

“Let’s go! Bring it!” Jin Ling shouted in response, the two expertly jumping into their duel. It was obvious from a glance that both were highly skilled for their age.

Unfortunately, their childish motivation kept anyone from seeing it in a positive light.

Lan Sizhui reached a hand out, as if to stop them, but quickly brought it to his face to rub his eyes tiredly, sighing as he did.

“Why are they fighting again?”

Lan Qiren nodded twice, feeling a kindred spirit in the young man.

Two blades spun around each other, equally matched despite the different styles. Then, as Jin Ling attacked, Lan Jingyi flipped above him, landing on the other boy’s back.

Jin Ling was sent toppling forward.

Jiang Yanli sucked in a breath in alarm.

Jin Zixuan most definitely did not scream.

Lan Sizhui made a noise of surprise and hurried over.

“You kicked him into a cave?!”

“I didn’t hurt him. He did it to himself!”

There was a distant sound of a clatter from within. Both boy’s eyes widened in surprise.

“Hey! Jin Ling!”

No response came.

Madam Jin frowned. It was one thing to overlook teasing, but if something happened to her grandson (child of a union as perfect as she always knew it would be)-

The two Lan boys looked at each other, then began walking towards the cave.

A talisman glowed like blue fire, and the two ventured inside.

“This is where the villagers conduct their sacrifices,” Lan Sizhui recited as the two ventured further in. The closer they got, the more elaborate the carvings in the floor became, until the two were frozen in shock.

Jingyi couldn’t finish his sentence, too shocked by the gargantuan statue he saw before them. It was too heavily shadowed for its features to be made out, but it towered over the room nonetheless.

"The statue the rogue cultivators mentioned?” Wen Xu suggested, eyebrows lifting in interest.

Rocks tumbled.

“Who-who’s there?!” Lan Jingyi demanded, spinning around as the talisman illuminated the danger.

A face stared back at them.

Jingyi screamed.

On the other hand, Lan Sizhui simply sighed, spreading out the light without further reaction. Seeing his friend’s calm behavior, Jingyi poked his head out from where he had hidden behind Sizhui.

Across from them, Jing Ling stood with his arms crossed and face set into a firm scowl.

“What a couple of cowards!” the boy declared. “Hilarious!”

“Pretending to be a ghost?” Jingyi responded. “How childish!”

“And you’re afraid of ghosts! You’re the childish one!”

Lan Qiren wanted to indignantly defend his to-be disciple, and both the Jins and Jiangs wanted to stand up for their to-be descendent, but none of them could manage anything but embarrassment in the face of the incomparably childish pair before them.

“Um, well,” Jiang Yanli coughed once. “At least we know they manage to grow much closer based on what we saw during their explanation. They probably mature greatly in the coming months.”

Lan Qiren stayed calm only by reminding himself of Lan Sizhui, who was ignoring the others to observe the statue. At least he knew there was one disciple he had managed to teach.

The heavily shadowed statue was easier to see with the spread-out light, and Sizhui saw it resembled a dancing goddess smiling down at them.

With the sound of stone rubbing against stone, its eyes moved.

Huaisang stepped back, moving through his brother's body to hide behind him, using the man's large stature to block his sight of the terrifying scene. Nie Mingjue just sighed, well-used to his brother's behavior.

"What? You're the one that started it!" the boys continued, but Sizhui turned his attention towards the statue with concern.

"I think the statue's eyes just moved," he reported.

"Thank god one of them was paying attention."

"Y-you think anybody's going to believe that? Ridiculous!" Jin Ling asked, his voice shaking slightly.

Regardless of his words, he turned to face the statue immediately, watching it as if he expected it to pounce on him at any moment.

However, as a few seconds passed without further movement, he turned back to Sizhui and shouted "Hey, nothing moved!"

"Stupid idiot," Jiang Cheng hissed, clenching his hands together in worry. "Be careful!"

Jiang Fengmian smiled at his son, amused at the protective instincts already kicking in.

Jingyi laughed, leaning toward Jin Ling and taunting "Ha! You were scared, huh?"

"I'm serious. I really saw it," Sizhui insisted.

"Are you going senile? Stone statues can't move."

"It's supposed to be a goddess-"

"Fine! If it really is so incredible, I'm gonna make a wish right now! I want the creature devouring souls on Buddha mountain to appear before me! Will it be able to do this?"

As soon as Jin Ling's wish was uttered, the candles flickered, and the entire cave of previously-unlit candles were soon illuminated by an unidentifiable force.

"Stupid, stupid, stupid-" Jiang Cheng continued, rubbing his hands together nervously. His sister giggled and made a motion like hugging air, giving comfort in the no-touch zone.

Huaisang saw both Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan leaning closer to their mothers, and even Lan Wangji briefly turned his eyes to Lan Xichen. Wen Chao's own terror was of no interest to him, but Huaisang carefully noted how the man very purposefully approached neither his father nor his older brother.

He still hated Wen Chao's personality, but information like that was worth noting.

The light filling the cave as candles flickered on and allowed more and more of the statue to be seen; the three teens present all tensed in preparation.

Jin Ling spun left, eyes wide.

"It's-"

"Look out!"

A massive hand had reached towards the boy, but he was luckily pushed away by Lan Jingyi in the nick of time.

Jin Zixuan gasped out in relief, but stayed upright, his clenched fists belaying the tension in his body. He knew (given that Jin Ling had talked to them just an hour ago), that his son would survive. However, with his new fears — how was he supposed to know exactly what conditions he had Jin Ling in? How could he be sure it was still his son's soul? — he was unconsciously viewing everything like it was out to kill his son.

"Thank you," he whispered to Lan Xichen, who blinked in surprise then returned an equally grateful smile.

The arm was pulled back, revealing the massive limb belonged to the previously-frozen statue.

The Lan boys made eye contact, then nodded to each other determinedly.

In an instant, both had sprung forward, running up the walls and attacking the gargantuan statue. Sizhui successfully attached a talisman to it, and a second later the goddess's arms shot out to implant themselves in the cave's walls. They pierced through like blades stabbing targets.

(Or, in the case of Huaisang, like someone who hoped imbedding the blade deep enough into the target would absolve them of further swordsmanship lessons.)

Madam Yu hid a nervous swallow, hoping the grandson she had yet to have would remain unscathed.

A nanosecond later, the arms curved back out of the walls, dozens of meters long and strong enough to snap the children in two. All three teenagers continued to move, avoiding as best they could.

The arms chased after them, soon crashing into the roof of the cave and causing a visible disturbance on the ground above.

Madam Jin nearly stumbled at the shock of suddenly being taken outside after so long spent within the cave; even if they had tentatively agreed to treat the simulation as real memories, it was still hard to get used to switching perspectives. In her mind, she cursed whoever had brought her in.

(Then, she remembered her adorable grandson was responsible, and, accounting for the fact that they seemed to have done the impossible and gotten her son to finally notice Jiang Yanli, she decided it was forgiven.)

A sound came from behind the watchers, and they saw Wei Wuxian turn towards the destruction the fight below the ground had caused.

From the cloud of dirt, Jin Ling jumped back, stance tense and defensive. The world shook like the rhythmic ticking of a pendulum as the goddess statue lumbered out of the cloud, still smiling her eerie grin.

Numerous cultivators dropped down from the trees, having sensed the conflict.

"Looks like it's alive!" one of them declared. "Let's go get it!"

Jin Ling scowled at the man, and sprang up to continue his assault.

With a disturbingly parental groan, Jiang Cheng leaned back in his chair, covering his face with his hands. He was long past the point of yelling "stupid kid" in front of the sect leaders.

That didn't stop him from thinking it.

'Stupid kid not knowing when to stop. Stupid other cultivators just watching. Stupid, useless Lan kids. Stupid Wei Wuxian not doing anything. Stupid older me for putting pressure on him. How were you expecting him to act?'

If Wei Wuxian were watching with them, he would have laughed at Jiang Cheng's misery. As it stood, Lan Xichen made a poor attempt to hide an amused chuckle. Jiang Cheng's glare only made him want to laugh more.

Nothing formed bonds quite like being trapped in a room with no way to kill each other.

Even as he continued to attack, it was obvious Jin Ling wouldn't be able to do anything. His sword couldn't break through the statue's tough exterior, only sliding off every time he tried.

He ran through the woods, but the arms followed. Each time they lunged for him, he dodged by smaller and smaller increments.

Wei Wuxian sighed.

"This kid is causing real trouble."

"Then help him!" Jin Zixuan all but yelled. Jiang Cheng didn't bother to berate him for the comment against Wei Wuxian; the young man's options might be limited by his lack of weapons, but their worry for Jin Ling had already overruled most logical arguments against it.

It took considerable effort for Jiang Yanli not to laugh, finding the near-identical reactions of her brother and fiance to be amusing.

Wen Chao did snicker slightly, but Wen Ruohan's annoyed glare shut him up quickly.

Clicking his tongue in exasperation, Wei Wuxian grabbed leaves off a nearby branch and sprinted closer. The leaves shifted and grew.

They were now talismans.

Wei Ying threw them forward, and they landed on the statue's extended arm.

Red energy seeped out, but the arm only tensed slightly.

'Can't restrain it?'

The talismans burned up.

Wei Wuxian frowned in annoyance.

Despite the tense situation, the general certainty that everything would be fine — because Wei Wuxian might want to stay hidden, but there was no way he would allow his nephew to die, not from what they'd seen — allowed Lan Wangji to make a few unusually thoughtless observations:

First, that Wei Wuxian, for all his power and past, was surprisingly open and expressive. His face was constantly displaying all of his intense emotions without regret.

Second, that in all his years, he had never seen anything as beautiful as the freely-shown protectiveness and passion before him.

Lan Wangji bit his tongue, forcing his brain to derail that train of thought. He knew what was said about his clan — they love only once, and they love forever — and he had seen what that had done to his parents. It was foolish of him to even consider something as immature as attraction.

He would have to take extra care to not spend any more time thinking on such an inane subject.

Another cultivator approached the statue, shouting "Watch this!"

A bell was flung into the air, and from it came an enormous seal. The bell expanded in size until it was as big as a building, and slowly lowered itself to trap the statue.

The bell made contact with the ground, and the earth shook slightly.

"It's trapped!" the cultivators declared.

"Oh, thank god," Jiang Yanli whispered; her fiance and brother couldn't help but agree. Jin Ling was highly talented — about as strong as they were, in fact — but he kept stupidly running at things alone.

Madam Yu thought the same, and huffed "At least it all worked out this time."

The cultivator approached the bell, and placed a hand on its smooth metal surface. He giggled in excitement.

“We’ve hunted basic zombies all night, but now we’ve caught something big!”

However, as soon as he finished congratulating himself, the bell shook.

Something had crashed into it from the inside.

The goddess wasn’t beaten yet.

Jiang Fengmian unconsciously moved between the bell and his children, his instincts instructing him to get close to them in case the worst occurred.

The simulation couldn’t actually hurt them, but Yu Ziyuan noticed the instinctual action all the same.

The shaking continued, and the bell trembled as it strained to keep the goddess trapped inside. Another crash, and a ray of light escaped through a tiny hole which had been punched through the metal. Then another. Then another. Then another.

The cultivator began to back up in alarm.

“W-what the-”

His skull was crushed.

One hand had broken through the metal entirely; as Wei Wuxian had noticed earlier, the goddess statue couldn’t be restrained.

Huaisang whimpered as the man had his life rapidly squeezed out of him.

Why would anyone want to go on a night hunt when this was a possible outcome? Honestly, what was wrong with cultivators?!

“What the hell is this?!” another one of the cultivators demanded.

Wei Wuxian turned to the two Lan cultivators and shouted, “Quick! Send a signal and tell your sect’s… your sect’s Hanguang-Jun to come up here! We found the soul-consuming creature!”

Jingyi checked as well.

And they continued to check.

“...All of the signal illuminations… were used up the night at Mo village.”

Wei Wuxian was speechless.

Lan Xichen sighed in chastising amusement, but Lan Wangji and Lan Qiren were far more infuriated. There was a reason disciples were required to carry them.

Finally getting his voice back, Wei Wuxian shouted "You didn't restock such an important item?!"

"We forgot…. We never really use signals."

Wei Wuxian buried his face into his hands and groaned.

While the teenagers knew the truth is Sizhui's words — having also gotten yelled at for forgetting them — it had only become a problem when they got back and realized they forgot. It rarely, if ever, was a problem while they were night hunting.

Not like now.

"This is so stressful," Jin Zixuan muttered, rubbing his temples.

No one disagreed.

"Young Master Mo," Sizhui began. "How do you know that the creature consuming people's souls is neither a spirit, nor a beast, but rather the goddess statue?"

Those with theories paid special attention, curious to see how theirs would compare to the apparently famed genius that created so many inventions. Creative intelligence and analytical intelligence weren't directly connected, but Wen Ruohan thought this would be a effective test on the authenticity of what they were being shown.

After all, even intelligent spirits were simply resentful energy prompted to engage in specific behavior. There had never been one more intelligent than a human.

"There are too many deceased souls in the area of the ancient tombs, so it definitely isn't a soul consuming spirit or beast. There are so many souls floating around. If it were one of those, would they still be around? Of course not!"

Lan Wangji's eyes widened. It was one thing to be told the goofy, childish (brilliant, passionate, humorous, upbeat) person before them was a genius who had invented demonic cultivation, but it was another thing to see the famed mind at work.

"Right," Lan Sizhui nodded, thinking the information over. "We all thought the landslide and thunder-striken tomb were what led to those incidents. Then it must be a soul-consuming spirit."

Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan nodded along, understanding the Lan disciple's line of reasoning.

"Wrong."

"Huh?"

“The order is wrong and the correlation is wrong. Between the landslide and soul-losing incidents, the latter came first and the former came second. The incidents were the cause, the landslide was the effect. Think about it. The first person to lose their soul, the sluggard. He was stuck on a mountain for the night, then married someone just a few days after he returned?”

“What’s wrong with that?”

None of the audience members had an immediate answer.

“Everything is wrong! He’s a penniless man who never does anything! How could he have found enough money to hold such a grand wedding?”

Words formed above the blushing young masters, added in by the watching spirits who created the simulation.

Young masters who have never had to think about money. ↓

Lan Xichen blushed as well, realizing that he had also struggled to come to a conclusion because of his own financially sheltered upbringing. Though, looking around, he knew the main clans of the most powerful families all had that fact in common.

“He wasn’t raised with you?” Xichen asked Sect Leader Jiang. His wife sniffed in disdain at the question, but the man answered calmly.

“He did spend awhile on the streets before I found him, but he was also a child then, and had no reason to think about what marriage was like as a civilian. Perhaps he had an opportunity to grow closer to the civilian side of things when he got older?”

Jiang Cheng shrugged, “He’s always had a terrible memory, so that makes the most sense.”

The sluggard suddenly married after the night of the landslide. Something special must have happened during the night.”

“Something special?”

“There was a storm that night, and he took shelter in the mountain. On Buddha Mountain, what is a place that provides shelter?”

“The goddess temple!”

“That’s right. And when most people go to the temple, there’s one thing they always do: make wishes.”

Nie Huaisang wanted to sigh. He liked knowing things, but in this instance he wished he hadn’t been right. The world was such a terrifying place!

“Wanting to become lucky, earn money, and so on, the man made his wish. The goddess granted it, sending down a bolt of lightning that allowed him to see the valuables inside the coffin. That’s why there’s an old man dressed in intricate burial robes among the souls drifting on Buddha mountain. His burial goods were definitely taken by the sluggard. Now that his wish had been fulfilled, the goddess took her price. She came upon him on the night of his marriage and sucked away his soul!"

"You're just guessing though, aren't you?"

"Certainly, but following this theory, everything can be explained.

"Back then, A-Yan had just entered her engagement. She definitely made a wish to the goddess temple. The wishes of recently engaged girls almost always follows a pattern of 'I wish my husband will only love me for the rest of his life.'"

Both Madam Jin and Madam Yu scowled toward the ground at that line. Noticing this, Jiang Fengmian wanted to reach out and reassure her, but backed away uncertainly, not knowing how to go about that.

The Jiang siblings frowned at their parents, and Jin Zixuan just scowled in exasperation.

"Can such wishes really be granted?"

"Of course, it's easy. Her husband's 'entire life' just needed to end as soon as possible."

"...Oh."

"Oh, oh! So then A-Yan's husband died!"

"So that's what happened! But then, why did A-Yan's soul return to her?"

"Have you forgotten? A-Yan's father, blacksmith Zheng, lost his soul as well. He went to the goddess temple to make a wish! He asked for the soul of his daughter to be found!"

Jiang Cheng bit his lip. All the talk of souls was bringing his mind back into unpleasant directions.

A-Yan had her soul destroyed, and was now just a shattered piece of it. If their theory was right… if the same thing had happened to Wei Wuxian-

What on earth could have driven his idiotically-happy, hope-filled head disciple to something like that?

His meager reassurance was that Wei Wuxian seemed to have recovered from that state now. Perhaps the resurrection ceremony got rid of the excess resentful energy demonic cultivation caused?

(Or dying, but he wasn't going to think about that.)

"Even after her soul was returned, she would uncontrollably imitate the goddess statue's dance and smile."

"Wow! Then everything can be explained!" Lan Jingyi realized.

Wei Wuxian nodded, "That's why the Compass of Evil stopped working, and why the spirit attraction flags can't summon anything. Why both weapons and talismans are useless. The creature on Buddha mountain isn't a ghost or a monster.

"It's a god."

Lan Wangji clenched his hands, an unusual worry starting to come over him. It shouldn't matter, but the idea of something happening to the future disciples (or the brilliant beam of moonlight that was Wei Wuxian, but he resolutely ignored that) filled him with concern.

'This is an untitled deity born from the nourishment of hundreds of years of incense,' Wei Wuxian continued mentally. 'To try and deal with it using things meant for ghosts would only be fanning the flames!'

"Do you think you'd be able to find L… Hanguang-Jun?" he asked.

Sizhui shook his head, "I'm afraid that-"

An arrow flew by him, and he cut off. His gaze turned to track the weapon, watching as it pierced the statue and created a crack.

It was Jin Ling's arrow.

Jiang Cheng silently buried his face in his hands yet again.

Not wasting a second, Jin Ling ran forward and shot three more arrows toward the goddess.

"What the hell is he doing?" Wei Wuxian asked. He tensed further, then looked left and right until his gaze finally landed on a lone bamboo stalk.

A slight crack resounded as Wei Wuxian snapped the top of the stalk off.

"What is he trying to do now?" Madam Yu growled. Even imbued with spiritual power, a bamboo stalk would make for a poor sword. The goddess statue had remained undamaged even with constant assault from several reasonably powerful cultivators. They at least had their blades; what could Wei Wuxian do with bamboo?

Madam Jin, Jin Zixuan, and the Jiangs all prayed that Wei Wuxian would be able to help.

Jin Ling's next three arrows were useless, bouncing off without leaving a scratch. The boy ran through the trees surrounding the statue, trying to get a good vantage point. Once he located one, he notched his arrow and pulled back as far as he could.

For a moment, another memory was overlaid on top of the one they were already seeing.

"If you can't capture something presentable tonight, don't bother coming back," the older Jiang Cheng said.

Yanli bit her lip.

While it was obvious Jin Ling knew Jiang Cheng wasn't literal in his threats, he was also clearly feeling the pressure of his uncle's expectations. It was so like Jiang Cheng himself that she almost couldn't believe he wouldn't realize the recklessness it inspired in her son.

She considered, for a moment, frowning disapprovingly at her brother to make it clear that would not be tolerated in the future.

Then she saw the expression on his face, and knew no one was angrier at future Jiang Cheng than himself.

After imbuing the arrow with even more energy, Jin Ling finally released it. Another insignificant crack in the statue was formed.

The statue looked up at him, tracing the attack back to its origin. The arm shifted, then grew.

Then swung.

"No!"

"Look out!"

"Jin Ling!"

Jiang Yanli flinched and turned away.

A sound pierced through the forest. It could barely be heard under the crackling of the fire which the statue had spread, but its power was obvious even to the watchers.

Mere centimeters away from the boy, the statue turned to instead face the origin of the sound.

Jin Ling dodged just in time to escape the attack. When he landed, he too turned to look at the flute that was playing its disjointed melody.

It was Wei Wuxian.

Jiang Cheng wanted to relax. Jin Ling was safe, Wei Wuxian was finally going to start making sure their nephew remained unharmed.

But, instead, all he could see was the first thing the simulation showed them. The older, broken, terrifying Wei Wuxian who could end an army with a song. Mo Xuanyu's face looked strikingly similar to the Wei Wuxian he knew; sometimes, it was hard to remember that this was an older soul.

But now, with the music playing, that red-eyed demon wearing his brother's face was all he could see.

Wen Ruohan watched closely.

The music was surprisingly lovely. The flute had been carved out of bamboo in just a few seconds, and Wei Wuxian didn't even have any tools. Nevertheless, the eerie, hauntingly beautiful melody squeaked out of the pitiful instrument showed the skill of a true master.

The Jiangs were unsurprised; Wei Wuxian might be a troublemaker, but he was their head disciple for a reason.

"Hey, this is serious! Why are you playing the flute!" Lan Jingyi demanded. "It sounds awful."

"How would you expect an instrument more closely resembling a twig to sound?" Madam Yu demanded. She might not like Wei Wuxian, but she had pride in the Jiang sect. Her head disciple's ability with an instrument was not something she was willing to allow a privileged Lan boy who had never held anything less than a flawless instrument to mock. A soft giggle escaped Jiang Yanli's lips as Lan Xichen bowed slightly in apology.

Wei Wuxian thought along a similar vein. 'With such a poorly crafted flute made from a few chops, the fact that it makes any sound at all is good enough. Now then, anything will work so long as it has enough hostile energy to tear the goddess to pieces.'

As if in response to the words, the scene momentarily transitioned to the inside of a dark cave, where a sealed fierce corpse lay chained up.

It's eyes opened.

"Wh-what was that?" Nie Huaisang asked.

"Ha. I suppose it only fits a member of a lower sect to be frightened by such a thing!" Wen Chao boasted, covering up his own tremble with a smirk.

The temperature seemed to drop twenty degrees as Nie Mingjue glared, but, before he could say anything, Wen Ruohan spoke first.

"Silence."

Wen Chao squeaked and obeyed.

As they spoke, several others were far more preoccupied with what was happening around them. The earth shook like a hatching egg and something burrowed through the ground.

Lan Jingyi had to leap out of its way.

"It's-"

‘Whatever it is…’ Wei Wuxian thought, continuing his song. ‘As long as its wrath is strong enough….’

Wen Ruohan watched the passing battle with concealed interest, his mind cataloguing the possibilities demonic cultivation was shown to have. He had thought, originally, it was most useful when ambushing someone else. It would allow the practitioner to ensure there were available corpses and could explain the enormous death count attributed to Wei Wuxian by the civilians.

However, even when trying to hide his true power, Wei Wuxian was able to act in a way he expected to be more effective than the dozens of trained cultivators present. Was demonic cultivation — a brilliant, unpredictable creation — really that powerful?

Or maybe, rather than the style of cultivation, it was simply Wei Wuxian that was useful.

From the dirt, chains popped out and looped themselves around the statue’s arms. The chains were pulled straight, tension increasing instantly.

The arms were ripped off.

“What?” Jin Guangshan demanded, eyes wide. The adult and teenage cultivators shown were nowhere near as strong as the sect leaders or senior disciples, but they were far from weak.

To instantly destroy what they couldn’t make a dent in-

A low, rumbling growl was hissed by the beast, and it straightened until they could see the fierce corpse’s face, blank with death.

Wen Qing couldn’t help feeling like it looked familiar. If she could just see under it’s bangs-

The sound continued as the base to the terrifying melody Wei Wuxian continued to play, and the creature's veins expanded across its body.

In a second, it punched the statue, knocking it to the ground and sending a cyclone of dust into the air. It’s hair flowed in the formed wind.

Then, it turned its gaze to the cultivators.

“What?” Wen Qing whispered.

Several people were surprised. They hadn’t spent much time together, but it had rapidly become obvious that the woman was stern and fierce, demanding respect from everyone she saw.

“Is something wrong?” Jiang Yanli asked, but Wen Qing just shook her head in disbelief.

“No. No, that couldn’t be-why would-”

Simultaneously, Wei Wuxian breathed out a shaky gasp of air. He stopped playing, relaxing his hand and allowing it to fall defenseless by his side. His eyes were wide in shock.

His frantic heartbeat rang in their ears.

“Wei Wuxian?” Jiang Cheng asked, despite knowing there would be no answer.

“What? That’s-”

“It’s… it’s the Ghost General!”

“What?”

“It’s Wen Ning!”

At those words, everyone turned to look at the congregate of Wens, only to see them staring very specifically at Wen Qing. The stern, strong, proud woman was trembling.

“...Wen-guniang?” Jiang Yanli asked softly, beginning to approach. “Do you know him?”

“He’s my… my brother, but that isn’t-” she paused, clearing her throat and forcing herself to calm down. “I’m sure there was some mistake. He has never been skilled at fighting.”

‘And that’s a fierce corpse,’ went unsaid. Wen Qing wasn’t willing to believe it was him.

‘Wen Ning?’ Wei Wuxian repeated. ‘Hadn’t he been turned to dust?’

Wen Qing bit her lip to keep herself from falling to pieces.

“I thought the Ghost General was killed before the First Siege of Burial Mounds!”

Beside the man who spoke, Jin Ling’s face contorted with anger. He unsheathed his blade.

Despite being overwhelmed by questions, Jiang Cheng glared at his nephew, seeing what he was building up towards, and whispered “Don’t you dare do anything stupid.”

Jin Zixuan’s lips cracked into a smile.

Then, to Wen Ning’s left, the statue’s arm struck out and attacked.

Jin Ling was pinned to a tree.

“Jin Ling!”

The predicament his nephew was in finally shocked Wei Wuxian out of his frozen state, and he immediately resumed playing his flute.

The crackling sound of the crimson electricity was followed by Wei Ying’s eyes dawning the color. Wen Ning stiffened at the song, then turned his head toward the statue.

A low growl escaped the fierce corpse's mouth.

Jiang Fengmian and Lan Qiren frowned, recognizing the corpse's power and knowing that if all the Wens were this dangerous, the Sunshot Campaign would be a very bloody war.

Wen Ning paused.

Then attacked.

Within seconds the statue was under a fierce assault. Wen Ning leapt high enough to bound over buildings and striked with enough force to tear castles apart. As the battle continued, Wei Wuxian thought over what he saw.

'Wen Ning was the most powerful corpse I created before I died. Aside from how he doesn't fear injuries, heat, cold, poison, or anything else humans fear, he could also think on his own. He was the only one of his kind.'

Wen Qing glared furiously at the future Wei Wuxian's figure, mouth curled into a deadly frown. From what she had seen of him, it seemed unlikely that he would kill someone just to make a weapon out of them. However, she couldn't forget that Wei Wuxian had taken part in their "Sunshot Campaign." She knew she wouldn't have let her brother join the fighting, but if Wei Wuxian hadn't know that-

Or maybe he just hadn't cared.

She was a doctor. Coming to an emotional conclusion was the height of stupidity. She knew that, but-

But her little brother was dead and she didn't even know why.

'But the Wen Ning right now clearly lacks his own will!'

"His own will? He's a fierce corpse!"

Madam Yu sighed in disappointment, "I suppose this is just one of his projects. He loves experimenting with things like this. He must have given it the ability to fight by itself, and simply patted himself on the back for allowing it to 'think' on its own."

"He does tend to over exaggerate things for humor. I suppose he must have used the phrase 'thinking on his own' so often as a joke that his mind simply skips over the explanation," Jiang Fengmian added, not disagreeing with his wife but including a much more fond tone.

In the few seconds those realizations took, Wen Ning had already finished dismantling the statue. The powerful god was now simply a pile of rubble, crushed to dust by the fierce corpse.

Wen Ruohan was impressed.

"Close in on him!" the surrounding cultivators shouted.

“Ha. Who cares about some statue. The Ghost General is the real prize here!”

He was ignored.

“Fellow cultivators, we must stop him so he doesn’t escape! This is Wen Ning we’re talking about here!”

“What’s there to be scared of? It’s not like the Yiling Patriarch is here! His owner’s already been torn to pieces!”

The reactions to these words were mixed.

Wen Qing had clenched her hands into fist, and her gaze burned with all the molten, scorching heat of the sun her sect symbolized.

Similarly, the Jiangs were biting their lips, displeased at the reminder of Wei Wuxian’s fate. Knowing it was pointless to say anything didn’t change their emotions, and even Yu Ziyuan was frowning slightly.

On the other hand, the Jins and Nie siblings wanted to laugh.

“Oh, please. Wen Ning took out something they were all helpless against in seconds! What exactly do those idiots think they can do against him?”

The two dissolved into cackles, and even Jiang Cheng felt his mood lightened slightly by their points.

Leaning close, Nie Mingjue motioned to where the Jin and Jiang heirs stood and whispered to Huaisang “You can join them, if you want. We can’t hurt each other, so it’s not as important that we stay together.”

With a slight hum, Huaisang considered the suggestion. Unconsciously, Jiang Cheng had stayed in the position he had moved into when he went to silently support the Jin heir during his parent’s argument. The two had never been close, but it seemed as if their shared parental woes were drawing them together. Perhaps joining in would be fun.

(He’d be able to manipulate better reactions out of Wen Chao, if nothing else.)

As Nie Huaisang journeyed over to the other two teenagers, Lan Xichen turned a thoughtful gaze to his brother.

‘You could also join in,’ he silently suggested.

Lan Wangji carefully ignored him.

Still conspiring amongst themselves, the cultivators finally realized, "If we kill him, we'll be famous from today on!"

"But he clearly saved us just a minute ago-"

Sizhui was, once again, flawlessly disregarded.

Their stupidity was almost impressive. Lan Qiren was just glad his own disciples weren't so foolish.

"A mere dog who lost his owner, yet he's still so arrogant!"

"Let's go!"

"Wait-"

"Gah!" the attacking cultivators shouted, as they were thrown back by the fierce corpses chains. Continuing to use them as a whip, Wen Ning effortlessly picked through the surrounding men and women without faltering.

"...I never thought I'd be cheering for a fierce corpse's victory instead of the cultivator's."

Wen Ning's chain stilled as Jin Ling's arrow pierced it to a tree.

Following up his attack, Jin Ling shot forward and tried to attack, only to be thrown back by Wen Ning. He skidded across the ground and past the trees.

Jiang Yanli bit her lip in an effort to stay silent.

The corpse was attacking in a second, lunging dozens of meters forward and raising his fist to strike down on the unsuspecting Jin heir.

Jin Ling flinched away.

"Stop."

Wen Ning froze, his fist mere centimeters away from his target.

"Oh, thank god," Jin Zixuan hissed, overwhelmingly grateful his stupid (reckless, brilliant) son hadn't gotten himself killed despite the numerous close calls.

Between them, Nie Huaisang giggled at his and Jiang Cheng's reactions, feeling a sudden levity now that the danger to the cultivators was gone.

"Oh, shut up," the Jiang heir hissed. "You'll be doing the same thing once we start focusing on the Qinghe Nie sect! Just let us have this!"

Huaisang laughed and looked away, offering no further comments.

As they spoke, Wei Wuxian switched his song. The first one had been hauntingly beautiful — made even more-so by the instrument's poor craftsmanship. That was not the one he continued to play.

'I need a calmer, quieter tune,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Calmer, quieter.'

Blurry, as though it was a long ago memory, their surroundings shifted into a dark cave. It was only lit by a small fire, so the two figures present were difficult to make out.

"We can even see memories?" Jin Guangshan asked, suddenly sounding nervous. It was one thing for Jin Ling to remember what his uncle said to him (it made sense for the illusion to know what it had shown them), but this was something else entirely.

Madam Jin thought his fear was silly; it wasn't like they had anything left to hide.

'Calmer,'* Wei Wuxian thought again, and the blurry figures finally became visible. 'Quieter.'

"Wangji?" Lan Xichen asked, his eyes widening in surprise. The two figures were injured, soaking wet, and neither the age they had already seen nor the age of the real ones, but were undoubtedly Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji. The former was listening calmly as Lan Wangji sang to him the song Wei Wuxian was now playing.

"Do you know that song?" Lan Qiren demanded of his nephew. "I don't recognize it."

Blinking, then schooling his expression to cover up his shock, Lan Wangji responded, "No. I've never heard it before."

Wen Ruohan blinked, then frowned in consideration. First the mystery, and now composing music. The more he saw, the more convinced he was that what they were being shown was indeed a possible future, rather than an illusion created from their memories.

Which meant there was a teenage Wei Wuxian outside. One who had the skill to create, but not the power to resist.

Interesting.

Wen Ning turned to face Wei Wuxian entirely. As the more relaxing song continued, a peaceful, almost romantic aura settled over everyone.

"Is this… affecting our emotions?" Wen Xu asked, shaking his head in a vain attempt to get rid of the sleepy feeling which suddenly came over him.

Jiang Fengmian, already used to keeping calm, was far less affected and could explain "They mentioned that we were being shown memories. If-they're from spirits, perhaps we're feeling pieces of how the spirits were experiencing the demonic cultivation."

“Ah,” Jin Guangshan hummed in acknowledgement, enjoying the sensation. “I can see why he was able to control a fierce corpse like this.”

If she weren’t so tired, Wen Qing would have growled at him for referring to her brother as simply “a fierce corpse.”

‘Wen Ning, it’s me,’* Wei Wuxian thought, silently calling out to his — friend? Bodyguard? Creation? Wen Qing would never accept the last one — summon.

Slowly, Wen Ning began walking towards Wei Wuxian, eyes still blank with unconsciousness. Each step he took rattled the chains, giving Wei Wuxian’s romantic song a strange aura.

Lan Wanji looked over at the player, who was calming the terrifyingly powerful beast with just a few notes. It was demonic cultivation — he knew it was unacceptable; detestable — but somehow his mind was focused on something else entirely.

As Wei Wuxian played, all Lan Wangji could think about was how gorgeous he was.

The simulation’s cultivators, unfortunately, did not feel the same.

“Report to the Sect Leader immediately! Somebody can control the Ghost General using a flute!”

“Young Master Mo!” Sizhui gasped out.

But Wei Wuxian paid them no mind.

‘Go back Wen Ning.’ he warned.

Wen Qing relaxed slightly, and the sleepy feeling on her increased. It was good that Wei Wuxian was focusing his attention on keeping her brother — his body, at least, but she refused to think about that — safe.

Slow, careful steps were taken as Wei Wuxian slowly lured Wen Ning away from the other cultivators. The song remained as peaceful as ever, and made the fierce corpse look like he was being lured to sleep. With each step back Wei Ying took, Wen Ning’s hobbling fumble followed.

One step back from Wei Wuxian, one step forward by Wen Ning. One step back, one step forward. One step, one step.

Wei Ying banged into a white-clad wall.

Jiang Cheng sucked in a breath, clenching hard enough to bruise.

Wei Ying's fingers were ripped from the flute by a hand around his wrist. He looked back, and came face to face with Lan Wangji.

Jiang Yanli made a soft, fear-stricken whimper. The relaxing aura on them disappeared in an instant.

The Second Jade of Lan — the Hanguang-jun — would never allow a demonic cultivator to go free.

The two made eye contact, Wei Wuxian's now-crimson eyes reflecting against Hanguang-jun's steely gold orbs. The simulation sharpened, and the watchers could clearly see the intense, burning passion in the man.

"Oh no," Nie Huaisang repeated. He understood that the rule-following Second Jade of Lan would be especially against demonic cultivation, but if Wei Wuxian hadn't used it those kids would have died!

(But, as he gazed at Lan Qiren, he knew it was hopeless. The Lan sect cared only for following the letter of the law; they didn't care about the circumstances in which it would be just to break it.)

The people surrounding Lan Xichen all made similar noises of fear for the future's Wei Wuxian, but he saw something else entirely.

"Wangji. You-"

"Mn," his brother responded, cutting off his words, equally stunned by what he saw in his older self.

That wasn't hate in his gaze.

'Oh no. Lan Zhan has personally seen me use a flute to control corpses before.'

"...Lan Zhan?" Lan Wangji repeated.

The disbelief in his expression was the first emotion many participants had seen from him, but it was covered up fairly quickly. They had to admit, it was justified.

Wei Wuxian had been scared enough of Lan Wangji to run away the previous night and avoid interaction altogether. If they were truly so against one another, why would the demonic cultivator have used his given name without the slightest bit of hesitation?

Though, with the tense situation, it was hard for most of the watchers to care about the specifics of using Lan Wangji's given name.

With the groan of Wen Ning, Wei Wuxian snapped out of his frozen trance.

"Damn it," he hissed, watching the fierce corpse begin to resist in earnest.

Wei Wuxian clicked his tongue.

"I have to get him out of here."

“Hurry,” Wen Qing hissed.

‘Whatever. Tens of thousands of people know how to play the flute, and the number who tried to imitate me by using flutes to control corpses could make up an entire sect. If nothing works, I’ll just refuse to confess no matter what*,’ Wei Wuxian decided.

Jin Guangshan made another mental note into his profile of the Jiang sect’s head disciple; he was continuously surprised by how influential Wei Wuxian grew to be.

Wei Wuxian struggled against Lan Wangji’s grip just enough to allow his fingers to reach the instrument again. In the next second, he had begun a different song — one with an urgent tone and dropped quality to further disguise his identity.

Wen Ning snapped his body upright in an instant, before fleeing from the forest. He shook the ground as he jumped into the trees, moving far faster than the cultivators could follow.

Wen Ruohan raised an eyebrow, not bothering to hide his reaction. After all, despite the most powerful cultivators in the world being gathered to watch, none of them could deny the Yiling Patriarch’s weapon was impressive.

He had always considered Wen Ning to be most useful as a hostage to keep his sister in line, but perhaps there was more to the boy after all.

“There he goes!”

“Go!”

“Don’t let him get away!”

Several cultivators chased after, but it was obvious they would not be able to catch up.

With a bone-shattering clench, Lan Wangji squeezed Wei Wuxian’s wrist. He resisted as long as he could, but eventually flinched, gasping out and dropping the flute to the ground.

Wei Wuxian looked down, refusing to make eye contact with his captor.

“Um, Lan Xichen. Lan Wangji,” Jiang Yanli coughed softly, wringing her hands to calm her nerves. “What sort of… punishment… do you think your sect will give?”

Everyone turned to watch with interest as Lan Xichen considered his answer. The Jiang’s interest was obvious; the Jins were torn between genuine worry and more malicious curiosity; Huaisang’s involvement in Wei Wuxian's life caught both of the Nie brother’s attention; Wen Ruohan mostly wanted to see how Wei Wuxian would escape.

Finally, Lan Xichen smiled and answered, “I don’t think you need to worry. I doubt my brother will try and harm Young Master Wei.”

Jiang Cheng barely resisted scoffing aloud.

Finally, Lan Wangji released him.

Energy crackled in the air.

Wei Wuxian turned in surprise, but, before he could act, Lan Wangji was in front of him, using his guqin to resist Zidian's power.

Their combined energy dented the ground between them with their attacks, showing a skill far beyond that of the already-powerful clan members.

Now, Jiang Cheng felt a sharp bite of shame on top of his anger. He had fully expected Lan Xichen's prediction to be off, and had mentally prepared himself for watching Wei Wuxian fight for his life against the Second Jade.

Instead, Lan Wangji had defended his martial brother. Against him.

(How could the future be so wrong?)

Dust began to clear, and Wei Wuxian watched Lan Wangji with unconcealed shock. His defender didn't move, remaining firmly between the two Jiang brothers.

"Zidian?" Lan Jingyi gasped out, looking up to where Jiang Cheng stood on the branch of a tree.

"Zidian steals souls. It can also force the soul out from a stolen body. Does Sect Leader Jiang suspect Young Master Mo of being possessed?" Sizhui theorized.

The watcher's perspective switched until they were directly before the new Sect Leader Jiang. He glared down coldly at Wei Wuxian.

"So, you're back, Wei Wuxian."

The older Jiang Cheng's lips slowly curled into a smirk.

Jiang Cheng flinched, disappointment stabbing into him.

He had hoped — naively, in hindsight — that this was all a misunderstanding. Sure, everyone said that he hated demonic cultivators with a passion (that he had murdered his brother), and it was impossible to miss the very-real anger his older self kept tightly wrapped around him, but he had thought-

Maybe, just maybe, when Mo Xuanyu was revealed to actually be his older brother back from the dead, his older self would lose his anger. Maybe, having his brother (his last family, aside from Jin Ling) returned to him would fix all the problems, and even his hate for demonic cultivators would fade.

Evidently, that wasn't going to happen.

Seeing his son's internal grief, Jiang Fengmian stepped closer, hoping he could provide comfort with his presence and knowing the nearby sect leaders made open affection difficult. Jiang Cheng didn't notice him.

Wei Wuxian stepped back once, scanning his surroundings. The watchers followed his gaze, moving over trees and rocks, until finally it landed on Little Apple, grazing calmly in the middle of cultivation battles and spiritually-formed forest fires.

In a second's pause, Wei Wuxian glanced back at Jiang Cheng.

Then, he ran.

"Wanna leave?" Jiang Cheng asked rhetorically, gracefully flipping down from the tree before whipping Zidian out like the strike of purple lightning its name implied.

It cracked the earth.

Wei Wuxian was hit.

"A-Xian!" Jiang Yanli yelled.

Rolling several times as he fell, the Grandmaster of Demonic Cultivation finally came to a stop with a tired, pained groan. He was still in Mo Xuanyu's body.

Both Jiang Cheng and Lan Wangji did a double-take.

"What?" Yu Ziyuan demanded. "But that's not his body!"

Lan Qiren scoffed, "It must have been the demonic cultivation. It figures something as vile as resentful energy would be able to interfere with even powerful weapons."

"Or maybe it just doesn't count as possession," Nie Mingjue suggested, raising an eyebrow as if challenging anyone to disagree with him. "Wei Wuxian didn't seem to have much choice in the matter."

"That does seem likely," Lan Xichen agreed instantly. He had never heard of a ritual that could force someone into your own body before (it was likely no one had even thought of such a thing until Wei Wuxian created it) so it was hard to tell exactly how pre-existing weapons would interact with his creations.

Jiang Cheng stared in shock at the still-conscious body that he had expected to house his brother. Instead of falling to the floor as a corpse, the body continued to obey Wei Wuxian's commands as he rubbed his back, playing up the extent of the pain.

"How amazing!" Wei Wuxian cried out, his eyes watering to a surprisingly realistic effect. "You really can do anything when you're the Clan Leader of a powerful sect, can't you?! You can even beat up whoever you want to! For shame! Tsk! Tsk! Tsk!"

Nie Huaisang snorted slightly at the return of Wei Wuxian's 'entitled lunatic' act, and noticed Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan do the same. Unknown to all except Lan Xichen, Lan Wangji was also highly amused by the performance from the — gorgeous, selfless, protective, talented, passionate, joyful — demonic cultivator.

(The one who, for some reason, called him "Lan Zhan" when even his own brother used "Wangji.")

"Impossible," Jiang Cheng hissed. "Why didn't it work?"

'Of course Zidian can't take my soul. I haven't possessed anyone's body. This was a sacrifice! A forced sacrifice!'

Simultaneously, Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen turned to look at each other, smiling at their theory being proven right. The doubters stayed resolutely silent.

"You-how did you summon Wen Ning? I'm going to find out just who the hell you are!" Jiang Cheng declared, only to be answered by some of the surrounding cultivators.

"Sect Leader Jiang, you might not know, but Mo Xuanyu is one of the LanlingJin sect's… ahem. Because he had low spiritual powers and didn't work hard in training his cultivation, and he had a sort of… anyways, he was thrown out of the LanlingJin sect. If I had to make a guess, he probably ventured onto the wrong path since the right one didn't work for him. It doesn't necessarily mean… that the Yiling Patriarch possessed him."

Madam Jin sighed at the obvious why the cultivator was talking around the cause. It seemed, even thirteen years later, the Jin sect could not escape the constant stream of clan-related scandals.

Jin Ling nodded and added, "Mo Xuanyu's always been a lunatic. He'll chase after anything that looks good. Men or women, trees, flowers, or animals, he'll pursue them all with a smile. It's disgusting."

Jiang Cheng's eyebrow twitched, and a look of revulsion came over his face.

'I can't believe Mo Xuanyu being an idiot saved me,'* Wei Wuxian thought. '*This is hilarious.'

Lan Wangji coughed, covering up the hint of a smile that appeared for a brief second.

"That's right," another cultivator agreed. "Wei Wuxian was a monster-"

Jiang Cheng bit his lip to avoid screaming at the unquestioned declaration.

"-but he at least had good taste. He liked flirting with pretty girls. If he wanted a body, he wouldn't have picked a madman's, would he?"

"Exactly. And his flute sounded terrible. He can't compare to the Yiling Patriarch and his flute!"

"...Really."

Wei Wuxian blinked once, then laughed embarrassedly.

Once again, chuckles rang out across the gathered cultivators. Although somewhat hesitant, Jiang Cheng was in agreement; they might not know his brother's morality, but they were all still aware of his skill ~~that he could never measure up to~~. Besides, it was nice to have something to laugh about.

(Anything to distract from his A-Jie's death.)

(Or how his shixiong had to be kept safe from future-him.)

'It doesn't mean anything,' Jiang Cheng thought. 'I should first find an excuse to take him back and use every possible method to get information out of him. It's impossible for him to not confess anything or give himself away — especially now that he's reacted this way. I've done things like this plenty of times already.'

Jiang Cheng shook his head. It was all a lie. It had to be.

"Alright. Then… take him back."

"Yes!"

With a feigned squeak, Wei Wuxian immediately ran behind Hanguang-jun and gripped onto the man's arm for support, shouting, "What are you gonna do to me?!"

For indecipherable reasons, Lan Wangji felt the tips of his ears grow hot at the scene.

To the watcher's surprise (and relief), Lan Wangji stood protectively in front of Wei Wuxian, guarding him from the Sect Leader and blocking the Yunmeng Jiang disciples who had been walking closer.

"...Young Master Lan, are you making this difficult on purpose?"

"Sect Leader Jiang, the evidence is right before your eyes. Mo Xuanyu hasn't been possessed. Why would you put so much effort into troubling such an unimportant person?" Lan Sizhui defended.

The trio of Lans brightened at seeing their disciple.

Ignoring the conversation about him, Wei Wuxian calmly thought 'I need to find a way to get rid of both sides. Oh, I could-"

"Hm. I could ask Second Master Lan the same question. Why are you trying to protect a lunatic who knows demonic cultivation?"

Keeping his gaze steady on Jiang Cheng, Lan Wangji answered "He used resentful energy, but he did the right thing. I can't sit and watch others bully him."

"Wangji!" Lan Qiren shouted. "He is using resentful energy! It's sacrilegious!"

“I know,” Lan Wangji responded immediately, bowing his head and ignoring the glares sent their way by the Jiangs and Nies. “I do not know what he — I — am thinking. I apologize.”

His uncle huffed, but acknowledged “We agreed to not punish for things that have yet to happen. However, keep this in mind going forward.”

Lan Wangji nodded once in agreement.

As they spoke, Lan Jingyi also spoke up in defense of Mo Xuanyu (though, granted, in a decidedly un-Lan-like manner), reminding them all that “Mo Xuanyu” had saved the teenagers three times. In an instant, the watcher’s view shifted and allowed them to see Jin Ling’s slightly guilty expression from where he stood behind his uncle.

“Look, Sect Leader Jiang,” Wei Wuxian protested. “Having you go after me like this is making me feel very troubled. I don’t chase after everything that looks good!”

Jiang Cheng promptly choked on his own spit, and noticed the people around him weren’t doing much better.

Using deliberately provocative body language, Wei Wuxian ran a finger over his lips in a considering gesture, continuing “Like that big cow in my village. He was way too fat. That’s not my type. And you? You aren’t my type either.”

In conclusion, Wei Wuxian flicked a bit of hair forward, getting it stuck in his mouth.

Jin Guangshan was impressed. Given Wei Wuxian’s exemplary physical appearance (in both bodies), the confidence and freedom portrayed was certainly a display that could entice any audience. He might not personally be interested in boys, but he could appreciate beauty.

In fact, coupled with the direct opposite that was Lan Wangji, the two of them could make a lovely pair. Like two precious, porcelain dolls — no, no, they were much too dangerous for that. More like exotic beasts, who should be collared and locked down; kept beautiful, but only brought out when they were of use.

A glance to his left told him Wen Ruohan was thinking along the same lines as him.

Lan Wangji shivered, feeling an inexplicable chill run up his spine.

In response to Wei Wuxian’s shameless statement, Jiang Cheng’s Zidian sent a trail of purple lighting crawling up his arm.

“You-fine. Then, may I ask what kind of person is your type?”

A sense of dread fell over all watchers as Wei Wuxian began to giggle.

“...What is he doing?”

Giving a long, drawn-out sigh, Yu Ziyuan braced herself for the impending blow.

“Well, to be honest… Hanguang-jun is my type!”

“What?!”

“That-”

“Shameless!” Lan Wangji shouted, raising his voice for the first time the other sects had heard as a terrible (telling, repulsive, shameful) heat of pleasure scorched through him. He tried very hard to not focus on how Wei Wuxian was playfully running his hand through stray locks of hair, nor on the shock (but very pointedly not disgust) that shone in his older-self’s expression.

Even Lan Xichen’s mouth was gaping open for a moment in an usual display of uncontrolled emotion, before he forced himself to calm down and moved to help his uncle (who had begun coughing up blood at the proclamation).

A moment later, Jiang Yanli gave a delighted giggle.

“Oh, A-Xian,” she whispered fondly.

The subject of their attention only gave a pleased, mischievous hum.

‘Feeling disgusted, right?’ he thought, eyes turned towards Lan Wangji. ‘This is killing two birds with one stone! One who’s overly-competitive, and one who’s overly-proper. They’ll definitely feel repulsed and keep their distance from me!’

While most were impressed with his knowledge and creativity (and audacity), Lan Wangji frowned and looked down. He knew future Wei Wuxian was right — he should be disgusted, he should be repulsed — and the lack of those emotions made shame tear through his heart.

Hanguang-jun very calmly ran a hand along the strings of his guqin as if in contemplation.

(To Xichen, it looked more like he needed an outlet for his affection.)

Then, his gaze turned to a now-confused Wei Wuxian and grasped the latter’s wrist yet again.

“Mark your words.”

“...Hm?”

“...What?”

Nearly every member of the audience had the same reaction as Wei Wuxian. Lan Wangji was sure his ears had turned as red as the Yiling Patriarch’s resentful energy.

“I’ll take him back to the Lan sect.”

“Huh?” Wei Wuxian repeated. The befuddled eyes of the Jiang cultivators showed even those in the future were confused.

Lan Wangji still didn't answer.

"...Huh?!"

"...What just happened?"

The scenery around them had faded out, leaving the watchers to fill in the blanks on their own.

"...That at least didn't seem like a… punishment was intended, perhaps?" Jiang Fengmian suggested, still looking somewhat dazed. He knew his ward's habit of using words to play with people's emotions — either to flirt or anger, or both at the same time — but he had never seen it responded to in such a way. Given how confused the future Jiang cultivators had looked, it couldn't be about the changes in time.

But the Lan sect of today would never accept such a thing.

('At least he escaped me,' Jiang Cheng acknowledged, before realizing what he'd just thought and convulsing in a full-body flinch.)

The watching cultivators turned to look at the younger Lan Wangji, but he seemed even more confused than all of them combined. As Lan Qiren had said, it was demonic cultivation. Most of them would agree that Wei Wuxian had used it for righteous reasons just then, but there was no way the Lan sect would agree. Even if he didn't think so, wasn't bringing Wei Wuxian to the Cloud Recesses just asking for him to be killed?

"Wangji?" Xichen whispered, leaning in. "Are you okay?"

But Lan Wangji had no answer to give, too struck by what he saw. He knew the shameful, disgusting things he was feeling were probably paralleled by his future self, but for Hanguang-jun to have so little restraint as to act on those feelings was incomprehensible. Where had his prided self control gone? Where were the qualities that gifted his future self the title of "Light-Bearing Lord?"

What was wrong with him?

Finally the scenery faded back into existence, this time in a beautiful, tranquil mountain. The cliffs were covered with grass, and the stone steps reflected the light like silver.

A serene aura washed over the world.

It was broken by a scream.

"No! I'm not going in! I'm not! No, I'm not!"

"A-Xian?" Jiang Yanli asked, recognizing the voice.

As much as Lan Qiren wanted to watch out for the disaster Wei Wuxian was inevitably causing, his attention was momentarily torn away by something else: bunnies.

‘Why are there bunnies in the Cloud Recesses?’ he asked himself upon seeing a large colony of them in the abandoned grassy fields.

“I’m not going in!” Wei Wuxian repeated, and their view switched so that they could see him clinging desperately to his donkey as Lan Sizhui and Lan Jingyi tried (and failed) to coax him in.

“Why are you complaining? You said you liked Hanguang-jun!” Lan Jingyi pointed out, not realizing Wei Wuxian had just been trying to manipulate the groups.

As much as Lan Qiren despised the shameless nature of his future-nephew’s act, he had to admit it was amusing to see how much Wei Wuxian’s attempt had blown up in his face.

(But, if what Lan Xichen said was true — if Wangji truly didn’t intend to simply re educate the demonic cultivator — then there might be a problem)

(Forcing someone to enter the Cloud Recesses to protect them was just a little too close to what his brother had done. He prayed his nephew would not end the same.)

“Hanguang-jun has brought you all the way here!” Lan Jingyi continued. “What are you crying about?”

“I also like my dear Lil’ Apple, but I don’t live in a donkey shed!” Wei Wuxian explained from where he lay clinging onto the creature. The donkey looked even more disgusted with him than all the humans combined.

“What are you going on about? You need to keep it down here. The rules are all written on that wall. Now settle down, or you’ll regret it.”

As he spoke, he made a motion to the large wall to their side.

Even the Lan cultivators were shocked.

“There seem to be… quite a few more,” Lan Xichen observed. The Gusu Lan sect’s wall had gained 3,000 rules in its hundreds of years in existence, but now-

“Have the rules on your wall of discipline increased in number? Last time I came here, there were only three thousand,” he demanded, thinking back to the culture exchange twenty years before.

“How long ago was that? It’s been four thousand for years!”

Wei Wuxian made a strange noise between gasping and hacking as he heard the outrageous number.

“So, our style of cultivating has changed immensely because of the inventions he has created in quite a short time. Is it likely that your new rules exist for the same reason?”

Beside his sons — one who had zoned out of the simulation completely (Wen Chao) and one who had grown bored now that the fighting had ended (Wen Xu) — Wen Ruohan smirked in amusement. It appeared Wei Wuxian's influence was farther reaching than even the man himself could have guessed.

Though, if they were right about Wei Wuxian splitting his soul, he supposed a lack of awareness and even memory loss could be explained.

'So many new rules,' Wei Wuxian thought to himself, then laid his head against Lil' Apple. 'I hated this place from the beginning.'

Lan Wangji frowned, feeling hurt but unable to identify the reason why.

"Young Master Mo," Sizhui spoke. "His Lordship is doing this for your own sake. Otherwise, Sect Leader Jiang wouldn't have let you go."

Wei Wuxian cried again.

"Alright! Stop being so noisy!" Jingyi growled. "Making noise in the Cloud Recesses is forbidden!"

"I'm only being noisy because I don't want to go in there!"

Huaisang thought he had a point.

"Please give up on me!" he continued, and Jingyi took a step forward as if to begin ranting.

"Don't bother with him," Hanguang-Jun ordered as he continued to walk up the mountain, pausing Jingyi mid-step. "Let him cry. When he becomes tired, drag him in."

Now, nearly everyone was gaping openly.

"What are you trying to do to my brother!" Jiang Cheng demanded, momentarily forgetting proper decorum. With Lan Qiren frozen in horror at the similarities to Qingheng-Jun, and Lan Wangji stunned over his own shamelessness, Lan Xichen was left to answer.

"Rest assured, I don't believe my brother intends to do anything uncouth. I think he's just trying to make sure Young Master Wei doesn't run off and fall back into some other Sect's clutches where he would, undoubtedly, be punished. It's obvious in the concern in my brother's expression."

"Obvious concern?" Jin Zixuan repeated, but Jiang Cheng had grown quiet. There wasn't much more he could say in protest, when Lan Wangji's future self was trying to protect Wei Wuxian from his future self.

Wei Wuxian stared in shock for a moment after Lan Wangji made that declaration. Then, blinking himself out of it, he immediately hopped onto his donkey.

“Lil’ Apple, let’s go!” he shouted, trying to get as far away as possible. Lil’ Apple, however, simply spun in a circle and started going in the wrong direction, ignoring Wei Wuxian’s cries of protest.

The Lan juniors could only watch, flabbergasted and frozen.

“Stop, stop!” Wei Wuxian shouted. In the conflict, his hair had fallen out of the previous bun he had kept it in, switching to a ponytail.

Yu Ziyuan blinked, once again shocked by the physical similarities between Wei Wuxian and Mo Xuanyu. It seemed like the other sects would have no problem recognizing Wei Wuxian if they saw him.

Slowly, Hanguang-jun turned to face the donkey which was steadfastly approaching him, and held out his hand to reveal the apple in it.

“Lil’ Apple! You’re a traitor!” Wei Wuxian screamed.

Not even Wen Qing could hide her amusement here.

However, the scene then began to fade before their eyes, and the hours of the day switched in an instant, allowing the sun to change position with the weather.

“Twenty years earlier,” Lan Sizhui’s voice read. However, it was instantly clear that this was the older Sizhui, who had trapped them in the simulation and narrated information, rather than the one who had been part of the play put on before their eyes.

Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli made eye contact, both simultaneously feeling a sense of dread creep up on them. If they were going to see what would have happened if not for the simulation, were they also going to see what had caused the older Wei Wuxian to have such a dull look in his silver eyes?

(Would they learn why everything in the future was so wrong?)

Worry clung to them like a shadow.

“Wei Wuxian! Wei Wuxian! Wei Ying!” the younger Jiang Cheng shouted.

Laughing slightly as he finished putting down some jars, Wei Wuxian then spun around and ran over, appeasing with an “I’m coming! I’m coming!”

His smile was still bright, and his eyes held the same joy they did when he was in Mo Xuanyu’s body, making them look even more similar. It was readily apparent why he was considered the fourth most sought-after young master despite his lack of bloodline.

Taking a deep breath, Lan Wangji forced himself to look away. He was staring too intensely for it to be appropriate; he resolved to work on his self control.

“He’s not dressed in Yunmeng Jiang’s robes?” Jin Zixuan asked Jiang Cheng, feeling more comfortable now that they had spent some time together.

Jiang Cheng shrugged noncomentally. Internally, he signed in frustration; his mother had always encouraged Wei Wuxian's different appearance. His brother took it as expressing his individuality, but Jiang Cheng knew his mother saw it as widening the divide between Wei Wuxian and the sect.

The watchers could only see his friends' backs now, but it was instantly apparent who the two figures were.

"Huaisang?" Nie Mingjue blinked in shock. He had seen the other's older selves, and had known it was possible, but it was still surreal to see such an accurate recreation of his brother standing before him.

Similarly, Huaisang did a double take towards himself. However, knowing the mischief that was likely to be revealed to his brother (even if he hadn't technically done it yet), he began tugging his hair in a nervous tick. He really, really wished he had his fan to hide behind.

The Jiang, Jin, Wen, and Lan clans had gotten pieces about them revealed. Perhaps it would soon be the Nie clan's turn.

"The 18th year of the reign of Xuanzheng, the year of Wuyin," Lan Sizhui narrated again.

The world came into view, turning into a river at night.

"Gusu, Cloud Recesses."

Nearly-silent, a figure ran across the bridge at twilight. Their surroundings switched to the middle of town, and they saw Wei Wuxian hop onto the roofs of buildings, sneaking through the darkness.

He looked around, and, seeing as no one was there, finally pulled out the jars he had hidden earlier. He brought it closer and breathed in the scent.

"Bringing alcohol into the Cloud Recesses?" Lan Qiren assumed. Really, the boy was just like his mother. Equally unruly and uncouth and undisciplined and stunning-

He resolved to keep his nephews away from the boy at all costs.

At the sound of someone landing behind him, Wei Wuxian turned around. A younger Lan Wangji was staring back at him.

Eyes all fell to the Lan Wangji with them, gauging his reaction. Although no one else could see anything in the Second Jade's stone-still face, Lan Xichen instantly realized that Lan Wangji was worried. If his older self was so obvious in his intentions and feelings, would this version of him behave equally shamefully?

He wasn't even sure if that would be so bad.

Despite having been caught, Wei Wuxian did not panic. Instead, he quickly took in the situation, glancing around to see if there was anyone else. Finding no one, he glanced up at Lan Wangji, smirked, and then turned completely towards him with a blinding smile.

Eyes brighter than the moon; a smile brighter than the sun. Lan Wangji was mesmerized.

Wei Wuxian held up a jar in offering.

“Emperor’s smile! I’ll give you a jar, so could you pretend you never saw me?”

It was over. The vision around them had faded back to white.

Lan Wangji blinked twice, stupefied by what he had seen.

That was — would have been — their first meeting? They were going to see what caused those differences — the sorrow in Jiang Wanyin, the death of Jiang Yanli, the grief then ~~love~~ passion in Lan Wangji’s own eyes?

The fall of the Wens?

An unusual sense of nervousness came over Lan Wangji as he glanced towards the Wens. Wen Qing seemed to be preoccupied thinking about her brother, and Wen Chao was easily distracted, but Wen Ruohan and Wen Xu were watching with unfaltering focus.

Finally, after nearly a minute of contemplative silence, Lan Xichen coughed and said, “Perhaps we should… review. I think we can all agree this segment gave us quite a lot to discuss. Especially with how... wrong most of us felt that future was.”

In response, Jin Zixuan squeaked, his cheeks flushing bright red, then a deeper red as everyone turned to look at him. He turned purple when Jiang Yanli failed to suppress a giggle.

“Ah. I… have a nephew,” Jiang Cheng added on, eager to discuss one of the few happy facts hidden in the barrage of tragedy. Only inches away from the Jiang heir, Jin Zixuan looked nearly blue.

When he made eye contact with a pleasantly-pink Jiang Yanli, that color only darkened.

Nie Huaisang laughed as well, agreeing, “he was rather cute, wasn’t he. I can’t believe you already know what your son looks like at pretty much your age.”

Now Jiang Yanli was blushing as well, though hers was more of a thankful flush than Jin Zixuan’s outright mortification. It seemed both were happy with what they saw.

(Jin Zixuan very carefully didn’t bring up his fears of changing the timeline. He should — would have to — later, but for now he didn’t want to consider the possibility. He refused to wonder if the information they were getting would inadvertently stop Jin Ling from being born.)

(Yes, it was better to focus on the happier things first.)

Then, as if in purposeful contradiction to Jin Zixuan's thoughts, Madam Yu said "We'll need to ensure your son doesn't end up an orphan this time, A-Li."

Just like that, the playful mood which had crept into the viewers' minds was flushed out without remorse. It was hard to imagine, but if they accepted the visions as true, they would need to accept that Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan would be dead in a few short years.

"If we believe this!" Wen Chao countered. "I, for one, find your belief that the Wen sect could be wiped out to be a childish fantasy. Wishing for something to be true doesn't mean you have the power to make it happen!"

Jiang Cheng gritted his teeth. If Wei Wuxian were here, he would have said something like 'Oh really? And what's someone like you going to do against my demonic cultivation? Just throw Wen Zhuliu at it like you do with all your other problems?!'

But he wasn't here, and everyone else was too smart to risk pointlessly offending Wen Ruohan.

However, to everyone's surprise, a defense came regardless.

"Until we have more information on the war, we can't confidently say that this can't be true. So far, I've only seen evidence in favor. Unless you've somehow caught something everyone else has missed, I suggest you stop making assumptions without proof," Wen Qing lectured.

The "idiot" at the end went unsaid but clearly heard.

Jiang Fengmian glanced to Wen Ruohan, ready to defend the brave girl if needed, only to see the man smirking at his cousin's words.

He agreed.

At first, the Jiang Sect Leader was pleased. It would lower the chance of another similar confrontation (keeping his children away from starting potential arguments), and the sentiment was indirectly supporting his ward. Wen Ruohan believed what the vision said Wei Wuxian could do.

Oh. Wen Ruohan believed what the vision said Wei Wuxian could do.

That… might be a problem.

"Speaking of which," Lan Qiren began. "Wen-gunian, do you believe that was your brother?"

A barely-visible flinch shook Wen Qing's body like an earthquake, but she understood the reason for asking. They had to check everything they could, and she was the only one who knew what her brother looked like.

"...Yes. There were noticeable differences, in part because he's-" Wen Qing, cut off and swallowed, "but he was undoubtedly my brother. Turned into a weapon."

Jiang Cheng frowned and turned to protest, but didn't know where to begin. Silently, his sister walked closer and simply gave Wen Qing a reassuring smile, thanking her for speaking despite the difficulty.

The tension in Wen Qing's stature faded away.

"On a different note," Nie Huaisang began, shrinking away when Lan Qiren and the Wen brothers turned their gazes upon him, but regaining his confidence when Nie Mingjue stood between them. "Um, I was looking at the dates, and I got curious about something. This takes place in the future, and we've tentatively agreed Wei Wuxian didn't seem to be…."

Awake? Conscious? Alive? A full soul?

The Jiang siblings looked like they'd start crying if he tried the last two.

"...aware during those thirteen years off. I was wondering how old the Wei Wuxian we just saw was. We probably shouldn't include the time in which he didn't… exist."

Ah, messed up there. Jiang Yanli's eyes were watering. Luckily, Jin Zixuan seemed to be trying to comfort her.

"Well, based on the timeline, Wangji is almost thirty-six."

"And A-Cheng is also thirty-five."

"Then, with thirteen years removed, Wei Wuxian would be… what? Twenty-two? Twenty-one?"

"That's unbelievable."

Most of the mid-teens muttered among themselves, feeling weird yet again at seeing such old versions of themselves and their friends. That Wei Wuxian might not be quite as old, but even twenty-one was definitely an adult. The first thing they'd seen had been the adult Wei Wuxian.

It made them feel comparatively young.

The adults shared the sentiment, but for the opposite reason.

"Only twenty-one?" Madam Jin spoke aloud with clear consideration. Nie Mingjue was the youngest Sect Leader currently in position (Lan Xichen might commonly stand in for his father, but he was not yet sect leader), and yet Wei Wuxian was slightly younger.

Wei Wuxian was twenty-one, old enough to lead classes, but — especially to cultivators — still a young man.

"And to the public, he's been a child, a street rat, a young master, a head disciple, a war hero, and the greatest monster in history. And yet he's still practically-"

"A child," Jiang Fengmian agreed.

“You can’t baby him forever,” Yu Ziyuan snapped. “He’s an adult.”

“Was he an adult during the war?” Fengmian asked back. “Were any of our children adults?”

“Well, perhaps you shouldn’t have allowed them to participate, then,” Wen Ruohan suggested with a cruel smile. Nie Mingjue barely held back an outraged growl.

The countdown to the next segment reached zero.

Wei Wuxian leaned back in his seat, rubbing his forehead in an attempt to remove his growing headache. He could last a fairly long time with his golden core as powerful as it was, but even he had limits.

(Simultaneously running a sect and investigating an unknown medical condition nearly shot past his maximum capabilities, but he wasn’t a member of the YunmengJiang sect for nothing.)

But it wasn’t as though his efforts were futile. Scanning the Jiang clan and the Nie brothers (the Lans, Jins, and Wens refused his offer) had revealed three things: the power’s purpose, effect, and characteristics.

The intentions were easy enough to determine after comparing the energy signature to the ones produced by various different talismans. These comas were created as a way to convey information, rather than out of malicious intent. The effect brought the consciousnesses of everyone under the spell to some sort of dream realm, where they were all shown the same thing. Once he had sufficient data, the Lan sect was willing to run their own tests, and confirmed his results in the Twin Jades and Lan Qiren. It was the last discovery that was the most concerning, however.

One identifiable part in the spell was characters related to time. There were more powerful factors still indecipherable, but there was one that was easy to see. The patient’s perception of time was slowed down so that they could exist inside the same dream realm without removing their souls from their bodies. Because the signal needed time to move across the hundreds of miles between cities, their sense of it slowed down.

It had been only a little over an hour to the clan leaders; it had been nearly two days outside.

He rubbed his forehead again, feeling the pain multiply. Maybe he should have asked A-Yue for some water before sending her to bed.

According to Wei Wuxian’s calculations, the spell was going to last for just under two weeks. He wasn’t sure the other clans would make it another day!

When the Lan elders heard his report, they had reacted with outrage, screaming (against their own rules) and cursing the dastardly monsters who had concocted this insane scheme.

A dimension away, 4 teenage radishes sneezed.

Despite being sect leader of the Yunmeng Jiang sect, Jiang Cheng hated going to inter-sect conferences. He hadn't liked them to begin with, but, after the events at Guanyin temple, they became unbearable.

"Did you hear?" someone would ask. "Of Jin Guangyao's crimes?"

"Yes, what a horrible, dreadful man. He murdered Jin Zixuan, his brother."

"His sister in law-"

"His father-"

"Jin Guangshan had it coming."

"Of course, of course. But did you hear about his wife?"

"His son!"

"And did you know? The Yiling Patriarch was proven innocent!"

With Hanguang-jun's impeccable reputation, and all four of the great clan leaders supporting the same story, the common folk and cultivators had no choice but to accept their explanation. And, if they picked the story the clan leaders offered, they would be forced to accept Wei Wuxian's innocence as well.

Now, all everyone — from cultivators to civilians to sect leaders to children — wanted to talk about was Wei Wuxian's proclaimed innocence. Once Wei Wuxian was brought up, Lan Wangji was sure to follow.

"Our glorious new Chief Cultivator."

"Yes, even when the whole world told him he was wrong, he stayed on the side of justice, even getting scars to prove his loyalty to truth."

"He was the only one who wasn't tricked by Jin Guangyao and Jin Guangshan. They only one who stayed on the side of justice. He is truly Hanguang-jun."

"And I heard he's getting married to the Yiling Patriarch!"

"Really?" they would ask, as if they didn't already know. "How wonderful."

Because Wei Wuxian might have been proven innocent to all of them, but that was only innocence in terms of intention. No one would deny the fact that he was still the weapon used to kill 5,000 cultivators in a single night.

He was no less dangerous.

(Only more useful, allowing them to make infinitely preposterous requests for his time and inventions and research while still scaring their children into behaving with his name.)

“No one will dare cause trouble for Hanguang-jun and the Grandmaster of Demonic Cultivation.”

“With him in charge and the Yiling Patriarch keeping him there, we’ll never have to worry about being tricked by an evil like Jin Guangyao again!”

Unquestionable villains being defeated by romantic heroes would always be the most interesting version of events.

(And anything was better than admitting they were in the wrong.)

“I’m glad Hanguang-jun has him.”

“Yes, if the second young master of the Lan sect keeps him on a leash, we have nothing to worry about.”

“Under the right hands, he’s the world’s most powerful tool. We’ll never have to worry about a cultivation war again!”

“Truly, this is the beginning of an era of peace.”

And Jiang Cheng knew they were wrong — knew Lan Wangji would rather die than keep Wei Ying imprisoned — but that didn’t stop those words from reminding him that it was no longer his job to make sure. He didn’t have a right ensure Wei Wuxian was living happily. Not anymore.

It seemed like the whole world was trying to rub it in his face that Wei Wuxian was no longer part of the Yunmeng Jiang sect, and he had no one but himself to blame.

“...Back then, the LanlingJin sect, the QinghеNie sect, and the GusuLans Sect had already finished fighting over the biggest share. The rest could only get some small shrimps. You, on the other hand, had just rebuilt Lotus Pier and behind you was the Yiling Patriarch, Wei Wuxian, the danger of whom was immeasurable. Do you think the other sects would like to see a young sect leader who was so advantaged? Luckily, you didn’t seem to be on good terms with your shixiong, and since everyone thought there was an opportunity, of course they’d add fuels to your fire if they could. No matter what, to weaken the Yunmeng Jiang Sect was to strengthen themselves. Sect Leader Jiang, if only your attitude towards your shixiong was just a bit better, showing everyone that your bond was too strong to be broken, or if you exhibited just a bit more tolerance after what happened, things wouldn’t have become what they were.”

Even knowing that Jin Guangyao couldn’t be trusted, and even though it was probably only said as a response to what Jiang Cheng said, he couldn’t get those words out of his head.

“Just go talk to him!” Jin Ling shouted. “Senior-I mean… We both know Wei Wuxian wants to reconnect with you! Your relationship isn’t irreparable jiujiu! It’s obvious he misses you!”

But what Jin Ling didn’t understand was that Wei Wuxian always forgave slights against himself. He held a grudge against Jin Zixuan for years, and hated Wen Chao with an erupting passion, but even after coming back to life never held any real animosity for Jin Guangshang or Jin Guangyao or Su She or even him.

He was always looking forward.

(Not like Jiang Cheng. Never like him.)

If their situations were reversed, and Wei Wuxian had exterminated the newly-rebuilt Lotus Pier, he would never forgive the other; he wouldn’t give Wei Wuxian an opportunity to forgive him.

Of course, repeating that thought like a mantra in his head became significantly harder when Wei Wuxian was all anyone wanted to talk about.

(Jiang Cheng hates them all. He hates the mindless worms who gossip and the clans whose opinions bounce back and forth and the Jin sect for focusing on Wei Ying instead of helping Jin Ling and the Nie sect for leading the gossip under Huaisang and the Jiang sect for continuing to talk and the Lan sect for taking his brother away and stupid, stupid Wei Wuxian ~~and himself~~ and so much more.)

After failing (repeatedly) to get his own sect to stop talking about his brother, he decided to go find Jin Ling. His nephew might also enjoy talking about Wei Wuxian, but at least he actually knew the man rather than getting all his information from the local watermelon sellers.

The only problem was that, when he wasn’t seeing Jiang Cheng or running the Jin sect, Jin Ling spent all his time in the Cloud Recesses!

Jiang Cheng scowled, speeding through the sky and praying that he wouldn’t run into Wei Wuxian when he visited.

The white void around the watchers vanished as the Cloud Recesses faded into existence.

“The 18th year of the Reign of Xuangzheng, Cloud Recesses,” Lan Sizhui’s voice narrated again.

Their surroundings switched, and they saw Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng running through a bamboo forest. As if it wasn’t obvious enough, Wei Wuxian’s color-divergent but otherwise identical Yunmeng Jiang sect robes proved they were being shown the teenage Wei Ying and Jiang Cheng.

Being abruptly confronted by what would have happened without them being dragged into the vision suddenly filled Madam Jin with a sense of worry. They had no way to contact the outside world, but she knew without a doubt that the immobilization or perhaps outright disappearance of the 16 most powerful leaders would throw the world into disarray. She prayed the sects would remain standing until they got out.

The pair finally returned to the watcher's lines of sight as they left the forest to walk across a stone bridge, giving them a perfect view of the Gusu mountains. While Wei Wuxian stretched excitedly, Jiang Cheng quickly straightened his robes out and turned to his brother with a scowl.

"If you get up late again tomorrow, I definitely won't wait for you," he declared.

To everyone who knew their relationship intimately, these words were no surprise.

However, to the people whose greatest understanding of the pair was the simulation's previous segments, they couldn't be more shocking.

"Huh. You don't hate each other."

"Of course not!" Jiang Cheng shouted, nearly standing out of his chair while trying to emphasize his insistence. Cracking a smile in response, Nie Mingjue allowed the assertion without complaint.

It was obvious Jiang Cheng needed to defend the authenticity of his relationship with Wei Wuxian. If Nie Mingjue was shown a divide between him and Huaisang, he was sure he would be behaving the same way.

Wei Wuxian gave a careless chuckle in response, easily threading fingers through his silky hair as he turned around.

"I was only just barely late. The worst punishment I can get is to stand in the corner!"

"Oh, look!" Jiang Yanli whispered to Jin Zixuan, pointing toward the nearby path where the simulation's version of him began to approach.

He turned, forcing himself to not blush at her close proximity.

"Zixuan-xiong," Jiang Cheng greeted, both Yunmeng boys bowing immediately.

The Jin heir flicked a careless glance over, before preforming an equally disrespectful mockery of a bow.

Normally, Jin Zixuan wouldn't have cared. He was used to barely interacting with others, and often made no effort to get close to anyone from different sects.

But, somehow, seeing that felt wrong.

Jiang Cheng had stood by his side while his parents argued, creating a silent show of support which Huaisang had later joined as well. Jiang Yanli had unquestionable, genuine kindness, with none of the additional motives he had learned to expect from people.

He didn't like this feeling.

"I-" he began, then cut off, cheeks flushing. Several people glanced his way, but turned back once they saw he wasn't going to add anything.

Then, silently, he preformed a proper bow in Jiang Cheng's direction even though the other boy was facing away and couldn't see it.

The only two who saw were Jiang Yanli and Nie Huaisang, who shared an amused chuckle as they made eye contact.

Once Jin Zixuan had left completely, Wei Wuxian relaxed his bow with a scornful huff.

"He's becoming more and more presentable."

Lost in self-reflection, Jin Zixuan didn't bother to comment on the boy's scorn.

"Jin Clan of Lanling, as rich as the princes," Jiang Cheng agreed. "He's the heir of the Jin Clan. He has to be presentable."

"Hmm?" Wei Wuxian responded, bringing a hand to his chin as he watched with mischievous contemplation.

Jiang Cheng elbowed him.

"Huh?"

"Ah!" Wei Wuxian stumbled momentarily, before righting himself and rubbing his back tenderly.

Jiang Cheng was not amused.

"Don't get any ideas," he lectured. "I'm warning you. No matter what, Jin Zixuan is still my sister's fiance. He'll be family one day. You will have to bear with it."

Madam Jin was still diffused by the revelation of her son's possible death, so Jin Zixuan was the only one left to feel grateful toward his soon-to-be in-law. He had seen what Wei Wuxian had done to the Mos; experiencing the same would have been unbearable.

"The Orchid room?" Wei Wuxian asked as the watchers view changed to random pieces of scenery in the Cloud Recesses. "Huh. The name's not bad, but the old man who teaches is so stubborn."

Hiding a huffed laugh, Jiang Fengmian turned to Lan Qiren and gave a slight bow, "I apologize. A-Xian tends to be too free with his words."

Lan Qiren looked as though he was about to delve into a lecture, but Lan Xichen stepped forward immediately and bowed back.

“No need for that, Sect Leader Jiang. None of the people being shown asked for this to happen. I’m sure such a great violation of privacy will cause many similar incidents in the future.”

Despite wanting to disagree, the lack of Wei Wuxian — the one who had actually made the comment — allowed Lan Qiren to drop the argument with a dignified nod.

”But he’s extraordinary indeed. However useless one may be, he can turn them into presentable men.”

“Hah. Am I not presentable enough right now?”

“Ha! As though he could be!” Wen Chao cackled, causing Jiang Cheng’s smirk and Jiang Yanli’s pleased smile to vanish. It would have been a much more enjoyable experience if the Wens weren’t included.

(Though the whimper Wen Chao made following Wen Ruohan's unimpressed raised eyebrow was amusing.)

Farther down the path, one visiting cultivator dressed in gray and gold robes turned to face the pair.

Nie Mingjue blinked.

He had seen the back of his brother in the last segment, but this was his first frontal viewing. Unable to resist, he made his way over until he was standing directly in front of the simulation, his real brother following closely behind. He nearly did a double-take.

The Huaisangs were indistinguishable.

”Jiang-xiong! Wei-xiong!” Nie Huaisang cheerfully greeted.

“You are definitely going to be the one spot staining his whole teaching career,” Jiang Cheng told his brother, but nodded in response to Huaisang’s greeting.

An older disciple next to Huaisang furrowed his brow in confusion.

“Wuxian is only a disciple of the Jiang Clan. How come he’s able to study at Gusu?”

If Jiang Cheng could have punched the man, he would have. It was only made worse by how much his mother seemed to agree.

”Wuxian’s parents were friends of Jiang Fengmian, who’s treated him like his own,” Nie Huaisang responded.

“Oh, I see.”

“Or as his own,” Madam Yu hissed under her breath. Her husband had never confirmed her suspicions, but she refused to discount the possibility of Wei Wuxian’s true lineage.

Jiang Fengmian frowned, but turned away, not knowing what to say.

Playfully, Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian began nudging each other as they walked. The scene was a stark contrast to the interrogations and whipping which had taken place in the supposed future.

“No wonder Jiang Cheng and Wuxian get along so well. They’re like brothers!”

Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli nodded furiously in agreement. If there was one thing the pair hadn’t believed about the simulation, it was the supposed dissolution of their relationship.

(However, if their current relationship was being accurately shown, then perhaps that future was also-)

”Jiang-xiong. Wei-xiong. I’d say enjoy your stay, but the Jiang Sect’s lotus pier is much more fun than here, isn’t it?”

“Hmm. Depends on how you have fun,” Wei Wuxian responded. “There definitely aren’t as many rules. We don’t have to wake up this early either.”

“Hm? We start at 5:00 am here. It’s not that bad, right?” Huaisang asked as his fan crept open. “When do you two get up?”

“Him?” Jiang Cheng scoffed playfully, as Wei Wuxian yawned. “He rises at 9 and sleeps at 1. Instead of practicing swordplay, he goes to hunt pheasants and fool around.”

“I’m the best in hunting pheasants!”

Lan Qiren frowned disapprovingly at the proclamation, and almost everyone else just rolled their eyes, but Wen Ruohan found himself growing even more interested. Not much was known about Wei Wuxian’s skill. There were rumors regarding his parents and true status in the Jiang clan, but most reports simply agreed that he was a powerful head disciple. Plenty of talent, but no motivation to cultivate at beyond his already-outstanding pace.

(Then, the Wen Clan gave him motivation, and he revolutionized the world.)

”I want to go study at Yunmeng next year! No one will stop me!”

Nie Mingjue raised a very telling eyebrow at his brother, who in turn quickly hid behind a snickering Jiang Cheng.

His companion patted his back, responding “Huaisang, no one will stop you. Your brother will just break your legs.”

Wei Wuxian giggled at the comment, adding “Honestly, you can still have fun in Gusu.”

Lan Wangji imperceptibly perked up, feeling personally invested in Wei Wuxian’s enjoyment of Gusu but unable to discern the reason why.

”Are you kidding me, Wei-xiong? A piece of advice for you, this place doesn’t tolerate misbehavior,” Nie Huaisang explained, leaning in to whisper conspiratorially. “Now that you’re in Gusu, make sure to never mess with this one man.”

This time, it was Wen Xu who scoffed, and Wen Xu who was met with Wen Ruohan’s disapproving gaze.

“Who? Lan Qiren?”

“Not that old man, but his favorite student-”

Paired with Huaisang’s words, the watchers were allowed to observe a man in Gusu Lan robes from the back as he deftly straightened his appearance.

“-Lan Zhan, one of the Lan Brothers.”

“Lan Zhan of the Twin Jades of Lan? Lan Wangji?”

“Of course. He’s a perfect example of the legendary ‘other people’s children’ that parents tell you to compare yourself to. Heavens, he’s the same age as us, but he’s got no youthful energy. He’s in charge of discipline. Everyone here fears him.”

A stinging bite of displeasure gnawed at Lan Wangji’s mind in response to the description. For the dozens of disrespectful disciples learning at the Gusu Lan Sect, that was a fine first impression to have of him, but for Wei Wuxian-

It was only years of self-control that kept him from childishly glaring at Huaisang’s true self.

Though, judging by his brother’s expression, perhaps he wasn’t hiding as well as he wished he was.

”Is he a boy who looks quite handsome? Dressed in white, wearing a ribbon, carrying a silver sword on his back? And with his sour face, he looks like he’s at a funeral?”

‘Handsome?’ Lan Wangji echoed mentally. ‘Shameless!’

The tips of his ears burned crimson.

”Yeah, that’s him. However, he likes to meditate alone, so how did you see….”

Nie Huaisang trailed off, his eyes laying on the very person he was just talking about, sitting calmly and facing away from them. As the wind blew both his hair and the ends of his ribbon to the left, Lan Wangji turned his head to face them.

With the early morning sun behind him, he gained an ethereal presence.

Wei Wuxian laughed nervously.

Wen Qing’s lips momentarily cracked upward in an amused smile. She hadn’t forgotten what Wei Wuxian had made her brother into — a cold, dead, lifeless, soulless corpse which even she couldn't save — but the boy before her wasn't that man yet.

She doubted she would ever forgive him, but she could acknowledge that the simulation's 15 year old Wei Wuxian didn't deserve to die.

Not yet.

Unfreezing after a moment, Nie Huaisang glanced speculatively toward Lan Wangji, then slowly turned until his extended fan pointed toward Wei Wuxian.

Wei Ying refused to make eye contact.

In an instant, Nie Huaisang's fan had opened to cover everything below his eyes as he glared disapprovingly at his still-turned-away friend.

"Wuxian… have you done something wrong?"

"Ah… well…."

The bright morning sky darkened to night immediately, returning the audience to Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian's first confrontation on the roof.

Lan Wangji's icy gaze fell on Wei Wuxian, containing none of the deep passion found in the previous segment. With the barest trace of acknowledgement, he spoke.

"You are not allowed in until 7 am tomorrow. Get out."

To Xichen's confusion, those words made Lan Wangji relax just slightly. He had been worried the story could continue unrealistically depicting him as possessing no restraint, but it seemed the past, at least, was accurate.

"Emperor's Smile!" Wei Wuxian responded, thrusting one of the jars forward. "I'll give you a jar, so could you pretend you never saw me?"

While Huaisang snickered at the futile negotiation attempt, Madam Yu frowned.

"Apologies," she begrudgingly said at last. "He truly should know better."

Lan Xichen shook his head to convey how unnecessary the apology was, but Lan Qiren nodded in acceptance. Although this was a relatively minor infraction, knowing the boy's parents, more severe ones were sure to follow.

Including Demonic Cultivation.

"You can't drink here."

"Is there anything we can do here?"

"The rules are listed on the Rock of Disciplines. Go see for yourself."

Wei Wuxian sighed in response, turning around so he could sit on a nearby branch instead.

“Your house rules have more than 3,000 lines. Who’d look at that?”

Lan Wangji’s glare deepened.

“Ah, alright, alright. Liquor is prohibited in the Cloud Recesses. Then, if I don’t go in and drink it on the wall, it wouldn’t be a violation, right?”

“That isn’t the point of the rules,” Lan Qiren lectured, then rubbed his temples, realizing it was pointless to try to interfere.

Gleefully, Wei Wuxian tore the jar’s covering off with his mouth, then lifted it above his head. Slowly, liquor began pouring out, a significant portion missing its mark.

Small streams of liquid began trailing down the pale expanse of his neck, soaking his clothes but giving him an unnatural shine in the dim moonlight.

He looked ethereal.

“...Wow.”

“HUAISANG!”

“What?! We were all thinking it!”

Several people scoffed in disgust, but Huaisang quietly noticed no one denied it. Noticing this as well, Jiang Cheng and Jiang Fengmian simply gave tired sighs (though one considerably more amused than the other). They could never think of someone who was all but family that way, but they were neither blind nor ignorant to the way Wei Wuxian attracted eyes like a magnet despite his lack of family status.

By this point, they had simply grown numb to the feeling.

What they hadn’t become numb to, however, was the icky sensation which crept up their spines when they saw the considering look Jin Guangshan was giving Wei Wuxian.

Lan Wangji then blinked, seemingly snapping out of his shock, and immediately drew his sword.

Lan Qiren wanted to disapprove of his nephew jumping to an unsanctioned battle so quickly, but he knew first hand how tempting that was around people like Cangse Sanren (and, now, Wei Wuxian). If anything, he was just grateful that his nephew was still trying to uphold the rules.

The blade struck forward, attempting to destroy the jar, but Wei Wuxian slipped out of the way just in time. Lan Wangji sliced the air and cut it in two, but continued to miss his target with every attempt as Wei Wuxian narrowly dodged.

Bichen struck forward, and its opponent immediately wrapped the jar's strings around the blade, momentarily stalling it. Then, Lan Wangji brought his blade to the sky, shattering the jar.

The contrast was intriguing.

While most members of the audience were preoccupied with being impressed with or simply amused by the fight, Wen Ruohan's mind observed something else entirely.

Based on the battle before them, it could be said that Lan Wangji's fighting was the pinnacle of order, while Wei Wuxian's style was the pinnacle of freedom. Lan Wangji used millennia old techniques and rules which had been hammered into him until he was tapered like a fine blade; Wei Wuxian bounced off the surrounding trees and used whatever tools he had on him to his advantage, adapting within seconds.

They were a nearly-perfect balance.

"Huh?" the simulation's Huaisang asked, and they were instantly thrust back to the next day. "It's prohibited here to go out at night, drink alcohol, or fight privately. You-you've already broken three rules!"

Contrary to his friend's shock, Jiang Cheng just rubbed his eyes tiredly, muttering "Three rules in one night. You really are a special snowflake, aren't you?"

A long, tired sigh was breathed out through Lan Qiren's nose as he rubbed his eyes. Even though the vision hadn't yet shown his class with the ~~demonic cultivator~~ boy as his student, he could already predict how taxing it would be.

He silently lamented that the vision couldn't offer them any soothing tea.

Rather than showing the slightest bit of regret, Wei Wuxian merely pouted.

"There are more rules than ants," he mumbled, crossing his arms like a child.

In turning away from his friend, he moved to a new angle which allowed him to see something that attracted his attention like a spirit to a summoning: Lan Wangji.

Even after Wei Ying's explanation, Lan Wangji had not looked away from the trio. Under the other boy's befuddled gaze, he narrowed his eyes further into a disapproving glare.

Nie Huaisang silently slid away.

A few smiles were shared at the obvious childishness of boys being boys, but most of the adults couldn't relax. The more they saw the kids playing around and acting like the children they were, the more authentic the video seemed. And if this was real, who was to say that the predicted future of war and pain couldn't be true as well?

And Jiang Cheng-

With the casual nature of a gesture between brothers, Jiang Cheng put his hand on Wei Wuxian's shoulder.

"He's watching you. Good luck."

Wei Wuxian thought the warning over for a moment, before tilting his head teasingly and smirking as if he found the prospect of Lan Wangji's challenge entertaining. He probably did.

Jiang Yanli bit her lip and turned away, unable to face her brothers acting so normal as the fear of what might happen in the future crept up on her. Seeing this, Jin Zixuan wanted to comfort her, but flushed and turned away.

He had plenty of half-siblings, but he didn't even know their names. He had no parallel to Jiang Cheng's relationship with Wei Wuxian to draw on, and no experience to know how such an obviously inseparable bond could have been… separated.

None of this made any sense!

"Good morning, sir!" the students chorused as the disciple exchange began.

Having been brought inside the large lecture hall, the watching cultivators spread out. Unable to resist, Jin Zixuan walked toward the illusion of himself, standing before him and observing intently. His parents followed, and the Nie brothers did the same with Huaisang.

In response to his student's greeting, the simulation's Lan Qiren merely gave a considering hum, then ordered the students to "Be seated."

With a soft thump, an enormous scroll unrolled itself until it was crossing the entirety of the room. Thousands of small letters were just barely visible from where the watchers were standing.

To Nie Huaisang, who remembered how his last stay at Gusu went, the scroll brought about an unnerving sensation of dread.

Wei Wuxian gaped openly when he saw the length.

"House rules of the Lan Clan:" Lan Qiren recited in near-monotone. "No private fighting, no promiscuity, no killing inside the city, no wandering around at night-"

Only a handful of seconds had passed before Wei Wuxian relaxed, setting his elbow on the table and resting his chin on his hand, disbelief written across his face.

"-no shouting, no rushing, no smirking, no sitting hunched over-"

To the watching Lan Wangji's surprise, Wei Wuxian's eyes soon drifted over to his simulation's seated figure. Despite the tiresome repetition of words he surely knew by heart, the Lan boy still sat straight up, looking forward intently.

Most of the teenagers (and Jin Guangshan) had begun to zone out only seconds after Wei Wuxian did, justifying it to themselves that they weren't actually present in the class. So, the sight of both the real and fake Lan Wangji still watching the explanation with proper respect was staggering.

"He's terrifying" Nie Huaisang muttered, to the silent agreement of all the teenagers and even a few of the adults. Opposite to them, Wen Xu watched with something akin to patronizing amusement.

What would it take to break the Second Jade's facade?

'How can he listen to something so boring?' Wei Wuxian wondered, more rudely mirroring the thoughts of many of the watchers.

"...no-" a sharp wack struck the classroom as Lan Qiren cut off, causing Wei Wuxian to turn back to him. "I'm reciting them one by one because no one reads them. Let's see if anybody continues to use ignorance as justification for breaking the rules.."

'Is he talking about me?' Wei Wuxian wondered cheerily.

"Yes!" Jiang Cheng responded, running a hand through his hair in exasperation. Even through that, he couldn't stop a small smile from sticking to his face.

Yes, this was Wei Wuxian, the brother he remembered playing with and protecting from dogs; the one who didn't know demonic cultivation and wouldn't have felt the need to run from Lan Wangji.

"Since someone is still not paying attention," Lan Qiren continued, "alright then, I'll tell you something else. Wei Ying?"

"Here!" the boy responded, throwing a hand into the air and giggling.

As if struck, Lan Wangji flinched, eyes widening in realization. The smile, laugh, and teasing nature were all too similar to that of the woman he had his brother gone to see every month without fail.

(The one whose house he kept returning to, even after she was gone.)

"What was the profession of the Qinghe Nie sect's founder?"

"Butcher."

"What type of white peony is the symbol of the Lanling Jin sect?"

"Sparks amidst snow."

"Who was the first in the cultivation world to focus on the rise of his clan rather than his sect?"

"The founder of the Qishan Wen sect, Wen Mao."

When their sects were mentioned, each of the clan members perked up slightly, focusing intently and becoming even more impressed.

They knew from the visions of the future that Wei Wuxian was intelligent, but, based on his personality, they wouldn't have pegged him as someone book smart as well.

"Huh. That's amazing," Nie Huaisang whispered. As the person standing closest to him, Jiang Cheng heard the utterance and responded with a barely-hidden smirk.

"Yeah, that idiot hates reading when he's forced to, but he'll still spend half his free time in the library. He knows plenty because he likes learning, but no one's ever been able to force him to learn something when he doesn't care."

"How do yao, mo, gui, and guai differ?"

"Yao come from living plants and animals, mo from humans, gui from the dead, and guai from dead plants and animals."

Jiang Cheng, who had tensed while Wei Wuxian answered, finally relaxed as his brother finished correctly.

Simultaneously, the real Jiang Cheng let go of the breath he had been holding in.

Frowning, Lan Qiren explained, "As a disciple of the Yunmeng Jiang sect, you should know these facts like the back of your hand. Answering correctly is nothing to take pride in."

Although Lan Qiren understood his other self's attempt, he couldn't shake the feeling that his strategy would be useless against the son of Cangse Sanren.

'You must carry on, Wei-xiong!' several other disciples thought. 'Please don't give Lan Qiren a chance to call on anyone else!'

An amused smile danced across Lan Xichen's face as he observed his uncle and brother's outraged reactions. Truly, Wei Wuxian was no more internally shameless than anyone else, he just had no qualms about outwardly expressing it.

"Hmm," Lan Qiren began walking closer to the students. "There is an executioner who has both parents and children. He beheaded over 100 people. After he died, no one buried him. Full of resentment, his ghost haunts the streets. What should we do?"

"Well…" Wei Wuxian trailed off, bringing his hand to rest at his chin as he thought.

Both Jiang Fengmian and Madam Yu were surprised; even if she disliked admitting it, they both knew it was rare for Wei Wuxian to stumble on a problem.

Leaning down as much as possible to hide his face in his book, Nie Huaisang shook slightly.

"Don't choose me. Don't choose me."

Nie Mingjue was about to glare sharply at his brother, but a snicker from the side distracted him. Apparently, Wen Chao found what he saw from an intrusion into their private lives amusing.

He opened his mouth to speak, however-

“Silence,” Wen Ruohan commanded sharply. Once again, Nie Mingjue was surprised. This was not the first time Wen Ruohan had stopped his children from speaking out against the other sects, which was at odds with the arrogant Sun Sect Leader’s usual behavior. He couldn’t figure out what the man’s motives were.

Wen Qing frowned similarly, clenching her first and practically glaring at Wei Wuxian to make sure she didn’t turn her eyes upon her sect leader.

Wen Ruohan, meanwhile, was ignoring his confused children, cousin, and fellow sect leaders, observing instead. The other sects might be willing to look at the experience as comparable to mere recreational entertainment, but Wen Ruohan knew the opportunity this presented.

This would be the unfiltered casual behavior of the people most likely to lead the next generation, and a unique look into the current sect leaders' reactions to it. If he managed to make them forget the Wen sect was watching (keeping his own cards close to his chest as he learned what caused their defeat), they would be more willing to act genuinely. Even discounting the invention of Demonic Cultivation, this would be a near-unparalleled chance to obtain information.

Information about the other sects, of course; it was unlikely there was anything this would teach him about his sons, so there was no benefit to allowing them to talk.

”Wangji, you tell him how to solve this,” Lan Qiren instructed.

Standing up calmly, Lan Wangji complied, “Talk to him first. Remind him of his family and calm him down. Find out his unfulfilled wish, clear what is chaining him to this world. Force him to leave if that doesn’t work.”

Wei Wuxian, who had continued to stand in a contemplative position throughout the explanation, suddenly brightened in realization.

“If he refuses to repent, destroy him.”

Wei Wuxian sat down, ignoring the rest of the class and pulling out a blank piece of paper to write on.

A foreboding premonition struck Lan Qiren, and he had a feeling this would not end the way the fake-him was hoping it would. Based on the expression Jiang Fengmian was making, the Jiang Sect Leader likely felt the same.

(That expression was at least better than the undisguised interest in Wen Ruohan’s eyes.)

”That’s the procedure we should follow,” Lan Wangji concluded, but both his and Nie Huaisang’s eyes were firmly on Wei Wuxian.

As if summoned by those gazes, Wei Wuxian finished writing and announced, "I have doubts. Find out his unfulfilled wish, and clear whatever is allowing him to cling to this world? But what do we do if his obsession is revenge?"

"We'll use force when it's necessary," Lan Wangji countered, his eyes turned back to his uncle in the front. "Destroy him if we have to."

"What a waste! It's not that I didn't know the answer, I was just thinking of a fourth option."

Wen Ruohan's focus remained firmly on Wei Wuxian, while Jin Guangshan glanced between the surrounding cultivators, observing their reactions.

"I've never heard of any other solutions."

"Here," Wei Wuxian offered, holding the paper out to the Lan disciple. On it, a cartoonish but expressive drawing depicted a man digging up graves.

"A-Xian," Jiang Fengmian muttered in worried reproach, his eyes darting briefly to Wen Ruohan before returning to his pseudo-son. The other sect leader's attention didn't leave the Jiang's ward.

"The executioner died a violent death and is full of wrath. Given the number of people he beheaded, why don't we… dig up the graves of those killed by him, and gather their ghosts to fight with him?!"

Every cultivator sucked in a breath.

While the copies that the vision projected reacted with shock (or long-suffering exasperation, given Jiang Cheng's facepalm), the gathered cultivators's reactions were even more justified.

Because these were no longer the mere musings of a boy looking to cause a fuss. These were the words of the man who would one day go on to invent genuine demonic cultivation.

Who knew how much he had already thought through?

Wen Ruohan's smile widened.

A stick came down with a crack and Lan Qiren whacked the hand which had been holding the paper, causing it to fall to the ground.

"How dare you?!" Lan Qiren growled. "Our goal is to liberate and purify those evil spirits. You're trying to make evil fight evil? You would be reversing the natural order… completely ignoring ethics and morality!"

He threw a scroll towards Wei Wuxian, but the boy simply ducked and allowed the object to smack Nie Huaisang in the eyes instead.

Huaisang, who had been standing next to his virtual-self, jumped at the attack and squeaked in fear. Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan gave simultaneous sighs, quickly being calmed down by Wei Wuxian's playful, shameless nature. Yanli laughed when she saw.

On the other hand, the Lan brothers were shocked. Yes, what Wei Wuxian said was inexcusable, but they had never seen their uncle lose composure in such a way.

"Spiritual energy is energy, but resentment and wrath can become types of energy too," Wei Wuxian continued unfalteringly. "Why can't we make good use of them? When Yu the Great tamed the flood, obstruction was the inferior method and redirection was superior. Suppression is the same as obstruction, so isn't it inferior?"

Disappointment had sunk into Jiang Fengmian's features. He had hoped, even if Wei Wuxian had truly used demonic cultivation, that the circumstances would justify it. Unfortunately, it seemed as if idle curiosity was his ward's only motivation.

Lan Qiren glared down, demanding "Then tell me. How can you be sure the resentful energy follows your commands and doesn't harm innocents?! What if you lose control?!"

Knowing the dubious circumstances surrounding her daughter's death, Madam Yu couldn't help but grit her teeth in worry.

But Wei Wuxian simply hummed to himself, acknowledging "Good question. Haven't figured that out yet."

"If you had figured it out, the cultivation world would not let you live! Get lost!"

"Goodbye!" Wei Wuxian responded, running out with a cackle.

Nie Huaisang and Jin Zixuan snorted at the boy's audacity (and many others transitioned into full-blown laughter), but Jiang Cheng's mind flashed back to the first thing the simulation had shown them:

"Great news! The Yiling Patriarch, Wei Wuxian, is dead!" the civilians had declared.

He bit his lip, forcing himself to remain silent. It wasn't like Lan Qiren could have known allowing Wei Wuxian to continue would lead to his brother's death. Why would the man have considered it to be anything other than a simple prank? He couldn't blame the Lan elder.

And yet….

Unbeknown to Jiang Cheng, Lan Qiren's thoughts were running along a parallel trail.

The vision faded to black for a moment, before clearing up to reveal a tranquil lake at night. A lake which they all stood far above.

Wen Chao may or may not have shrieked at the transition. Before, they had been standing on the floor of the Lan Sect's classroom. Now, they stood in the air, suspended by nothing they could see yet feeling a pressure under their feet all the same.

As cultivators, all of them were well-accustomed to heights. Nonetheless, seeing people and chairs floating in the sky without swords couldn't be anything but off-putting.

Several people stood on the pier below, talking worriedly between themselves.

"How come the boat's not here yet?"

"Exactly! We've waited so long already. Hopefully nothing's happened."

An infant's cries permeated the air.

Both Yanli and Zixuan were abruptly reminded of their own infant, babbling in joy when he was held in their arms.

Right before the simulation had shown Jiang Yanli's corpse.

Their good mood extinguished like a doused candle.

"Oh! I see it! It's here!" one of the waiting civilians shouted.

From the distance, a boat rapidly approached, cutting through the water like a blade.

"Here comes the boat! Pack your things and get ready!"

Abruptly tensing, Wen Ruohan glanced down at the water, causing everyone else to follow shortly after. A second later, they realized what the Wen sect leader saw.

Barely visible in the night — camouflaged to the point where non-cultivators would never notice — a tendril of resentful energy approached. It spread as long as the boat, then from the boat to the pier, and continued expanding until it looped across the entirety of the coast.

Several watchers stepped back nervously.

The lake immediately became turbulent, making the boat shook violently. Cyclones of water burst into the air, approaching the boat like starving wolves.

"Water ghosts! We're doomed!"

"Water ghosts don't behave like that!"

"It must be something even more dreadful!"

Most of the adults had a sneaking suspicion as to what it could be, but they silently prayed they were wrong.

(Or, in the case of the Jin and Wen sect leaders, prayed they would get to watch the to-be Yiling Patriarch battle against it.)

"How-how do we deal with it?"

As soon as the man spoke, his prayers were seemingly answered. Numerous cultivators descended from the sky, surrounding the being and announcing their presence.

“The Wen Clan has arrived to cleanse evil! All of you leave!”

Wen Chao bounced excitedly in his seat, but was careful not to say anything.

”To your position!”

The sky lit up with the golden seals the cultivators produced, shining like dim suns in the cloudy sky before combining into a single large seal. Lightning-esque ribbons looped around the pillars of water, and the watching civilians only barely escaped the enormous, crashing waves.

For a brief instant, Lan Xichen frowned disapprovingly at the disregard shown for the innocent’s safety, before he quickly covered it up with a politely neutral expression.

It seemed Wen Ruohan was taking great delight in watching their reactions.

The waves calmed at last, settling into a lazy tumble.

“Done?” Lan Xichen repeated, making eye contact with his uncle only to see an equal amount of confusion.

Jiang Fengmian furrowed his brow, slowly realizing what had just happened.

Jin Guangshan chuckled.

The crowd thanked the Wen cultivators, not recognizing the odd circumstances.

Another Wen approached the leader, leaning in to whisper, “Isn’t this quite inappropriate? We were ordered to destroy it, and we only pushed it downstream.”

The teenagers all felt their eyes widen, and Lan Wangji was most shocked of all. With their proper upbringings, they would have never considered simply directing it away.

”What’s inappropriate?” the man responded. “That creature under the water is powerful. It’s easier said than done to kill it.”

“But the downstream reaches the boundary of the Lan Clan. I’m afraid-”

“Ha! Afraid of what? Today, most sects depend on us. The Lan Clan alone won’t pose a threat.”

Three pairs of hands clenched into fists as the Wen brothers silently preened. Abruptly, the words of a future Wei Wuxian passed through their minds.

‘All these years, and the Lan Clan still hasn’t changed. Why bother being so polite? Hilarious!’

All three knew and respected their rules, but it was times like these that they internally wished they were allowed a bit more freedom of expression.

(That feeling only increased when they saw Wen Ruohan’s entirely unrepentant smirk. Based on how the simulation had been structured so far, it was likely those Wen disciple’s actions would cause Wei Wuxian to come into contact with the abyss. He was intrigued by the possibility of witnessing Wei Wuxian’s reaction to a foe that completely outclassed him.)

(Nie Mingjue silently scoffed. Wen Ruohan could at least pretend to feel guilty.)

In the next instant, they had returned to the Cloud Recesses, watching as Wei Wuxian dipped the tip of a branch into a lake of koi fish.

“Wei-xiong!” Nie Huaisang called, presumably having just been let out of class.

“Huh?” Wei Wuxian murmured as he turned to face his friend and brother. Both Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang were beginning to approach, with Lan Wangji watching from behind.

Lan Wangji sincerely prayed none of the other him’s thoughts would be read aloud. The spirits had done that several times for further exposition, but the gathered crowd really didn’t need to know how his mind kept drifting to the many ways Wei Wuxian’s eyes resembled piercing moonbeams.

Wei Wuxian perked up as he noticed his ~~favorite victim~~ friend, shouting “Wangji!” across the path. In response, Lan Wangji simply turned and walked away.

The real Lan Wangji breathed an internal sigh of relief, grateful his fear seemed to have been unnecessary for the time being.

”He ignored me,” Wei Wuxian observed cheerily.

“What did you expect?” Jiang Cheng asked with a raised eyebrow. “Remember what you answered in class? You’re impossible! He’s probably just like Lan Qiren, who thinks you’re evil to the core.”

“Yeah, Lan Wangji usually… no, he’s never been that rude. Though, given what you did….”

Wei Wuxian laughed, “Lan Qiren asked and I answered. He told me to get out, so I got out. What else would he have me do?”

“Doesn’t it seem like Lan Qiren is especially strict towards you? He keeps directing his scolding and questions at you.”

The boy did have a point. After the emperor’s smile incident on the first night, the simulation’s Lan Qiren had no doubt his other self had written Wei Wuxian off as another Cangse Sanren, and tried to respond accordingly. Obviously, he had been less subtle than he hoped.

“It serves him right. What sort of answer is that?” Jiang Cheng demanded. “It’s fine if he spouts nonsense at home, but he dared to say these in front of Lan Qiren. What were you thinking?!”

Wei Wuxian shrugged, “No matter how I answered it, he wouldn’t like me, so I might as well just say what I wanted to say. Anyways, I wasn’t trying to offend him. I was just answering properly.”

Here, Lan Qiren was forced to look away, his mind suddenly completing a theory which had been nagging at him for some time. If Wei Wuxian originally came up with the idea in his class, then was he partly to blame? If he had managed to maintain restraint and avoid projecting his feelings of Cangse Sanren onto her son, would Wei Wuxian have ever considered such a diabolic path?

He mentally promised himself to never allow Xichen or Wangji to experience such temptation.

“But honestly, I think what you said makes sense!” Nie Huaisang added. “I don’t know how many years it’ll take someone like me to cultivate to strength step by step. The wrath and resentment of vengeful ghosts can be readily used. That sounds exciting, doesn’t it?”

“Huaisang!”

“Ah! Sorry, Da-ge!”

”That’s exactly what I meant. If we can make use of it, then many places that gather resentment won’t be forbidden places anymore.”

Without turning to Wei Wuxian, Nie Mingjue maintained a deadly glare.

“I won’t! I won’t Da-ge! I’m sure other-me was just kidding!”

”Even the Burial Mounds at Yiling,” Wei Wuxian added, leaning back to look at the sky.

“Jiang Clan of Yunmeng, Jin Clan of Lanling, Lan Clan of Gusu, and Nie Clan of Qinghe have all taken the lead, and burned the Burial Mounds to the ground,” the man at the bar explained.

“...You don’t think he actually went there, right?” Jiang Yanli asked, fear for her brother suddenly overwhelming all else.

“I’m sure he didn’t!” Jin Zixuan immediately proclaimed, coughing embarrassedly when all eyes turned to him. “I mean, we all heard what they said. They claimed Wei Wuxian killed 5,000 cultivators in a single night. They might have been right about inventing demonic cultivation, but I’m sure the other parts were hearsay.”

As Yanli bowed lightly in thanks, Jin Zixuan's blush make him look nearly purple. Jiang Cheng turned away and tried to hide a repulsed groan.

(He wanted Zixuan to value her, but he really didn't need to see more.)

Rolling his eyes with amusement, Nie Mingjue added "Besides, he's a ward of the Jiangs. What reason would he have to go there?"

Xichen nodded in agreement, turning to his worried brother to smile reassuringly.

"Enough," Jiang Cheng commanded. "This is getting ridiculous. You can say whatever, but you can't go down that path."

"I'm not stupid enough to try that. I'll follow the right path like everyone else. Why would I sneak across a single plank bridge instead of a wide, broad road? Besides, if it were that easy, someone would have figured it out already."

"And yet, he failed to maintain that promise," Lan Qiren growled.

"Do not make assumptions without proof," Lan Wangji fired back, surprising even himself. Even with the "set up" warning in the opening narration, he should know better than to argue with his elder. He immediately bowed in apology to his uncle, not noticing Jiang Fengmian and Yanli smiling gratefully.

"It's still early," Wei Wuxian laughed, wrapping an arm around Jiang Cheng's shoulders. "We should go hunt pheasants."

"Forget the pheasants! Lan Qiren ordered you to copy The Book of Discipline three times, and reflect on your wrongdoings."

"Three times! I'd rather kill myself!"

Those words were far less amusing from someone who would die at 21.

"No way," he decided.

"I'll do it for you! I'll do it!" Nie Huaisang offered.

"...We agreed to not punish for things that haven't happened…." was Nie Huaisang's only defense when the adults turned their glares on him.

"But you won't do it for free, will you? Say it. What do you want in return?"

"Ah… here's the thing, Wei-xiong. Lan Qiren has a bad habit. He likes to quiz us unexpectedly."

"Hold on," Wei Wuxian thrust a hand forward in a stopping motion. "You want me to take the exam for you?"

"Ah, no, no! Telling me the answer is enough. I have everything prepared."

He handed over a long, thin scroll, which Wei Wuxian skeptically unraveled.

"...Lan Qiren already hates me. If he finds out…."

"Please, Wei-xiong! It's okay! Nothing will go wrong."

Nie Mingjue was half tempted to join Lan Qiren in scolding his brother for allowing himself to be corrupted by Wei Wuxian's bad influence, but he knew Huaisang had done this last year too. If anything, he was simply grateful his brother had found someone who accepted him for who he was.

(But that didn't excuse demonic cultivation. He needed to keep watching.)

In a blink, their setting had switched to following Wei Wuxian, Jiang Cheng, and Nie Huaisang trudge up a hill.

"Ah… Wei-xiong, I'm sorry."

"Didn't you say it'd be okay?"

"I didn't expect Lan Wangji to suddenly appear!"

Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes, interrupting "Anyways, you're on your own. There, the library is right ahead."

As the watchers followed the trio to gaze over the top of the hill, they gazed upon the Lan sect's intimidating yet graceful library. In the cool, ever-present fog, it radiated an aura of tranquility found nowhere else.

Wen Xu idly wondered how it would look on fire.

Wei Wuxian sighed dramatically.

"It's just copying a book. Huaisang?"

"Lan Qiren said no one is allowed to help you."

"Ha! How would he know that? Unless…. Will he have someone watching me?"

"Exactly."

"Huh? Seriously?" Wei Wuxian asked, looking in.

Lan Wangji was seated before him.

An unusual sense of doubt crept into Lan Qiren. Less than a minute ago, Lan Wangji had spoken back to him. He had bowed and apologized immediately after, but that didn't change what had happened.

Perhaps his other-self wasn't aware his goal should be keeping his nephews away from the temptation that was ~~Cangse Sanren~~ Wei Wuxian.

Although he didn't realize this, Lan Qiren's thought mirrored many which Madam Yu had regarding Wei Wuxian's relationship with her own children.

After a beat of silence, golden eyes looked up from the calligraphy and made contact with Wei Wuxian's silver orbs.

"Lan Zhan," Wei Wuxian breathed out in surprise.

Only after reciting the first twenty rules in his head did Lan Wangji's ears return to their normal shade. The constant use of his birth name was ~~pleasant~~ off-putting.

Both Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang slid out of the room.

"Hey!" Wei Wuxian protested. "You people-"

He cut off with a sigh, realizing the traitors were likely out of hearing range.

"This guy is dead boring, and I'll have to sit with him for a month? This is torture."

The words themself were nothing new, but somehow they twisted in far deeper when it was Wei Wuxian saying them. It made Lan Wangji want to ~~shut him up with his~~ act unrighteously.

Wei Wuxian plopped down across from Lan Wangji, legs spread casually and arms against the table.

"Wangji, a question for you. Do you actually really hate me?"

Without even the slightest falter in his brushstrokes, Lan Wangji continued writing.

"Hey! You're still ignoring me!"

The frowning mouth shifted into a mischievous grin, looking much like he had (would) when playing up the role of a lunatic.

"Hey, hey," he crawled his hand across the table like a spider. "What should I call you to get a response? Wangji? Wangji-xiong? Lan Wangji?"

They were far, far too close.

"Lan Zhan!" he tried, sitting on both the table and Lan Wangji's sleeve.

"Our… apologies," Jiang Fengmian told Lan Wangji, failing to completely cover his amused smile.

"We agreed to not punish for actions that have yet to occur," the boy responded. "Apologies are unnecessary."

"Don't look at me like that! I only called you by your birth name because you didn't answer me when I called you Wangji. If you don't like it, you can call me by my birth name as well. Or… is Lan-gongzi better?"

Here, Lan Wangji paused, though more because his sleeve was caught than due to what Wei Wuxian said.

“Oh, I got it! Lan-er-ge!”

The following smile was far brighter than the Wen Sect could ever hope to be.

Energy crackled, and Wei Wuxian’s mouth was abruptly sealed shut. He flailed around slightly, then leapt off the table and ran around to his original side, grabbing paper and a brush.

'Sorry, please remove the spell’* was written on the paper and held up in front of Lan Wangji.

Wei Wuxian’s face was gradually turning red.

However, Lan Zhan only glanced at the request for a moment before turning away and bringing a book up to cover his face.

Nie Huaisang bursted into laughter, finding the reaction an amusing reflection of how he used his fan. Despite their best efforts at staying composed, Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan followed shortly after.

“You could join them,” Lan Xichen whispered to his brother, jerking his head slightly toward the three teens.

Ears flushing slightly, Lan Wangji shook his head in refusal.

Realizing his request had been rejected, Wei Wuxian angrily crumpled his note up and buried his face into his crossed arms against the table. He sneaked a red-faced glance up.

Lan Wangji felt his ears grow even warmer.

There was a short, huffed laugh, and Madam Jin saw her husband glancing at the pair of illusions greedily. She sincerely hoped his thoughts remained conventional.

Another note was slammed onto the table, this time carrying a surprisingly well-done sketch of a wolf looking at a chicken.

A wolf, and a chicken.

狼望鸡, for Lang Wang ji.

While Jiang Cheng sighed, Xichen and Mingjue snorted slightly with the amusement only overprotective older brothers could experience. It seemed Wei Wuxian was clever in a variety of ways.

Lan Wangji began reciting the rules in his head again.

With precise, purposeful movements, Lan Wangji picked the drawing up, folded it into quarters, and tossed it into the waste bin.

“Ridiculous,” Lan Wangji scolded as Wei Wuxian hummed in outrage.

Finally, the seal was removed.

“Oh my god, I thought I was gonna die! Hey, Lan Zhan! I wanted to apologize to you! How could you treat me like that! Fine! That night was my fault. I was wrong. I shouldn’t have jumped over the wall. I shouldn’t have had alcohol. I shouldn’t have fought with you. Happy now?!”

“One more word, and I’ll do it four times as long.”

Jin Guangshan huffed a laugh, muttering “Are you sure that’s how you want to silence him?”

Lan Zhan froze.

Madam Jin’s patience cracked like porcelain on stone.

“They are children!” she screamed. “How dare you project yourself onto them. They are our son’s age! What? Is the hour or two we’ve spent in here too long for you to contain yourself?! Your brain needs a certain number of deplorable thoughts each day? And you dare to call yourself a sect leader!”

Not realizing he was loud enough to be heard, Jin Guangshan was completely unprepared for the brutal assault his wife unleashed upon him. He quickly hurried to deescalate the situation, sufficiently distracting everyone from noticing Lan Wangji’s relief.

Those words had been said because of how the man’s mind worked, rather than because his emotions were obvious to the people around them. His heartbeat began to return to normal.

“...It’s-it’s just that, come now dear,” Jin Guangshan continued. “They make quite an interesting pair. I certainly don’t think of them that way, but it doesn’t change the fact that many people will value their appearance more than their age-given innocence. Besides, we saw them in the future, subconsciously pairing them together is only natural. Both become such unparalleled weapons that-”

“I would like to ask you to not refer to my ward as a weapon, Jin-xiong,” Jiang Fengmian interjected, his smile remaining even as his eyes cooled into the arctic ocean.

“And I would also have to request you don’t finish your thought,” Xichen added. “I don’t believe that was appropriate given the current setting.”

Lan Wangji’s face was paler than it had ever been. Jin Zixuan wasn’t too far behind.

It was obvious to everyone who heard what Jin Guangshan was viewing them as. Jewels, perhaps. Statues; paintings; beasts. Trophies, but certainly not people.

It seemed having their lives on display had caused Jin Guangshan to forget they were real.

“Come now, no need to be so violent,” Jin Guangshan attempted again. “I was simply exploring possibilities of different ways to group them together-”

“And you mind automatically went to-”

“I’m sure,” Wen Ruohan interrupted, “that he simply couldn’t help himself.”

Jin Guangshan nodded vigorously at the words, and everyone else paused. So far, the Wen sect leader had been trying to make them forget he was there. But now, he was joining their conversation unprompted.

He agreed with Jin Guangshan, and wanted the other man to continue thinking up ideas.

With everyone else still frozen in horror at that realization, Jin Guangshan was able to easily bow once in gratitude and say, “Of course.”

As the watchers had talked, their surroundings had dimmed into night. Now, the only light in the room was the soft, yellow glow of a candle. Lan Wangji continued to copy texts, while Wei Wuxian laid carelessly on the floor.

Then, the sky brightened again, and Lan Sizhui’s voice spoke.

“A month later.”

Wei Wuxian sat before the table, working diligently at writing something. On the other side of the library, Lan Wangji stood, his eyes looking up at Wei Wuxian when he noticed the other’s approach.

“Lan-gongzi,” Wei Wuxian cheerfully greeted. “It’s already been a month; I won’t come tomorrow. Here’s a parting gift to you!”

The piece of paper Wei Wuxian had been working on was held out before Lan Wangji’s face.

The watching crowd surged next to the virtual Lan Wangji to see the gift for themselves.

”Here. You can have it!” he shoved the drawing forward, allowing them to see.

It was Lan Wangji.

Glancing away from Wei Wuxian’s laugher, Lan Wangji snapped Poems by Lan An closed and set it on the shelf to his right. He reached forward, and took the paper from Wei Wuxian’s outstretched hand.

And froze.

“That’s-”

"Flower!"

None of the teenagers could form a full sentence, too shocked by the enormous flower drawn onto the painting of the Second Jade of Lan.

Wei Wuxian's laughter shook the room as he nearly collapsed in on himself, singing "How do you like my gift, Lan-gongzi?"

"Ri-"

"It's 'ridiculous' again?! Can't you say anything new?!" Wei Wuxian asked, his gaze momentarily flickering to the set down poetry book.

"Utterly Ridiculous," Lan Wangji amended.

The real Lan Wangji found himself inexplicably, irrationally jealous of his other self. He doubted he would get Wei ~~Ying~~ Wuxian's painting now.

Why couldn't they have been brought in after this moment so that he'd at least have that?

(It suddenly, abruptly occurred to him that if they changed things, it wouldn't be only the bad moments that disappeared.)

Calmly, Lan Wangji reached out and grabbed Poems by Lan An again.

Then threw it down like it was on fire.

Wei Wuxian snickered, giggled, then dissolved into full-bodied laughter.

He had snuck porn into the poetry book.

"Shameless!" Lan Wangji shouted, unable to resist in the face of Wei Wuxian's audacity.

Jiang Cheng buried his face into his hands and gave a long, tired groan, not noticing that the reddening of Lan Wangji's ears was from more than just anger.

Xichen coughed to hide his laughter.

Lan Wangji stepped back, trembling, then clenched his fists in rage.

"Wei Ying!"

'Ying?' Lan Wangji repeated disbelievingly.

"Here! I'm here!"

"You-"

He cut off, his gaze turning to the side, before he grabbed and unsheathed Bichen in a single, fluid motion.

Wei Ying's laugh cut off as he blinked nervously.

Hearing Wei Wuxian call him "Lan Zhan" was one thing, but the idea that he also referred to the other by their first name was staggering. Then, Wangji forced himself relax, reminding himself that his other-self would shoo off the little beast ~~whose lips and neck kept drawing his eyes~~ before anything else happened.

He resolved to punish himself thoroughly once the simulation was over.

Grabbing the book, Wei Wuxian quickly skipped back to the table, snatching his own sword in preparation.

"Manners, Lan-gongzi, manners! If you fight me, your library will be destroyed!"

"You…. What sort of person are you?!"

"I'm a man! What else would I be?"

"Shameless!" Lan Wangji repeated, a light flush dusting his cheeks as his ears turned darker than cherries.

"Is this something to be ashamed of? Don't tell me you've never looked at it before?"

He paused when Lan Wangji didn't answer.

"...Have you actually never-"

"Shut up!" Lan Zhan exclaimed, raising his voice for the first time. "You really are… utterly shameless!"

Lan Xichen bit his lip. Laughing at his younger brother would not be appreciated.

Luckily, Nie Mingjue was happy to take that role for him. Even Lan Wangji's frigid glare wasn't enough to stop the Nie sect leader.

With a twist of Bichen, spiritual energy sent the papers between them flying.

"Lan-gongzi, calm down, calm down! Don't you know? No private fighting in the Cloud Recesses!"

Then, Wei Ying looked up, and realized the book had been thrown into the air as well.

Bursts of spiritual energy brought them to impossible heights as both reached for the book. Simultaneously, they grabbed it, and slammed it down onto the table.

The air shook as the remaining papers floated down, synchronizing with the boys' hair.

(Then, in the privacy of his mind, wondered if Jin Guangshan's crude utterance wasn't as far off as everyone else thought it was.)

”Let go,” Lan Wangji growled.

“Hm? Why?” Wei Ying asked, tilting his head to the side. “I thought you didn’t want to see it…. Oh! So you actually wanted to. You were just pretending, weren’t you?”

By this point Lan Wangji was unable to hide how he shook with rage.

“Why do you keep poking the sleeping dragon?” Jiang Cheng muttered, near-silently. Wen Qing smiled slightly at the question, knowing the exact feeling of brotherly exasperation Jiang Cheng was experiencing.

”I. Won’t. Look.”

“Then why are you grabbing it? Are you gonna hand it to Lan Qiren? Oh, I mean, your uncle. Well, don’t do that! What if he suspects you’ve read it? Wouldn’t you die out of embarrassment?”

“You-”

Said Lan Qiren was deeply, deeply regretting his simulation’s decision to allow his nephew to spend any amount of time with Wei Wuxian.

”You were the one who read it! I-”

“What’s with the ‘you’ and ‘I?’ Everyone says you’re the finest gentleman in the world. And yet you hid erotic pictures in books!”

By this point, the two had stood up and begun a tug of war with the book.

“You study them tirelessly,” Wei Wuxian added on as a rip began to form. “If your uncle found out-”

Sky-blue spiritual energy suddenly surged, crashing into the book and overwhelming it until it exploded into a million flecks of paper.

“Huh? Oh, no! Those pictures were really great! How could you just tear them up?”

Even in the face of the numerous rules his prized nephew had broken, Lan Qiren couldn’t be angry. Truly, Cangse and her son were a force neither of them were equipped to deal with.

"What? Get lost? I can’t believe you’d say that!” Wei Wuxian declared, spinning around and bounding closer to Lan Wangji. “Ah, Lan Zhan, Lan Zhan. They say you’re cultured and elegant, always well behaved. But look at you now, goodness….”

“GET LOST!”

By this point, the trio of Jin Zixuan, Nie Huaisang, and Jiang Cheng had fallen to open laughter as they curled in on themselves, clutching their stomachs as the pain from their giggles increased.

The Wen brothers found the Second Jade's failure to maintain composure amusing, but Wen Qing's emotions were identical to the other older siblings: the sort of fond exasperation that came with watching those younger than you try to interact (doubly so with Lan Xichen, who knew for a fact his brother had never lost his cool before).

The adults were mostly amazed; even those who had already known Wei Wuxian were shocked at how incomparably annoying he managed to make himself in a short amount of time.

"My, I wasn't aware it was possible to be this bad," Madam Jin murmured to Yu Ziyuan, her lips cracking open in a slight smile. From the expression her friend gave her, Madam Jin assumed this was hardly the first-time.

Unlike everyone else, Lan Wangji was not thinking over what he had just seen. In fact, he was desperately reciting the rules in an attempt to forget what he had just seen.

(The smiles and laughter and confidence and skill and shamelessness and joy and continuing to talk to Lan Wangji even with every refusal and-

Perhaps, when this was finally over, he would ask his Uncle for advice on how to prevent such emotions.)

The sun turned into a moon, and the blue sky darkened into a murky black.

"Emerald Lake, Caiyi Town, Gusu," Lan Sizhui's voice read.

Lan Xichen frowned, remembering where the Wen cultivators theorized the spirit would end up.

A small boat floated gracefully on the calm surface of the water. The watchers floated in air once again, feet and chairs resting firmly against something they couldn't see. It wasn't flying — there was no breeze or humidity; no unbalance or feeling of weightlessness — but they stood suspended above the water all the same. Across from them, a man sitting in the boat patiently fished.

He yawned, not noticing the darkening shake of the lantern-lit water.

Unconsciously, Nie Huaisang departed from his fellow heirs and moved closer to his brother again. Watching this was bad enough, but watching it next to a creepily intrigued Wen Ruohan was torture!

The fishing rod bounced twice in the man's hand as the lake gently tumbled, then jerked down.

"Huh?!" the man demanded.

He struggled and pulled with all his might, but whatever he had caught would not budge. From their elevated position, the watchers could see the movement of the supposedly-caught creature.

It was nearly double the size of the boat.

It took every bit of restraint Lan Qiren had to not lecture Wen Ruohan on the actions of his disciples.

The creature began to circle around the boat, causing it spin in turn, still attached by the fishing rod.

“W-what’s this?!”

Bending the fishing pole into a steep arch, the creature continued to secure the rod and tug and tug and tug.

Until finally, it snapped.

“Gah!” the man screamed, having not expected the sudden break and falling back. Luckily, he was standing facing the outside, so he did not fall out of the boat.

Breathing shakily, the man looked to the left and right in confusion, and then held up his torn up hands, eying the roughed up skin.

“What on earth was that thing?” he couldn’t help but ask, then flinched when he heard a few bubbles pop behind him.

The bubbles continued at an increasing frequency, until the large object they came from reached the surface. Dozens more followed, covering the lake’s surface like flies on a carcass.

The man looked closer at the objects, then realized what they were.

Corpses.

His scream filled the air.

Judging by the sharp intakes of breath around him, whatever had happened was bad. Huaisang was perfectly happy continuing to hide in his brother’s intangible body, but his Da-ge had other plans.

“Don’t look away,” Nie Mingjue ordered, stepping to the side and allowing his brother to see. “Closing your eyes from danger is more dangerous than watching it.”

His brother responded with a truly pitiful whine.

Then, the black night around them brightened, switching to the pure white field of the in-between realm they were allowed to talk in.

“...Ominous,” Jin Guangshan muttered at last.

Madam Yu scoffed at the grievous understatement, but agreed nonetheless. Even without ~~the favorite son's~~ Wei Wuxian's universally-accepted categorization, they knew nothing normal would be able to amass such a high kill count in such a short amount of time.

If anything happened to her son-

...An overwhelming sense of powerlessness gripped at her heart as she realized there was nothing that could be done. If there was an enemy before her to defeat, she would never back down, but she didn't even know where to begin on stopping whatever caused the simulation.

Luckily, a distraction came quickly.

"Sect Leader Jiang," Lan Qiren spoke. "Yunmeng Jiang has Gusu Lan's full support on stopping Wei Wuxian. Whatever you need to do to convince him to avoid resentful energy, we will help with."

"Uncle!" Lan Xichen turned, raising his voice for the first time in years.

"...I thought we had agreed to not punish anyone for things that have not yet happened," Jiang Fengmian responded.

"I not suggesting we punish him, simply that we take action," Lan Qiren explained, cursing in his head. He could acknowledge that the boy shown here was not yet the embodiment of evil and was ~~as bright as his mother~~ not mean spirited, but he had still done — would do — the unforgivable.

Nie Mingjue hummed doubtfully. He was always a vote towards doing something rather than simply talking about it, but he had seen how happy Wei Wuxian made his brother. Was anything they had seen really worth what Lan Qiren was suggesting?

"Some of these scenes would have taken place in less than a week if we hadn't been sucked in here. We need to take action as soon as possible."

"Do you believe Yunmeng Jiang cannot take care of its own disciples?" Madam Yu growled back.

"It obviously didn't work the first time," Jin Guangshan sang in response. "Perhaps you should try allowing Lanling Jin to watch over him for a short while-"

"Unnecessary."

"Surely, we can't leave him to fall on his own," Lan Qiren continued, only to be countered by the last person he expected.

"We can't make any decisions without all the information," Lan Wangji declared. "There are… rising tensions. Wei Ying might behave differently this time around, even without our involvement."

"Yeah! We should wait and see!" Jiang Cheng jumped on, very intently not thinking too deeply about the ice-cold Second Jade's use of "Wei Ying."

Seeing other people his age join in, Jin Zixuan added “We can’t get out anyways. It couldn’t hurt to wait and see.”

Behind him, Nie Huaisang and Jiang Yanli nodded in agreement.

“Wangji, that was demonic cultivation.”

“...It was a theory,” Lan Zhan responded hesitantly. “A joke; not an action.”

Was it foolish of him to put blind faith in the smiling boy he had known about for less than two hours? Probably. But somehow, he couldn’t make himself feel guilty about it.

He added two sessions to his mental list of punishments for when they got out.

“Why are you speaking so highly of him?” Wen Xu wondered. “From what I saw, your other-self understandably detests him.”

Madam Yu glanced over, equally suspicious, adding “As usual, there was no end to the trouble he caused.”

"My lady-"

"Am I wrong?"

“...That is a little weird,” Jin Zixuan tacked on, more confused than accusatory. “You would have apparently hated him. Why do you feel so different now?”

He very carefully didn’t add how his own perception of Wei Wuxian was drastically different from what it would have been. In his mind, it was completely different.

“Actually, I don’t believe Wangji feels animosity towards Young Master Wei,” Lan Xichen corrected, ignoring his brother’s deadly glare. “He might have been flustered and confused, but he wasn’t angry. If anything, I think my brother might have been charmed.”

Those words caused many watchers to scowl in disbelief, but Jiang Cheng was unsurprised. After all, not even he called Wei Wuxian “Wei Ying.” Similarly, Yanli and Jiang Fengmian were pleased with the First Jade’s assurance Wei Wuxian had not caused too much trouble.

Lan Qiren scoffed quietly, the stressful situation lowering his self control until even he was unable to hide his doubt.

Having seen his father had no complaints with Wen Xu’s words, Wen Chao puffed up his chest and said, “Well, I don’t see why we spent so much time on the school life of a couple of boys. Were those parts of the vision really necessary for us to see? The Wen Clan wasn’t even involved!”

“Except for when you shoved your own work onto the Lans,” Madam Yu pointed out.

“Ha! If it really bothers them, then I’m sure we’ll see a counter-attack in the next segment!” he bragged back, knowing full well that even the Lan Clan wouldn’t be able to raise a fuss over something the Wen Clan did. Even if they realized who the culprit was, it was unrealistic to expect retaliation.

'All these years and the Lan Clan still hasn't changed. Why bother being so polite?' repeated in their heads again. It wasn't even that the words themselves were groundbreaking; it was the person who said them.

Wei Wuxian was the creator of demonic cultivation. In all aspects, he should represent the antithesis of their ideals and values. And yet, every action they had seen him take so far could only be described as righteous.

He had stayed behind to help the Lan disciples, even though that might get him killed; he saved Jin Ling despite the threat adult Jiang Cheng posed; his inventions were used across the cultivation world, yet his reputation remained pitch-black. Regardless of the crimes attributed to the future Wei Wuxian, he had not shown himself to be evil.

And then, on Dafan mountain, he had been the brilliant mind who pulled the scant clues together, muttering about how much time the Lan Sect wasted on learning rules when they could be focusing on the practical investigation work that came with night hunting.

There was nothing the three Lans respected more than their acclaimed rules, but the simulation made the little cracks in their trophy that much more obvious.

"...Wait, so you like Wei Wuxian?" Huaisang checked again, partly because he couldn't believe it, and partly to distract the crowd from the aggravating words.

"Hard to tell," Lan Wangji responded, not wanting to make a claim he wasn't sure about.

His brother's barely-suppressed snicker did not support his assessment.

"My, how romantic!" Huaisang declared. "Two perfect opposites — even your clothes directly counter each other!"

Lan Wangji froze, even his breathing halting.

"You don't have to make everything romantic," Nie Mingjue responded, rubbing his eyes with fond exhaustion.

For a moment, Madam Jin's eyes strayed to her ~~useless, wild beast of a~~ husband. There was the callousness with which he observed Mo Xuanyu, and the depraved way he discussed Lan Wangji's relationship with Wei Wuxian (because apparently he couldn't last 5 minutes without some whore draped over his shoulders). Her blood bubbled with anger.

"I don't see why it would be a problem," she declared at last, attracting a multitude of surprised eyes. "If they truly do enjoy spending time together, it would be a fine basis for a relationship. Any kind of relationship, depending on what they want. I doubt either of them would be unfaithful."

Her husband turned to her with an astounded expression, but she couldn't bring herself to care.

“Absolutely not!” Lan Qiren declared. “I will not have my nephew-”

“Thank you for the kinds words, Madam Jin,” Lan Xichen interjected, ignoring his uncle’s flabbergasted expression (do not interrupt was a rule Lan Xichen hadn’t broken in years).

Jiang Fengmian turned to her as well and bowed in thanks, not entirely agreeing with discussing his ward’s romantic life so openly but not wanting to return to the tense discussion Second Young Master Nie brought them out of.

With a sudden clicking noise, the next segment began.

Jiang Cheng had been Sect Leader for years. He was now one of the older ones in the Great Sects, and had been a main contributor in numerous battles ~~including one to kill his brother~~. He had thought, for a time, that nothing could surprise him anymore.

But, as he walked through the Cloud Recesses searching for his exhausting nephew, he heard a voice that froze him to his ~~brother’s~~ core.

“Hello? If anyone’s there, I need your help!”

Wei Wuxian.

Not the Wei Wuxian in Mo Xuanyu’s body, who sounded unnervingly similar yet still had his own distinctive tone. It was the voice of Wei Wuxian at fifteen, around the time they went to the Cloud Recesses for the disciple exchange.

(Wei Wuxian was always happy, but this voice had his charming, carefree innocence too. One that had been lost all too soon.)

“My name is Wei Wuxian,” the voice declared. “And I’d like to make a formal request-”

Unable to stop himself, Jiang Cheng found his feet guiding him towards the sound of the perpetually-cheerful boy he had seen shatter in the massacre of Lotus Pier.

He pushed the door to Wei Wuxian’s lab open.

“Wei Wuxian?” he asked, his voice almost breaking. “Wei Ying?”

It couldn’t be a spirit — he had felt the Cloud Recesses’ fully operational wards on his way in — and yet there was no mistaking the voice calling out to him.

“-I’d like you to reverse what you’ve done to the sect leaders,” Wei Wuxian’s voice continued. “When I checked on the energy, it didn’t seem malicious, just informative. So… you know.”

After investigation, Jiang Cheng found his once-upon-a-time brother’s voice was coming out of a glowing red orb hidden between three stacks of books. It might not be unusual for Wei Wuxian to make his workspace look like 50 children had been left unsupervised there, but he rarely allowed anything dangerous to be left unattended. Hopefully, the orb wouldn't blow up the mountain.

(Did he still know his brother well enough to be sure?)

(He did. Of course he did.)

"If you didn't mean to do this, it would be great if you could reverse it. Or, you know, send over some hints on how to? It's kinda causing a bit of a mess. Thanks!"

What on earth had Wei Wuxian done?

"How do we make it stop recording?" a child's voice asked.

It took Jiang Cheng a little while longer to recognize this one (there were few people he knew as well as Wei Wuxian), but, a second later, he did.

A-Yue. His Shi-mei.

Who had died during the massacre of Lotus Pier.

"Maybe the people on the other side can stop it?"

A-Lu, whose head had been chopped off by one of the Wen-dogs and displayed like a trophy on the Pier's main entrance.

"Are there even really people there?"

"Sure there are!" Wei Ying responded, his voice the tone he always used when trying to sound more confident than he was. "The energy's function resembles empathy, and the Lan sect said the data I sent them was similar to an ancient incense burner they had. The energy is like resentful energy, but it's probably just some evolved form of the Nie Sect's technique. This is definitely the work of humans. And we're sending the message back on the trail they already laid out, so it definitely went back to them."

"...No one's stopping the message."

"Ah, well… maybe the spiritual energy-storage just needs to run out-"

As if prompted by those words, his voice vanished.

Sandu Shengshou, likely the most feared Sect Leader in the modern era, stood frozen in shock.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

For a solid minute, Jiang Cheng remained frozen before the red orb.

Now that Wei Wuxian's voice had vanished, the lab was far, far too silent. Aside from the barely-audible crackling of resentful energy around the improved Compasses of Evil, the only sound in the room was his own, faltering, breath.

Was it a fever dream? A spirit powerful enough to breach the Lan Sect's barrier? A delusion? An illness? Exhaustion? Or was it simply his insurmountable regrets piling on top of each other until they breached his mental fortress?

After all, how many otherwise-innocent demonic cultivators had he tortured and murdered, fueled by rage for circumstances he didn't understand? How much hate had he tried to teach Jin Ling to have for the boy's own uncle? How many times in the month since Guanyin temple had he dreamed of a do-over, of getting another chance to help his brother before everything fell apart? The kind, untouched, spiritual cultivator Wei Wuxian had been requesting his assistance? Offering him a chance to redeem himself?

Too good to be true.

What a cruel thing to imagine.

~~He would give anything for it to have been real.~~

But if time travel was possible, did that mean Wei Ying had-

"Eh? Jiang Cheng?" a voice asked from behind him. He turned, coming face to face with Mo Xuanyu's silver eyes, brightened from their previous gray by Wei Wuxian's lively soul.

Tensing up slightly, Wei Wuxian did a quick survey of the room, cataloguing everything he saw. Compass prototypes, check; experimental tracking-maps, check; half-written cultivation score, check; time travel orb….

In Jiang Cheng's hand.

Wei Wuxian swallowed nervously.

Conversations with his former brother were always awkward these days. Jiang Cheng had every right to hate him, and nothing — especially not Jin Guangyao's words — should change that. While Wei Wuxian might disagree with many of the actions he had taken, he knew better than anyone how valid Jiang Cheng's emotions were. At times he missed how they were as children, but some things couldn't be recovered.

It was best to avoid interacting at all costs.

"...Jin Ling is in the library with Sizhui," he said at last, hoping the orb hadn't caused any problems. Maybe, if Jiang Cheng talked with Jin Ling and left, they would be able to avoid too much damage. With all the delicate prototypes in his lab, he wasn't sure the Cloud Recesses would survive an encounter with Zidian!

Of course, as with all things Wei Wuxian was involved in, the worst occurred.

"What is this?" Jiang Cheng demanded, holding the orb out as infuriated purple lightning sparked up his arms.

Clenching his fists, Wei Ying forced himself to remain calm.

"Ah… well, I was looking at some of my old notes, and combined it with an incense burner I found and empathy to… create a way to store memories, kinda? And-"

"What were those notes on?"

"Things on… time, I guess. Nothing bad! Our reality is perfectly safe, I promise. It's… kinda like the beginnings of time-"

"Travel?" Jiang Cheng suggested.

"...What?"

"Am I right?"

"Um… yeah, I mean-"

"Really?"

Here, Wei Wuxian hesitated. From the tone Wanyin was using, he could tell this question was far more important than it seemed, but he couldn't figure out why. What made Jiang Cheng jump to the conclusion that-

"You made time travel, didn't you? Tell me the truth."

"I… yes, I did."

Windows shattered as the full weight of the Sect Leader's power flooded the air, setting it alight with energy. The walls shook, the ground trembled, and the room's talismans became blinding.

The Earth seemed to shake with his rage.

Contrarily, Wei Wuxian stood frozen still. It had taken Lan Zhan and even Sizhui hours of intricate explanation to convince them he was telling the truth. Time travel was an element of fiction, not reality.

Why would he ask that?

“Uh, Jiang Ch-”

“What did you change?”

“What?”

“You said you can go to the past? And change things?”

“Well, it’s complicated-”

He growled, “Are… are you the reason Sect Leader Nie found out about Nie Mingjue? Did you make Lan Wangji artificially fall in love with you? Make sure Jin Guangyao was caught, even though that broke Lan Xichen?! You can travel through time. What. Did. You. Change.”

(He still didn’t know why Wei Wuxian only chose to come back to life after thirteen years. Was it because of this, somehow? Why wasn’t he told? Why didn’t he ever know anything?!)

“What are you-”

“You didn’t even try to save A-Jie?!” he demanded.

His hand reached his eyes, and Wei Wuxian realized with horror that he was wiping away tears.

“Jia-”

“No. Of course not. You’d rather spend time playing pranks or galavanting off with Lan Wangji and Wen Ning like always. Is that all we ever meant to you?!”

~~’Was it my fault? Am I the reason you didn’t care enough about us to try?’~~

“Jiang Cheng, what are you talking about?!” Wei Wuxian’s voice rose as well, his eyes gaining a slight, red tinge.

“No matter happened between us, I thought you at least loved A-Jie.”

The ground at his feet shattered as Wei Wuxian finally snapped. With a hiss, the room’s lingering resentful energy striked and disrupted the electricity-filled air Jiang Wanyin had created.

Purple light and red darkness danced around each other until Jiang Cheng could taste the power in the room.

The two brothers made eye contact, fury blazing in their eyes and fists clenched in rage. In the sudden silence, the approaching footsteps resounded sharply.

“Wei Ying!” Lan Wangji called out once he was close enough, standing protectively in front of his betrothed and glaring the Sect Leader down, ignoring said betrothed’s furious orders to stop.

Hanguang-jun watched the purple light, ready to attack the second it got too close to Wei Ying, and the other two responded in kind. The three most powerful men in the world faced each other, a swirl of deep purple, icy blue, and demonic red.

The Cloud Recesses shook under their power.

Wei Wuxian forced himself to breathe out a shaky exhale, refusing to lose control, and shoved away the area's resentful energy. Feeling it dissipate, both Lan Wangji and Jiang Wanyin looked over.

"Jiang Cheng, why don't you start from the beginning?"

Over a clear, bright lake, several wayward leaves drifted lazily, before landing delicately on the water. The ripples they formed distorted the cloud's reflections as if the liquid was a piece of embroidered fabric, fluttering in the wind.

Trembling like an earthquake, Nie Huaisang willed himself not to remember the creepy being the last segment had shown drifting through a river.

The leaves were pushed aside as a boat passed through the water, and the watcher's surroundings faded into existence; a quaint, lively town formed before their eyes. A tall bridge created a tunnel for the boat to pass through, and allowed the watchers to recognize the mountains before them.

"Caiyi?" Lan Wangji asked his brother, receiving a nod in return. Both remained tense, feeling the peaceful beauty before them was only the calm before the storm.

A voice sighed pleasantly, then observed "Small streams and bridges. People living next to water. Caiyi Town is wonderful."

At the words, Lan Xichen smiled gratefully at Nie Huaisang, appreciating the observation (and expertly masking any lingering worry he felt).

Delighted, boyish laughter bounced through the town, making the day glow even brighter than before.

'Wei Ying!' Lan Wangji realized, perking up, then forcing himself to return to proper posture.

"Ah," Wei Wuxian laughed again. "We're really so fortunate to be here. Thank God! Good luck has come, and there's no way to stop it!"

Lan Wangji clenched his fists, trying desperately to ignore the stinging hurt that came from Wei Ying referring to leaving the Cloud Recesses as "good luck." It was all for the best, truly. At least this way there was no chance of him humiliating himself by revealing his internal thoughts.

Scoffing at Wei Wuxian's over-exuberant voice, Jin Zixuan rolled his eyes and walked away from the Jiang boy, who sat at a table across from Jiang Cheng, a treat before them.

Once again, Jin Zixuan felt the slightest tinge of regret over his actions. If Jiang Yanli and Jiang Cheng weren't as irredeemable as he had thought, perhaps he would have enjoyed spending time with the Yunmeng Jiang pair.

He rid his head of that thought immediately, reminding himself that he still had his cousin. They might not be as close as the Jiang siblings, but Jin Zixun would keep him company.

With the joy of a child, Wei Wuxian happily bit into the ice-cream.

"Good luck?" Jiang Cheng repeated skeptically. "You've offended the Lan Clan. When Lan Qiren comes back, he'll make you pay for it."

"Comes back?" Qiren repeated.

"Ha! Since you've covered for me many times, one more isn't a big deal! And who cares what'll happen in the future? Let's enjoy things while we can!"

"Idiot," Jiang Cheng couldn't resist muttering, and the expression on his virtual-self's face conveyed the same sentiment. However, his other-self's thoughts were layered with fond exasperation, while his had genuine concern.

Had Wei Wuxian's refusal to think about the future contributed to his death? What kind of mistake had his brother made for the Clans to rally together against him?

Why had he been stupid enough to turn to demonic cultivation?

"We're in the thick of spring!" Wei Wuxian declared, utterly ignorant to the real Jiang Cheng's thoughts. "And we have this delicious ice cream. Why not just enjoy it!"

With that declaration, he happily devoured another bite.

"You're acting like you've never eaten frozen desserts before."

"Well, the Cloud Recesses always starves people. If I could eat these amazing desserts every day, I wouldn't mind staying in Gusu longer."

Lan Wangji immediately circled around, finding the name of the store and committing it to memory. For purely intellectual reasons, of course. Understanding cultural differences was important.

A longing sigh.

"I really envy people who grew up with this."

"Come on. If I tried to make you copy books for a month, you'd disappear faster than a rabbit!"

Huffing in offense, Wei Wuxian leaned across the table, sticking his tongue out at his brother.

Once again, their relationship couldn't be further from the one portrayed in the future. Laughing with each other? Eating snacks together? Teasing? Sticking his tongue out? How did this evolve into one brother fleeing, and the other hunting down and murdering anyone who he suspected of being Wei Wuxian returned to life?

Clenching his teeth, Jiang Fengmian forced himself to breathe.

The two brothers continued their stare-off for several long seconds, before Wei Wuxian smiled again.

"I bet Shi-jie would love this!" he declared. "We can come back here and bring some home with us!"

Jiang Cheng nodded intensely in agreement.

Seeing her brothers' over-exuberant sweetness, Yanli laughed delightedly, and Yu Ziyuan huffed in acceptance. Coughing awkwardly, Jin Zixuan took a deep breath, then forced himself forward.

"W-would you like to go together?" he whispered, and she turned to look at him. "I mean- when this is done. If you want to. Not that we'd need to go, I could just buy-"

"I would love to," Yanli responded, smiling brightly at him. Jin Zixuan hurried away, forcing himself to not squeal in joy.

Nearby the brothers, two men spoke sternly to each other over a trade deal. When Wei Wuxian noticed, he huffed slightly in disbelief.

"People from Gusu talk so softly. How is this arguing?"

Genuine confusion blanketed his flabbergasted tone, making Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue both laugh slightly. The former found the reaction amusing, while the latter remembered voicing a similar question before.

Jiang Cheng followed Wei Wuxian's gaze to the pair, adding "If they saw how people in Yunmeng argued, they'd be scared to death for sure."

At this, Yu Ziyuan raised an eyebrow at her son, daring him to imply the comment referred to her. Her son, predictably, unconsciously moved closer to Yanli when he felt her gaze. At least she could take comfort in the fact that Yanli knew how to provide assurance without making a scene.

Then, Wei Wuxian stopped, straightened up, and began sniffing the air. He spun around fully, face lighting up into pure, unadulterated joy as he looked past the arguing pair.

"That smells like rice wine!"

Seeing his brother carelessly jump into a nearby boat, Jiang Cheng scowled and shouted "Don't run so fast! You'll fall in the water!"

But Wei Wuxian paid his warning no mind, instead grabbing onto the bamboo pole and pushing himself along with a simple "Thanks for your concern!"

Jiang Yanli made a sound half way between a laugh and a sigh as she watched her brother's blatant disregard for his own safety. Not that that was anything new.

Having experienced the same sensation due to their own younger siblings, Lan Xichen, Nie Mingjue, and Wen Qing gave short huffed-laughs as well. When Wen Ruohan's eyes turned on her, Wen Qing immediately regretted her own carelessness, resolving to remain vigilant.

The boat passed under a bridge on which the Twin Jades of Lan stood.

"Brother," Lan Wangji began. "Why did you decide to bring them? Exorcism is no laughing matter."

Before him, Lan Xichen hummed once, then turned his gaze to his younger brother with a soft smile.

Instantly, the world remolded itself into a new shape: Gusu's Guest Disciple Dorms. Outside the blurry room, a voice called out gleefully.

"Wei-xiong, Wei-xiong!" Nie Huaisang shouted, slamming the room's doors open. "This really is your lucky day!"

A foreboding expression landed on Nie Mingjue's face. He loved his brother with all his heart, but had long-since learned to remain vigilant when Huaisang became so excited.

The room came into focus, and the watchers realized they were in Wei Wuxian's dorm room. Said boy blinked once at the announcement, then sat up.

With a sharp turn, Lan Wangji forced his eyes away from the figure before him. Of all places, why did it have to show him relaxing on his bed? Was the simulation aware of his shameful thoughts and choosing the scenes that would hit the hardest? Lan Wangji clenched his fists, once again confident that the simulation's creator must have been some sort of demon.

Wei Wuxian's mouth twisted into an amused smirk, and he asked "Really? What's up?"

"No school for the next few days! Last night the old man went to Qinghe to attend my sect's Discussion Conference!"

"Oh, no," Qiren whispered, finally understanding.

"Really? That's great! If the ol' fuddy-duddy's gone, the lil' fuddy duddy will be easy to take care of!"

Slowly and carefully, Nie Huaisang slid away from his older brother, approaching Lan Wangji in the hopes that the steadily increasing icy aura would snuff his brother's explosion. To his surprise, however, neither Lan Qiren nor Nie Mingjue made any move to reprimand him. Had they truly decided not to punish for things that hadn't happened?

Unlikely.

Nie Huaisang slid his gaze back and forth between his elders, trying to puzzle them out. Unbeknown to him, they were both preoccupied by identical waves of melancholy sorrow.

The future Nie Huaisang hadn't appeared yet, but they had all seen the future Wei Wuxian. He might still laugh and tease, but there was a notable innocence and immaturity in his current expression that was gone in the future. Qiren might want nothing more than to guide Wei Wuxian to the right path, but even he could admit the loss was disheartening. The boy who cackled while switching poetry for porn was gone.

A victim of the war.

Wei Wuxian immediately got off the bed, hurriedly putting his shoes on and singing "Today really is my lucky day! Even the heavens are helping me~"

His laugher rang out across the room.

Lan Wangji had never heard a sound so mesmerizing. If sailors heard at sea heard something even half as beautiful, he could understand why so many fell prey to the spirits' traps.

(Though he wished he hadn't been referred to as "lil' fuddy-duddy." He wasn't quite sure how to respond to the words, but being grouped with his uncle, which had always been a source of pride, suddenly left a sour taste in his mouth.)

"I can't believe I can't even find a few pheasants on the Lan Clan's mountain!" Wei Wuxian complained as the watcher's surroundings switched to a hallway.

"Tone it down a bit!" Jiang Cheng ordered crossly, "when he comes back, you're still gonna get your punishment."

Wei Wuxian responded, "Why would a living person worry about what happens after they die? I'd rather live freely for as long as possible."

'What an unbelievably optimistic person,' Nie Mingjue thought. The way Wei Wuxian's name was continuously dragged through the mud even 13 years after his death would initially seem to undermined the statement, but Wei Wuxian had never given any sign that he was hurt by the words.

He truly didn't care about his reputation.

Across the hallway, two figures approached: Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen. Other than their expressions and slightly differing eye color — Lan Wangji's eyes closer to gold while Xichen's resembled a pale bronze — the two siblings seemed identical. Though, with one having an ever-present frown and the other a smile, most people could tell them apart.

Not everyone though.

“Huh?” Wei Wuxian asked once his eyes landed on the brothers. “There are… two Lan Zhans.”

Lan Wangji glared.

Both Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan snorted at the description of the twin jades, while Nie Huaisang began to openly laugh. The Wen brothers huffed in disdain, but the other teenagers all seemed amused by the reactions.

Especially Xichen.

“You turned your head away,” Lan Xichen whispered, leaning close to his brother. “Is there something-”

“No.”

Lan Xichen raised an eyebrow, amused rather than intimidated by his brother’s ferocious insistentance.

”You two are?” the virtual Lan Xichen prompted.

“Jiang Wanyin of Yunmeng.”

“Wei Wuxian of Yunmeng.”

“Huaisang,” Lan Xichen returned. “Some time ago, while I was at Qinghe, your brother asked about your studies. How have you been? Do you think you’ll be able to pass this year?”

“Er… probably.”

Reminded of the Nie heir’s rather shameful academic history, Wen Xu gave a huffed laugh. The older brother was a pain in his neck, but the younger Nie brother could probably be dealt with much more easily.

He regretted the act when his father’s gaze landed on him.

Wei Wuxian smiled at his friend’s response, before asking, “Zewu-jun, what are you two planning on doing?”

“We’re going to exterminate water ghouls,” Xichen answered. “We were short-handed, so I returned to get Wangji.”

“Ha. ‘Water ghouls,’” Jiang Cheng parotted mockingly. Based on the earlier scenes, it was obvious what the so-called “water ghouls” would turn out to be.

“Brother, there is no need for small talk,” Lan Wangji interrupted. “The matter permits no delay. We should depart immediately.”

Lan Wangji relaxed slightly, nodding in agreement. Good, yes, he should get as far away as possible while he still could. Before people other than his brother started noticing his feelings.

”Wait, wait!” Wei Wuxian called out. “We can help!”

Paling unnoticeably, Lan Wangji silently begged his brother to prevent the ~~beautiful~~ boy from coming along.

(Wen Ruohan prayed for the exact opposite.)

”In Yunmeng Jiang, we catch water ghouls all the time!” Wei Wuxian explained. “Besides, it’s not like we have any lessons for the next few days. Zewu-jun, could you take us along?”

“That is not necessary,” Lan Wangji immediately countered, talking insistently on the other side of a tranquil Lan Xichen. “The Gusu Lan Sect is also-”

“Sure, then. Many thanks for your help,” Xichen interrupted.

Even the most disciplined couldn’t resist snorting slightly at the identical betrayed looks both Lan Wangjis gave their brother. It was the most emotive expression they’d seen on him aside from when he shouted at Wei Ying.

To Lan Qiren, who had seen his nephew lose control more often in the past hour than in the past decade, this exchange was accompanied by an exhausted sigh.

”You can go prepare,” Lan Xichen instructed. “We can depart together. Would Huaisang like to come as well?”

“Maybe I’ll just tag along to Caiyi town.”

“Instead of studying?” Mingjue asked, raising a single, unimpressed eyebrow.

“You can’t blame me, Da-ge! This is a future me!”

”Let’s go! Time to get ready to catch water ghouls!” Wei Wuxian declared, swinging an arm around Jiang Cheng’s shoulder as all three boys made their way back to the dorms, excitement clear in their expressions.

The flashback faded away, returning the watchers to the bridge in Caiyi town.

Having thought about his answer for a moment, Xichen finally responded “Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian have a good reputation in Yunmeng. They are highly capable.”

Jiang Cheng blushed slightly, surprised by such genuine praise from the respected Zewu-jun, and flushed deeper when both Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli giggled at his reaction. The ‘I beg to differ’ written all over both Lan Wangjis’ faces seemed to double their amusement.

Lan Xichen smiled and continued. "And you wished for him to come, didn't you? I only agreed because you looked as though you wanted Wei Wuxian to come along."

Lan Wangji did a double take, his ears glowing a dusty rose.

"...He did?" Jiang Cheng asked, not having seen anything but annoyance in Lan Wangji's expression. His father then began to laugh slightly, nodding once to Lan Xichen.

"You are quite skilled at reading your brother," Fengmian acknowledged. Lan Xichen bowed back to the Sect Leader, ignoring his uncle's concerned frown.

(Were Qiren's efforts to save his nephews from their father's fate worthless? The future Lan Wangji, who had dragged Wei Wuxian back to the Cloud Recesses, seemed to support that theory.)

At the sound of moving water, Lan Wangji glanced down at Wei Wuxian's boat, which had just passed under the bridge. He stared for a moment, then turned back to his brother.

"That's not true."

Despite the confident assertion, immediately following it by walking away from his brother lowered his credibility quite a bit. All the more so when the pink on his ears became increasingly noticeable.

For the first time, Nie Huaisang, Jin Zixuan, and Jiang Cheng turned their gazes on Lan Wangji with something akin to understanding. So far, he had always been — as Huaisang said — the perfect example. A piece of jade with neither emotions nor sympathy, who only operated under his Clan's rules. The genuine annoyance at Wei Wuxian had been a surprise, but nothing ground-breakingly different from Lan Qiren.

However, if he was simply not showing what he was feeling-

Wangji glared at his brother with all the embarrassed rage he could muster (and doubled it, when his brother had to choke down an amused laugh).

In a blink, the watchers had been pulled away from the bridge to hover over the water, following along as Wei Wuxian continued his search for the wine.

"Where is it?" he wondered to himself. Then, with another sniff of the air, doubled down in his pursuit.

"Young man, where are you running off to so quickly?" a woman called from the side. "Would you like to try my freshly picked loquats?"

"I appreciate the offer!" Wei Wuxian shouted back. "I'll try some when I return!"

"Ooh, we should all go there together!" Nie Huaisang whispered, glancing at Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng beside him. The two of them blinked in surprise, but considered the idea carefully.

"...If we're going to Caiyi town, it would be easier to have a guide."

"Right," Jin Zixuan nodded. "A local would be best."

Despite hearing their words, Lan Wangji made no move to take them up on the implied offer. Xichen frowned slightly at his brother's aloofness, as the glare he gave silenced further offers.

Simultaneously, the Jiang, Nie, Jin, and Lan heirs realized the same thing: if Wei Wuxian had come, he would have shamelessly needled Lan Wangji until he got an invitation.

Instead of him, they got a dozing Wen Chao who couldn't be bothered to pay attention to the things involving other clans.

Wei Wuxian opened his mouth to continue, but cut off as his boat jerked to a halt, ramming into Jin Zixuan's.

Seeing his other-self get splashed by the resulting water, Jin Zixuan couldn't help but be grateful all of the simulation's elements would phase through the watchers.

"Ah…" Wei Wuxian realized, bowing in apology. "I apologize, Jin-gongzi."

The soaked Jin heir glared up at the other boy.

The water might not have actually affected him, but the real Jin Zixuan was still annoyed at Wei Wuxian's carelessness.

Then, Yanli laughed lightly and bowed as well, a slight blush on her cheeks.

"My apologies as well, Jin-gongzi."

And just like that, Jin Zixuan suddenly couldn't find it in himself to be angry anymore.

"Wei Wuxian. Was that intentional?" Jin Zixuan demanded.

"Shut up!" Jin Zixuan hissed at his other self, mentally begging the simulation not to ruin the moment he had just had with Jiang Yanli. Seeing this, Jiang Cheng felt the irritation which had begun to crawl into his mind immediately vanish.

Madam Jin nodded once at her son, pleased.

"It's such a wide river. Did you really have to hit me?"

"I wasn't paying attention. I'll get you some more rice wine if you want!" Wei Wuxian promised as Jin Zixuan tried to squeeze the water out of his clothes.

"No need for that."

"All right, if that's what you want, then I'll-"

"Just make sure the Jiang Clan of Yunmeng stays away from me."

At this, both Jiang Yanli and Jiang Cheng turned to look at him. Their gazes were neither scornful nor offended, just abruptly concerned that their presences by his side were unwanted. If they had tried to help and unknowingly made things worse, they might have just justified his complaint.

“Er-no. No, um, I….” Jin Zixuan began, but ran out of words to say.

‘I want to get close to you,’ he should have said. ‘I want to thank you for the support you showed. I want to get to know you two. I want to have Jin Ling.’

Instead of explaining any of that, he simply stood there, gaping like an idiot. Sometimes he really hated himself.

”What do you mean by that?” Wei Wuxian finally asked. When he turned so that his eyes could rest on the Jin heir, they were shadowed, the sun appearing directly behind him.

For the first time, the watchers were shown the past Wei Wuxian without a smiling face.

Jiang Fengmian nodded once; even against Yanli’s fiancé (and the warning look Yu Ziyuan was giving the simulation), it was Wei Wuxian’s right to defend the Jiang sect.

On the other hand, Huaisang swallowed nervously, wondering if Lan Xichen's assurance about Wei Wuxian’s skills was about to be proven in the worst way possible.

Slowly, Jin Zixuan turned as well, gazing upon Wei Wuxian’s clenched fists with disdain.

The two made eye contact, and tension spiked. A cloud shadowed them overhead.

“A-ah,” Nie Huaisang gave a hesitant laugh, moving his boat to pass between the two. “Calm down. Just calm down.”

Still speechless with embarrassment, Jin Zixuan could do nothing as the Jiang siblings started seriously considering walking farther away.

”Huaisang, here’s some advice…. If you lay down with dogs, you’ll end up with flees.”

Now, Jiang Cheng’s worry was overwhelmed by a biting anger, especially at the specific comparison between Wei Wuxian and “dogs.” He turned a furious glare on Zixuan.

”Be careful who you call your friend,” Jin Zixuan continued, digging the real-Zixuan’s grave even deeper. “Don’t neglect your studies. Your brother will have words for you.”

Although the terrifying Nie Mingjue had joined Jiang Cheng in glaring at Jin Zixuan, he found himself unable to care. Instead, his mind was consumed by the realization that Jiang Yanli, Jiang Cheng, and Nie Huaisang, three people who he had begun to grow close to — as equals, rather than subordinates like with Zixun — were being alienated by the simulation’s words. And, worst of all, he knew he would have said the same.

"Apologies, Young Master Jin," Jiang Cheng growled as he stalked off.

”Let’s go-”

Zixuan’s order was cut off as his boat abruptly shook, causing him to sway dangerously.

“Wei Wuxian! How dare you!”

“Huh? Wasn’t me!”

Indeed, Wei Wuxian’s boat was still separated from his by Nie Huaisang’s. Shortly after, all three boats began to shake.

“Something strange is going on!” Jin Zixuan declared.

“What? What’s happening?” Huaisang asked, not noticing the powerful wave unnaturally surging up behind him.

“Huaisang!” Mingjue all but shouted, leaping between his brother and the wave. However, with the way the simulation was set up, the wave phased through him as if he wasn’t even there.

(Zixuan recalculated his earlier gratitude about being untouchable.)

From the water, a legless water ghoul turned, surged forward, and pounced. Huaisang screamed.

Nie Mingjue felt his heart stop.

A crack brought the ghoul down as Wei Wuxian’s pole slammed into its head. Huaisang stumbled back, and the civilians on the pier ran away with terrified screams.

“Water spirits! It’s water sprits!” they shouted.

The lotus seller was too slow running away, as, mid-stride, she was pulled down by a hand chained around her ankle. In the next second, however, a red streak sliced the ghoul’s arm in two, Wei Wuxian’s sword having responded instantly. He landed, body upright and expression serious.

Lan Wangji blinked once, impressed.

Seeing that, Xichen laughed slightly.

An enormous water ghoul burst out of the water and climbed onto Huaisang’s boat.

Nie Mingjue, still standing ineffectively between them, could only curse his own powerlessness.

The pull continued, eventually tipping the boat and forcing the Nie heir to clutch to the boat’s rail. Despite wanting to help, Jin Zixuan was surrounded on all sides, a new ghoul attacking every time he cut one down; he was trapped.

Then, two arcs of bright blue light cut through the water. Enormous waves surged up.

With his robes flowing elegantly in the air, Xichen landed on Huaisang's boat.

"Th-thank you, Xichen-gege," Huaisang muttered.

Breathing out slowly, Nie Mingjue turned to Xichen and nodded once in thanks.

On the street, Wei Wuxian continued slicing through the water ghouls with ease born from experience. To his right, Jiang Cheng landed on the roof of an abandoned boat.

Five talismans flew out from behind Wei Ying, subduing an equal number of ghouls. Wei Wuxian turned in the direction the talismans had come from, and saw Lan Wangji flying high above him.

Seeing how outclassed they were, the few remaining ghouls quickly fled.

"Exemplary work," Jiang Fengmian softly praised. Lan Qiren looked torn between pride at the compliment and annoyance at what he was forced to admit as a result.

"...Your boys did well," he finally said. Grouping them together at least saved him from directly admitting Wei Wuxian's skill, and Jiang Cheng was certainly an above-average student.

Luckily for him, although Jiang Fengmian smiled slightly at the obvious conflict going through Lan Qiren's mind, he simply nodded in return, hiding his amusement.

The teenage cultivators returned to the boats, fiercely staring down at the water ghouls their cultivation-enhanced eyes could make out fleeing in the depths.

"They're gone now," Wei Wuxian reported, watching the last of the shadows fade out of sight.

Lan Wangji's frown deepened faintly as he turned to his brother, "I thought there weren't any monsters in Emerald Lake."

Xichen nodded once in agreement, turning to observe a more heavily shadowed area of water.

"...The situation is more serious than I expected."

Wen Qing breathed out through her nose slightly, reminding herself again that the actions of random members of her sect did not involve her.

(But, in her head, a traitorous voice continued asking how many victims her sect's actions would create.)

“Huaisang, you should just wait for us here,” Xichen advised. “The rest of you will come to the Emerald Lake with me.”

Although he hadn’t relaxed since the simulation started, Xichen noticed Nie Mingjue’s shoulders lower a fraction of a centimeter. It took all his self-control to avoid laughing at the unexpected softness.

From there, the watchers were pulled along the river, quickly speeding after the now-distant boats.

”Zewu-jun?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Does this match the reports on the river path?”

A nod, “Water ghouls have not haunted Caiyi town in over 10 years, but, recently, people and ships have started sinking.”

“Were arrays set up to catch the water ghouls?”

“Yes,” Xichen explained. “A few days ago, I set up net arrays. I thought I would catch one or two, but there were more than a dozen.”

At his own explanation, Lan Xichen felt a sudden regret that they didn’t have Wei Wuxian’s spirit-attracting talismans yet. It would have saved many lives.

(Or just "would," if they managed to convince Wei Wuxian develop it once they got out.)

”Were all the bodies you found people who live here?” Jiang Cheng asked.

“I’m afraid not. We cleaned the corpses, brought them to the town, and asked around, but there were many that nobody claimed. Yesterday, arrays were set up again, and even more were caught.”

Wei Wuxian hummed in consideration.

The watchers had already seen Wei Wuxian puzzle through an incident on Dafan mountain, but, this time, they had more information than him. As he was surely considering, water ghouls became accustomed to specific regions of water, rarely leaving the region they drowned in. A group floating down to Caiyi town was unlikely.

But, if it was what the Wen Clan chased downstream, all their questions would be answered.

As if in response their thoughts, Wei Wuxian continued “What we just encountered might not be water spirits.”

“Neither you nor Wangji managed to catch them,” Xichen agreed. “That’s quite unusual.”

Not reacting to the implied praise, Wei Wuxian bent down to dip his hand in the water, pulling up tangled, dirty strands identical to what he found during the battle.

A sudden chill brushed over Jiang Fengmian, and he turned to see Wen Ruohan watching his ward with the consideration one might use to appraise jewels. Except, rather than the outward appearance (thankfully not copying Jin Guangshan's words), Wen Ruohan was far more interested in seeing how Wei Wuxian's mind worked. How accurate were the future's rumors? What moral code did he follow? What made him tick?

In some ways, that was even worse.

Sect Leader Jiang took a forceful, slow breath, reminding himself to remain vigilant.

"Zewu-jun, water ghouls and whatever else this might be are really clever. If we use boats like this, isn't it possible that they'll hide underwater and refuse to come out? What if we can't find them?"

Lan Wangji replied, "We will wait until we find them. After all, we do what we must."

Qiren nodded once to his nephew's words, offering a rare trace of silent praise.

"Just by using nets?" Wei Wuxian confirmed.

Lan Xichen nodded, "That's right. Does the Yunmeng Jiang Sect use other methods?"

Seeing that Wei Wuxian wasn't going to answer the crowd instead turned their gazes on Jiang Fengmian, who smiled somewhat embarrassedly.

"We, of course, use nets as well. However, Wei Wuxian is an exceptionally good swimmer, and has always preferred jumping into the river and dragging the water ghouls out. That said, this method is obviously too dangerous to set as a standard, and we try to discourage him from doing so."

Huffing slightly, Madam Yu rolled her eyes, muttering "It's like he's allergic to following simple instructions."

Both Jiang siblings snickered slightly at their memories of similar incidents, and Jin Zixuan once again wished he could approach them.

Oblivious to the discussion, Wei Wuxian continued humming in consideration, and bringing a hand against his chin as he thought aloud.

"If only there was something like a compass, that could point out where the spirits are."

"What? Think about who invented the compass of evil! I've never heard of anything that could disrupt his work!"

"I know it was the Yiling Patriarch, but he couldn't make everything perfect, could he?!"

"Oh?" Jin Guangshan murmured. "He's thinking about that even now?"

Madam Yu huffed, "Of course. That makes far more sense than him simply inventing it in an instant during his free time. What exactly were you expecting?"

"...My apologies. You're right, of course. Just thinking out loud."

But the implication was clear: if Wei Wuxian was already theorizing, then he was just as valuable now as the one shown in the future. More, perhaps, as he couldn't yet escape.

Wen Ruohan smirked.

Jiang Cheng spoke, "Look down at the water and concentrate on finding them. You're letting your imagination run wild again."

"Cultivation and riding on swords also used to be just wild dreams," Wei Wuxian responded, teasingly.

Swallowing nervously, Jiang Cheng thanked his other-self for bringing the topic away from his brother's insane theories (that, as it turned out, weren't as improbable as they all thought).

The slight annoyance that flickered across Wen Ruohan's expression only increased his gratitude.

Bookmarking his thoughts for a later date, Wei Wuxian's eyes drifted to the impeccable form of Lan Wangji.

The Second Jade turned away, refusing to think too deeply on it.

Wei Wuxian's gaze grew in intensity, and his smile shifted into the serious expression they had only seen on him a few times before. Then-

"Hey, Lan Zhan!" he shouted, jumping up and down. "Look at me! Look at me!"

"Wei Ying!" Jiang Cheng hissed in embarrassment, now several meters away from Jin Zixuan. To distract himself from his annoyance at the peacock, Jiang Cheng focussed all his energy on being exasperated at his brother.

Reacting in kind, the virtual Jiang Cheng gaped in shock, then facepalmed tiredly. After rubbing his temples for a moment, anger took over.

"Hey! Wei Wuxian! Can't you be serious for once!"

The tension which had been built by the previous fight dispersed in an instant.

Both Sect Leaders and heirs found the interactions hilarious, but, despite his smile, Wen Ruohan's eyes remained coldly fixated on the to-be Yiling Patriarch.

Still snickering to himself, Wei Wuxian pushed his boat closer to Lan Wangji. Finally, when they were only a few meters apart, the Second Jade turned his gaze on Yunmeng Jiang's head disciple.

With a crack, Wei Wuxian's pole collided with the water.

"What the-"

“Hey!”

The watchers who had approached the pair unconsciously jumped back to avoid the enormous splash, several shrieking as they did. Perhaps unsurprisingly, Nie Huaisang panicked so much he lost his footing and fell back onto the invisible floor beneath the watchers.

The enormous wave splashed into the air, nearly doubling the height of the boats, and collapsed down. Hastily, Lan Wangji pulled his sleeve away from the water and jumped to his brother’s boat.

“What is he doing?!” Jiang Cheng demanded, turning to his sister for answers.

”You-” Lan Wangji protested, but paused when Wei Wuxian flipped onto the roof of his own boat and used his pole to launch Lan Wangji’s boat in the air.

On the flipped-over bottom of the boat, several gnarled hands latched on.

Nearly everyone present wore expressions identical to those of the simulation’s Twin Jades. Eyes widened; mouth’s agape; attention focussed entirely on what was revealed to them under the boat.

“Oh.”

”Water spirits,” Lan Wangji realized.

And, indeed, three to four drowned corpses landed with the boat, getting purified immediately by Lan Wangji.

“How-”

“He got lucky,” Wen Chao declared, faking the confidence his father had weaponized against the other sects.

Xichen smiled warmly, saluting Wei Wuxian once.

“Wei-gongzi, how did you know that they were on the bottom of Wangji’s boat?”

Wei Wuxian landed excitedly, then turned to the Lan brothers with a smile full of exuberant cheer.

Lan Zhan swallowed.

”Easy,” Wei Wuxian declared, tapping his boat twice with the pole. “Its displacement in the water was wrong. There was only one person on the boat, but it had sunk in deeper than a boat with two people, so there must have been something at the bottom of the boat.”

Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan re-evaluated the worth of the investment before them. They had already realized his value as the Yiling Patriarch, and had added in his inventive mind, analytical ingenuity, and general book smarts. However, they had not realized that, on top of everything else, he was also unusually experienced.

With every segment, Wei Wuxian became an increasingly more tempting prize.

”An expert indeed, Young Master Wei.”

To support his future-self’s words, Lan Xichen saluted Jiang Fengmian and Madam Yu in respect. While the Jiang Sect Leader saluted back warmly, Madam Yu’s was significantly more forced.

If this continued, the world’s most powerful cultivators would associate the Yunmeng Jiang Sect with Wei Wuxian before they noticed her son.

She gritted her teeth angrily.

"Lan Zhan! I didn’t mean to splash water on you,” Wei Ying apologized. “Water spirits are crafty. If I had said anything, they would have heard me and run away. Hey! Can you hear me? Lan Zhan? Lan-”

A single hand was raised by the one he was calling out to, silencing Wei Wuxian’s shouts.

A brief flicker of disappointment stung at Lan Wangji’s heart, but he quickly suppressed it. He was not upset that Wei Wuxian stopped shouting his name, nor was he annoyed at the simulation for focusing on the ghouls rather than his relationship with Wei Ying.

He was not.

When Wei Wuxian turned to look at whatever had caught Lan Wangji’s attention, his smile vanished. A dark shadow was spreading across the water, creeping closer to the boats and making the lake turbulent.

Both Nie brothers were silently grateful Nie Huaisang stayed in Caiyi town.

In an instant, Wei Wuxian playful grin returned.

The water molded itself into the shape of arms, before striking out at the Twin Jades’ boat. Simultaneously, two gleaming white swords left their sheathes.

Stepping out, Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen circled around each other, allowing their flowing white robes to spread out around them. Icy blue spiritual power made the blades glow like jewels, before it was launched towards the dark shadow. The resentful energy was thrown back.

Lan Qiren nodded once at his nephews, pleased with their timely reactions and power.

Wangji followed up with several more powerful slashes, cutting through the ones on the left and leaving only disembodied palms with fingers digging deep into the wood. Then, as he turned to face the house-high wave of arms on the right, a red light flashed past, and Wei Wuxian's sword was already back in its sheath.

Jin Zixuan blinked, eyes widening as an unusual trickle of awe began eroding away at his mind. He had known Wei Wuxian was infamous for his skills — it was common knowledge every other member of the top five most coveted young masters was an heir to a great sect, and carried with them their inheritance — but it was still astounding to see it in action.

(A sting of guilt struck him once again, but, when he glanced up at the still-turned-away Jiang siblings, all the courage he had mustered up was flushed away in an instant.

No apologies left his lips.)

"Nice sword," Lan Wangji complimented tonelessly, "What is it called?"

"Oh, no," Jiang Cheng whispered.

"Whatever," Wei Wuxian carelessly responded, levitating the sword and preparing it to strike again.

Even Wen Ruohan raised an eyebrow at the implied disrespect.

"Your sword has a spirit, it deserves a proper name," Lan Wangji lectured, directing Bichen to follow after Wei Wuxian's blade. In response, however, Wei Wuxian just lightly chuckled.

"When Uncle Jiang gave me the sword, I came up with more than 20 names, but I wasn't satisfied with any of them. I figured I could let Uncle Jiang name the sword for me, so when he asked I just said "Whatever." Who could've guessed, when it came, it would really have "Suibian" inscribed on it!" the blade returned, snapping into its sheath at a lightning fast speed. "See? I didn't lie to you."

Lan Qiren couldn't help raising an eyebrow at the lightly chuckling Jiang sect leader, while Nie Mingjue gave a hearty, bellowing laugh. None of the other sects had expected that, having always seen Fengmian's near-passive calmness that seemed to oppose the nature of his sect, but never noticing the truly Jiang-style mind he had.

Wen Ruohan was quite pleased at how much the simulation was teaching him.

Meanwhile, amidst Jiang Cheng's heavy eye roll, Lan Wangji's outraged confusion, and Jin Zixuan's befuddled blinking, Nie Huaisang snickered and muttered "Wei-xiong, you truly are a gift."

"Ridiculous," Lan Wangji declared, insighting further laughter.

"Why's that? It's a nice name. People like you are always easy to trick with this."

Surprising even himself, Wen Ruohan found the continued banter between the pair was accompanied by a wave of understanding. Wei Wuxian was a prodigy when it came to cultivation, surpassing nearly everyone he came across and easily maintaining his title of Yunmeng Jiang's head disciple. How many people could match him — especially people his own age? Their first fight had obviously been surprisingly challenging for both, and was most likely the reason behind Wei Wuxian's initial fascination with the Second Jade of Lan. Since then, their bond had only grown.

But, as much as Wen Ruohan understood an absence of equals, he was displeased by the observation. If Wei Wuxian was both talented and invested in righteous cultivation, it would probably be extremely difficult to convince him to switch his focus to cultivating resentful energy.

At least the simulation would give him further instruction on how to make that happen.

Tendrils crept through the depths beneath the boats, then slowly broke through the surface. As they rose with the darkness, the watchers found themselves staring at Jiang Cheng's back, facing away from the danger.

With swift, sharp steps, Yu Ziyuan walked towards her real son as if that would protect the virtual one from danger, and Jiang Fengmian felt his heart skip a beat. His only consolation was that the simulation already confirmed Jiang Cheng would survive the next twenty years.

~~Thinking that only served to reminded him of his children who didn't.~~

Luckily, the slight sloshing of water alerted Jiang Cheng to the presence behind him, and, with careful movement, he brought his hand to the hilt of his sword.

He swung; the shadows dodged.

They sunk underwater again, unwilling to engage in battle.

It was a little heartwarming how many people breathed out sighs of relief. Not only did his family relax, but Nie Huaisang, Lan Xichen, Madam Jin, and even (surprisingly) Jin Zixuan calmed down.

(Neither he nor Yanli had forgiven Zixuan for what he said about their brother, but Jiang Cheng was starting to wonder if he had overreacted.)

"Be careful," Jiang Cheng warned. "There's something in the water!"

Something shook his boat, and Jiang Cheng gasped slightly as he regained his balance. In the next instant, the watchers were underwater again, following the tendril's journey.

Huaisang blinked and looked around himself, seeing the water exactly as expected but not having any trouble breathing. Air was the same temperature, and no feeling of cold, wetness, or darkness landed on his skin. His clothes also remained dry, regardless of how they were technically under a lake. It was bewildering; whoever made this was a genius.

(Or a terrifying resentful spirit, but Huaisang was leaning more towards the former option as time went on.)

By now, every ship was shaking heavily in the water, imitating what had happened to the boats in the previous segments. The passengers now might be cultivators, but there was no telling whether these boats would also be swallowed.

Their vision fluctuated, then focused on the faces of Lan Wangji, Jin Zixuan, Wei Wuxian, and Jiang Cheng.

"What was that?" Jin Zixuan demands.

In response, Lan Wangji spun his sword through the air and took control, expertly directing it into the unseen depths. After a moment of struggle, the shaking disappeared and the blade resurfaced.

With it, came a glob of dark tendrils, almost resembling hair.

"Is this…?"

Cutting him off, a disciple on the other side shouted "It's back," similarly drawing their sword and directing it toward the dark shadow.

However, after his sword went under, it disappeared from their line of sight. The disciple tried pulling the sword back, but nothing was retrieved from the water. It was as if his sword had been devoured by the lake, vanishing without a trace. The disciple paled to a pasty white.

Xichen stepped closer, recognizing the man at last.

He was slightly surprised his other-self elected to include Su She given the man's skill, but supposed his options had been limited with his uncle at the conference.

An older disciple beside the boy spoke, "Su She, right now, we still haven't determined what the thing inside the water is. Why did you act on your own and send your sword underwater?"

Somewhat flustered, Su She replied indignantly "I saw that Second Young Master also-"

He cut off, realizing belatedly how illogical his defense was, and turned red with embarrassment.

With a slight scowl, Jiang Cheng looked away. He knew all-too-well how it felt to try to follow someone's example, and only ever end up a pale imitation. Although, he had to admit, he was far from foolish enough to try what Su She had done, especially when Lan Wangji had already tried.

The sight of Jiang Cheng's inner turmoil caused the whispers in Jin Zixuan's mind to grow unbearably loud.

‘Just apologize! Help them, like they helped you.’

‘The Jin heir should do everything he does with pride,’ his mother’s voice responds. ‘Never show weakness in this household.’

"Pull up the net,” Lan Xichen ordered.

Boats spread out and raised the net, but, aside from a few of dark strands, there was nothing on it.

‘Hm?’ Xichen thought, scrunching his brow in confusion. ‘There were obviously water ghouls trapped in the net. What happened?’

A flash of something a little like guilt once again burrowed into Wen Qing’s mind. With a single, calming breath, she redoubled her resolve to hide all traces of anger from Wen Ruohan.

(Honestly, Lan Wangji was her brother’s age! How was he so good at hiding his emotions?)

As the silence stretched out, an ominous shadow spread across the lake.

Now seemed like a good time to hide again, so Huaisang swiftly stepped over to Nie Mingjue and phased through, resting calmly in his intangible older brother’s chest. Here, at least, he couldn’t see anything that was happening. And besides, with Jiang Cheng having gotten into a fight with Jin Zixuan, it seemed the temporary friendship they had formed wouldn’t make it.

Sad, but Huaisang was no where near as friendly as Wei Wuxian, and he didn’t think he was really qualified to try and repair the 10-minute long alliance.

”Hey, Lan Zhan, something’s not right,” Wei Wuxian reported.

Frowning for a moment, Lan Wangji looked down at the water. Then-

“Turn around.”

“...What?” his brother asked.

“We need to go back. It lured us here.”

‘Insightful,’ Madam Jin found herself acknowledging as she swallowing nervously. So far, the only thing they had actually felt was the calming effects of Wei Wuxian’s demonic cultivation against the Ghost General.

It stood to reason, then, that the cause of the sudden unnatural tension in the viewers was the growing resentful energy of the abyss below them. If the memories they were trapped in truly came from ghosts, Madam Jin was sincerely glad they weren’t somewhere like the burial mounds — polluted by enough resentful energy to suffocate even the strongest of cultivators. She had no doubt such a vile place would bring them to their knees.

The sound of water crashing against wood grew louder and louder as the waves grew progressively more and more violent.

A moment later, cyclones of water burst from the lake, twisting around the boats and tearing the flimsy wood to shreds. The two cultivators within screamed as they were hurled into the air, swirling around the tornado.

From his hiding spot in his brother, Nie Huaisang noticed the other shift forward, trying to place a comforting hand on his friend’s shoulder. They weren’t able to touch, of course, but Huaisang gave him points for effort.

Five slices of spiritual energy attacked the cyclone, glowing blue, red, purple, and yellow in turn. The attacks by the Great Sect Heirs (and to-be Yiling Patriarch) made the cyclone to back off, dropping the two victims (and what remained of the boat) back into the water.

Some part of Wen Qing kept asking her how many people were going to die because of ~~her~~ the Wen sect.

Luckily, Su She and the older disciple burst out of the water soon enough. The older disciple quickly joined the others in the air, but, lacking his sword, Su She had to choice but to make his way to one of the intact boats.

Above, the heirs flew swiftly, and Xichen spoke.

“This kind of evil is more than we can handle. Focus on getting out safely."

Seeing the slight tension in the Lan heir, Jiang Fengmian made eye contact with Lan Xichen, trying to convey his agreement with the command.

(Madam Yu huffed, wondering when he would start worrying about his own heir.)

Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng flew through, then the former suddenly jerked back. Dark vines burst into the air, reaching up towards them like tentacles. The two dodged expertly, showing speed and experience that far outclassed nearly everyone else their age.

What had Jin Zixuan told them? ‘If you lay down with dogs, you’ll end up with flees,’ wasn’t it? And yet, based on what he saw before him, he couldn’t deny that spots four and five on the list of young masters were just as capable as spots one, two, and three. And Wei Wuxian didn’t have the title of Sect Heir pushing him up — his placement was all from skill.

’Have pride in your position,’ his mother’s voice reminded him.

The pair of Jiang disciples moved expertly, but they continued to be chased. Seeing this, Wei Wuxian made a sudden dive towards the water. When he emerged, he began hovering only just above the lake, practically surfing on the turbulent waves around him.

He was approaching Su She, who remained stuck on the boat.

“Ah,” Xichen turned to Jiang Fengmian, “Thank you. You have trained your disciple quite well.”

“No thanks needed. Without your leadership and judgement, this would hardly have been possible.”

Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes, “I’m just glad Suibian specializes in speed. That idiot’s being way too risky.”

Despite that, Wei Wuxian began evading by smaller and smaller increments as the darkness began closing in. With an abrupt jump back, he narrowly avoided the upward snatching motion of the darkness’ surprise attack.

Jiang Yanli squeezed her hands together nervously.

Within half a second, Wei Wuxian reached and snatched Su She, only for the darkness to tear the boat to shreds an instant later. They had made it out by a hair’s breadth.

“Now he’s carrying two people!” Huaisang squeaked, having peaked out of his older brother when he heard sighs of relief. At those words, Jiang Cheng glared to cover up his nervous edge. Su She had literally become dead weight for his brother! His sympathy for the man was rapidly running out.

Now, Wei Wuxian’s expression was significantly less playful, and darkness got closer to catching him with every attack.

Soon, Wei Wuxian’s body was twisting in an unpredictable loop, yet still dodging by only a scant few centimeters.

He tsked, “Waterborne Abysses are so difficult to handle.”

However, when he looked down at the boy he was carrying, he clenched his fists with newfound resolve.

Lan Xichen sighed. Su She was going to owe Wei Wuxian quite a bit when this was over.

”Wei Wuxian! This way!” Jiang Cheng yelled from above, rapidly approaching to lend support.

Wei Wuxian’s face relaxed into a divine smile.

Lan Wangji’s utter humiliation at getting distracted by something like that in the middle of a fight made him add an additional three copies to his mental list of punishments for when they got out.

Wei Wuxian flew up, his hand reaching out to Jiang Cheng’s own outstretched one.

However, at that moment, the the darkness broke through the water, wrapping around Su She's outstretched leg.

"Stupid dead weight!" Jiang Cheng couldn't resist hissing.

"Gah!" Wei Wuxian yelped, his outstretched fingers just barely missing Jiang Cheng's as he lost balance and toppled off his sword.

"Wei Wuxian!" Jiang Cheng shouted.

"Wei Ying!" came a terrified gasp. It took Jiang Cheng an extra moment to realize who said it, because, when he turned, all he saw was the emotionless Lan Wangji.

Who was the only person who called his brother "Wei Ying."

Underwater, the dark tendrils blanketed the floor like seaweed, and Wei Wuxian gradually sank down towards them. Soon, they slowly meandered up, wrapping around his arms and legs and face until they could enter his mouth.

Trying to tear him apart from the inside out.

Slowly, in the artificial calm generated by the muted sounds, Wei Wuxian cracked his eyes open.

Yanli gasped in relief.

"Don't you dare die," Jiang Cheng whispered.

Instead of rushing to the surface like Jiang Cheng hoped he would, Wei Wuxian's eyes looked down to where Su She was being carried away by the abyss. He reached out as the Lan disciple disappeared from sight.

Unnoticeable to all except his brother, Lan Wangji's breathing was becoming sporadic with worry.

The abyss drew him in, and he entered the calm underneath the cyclone, where an enormous mass of resentful energy churned. Soon, the cloud of darkness expanded and surrounded him.

Even Jin Zixuan was starting to tremble with worry (though no one was shaking as much as Huaisang). Even if he'd never actually met Wei Wuxian, it was impossible to not grow attached to him.

And, even worse, there was an unmistakable chill filling each and every one of their bodies. The spirits which empathy was based off could sense the area's overwhelming resentful energy, snaking around them and drawing them in just as it was doing to Wei Wuxian.

Wei Wuxian's eyes bounced around the cloud, searching desperately for Su She's unconscious body. Then, in the echos of a memory, they heard his voice.

‘Resentment and wrath are energy too. Why can’t we make good use of them? If we could, then many places that gather resentment wouldn’t be forbidden anymore.’

“No,” Lan Qiren hissed as horrified realization sank in. Clicking her tongue, Madam Yu couldn’t help but agree; she had always known the boy would be the fall of the Jiang, and the opening narration had confirmed it. Was this the beginning of his descent into darkness?

They should have left him on the streets to rot.

’Resentment*,’ Wei Wuxian thought, forcing his eyes open again. Slowly, he extended a hand, trying to reach through the massive whirlpool of darkness surrounding him.

Attempting something else, too:

Demonic cultivation.

Of course. Because Jiang Cheng had been too-slow, too-weak, too-hesitant to lift him up, his brother was starting to genuinely consider using resentful energy. Because he hadn’t been able to help, Wei Wuxian thought his only choice was to rely on the demonic.

He forced himself to relax. Surely, his other-self realized this and would support Wei Wuxian from now on.

~~But then why did he die at twenty one?~~

Sound remained completely cut out by the water, and, slowly, light was beginning to fade as well, leaving Wei Wuxian in an empty void.

The tendrils crept closer, but there was a notable shift in the energy.

He hadn’t figured it out yet, but Wei Wuxian was trying.

Smirking, Wen Ruohan stepped forward until he was less than a meter from Wei Wuxian, lifting his hand as if to caress the other’s cheek. It phased through, but still allowed Wen Ruohan to stare directly into Wei Wuxian’s eyes.

Jiang Fengmian felt his heart stop.

“W*ei W*uxi*a*n!” a faded voice shouted, obstructed by the water.

Then, louder, “Wei Wuxian!” Jiang Cheng’s voice screamed.

Blurred by the haziness of water, the watchers saw a mass of white jump in after Wei Wuxian. It was only when they saw the two separate strands of the Lan Clan's ribbon that they realized who it was.

A hand reached forward, grasping Wei Wuxian’s collar.

Finally, his face was pulled above water, and he gasped in the breathable air. Lan Wangji stared down calmly, still holding onto Wei Wuxian’s collar.

“Thank you, Second Young Master Lan,” Jiang Yanli spoke softly, still visibly shaken by the danger her brother had been in even as she bowed. It was apparent from the beginning that Wei Wuxian would survive, but that attempted use of resentful energy was the first in the chain of events that had led to his death.

Fear gnawed at her heart.

Still coughing , the soaked Wei Wuxian blinked up at his savior and disbelievingly muttered, “Lan Zhan?”

There was no response.

Jiang Cheng turned away, trying not to feel resentful over the fact that Lan Wangji had been the one to save Wei Ying.

(Lan Wangji, who had been so adamant about avoiding Wei Wuxian’s splash before, and yet had dived into the lake to save him.)

“...Why are you holding me by my collar? I can’t breathe,” he informed the other boy, smiling weakly.

“I don’t touch strangers.”

‘But you were perfectly fine grabbing Wei Wuxian’s wrist and dragging him back to the Cloud Recesses?’ Lan Xichen thought with a knowing smile, momentarily forgetting that that was the future.

A laugh, “We’ve known each other for a while. How are we still strangers?”

“We don’t know each other.”

Where before those words would have been read as the expected behavior of the Second Twin Jade, Lan Xichen’s earlier comment put it into perspective. How many of Lan Wangji’s actions were emotionally driven, but undetectable due to his eternally calm expression?

Jin Guangshan chuckled slightly, and Lan Xichen found himself belatedly wishing the simulation hadn’t shown any insight into his brother’s true emotions.

The scene on the water faded out, and the sun zoomed forward until it was sunset. Before them, Wei Wuxian was sitting on the edge of a boat, gazing solemnly down at his reflection in the water, holding out the hand he had attempted to use to manipulate the resentment. For a brief moment, the surroundings returned to that scene.

Wei Wuxian was pondering his own actions.

“Not good enough,” Lan Qiren hissed.

Several people turned their gazes on him, surprised by the level of hate in the man’s words.

“...Pardon?” Nie Huaisang asked.

In response, Lan Qiren turned his gaze upon Jiang Fengmian and spoke furiously, “I certainly hope you understand what he tried to do. Something like this cannot simply be written off.”

Laughing slightly, Jin Guangshan fired back “Although he might be a Jiang disciple, he’s only attempted such things under your righteous Lan Clan’s guidance. Perhaps that says something-”

“We are not here to point fingers,” Jiang Fengmian responded.

“Why not?” his wife demanded, and Madam Jin nodded in agreement with her friend. “You heard what they said at the beginning. That son of a servant is going to annihilate the Jiang family because he can’t keep his hands to himself and continues to dabble in dangerous arts. At this point, the best option for everyone would be removing him from the sect.”

“Mother! He-”

“You can’t possibly be trying to defend that monster!” Lan Qiren cut Wanyin off, glaring with rage built atop fear. “He almost manipulated resentful energy for no reason!”

“As I recall,” Jiang Fengmian countered coldly, “He did it to save your disciple.”

“Oh, of course you defend him-”

“My Lady-”

“Nothing excuses demonic cultivation,” Qiren disagreed.

“But… would doing nothing not break our rules? Save the innocent; protect the weak; it was his responsibility to try something, wasn’t it?” Xichen asked back, making eye contact with his brother. For the first time in many years, the Twin Jades found they both disagreed with their Uncle.

(That hadn’t happened since their mother-)

“Perhaps external assistance will be required,” Jin Guangshan suggested again.

Smirking, Wen Ruohan added, “I’m sure our troves have a few items that could incapacitate the boy without killing him, if that’s what you desire.”

Madam Yu huffed, “No need. If it comes to that, we’ll end him ourselves first.”

Both Jiang siblings did a double take, turning to look at their mother with abject horror.

“...I believe that may be something of an overreaction,” Nie Mingjue spoke.

“Well, there’s a surprise,” Wen Xu responded, mockingly. “I thought the Nie were the best when it came to fighting against evil.”

“His intentions were righteous,” Mingjue disagreed, to the relief of his younger brother. But Nie Mingjue had to believe that, for his own cultivation was far more similar to demonic cultivation than that of the other clans. He trusted his clan with the power because they were fighting for the right reasons, why would the same not apply to Wei Wuxian?

“That still doesn’t-”

“I agree with Sect Leader Nie, father,” Jin Zixuan said, openly opposing Jin Guangshan for what might be the first time in his life.

Jiang Yanli’s surprised eyes landed on him.

He coughed, “I-He was trying to save someone, and he didn’t even succeed in manipulating the energy. He… seems like a righteous cultivator. At the very least, waiting to decide couldn’t hurt.”

Both Jiang siblings relaxed at once, gratitude flooding them. It wasn’t an apology — not even close — but, for now, it was enough. They walked to stand by him, and Zixuan tried not to show the frantic cheering going on in his mind.

Wen Ruohan gave an amused huff, but allowed the discussion to stop.

As Wei Wuxian continued to sit in contemplation, Lan Wangji, from a nearby boat, turned to face the wreckage. Planks and logs that were once ships had been left in the abyss’ wake.

“Brother,” he began, “The Waterborne Abyss is still there. The local people will suffer.”

Straightening up, Lan Xichen continued to survey the survivors and responded “Waterborne Abysses are extremely difficult to handle. We must seal it in the Emerald Lake temporarily, and make further plans once Uncle comes back.”

Lan Xichen frowned minutely, understanding the logic but nonetheless frustrated. Seeing this, Nie Mingjue walked over and whispered, “You made the right call.”

Blinking once in surprise, Xichen turned to the sect leader hesitantly, before regaining his usual warm smile and nodding in thanks.

(Nie Huaisang was so proud of his brother! He was finally learning social skills!)

On a different boat, Wei Wuxian continued to stare into the river, not noticing Jiang Cheng’s approach. Suddenly, Suibian was thrust forward.

“Here, your sword,” Jiang Cheng announced.

After a moment, Wei Wuxian managed to shake himself out of his contemplative state and grab Suibian, thanking Jiang Cheng as he did.

“What are you thinking about?”

“Nothing,” Wei Wuxian responded. “Just that Waterborne Abyss.”

Jiang Cheng frowned, not pleased that Wei Wuxian was hiding something so important.

”That kind of monster needs a lot of shipwrecks to form so much resentment. Everyone in Caiyi town can swim. There’s no reason for a Waterborne Abyss to form here.”

“Unless every single drop of water is taken out, and all the people and goods that sank are fished up, and the abyss gets exposed to sunlight for a few years, it’s impossible to exterminate. However, there’s an easier way to solve the problem: chase it away to somewhere else.”

“Clever child,” Wen Ruohan muttered, softly enough that, even with advanced hearing, only those sitting in the Wen section heard it. Wen Qing clenched her teeth, refusing to shudder.

”Brother,” Lan Wangji turned towards Xichen, his frown deepening. “Do you know of anywhere that has seen a Waterborne Abyss recently?”

“Mn,” Xichen grimly nodded, then, silently, pointed to the setting sun before them.

The Wen sect.

Scoffing slightly, Wen Chao huffed, daring the Lan Clan to raise a fuss over it.

”That’s outrageous,” someone muttered. “They couldn’t take care of it themselves, so they just chased it here and allowed it to harm others!”

Wei Wuxian sighed, “Since it’s that sect, it’ll be useless to accuse them.”

Jiang Cheng nodded, “First, they won’t admit it. Second, we won’t get any compensation regardless.”

Wen Ruohan glanced at Jiang Cheng, as if mockingly congratulating him on his intelligence. Frowning slightly, Jiang Fengmian stood between Wen Ruohan and his son, then continued to watch the simulation as if he hadn’t noticed what he had done.

Madam Yu, standing by Madam Jin, turned to her husband and stared in surprise.

”But if we keep letting them get away with things, there’ll be a disaster sooner or later!”

Lan Qiren sighed, feeling the matter was far more complicated than Wei Wuxian was making it out to be.

”Let it be,” Xichen ordered. “Wei-gongzi makes a good point, but we should head back first. Let’s deal with it after Uncle returns.”

“Ha, it’s easy for Wei-gongzi to say,” a Jin disciple declares scathingly. “If they can’t stand being pushed around, why not just fight back. Why drag other clans down with them?”

Madam Yu straightened up, feeling vindicated by the words, but, as always, her husband showed no sign of being willing to punish the boy. What was wrong with him? Hadn't the introduction said the Jiang's destruction was Wei Wuxian's fault? Saying things like this was exactly the reason why! He was a destructive, self-fulfilling prophecy.

Everyone else, however, felt Wei Wuxian more closely resembled a cautionary prophet, knowing now that the "Sunshot Campaign" would happen. It was hard to tell what had sparked such a conflict, but no one could say Wei Wuxian was wrong in his assessment.

To everyone's surprise, the simulation's Jin Zixuan disagreed with his disciple: "If everyone only worries about saving themselves, then I'm afraid that it won't be long before all clans are serving the Wen clan."

Yanli turned to Zixuan with a beaming smile, realizing her fiance would have been mature enough to observe objectively even without anyone to show off for. At the sight of that, and Jiang Cheng nodding once in thanks, Jin Zixuan found himself overjoyed in a way Zixun and his other cousins had never been able to make him.

Unlike his real counterpart, Jiang Cheng was frowning as he walked to Wei Ying, reminding "The arrow hits the person who takes the lead. Don't ever say anything like that again."

'Break their legs? Haven't I told you? When dealing with those without honor, just kill them and feed them to your dog.'

What on earth had happened to them? It seemed like nothing could break their bond.

'He finally realized the truth about Wei Wuxian,' Madam Yu thought.

"I know, I know. Just mind my own business, right?" Wei Wuxian replied, laughing. "But, even if I don't say anything, someone else will."

"For heaven's sake-"

"Young man, take it!" was shouted from the side. Wei Wuxian turned, and caught a basket full of loquats which had been thrown at him by the loquat seller he had saved earlier.

"It's not much," she called out, "but it's a small token to thank you for saving us!"

"Thank you so much!" Wei Wuxian replied, then winked. "If it's given to me by Sister, then I definitely want it! You're as sweet as the loquats!"

A dark hunger he refused to identify as jealousy gnawed at Wangji's heart.

Ignoring Jiang Cheng's disbelieving expression, the girl replied, "But not as sweet as you are!"

Neither Lan Xichen nor Lan Wangji could keep themselves from blushing slightly at the scene, so unused to this way of interacting with others. Even outside of the prudish Lans, no one could deny it was quite an experience to see Wei Wuxian talking and smiling like that. Nie Huaisang even gave an appreciative sigh.

Among the most coveted young masters, Lan Xichen kept a polite, untouchable distance, Lan Wangji kept a frigid, untouchable distance, Jin Zixuan kept an arrogant, untouchable distance, and Jiang Cheng kept an angry, untouchable distance. Perhaps partly due to his lower status, Wei Wuxian was the only one in the top five who was willing to flirt.

Lan Wanji changed his mind; he was never bringing Wei Wuxian there, regardless of how much the other wanted ice cream.

Jiang Cheng scowled, "Flirting again?"

'Again?' Lan Wangji mentally shouted.

As always, Wei Wuxian only laughed at the accusation, turning around carefreely. However, as he did, his eyes landed on Lan Wangji and abruptly turned mischievous.

"Oh, no," Jiang Fengmian whispered softly, laughing slightly as he did.

"Miss, don't you think he's good looking?!" Wei Wuxian shouted, pointing at Lan Wangji.

"Yeah! He's even more handsome!" several women responded, the Gusu dialect ringing like wind chimes in the watchers' ears.

"Then don't stop flattering him," Wei Wuxian whined playfully as Lan Wangji turned away from them and Jiang Cheng facepalmed again. "See? Isn't he much sweeter? Can he have one? If you only give these to me, I'm afraid he might become jealous."

Matching his counterpart perfectly, Lan Xichen smiled at the teasing, and Nie Mingjue couldn't help but feel respect for Wei Wuxian's unparalleled shamelessness.

"What a force of nature," he muttered, getting a laugh out of his brother.

"Lan Zhan, I like the Gusu accent," Wei Wuxian continued. "Can you teach me how to say 'ridiculous' in it?"

His only answer was a ferocious glare, causing Wei Wuxian to shake with laughter. Turning away, Lan Wangji sighed and muttered softly in Gusu dialect.

"Ridiculous."

Between Nie Huaisang's delighted snickers, Jiang Cheng's amused eye-roll, Jiang Yanli's pleasant giggles, and Jin Zixuan's unexpected snort, laughter bounced around the room. Normally, Jiang Cheng would have responded like his simulation-self — with sighs and facepalms and insults and headaches — for the embarrassment placed upon the Jiang sect by Wei Wuxian continuing to bother someone who hated him.

(Madam Yu certainly felt that way.)

However, thanks to Lan Xichen's words earlier, he was starting to get a better reading on Lan Wangji. If Wei Wuxian was actually creating connections (and only Madam Yu was annoyed), then there was no reason for him to not laugh at the ridiculous scene.

(Lan Qiren, who had initially been against Wei Wuxian, was conflicted. While it was true that Wei Wuxian was making his younger nephew socialize with his piers for the first time, the boy was a demonic cultivator.

And yet, both his nephews had stood up for the boy against him.

He had a lot to think about.)

Despite his decisive words, Lan Wangji's eyes continued to drift to the loquats in the Jiang brother's hands.

"Wangji, do you want a loquat?" Xichen asked privately. "We can buy a basket of them."

"I don't."

Xichen turned to his brother, lifting an eyebrow in doubt, and received a frigid glare in response.

The segment ended, and their surroundings faded to white.

With a moment to simply collect their thoughts, it should have been far more relaxing than watching their potential future. Instead, the tension in the room multiplied.

The Sunshot Campaign wasn't a sudden action, it was built up; they were seeing the beginning of that here. And, despite the massive insult and endangerment of human lives, the Lan Clan could do nothing in response.

'All these years, and the Lan Clan still hasn't changed. Why bother being so polite? Hilarious!'

It was different, Xichen told himself. Sizhui and Jingyi had been falsely accused, so, while their lack of retaliation was the expected response, Wei Wuxian's involvement had been fine. Informing Madam Mo that she was shouting baseless accusations was likely the correct reaction, even if he hadn't been especially polite while doing so. His own silence at the Wen Clan's audacity was also correct, as they couldn't risk bringing such a powerful sect's rage down on the Lan Clan. Offending a non-cultivating Madam was vastly different from offending the Chief Cultivator.

'But if we keep letting them get away with things, there'll be a disaster sooner or later.'

But it was different. The Sunshot campaign was not due to the reaction (or lack thereof) of any Clan, it was simply the fruition of Wen Ruohan's ambitions. There was no better option for any of the leaders to take. Even Nie Mingjue — who hated the Clan — couldn't act rashly.

They all made the right decision given the circumstances.

(Right?)

Right.

After nearly a minute had passed, the silence was broken by Nie Huaisang's nervous laughter.

"A-ah, that was quite exciting. And it was nice to see a bit of Caiyi town," he prompted, then paused, waiting for the people around him to respond. Without all the information, it wouldn't do for people to start analyzing everything too deeply. They would get their answers in time; worrying now, when they could do nothing, was pointless.

"Ah, yes," Jiang Fengmian nodded, realizing what the Nie heir was trying to do. "Thank you for bringing them with you, Lan Xichen. It seemed like a valuable learning experience, despite the… unforeseen circumstances."

Lan Qiren rose up, growling "The demonic cultivation-"

"Can be fully judged at a later date. Thank you for your kind words, Sect Leader Jiang," Lan Xichen interrupted. Again! They might not be in the Cloud Recesses (actually, he had no idea where they were), but his nephews were gaining a previously-unfound rebellious streak. And all because of Cangse Sanren's son. Lan Qiren felt his blood begin to boil.

"Of course," Jiang Fengmian responded, nodding once. No one commented on how everyone was skirting around the origin of the Waterborne abyss.

The Chief Cultivator's eyes roamed the crowd, as if daring someone to bring it up.

An awkward silence stretched out.

"A-ah, well…" Huaisang stepped into his brother again, but forced himself to speak. "Zixuan-xiong, do you have any ice-cream like that back at Lanling?"

Also eager to move the conversation away from the abyss, Zixuan hurried to answer, "Not quite the style they have in Gusu, but we have a few additional options flavors-"

As Sect Leader Jiang Cheng explained what he had seen, Wei Wuxian fiddled with his hands, his mind surpassing the speed of light as he considered the different possibilities.

If what Jiang Cheng had seen was true, then someone had broken into Wei Wuxian's lab and used his inventions. And he hadn't even noticed.

Even more than his other theories, Wei Wuxian had kept a tight lid on the number of people who knew about his research into time travel. As far as he knew, the only one he had told about it was Lan Zhan (Wei Wuxian had a tendency to mumble his barely-coherent theories while half-asleep). Due to the delicacy of the project, he'd been careful to keep the people who knew about it to just the two of them. With Lan Xichen still in seclusion, Lan Zhan was the only person whose permission he needed to begin research.

(Naturally, he got it.)

It was only after he confirmed that the "minor concerns" of erasing-people-from-existence and tearing-reality-apart were impossible that he'd relaxed his secrecy. But he still couldn't think of anyone else he might have told-

"Xian-gege?" Lan Sizhui asked.

"A-Yuan, is that you? Come in, come in! I've got something to show you!"

"Wei Ying," Lan Zhan spoke, breaking through Wei Wuxian's train of thought.

"Huh? Oh!" He blushed slightly, turning to ~~his brother~~ Sect Leader Jiang. "Sorry, I… I just got a little lost in thought."

Unfortunately, Jiang Cheng only narrowed his eyes in suspicion, "I've seen you with that look before. What did you figure out?"

Having noticed the same, Lan Wangji remained unsurprised as he set his attention on Wei Wuxian and waited for the answer. For a moment, Wei Ying considered denying it.

Then he remembered he would never be able to beat his fiance in a game of patience.

"...I may have a theory."

Instantly, both Jiang Cheng and Lan Wangji's expressions turn pensive and grim, noticing Wei Wuxian's hesitance. Really, they were so different in so many ways, but they undoubtedly knew Wei Wuxian better than anyone else. His unspoken words were heard clearly.

He knew the most likely suspects, and they wouldn't like his answer.

"...Lan Zhan, the kids are in the library right now, right?"

"Mn. If nothing's happened."

"Great, let's head over," Wei Wuxian suggested, beginning the trek without waiting for a reply. Without hesitation, Lan Zhan followed, and Jiang Cheng joined them shortly after.

The tension between the three was palpable. Jiang Wanyin glared at the others with a million emotions buried beneath rage; Lan Wangji remained expressionless, his indifference masking the annoyance he felt for one brother and the adoration he felt for the other; Wei Wuxian led the trio towards the library, doing everything in his power to ignore the mess of emotions swirling like a tornado behind him.

As that tornado grew in magnitude, the energy in their surroundings responded in kind. Twice, Wei Wuxian caught himself decomposing nearby flowers mid-step when the resentful energy under his command flickered out. Similarly, slight sparks and frost crystals formed behind them.

The silence wouldn't last much longer.

"...Wei Wuxian."

Swallowing slightly, Wei Ying forced himself not to jump at the words, having expected them eventually.

"Yes?"

"If it really can't change anything about our current timeline, why bother?"

After several slow, calming breaths, Wei Wuxian managed to ask, "Does it matter?"

"Shouldn't it? What do you get out of working on something that won't help? Just curiosity?"

"Is that a problem?"

"We both know how well that's worked out."

When the temperature dropped abruptly, Wei Wuxian was torn between gratitude and terror. While his Lan Zhan's protectiveness was appreciated, Wei Wuxian was too sleep-deprived for a fight right now.

"It was never just curiosity," Lan Wangji reminded, as if Jiang Cheng could have forgotten his own involvement in Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation. At the reminder of his ~~brother's~~ golden core, the purple lightning around Jiang Wanyin momentarily flickered as bright as a star.

"Ah, well, it wasn't just curiosity anyways. I was wondering if it would be possible to set up a communication between our dimension and an alternate one. The key to most advancements is a collection of ideas from different people, so being able to easily contact a greater number of people will allow for a much broader cultural exchange — especially once any changes made start resulting in different people being born," Wei Wuxian explained, as if he hadn't single-handedly created every cultivation advancement in the last millennium (for even the others, like Xue Yang's nails or seal, were simply pale imitations of the creations whose instructions Wei Wuxian had not written down).

"...I suppose that's acceptable," Jiang Cheng decided.

If he was able to read Lan Wangji's expression, the 'Wei Ying doesn't need your approval' would have been unbearably loud. Small mercies.

(Since when was Wei Ying the one who de-escalated situations?! This wasn't the role he was meant to be in! The fates had made a grievous error!)

Luckily, by then, they had reached the library.

"A-Yuan? Are you in here?"

“Xian-ge?” Lan Sizhui whispered back, looking around nervously despite their group being the only ones in the library. “What are you doing h-”

He cut off, eyes widening, and Lan Jingyi dropped his book. As it clattered on the ground, Zizhen and Jin Ling both gaped at the pair who followed behind their senior.

Sandu Shengshou, Hanguang-jun, and the Yiling Patriarch faced them, presenting as a united front. Even if they had felt fluctuations of power earlier, no one could have expected this.

“Jiujiu!” Jin Ling snapped out of his shock first, standing up. “What’s going on?!”

“Hanguang-jun?” Jingyi couldn’t resist gasping. “Why are you here?”

“Is something wrong, Senior Wei?” Ouyang Zizhen added.

Smiling far too mischievously for them to relax, Wei Wuxian sauntered forward and leaned over their table.

“I think I should be the one asking you that. You see, a little while ago, someone broke into my lab. If they didn’t set off or break my alarms, they must have been people I already told it to recognize. I don’t suppose you four saw anything?”

“No?” Jingyi squeaked out.

“I certainly hope not. There are quite a few things in there that could really injure someone who didn’t know what they were doing, don’t you agree?”

“...Of course,” Sizhui mumbled, looking down.

“Not to mention the economic crisis that’d occur if my ideas were stollen.”

“You don’t care about having money anyways!” Jin Ling protested. “Didn’t you say that as long as you had enough money to live, my sect’s ‘stupid luxuries’ were-”

“Jin Ling,” Jiang Cheng growled, silencing the juniors. Combined glares from Jiang Cheng and Lan Wangji turned Wei Wuxian’s already devastating mind into an even sharper blade.

“And even ignoring the economic implications, we’re all aware of how dangerous my inventions can be. In fact, one of them rips apart time and space, remember?”

“I thought that wasn’t an issue!”

“And you think my mysterious thief knew that?”

“Thief? We didn’t steal anything!”

Wei Wuxian watched in silence as Jin Ling’s words slowly dawned on the juniors.

“Wait-”

“I mean-”

“We didn’t-”

“I’m sorry!” Sizhui caved, unable to keep up the act anymore. “You said nothing would go wrong, so we didn’t think about the consequences!”

“““Sizhui!!!””” three outraged teenage voices yelled.

Jiang Cheng snapped.

“Jin Ling! Why would you do something so stupid?!”

“He said nothing was going to happen!”

Hanguang-jun frowned, “Sizhui?”

“I’m sorry!” the boy repeated helplessly.

“We were just-”

“Messing around with things that could kill you?”

“There are things in there that could have killed us?!”

“The problem is that you have to ask that!”

Thoroughly chastised, the quartet sank down into their chairs. Nothing Wei Wuxian said was wrong.

“Has…” Sizhui clenched his fists, looking terrified of the answer. “Has something gone wrong because of what we did?”

Wei Wuxian shrugged, “Nothing except a parallel dimension’s Great Clan main branches falling unconscious simultaneously.”

“Eh? Well, not for that long, right?”

"Of course not. By my estimate, it'll only be a few weeks."

“...Is it supposed to take that long?”

“Well, you’d know the answer to that if you’d asked me first, wouldn’t you?”

“Sorry, senior…” Zizhen mumbled, trying to melt into the floor.

Seeing they had all begun to realize the gravity of their error, Wei Wuxian breathed out and relaxed his glare. The most important thing to do was figure out how big of a mess this was and hope Jiang Cheng didn’t kill him for allowing his inventions to mess everything up again.

(Stupid, stupid, sleep deprived brain.)

“So, what, when, who, and why?” he asked causing the juniors to glance up.

“Oh, um, we sent back some information on the causes of the sunshot campaign and what made everyone turn on you. To… around twenty years ago, I think?” Sizhui began.

“You think?”

“We got some help,” Jingyi explained. “A bunch of nearby spirits and some people who’d been alive then but died were willing to help you out. They said they agreed with what we were trying to do. Which was send the information back to a young Hanguang-jun, a young Zewu-jun, a young Sect Leader Nie, and young Sect Leader Jiang, etcetera.”

“And my parents,” Jin Ling added. As always, both his maternal uncles flinched slightly at the mention of his mother.

“As for why,” Zizhen added, “We just… we felt you all deserved better!”

“My Mom and Dad, and the three of you, and Sect Leader Lan, and the Nie brothers shouldn’t have had to go through that. If everyone knew from the beginning-”

“They’d what?” Wei Wuxian interrupted. “Hunt down and kill the teenage versions of Jin Guangyao, Su She, and Xue Yang? What exactly would that accomplish? You think I care about revenge? It’s not perfect, but I’m happy with the life I have now. Why create an alternate dimension where you change that? You want revenge that much?”

“It’s not about that!” Jin Ling protested, mentally sighing over how much easier this would be if Wei Wuxian carried grudges about slights against himself like a normal person. “My… Jin Guangyao may have lied about a lot of things, but he was right about one thing: it probably would have happened regardless.”

Sizhui nodded, “Everyone feared you, and, by then, the cultivation world was too used to war. If it hadn’t been because of him, someone probably would have acted against you eventually. But that’s why this is so important! Your greatest enemy wasn’t Jin Zixun or Su She or Jin Guangyao or Xue Yang or even Jin Guangshan, it’s everyone’s willingness to judge without all the information. The collective’s fickleness and mob mentality, not any one person’s. All those people just used you because everyone hated you anyways!”

“The smaller sects can’t move against a great sect without another great sect backing them up,” Zizhen added, thinking about the smaller sects rallying behind the Jiang sect at the burial mounds. “We didn’t send it over to get people killed, we did it to teach the cultivation world’s leaders how easily they get manipulated and tricked! Because, above all else, the public has always been your greatest enemy.”

For several moments, the juniors were greeted by the rare sight of Wei Wuxian being stunned silent.

Then, he nodded once, and spoke: “I see your point my little radishes, and I’m very proud of all of you. Which is why you’ll be writing every rule twenty times each.”

“What?” Jingyi shrieked.

“Senior-”

“But you said-”

“That’ll take months!”

“Thinking the political situation through means nothing if you don’t realize that this idiot's inventions are dangerous,” Jiang Cheng nearly shouted. “You shouldn’t have been in there at all!”

“You can’t punish me,” Jin Ling protested, looking away from his furious uncle to stare at the shorter one. “I’m a Sect Leader.”

“And I’m your uncle… three times over through Shijie, Mo Xuanyu, and Lan Zhan whose brother was sworn brothers with your uncle. So, through adoption, blood, and marriage, yes, I can.”

“I… that doesn’t count.”

“It does,” Lan Wangji refuted.

“And even if it didn’t, you’re not escaping me, brat!” Jiang Cheng added.

“You’re not my uncle,” Ouyang Zizhen muttered.

“Get married to one of those three and I will be,” he teased, causing all four to flush into a cherry red. “Anyways, no. That was very dangerous, and you’re all doing the punishment regardless of family ties or lack thereof. Right, Lan Zhan?”

“Mn. Wei Ying is always right.”

“Lan Zhan!”

Jiang Cheng just sighed, wondering when things like time travel became a normal part of his life.

(‘When Wei Wuxian returned,’ his mind helpfully supplied.)

Chapter End Notes

Note: Don’t you love the Cornetto adds? I was writing everything I saw until I realized it was about ice-cream and thought ‘They had ice-cream in ancient China?’ And then I saw the brand name. By the way, it turns out the earliest record of something similar to ice-cream was second-century B.C., so way, way after the time period this story takes place in. But it’s not like they had flying swords in ancient China either, so whatever.

After a day full of tension, interrogations, and punishments, there was something truly special about getting to relax. The warm bath was only made more seductive by Lan Zhan continuously running his fingers through Wei Ying's hair, brushing it to a silky sheen.

Unable to help himself, Wei Wuxian curled up into a ball, wrapping his arms around his legs so he could sink deeper into the water. After Jiang Cheng had left with Jin Ling (finally ending the deafening shouting match between the two), Wei Wuxian hadn't wanted to think about anything. Not the time travel, not the risks, not the consequences, and certainly not his fractured relationship with Jiang Cheng. Unfortunately, he also knew from experience that if he didn't fix it, no one would.

"...Lan Zhan?"

"Mn?"

The soothing rumble of Lan Zhan's voice served as a reminder Wei Wuxian desperately needed. He wasn't alone; his husband could help. Smiling faintly, Wei Wuxian glanced up, unable to turn his head completely while Lan Zhan continued combing his hair.

"How big of a problem do you think this is?"

"...For us?"

"For them. How much have we changed?"

The steady rhythm of combing paused, making Wei Wuxian turn his head completely to look at his frozen husband. Golden eyes gazed down at him with a warmth and kindness that was far more obvious than should be possible with his unsmiling lips. Then-

"Not your fault."

Wei Wuxian laughed, "It kinda is, Lan Zhan."

"No. Uncle wanted you to explain your inventions to more people. I suggested you allow the juniors access to your lab. You are trying to fix it because you are good, not because it's your fault."

And his words were true. Paranoid over Wei Wuxian's continued production of inventions (unlike the other elders, who greedily welcomed the Yiling Patriarch once they realized the benefits), Lan Qiren ordered him to allow several other disciples free access to the lab. Wanting to preserve some of Wei Ying's privacy, Lan Wangji had suggested Sizhui and Jingyi be the ones given permission. Even Lan Qiren couldn't suggest that Lan Sizhui was unrighteous, so he agreed.

“It’s still my invention. I didn’t specify that ‘no risk of tearing reality apart’ didn’t mean ‘you can go behind my back and do whatever you want with it.’ And I mean, I didn’t think I had to, but still.”

“You were using a Lan lab. It wasn’t just your responsibility to monitor the invention.”

Wei Wuxian hummed skeptically.

“What Xue Yang did with the Stygian Tiger Seal wasn’t your fault either.”

Here, Wei Wuxian had to laugh. Even before he knew the name Xue Yang, the waiter they interrogated about the Chang family’s massacre had blamed it on the Yiling Patriarch. He had been dead, and people still considered his inventions to be his fault, not caring he’d died trying to destroy the seal.

His husband was truly too kind.

Finally, the combing resumed, and Wei Wuxian’s bitter laughter ended. He hummed, relaxing into the rhythmic sensation and wondering if he could create a device that replicated the effect for Zewu-jun. Upon returning from his visits to his brother, Lan Zhan always seemed disappointed by the lack of progress. Presents might help with that!

What would Jiang Cheng say if he heard about this? If it was the Jiang Cheng from ~~seven~~ twenty years ago, he would have known. The fifteen year old Jiang Cheng was his brother through and through. Now, all he knew was that interacting would hurt both of them more than it would help.

“Wei Ying, don’t worry,” his perfect husband spoke. “We can fix this. You don’t have to, but you can.”

“You sound awfully sure about that for someone who hasn’t given me an answer. So, how much of a problem is this?”

“Help me understand, and I’ll tell you.”

“...I guess it depends on how much the people over there figured out. It’s a little hard to tell when this is all second hand information, but… I’m not sure the past-me realized this is the future.”

“What do you mean?”

“He made no mention of it, and didn’t give any indication that he knew what the kids sent over. Jiang Cheng only guessed it was time travel because he recognized the voices. The difficult part with the device was creating the parallel dimension, but, since I wanted to use it for communication between dimensions, it was supposed to be easy to send a message back along the existing connection. If he just sent it along that, I’m not sure he would have realized the time-characters do anything more than change the subject’s perception of time.”

“Is that a problem?”

“I’m not sure. If they haven’t realized it’s the future, I’d rather keep that from them. Maybe the Sect Leaders will decide the vision was created by a resentful spirit.”

“If they don’t realize it’s real, it won’t be a problem. How likely is that?”

“With my luck? Zero. But ‘high hopes, low expectations’ is the key to a happy life~”

Lan Wangji frowned. Recently, the elders had been putting more pressure on Wei Wuxian to earn his place in the Lan sect, as if he hadn’t already done more for the cultivation world in a few months than every sect put together. While teaching the juniors. And dealing with the occasional night hunt. And studiously worked on his core until it was almost as strong as Sizhui’s. As always, Wei Ying hid his exhaustion under blinding smiles to keep people from seeing anything else.

In some ways, Lan Zhan thought it was nice that Wei Ying didn’t feel like he needed to hide his exhaustion with him. In other ways, he hated that it existed at all.

Silently, Lan Wangji wrapped his arms around Wei Wuxian’s shoulders, pulling him close. Perhaps they would get to their “everyday” later; for now, nothing was more important than reminding each other they were not alone. Soon, the rest of the world faded, leaving only the two of them.

Then, Wei Wuxian started to laugh.

“Well, that’s enough whining from me. What do you think, Lan Zhan? Should we go check on the kids’ punishments and see how far they’ve gotten? They’re always so cute when they’re trying to copy your one-armed handstands.”

“I doubt they will appreciate that.”

“I only tickled them once, Lan Zhan. And you can’t blame me! They were trying so hard to keep their balance that I just couldn’t help myself!”

“You made Jingyi knock over a priceless vase.”

“I caught it, didn’t I? It’s fine! Pleeeease?”

The two made eye contact, Wei Wuxian’s fake tears glistening brightly, making his already-silver eyes shine like diamonds. Mentally, he counted down.

‘Three… two… one….’

“Fine.”

“Thank you, thank you. Lan Zhan is very good to his Wei Ying, isn’t he?!”

“Mn.”

When the world switched from bright white plains to a river at midnight, Nie Huaisang breathed out a sigh of relief. Even after his repeated attempts to maintain conversation, the tension in the area was nearly physical in its intensity. If he didn't know for a fact they all had their cultivation sealed, he might have suspected Wen Ruohan was artificially causing them to feel like they were carrying a mountain on their shoulders.

"Waterborne Abysses come from the resentment brewing in water. It is hard to eliminate once it takes shape," Lan Wangji's voice reviewed, and the watchers were brought inside to where he was denoting the information into a letter.

The writing then paused, and two golden orbs turned to his right. A light tap of movement from outside was followed by a slight falter in Lan Wangji's breath.

"Huh. I think I'm starting to figure out how to read him," Jin Zixuan whispered. Jiang Cheng remained silent in equally surprised agreement, while Huaisang giggled slightly at the purposefully blank look shot their way.

Lan Wangji was not amused.

Outside again, they were brought along the Cloud Recesses' hallways, following the mostly-shadowed figure of Wei Wuxian. In his hands, two jars of Emperor's Smile dangled.

Simultaneously, Madam Yu and Lan Qiren glared at the boy. He had already gotten in trouble once, why was he breaking this rule again only a few months later?!

(Truly, the spawn of Cangse refused to be tamed.)

Wei Wuxian smirked at his success, dipping nimbly through the pillars and remaining hidden in shadow, his footsteps muffled by the light rain. Then-

"Stop."

Wei Wuxian jerked to a halt, turning around to see Lan Wangji, who stood only a handful of meters from him. To combat the rain, a small umbrella was held over his head, giving him the aura of a traveling immortal.

It really wasn't fair that Huaisang was trapped in here without his canvases and brushes! How was he supposed to remember these things properly if he wasn't allowed to paint them? Or, better yet, Wei Wuxian could use his phenomenal art skills to depict it. They could call it 'Wandering Lover Awaiting His Soulmate: Part Two.' Though, this time, they would add a camellia (for longing) instead of a peony.

As if reading his thoughts, Lan Wangji turned a cautious glare on him, causing Huaisang to hide behind Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan again.

Wei Wuxian froze for a moment, then gave a nervous laugh and hid the jars behind his back, greeting "Lan Zhan! What a coincidence!"

“Disciples who break curfew too many times must go to the Lan ancestral hall to receive punishment.”

Even though he couldn’t see from where he was hiding, Huaisang squeaked in exaggerated fear at the threat. When Nie Mingjue sighed, both Jiang Fengmian and Lan Xichen had to hide an amused smile.

”Eh? Seriously? I thought we were friends!” Wei Wuxian protested. “Can’t you spare me just this once?”

While Jiang Yanli and the rest of the older siblings were laughing slightly at the “just this once,” Lan Wangji was desperately trying to ignore how “friends” played on repeat in his head.

Jiang Cheng facepalmed, unable to watch any more.

An intimidating scratch of metal rang through the air as Lan Wangji unsheathed Bichen, allowing its ice-like gleam to shine though the darkness.

“Hey, why are you doing this? We’re the only ones here! If we both stay quiet, no one else has to know, right? It won’t happen again, I promise!”

“Trying to collude with the enforcement?” Lan Qiren growled, mentally tallying up how many rules Wei Wuxian had broken in this conversation alone. By the end, it seemed likely he’d get to twenty.

Wei Wuxian tensed slightly, noticing Lan Wangji refused to sheath Bichen. The two made eye contact through the pouring rain.

Lan Wangji attacked.

Metal clanged as Wei Wuxian responded in kind. A moment later, he jumped out of the hallway, effectively reversing their previous positions, and slid to a stop across the wet grass. Within moments, his hair was drenched from the rain into an even silkier shade of ebony.

Uninterested in fighting, Wei Wuxian turned and ran to the other side, trying to escape. However, because he carried the delicate jars of Emperor’s Smile, it was too dangerous for him to use his full speed. In the next instance, Bichen had swung around to rest against the pale expanse of his throat.

If Lan Wangji’s mind didn’t stop making such inappropriate observations, he was going to turn around and ignore everything shown in the simulation. Part of him couldn’t understand how he was getting so attracted to a rude, demonic, needlessly vivacious, informal, undisciplined, ~~talented,~~ rule breaker.

(The other part of him kept focusing on how brilliant Wei Wuxian’s inventions were, how unhesitantly he defended Lan Sizhui and Jingyi, how he courageously returned to save Jin Ling despite the great risk of Jiang Wanyin, and how little he cared about his own destroyed reputation. Wangji did his best to quiet that voice.)

Rain continued to fall, soaking the pair's clothes further in the momentary pause. The trickle of rainwater sliding down Wei Wuxian's exposed neck reminded several of seeing Wei Wuxian drink Emperor's Smile the last time he snuck it in.

And that settled it; Lan Wangji's brain obviously couldn't be trusted to watch this. He closed his eyes and began religiously reciting rules backwards.

"I don't believe you," his virtual counterpart declared, responding to the "it won't happen again" promised earlier.

Wei Wuxian gulped nervously as rain drops landed on the blade.

"Alright, alright, alright," he rushed to say. "You're the one with a sword, so what you say goes. As you wish."

Lan Wangji nodded once and removed the blade from his neck.

While she was glad to see the blade move away, Yanli couldn't help but feel skeptical.

Seeing the blade get retracted, Wei Wuxian blinked once, then smirked.

"Oh, no," Jiang Fengmian sighed, trying to hide his smile.

With a playful hop, Wei Wuxian darted forward. Lan Wangji did a double take.

"You-"

He neglected to finish his sentence and began chasing after Wei Wuxian, who twisted through the hallway's pillars with the grace of a dancer. Once he got to two adjacent ones, he threw one jar into the air and jumped up the pillars. Once he reached the top, he flipped onto the roof.

He landed, both jars in hand, only to see that Lan Wangji was already waiting for him. The umbrella shadowed his glare until it was a terrifying glower. In under the steady fall of rain, they made eye contract for a moment.

Then, Wei Wuxian fled.

"Run, Wei-xiong," Nie Huaisang whispered, cheering his friend on.

Once again, Lan Wangji managed to circle ahead of Wei Wuxian, but every time he tried to grab him, Wei Wuxian slipped through as if his body was made of air. They twisted around each other, only barely avoiding contact each time (either hindered by the delicate jars or the obstructing umbrella they carried).

To be so fast despite holding liabilities spoke wonders of their skill; Wen Ruohan made eye contact with Jin Guangshan, both silently communicating their interest.

“Hey! I already promised you that it won’t happen again! Why are you being so stubborn?” Wei Wuxian demanded as he backed off.

Lan Wangji again ignored the question, continuing to chase after the other.

As the near-misses piled up, the watchers began to sympathize with Lan Wangji. Wei Wuxian’s fighting made him resemble a trick of the light: visible, but not tangible. They had faced similar frustrations trying to make contact with each other in the simulation-realm.

In the back of his mind, Lan Wangji remembered the look on his older-self’s face when he had grabbed the Yiling Patriarch’s arm. Hope, shock, and disbelief, as if finally catching something which had escaped his reach for the last twenty years.

Wei Wuxian continued to slip around the other until he was forced to jump over an attack, leaving him momentarily suspended in the air. Instantly, Lan Wangji’s hand reached the ground, and Wei Wuxian was forced to block a ridiculously high kick.

One jar was knocked out of his grasp.

“Lan Zhan! Don’t be so harsh! We’re friends; if you let me go this time, I’ll return the favor next time!”

The only response from the Second Jade was a slight huff of refusal.

Lan Xichen’s lips twitched slightly, but he managed to stop himself before a laugh escaped.

“You…. Alright,” Wei Wuxian’s annoyance shifted into a crafty smirk, and he threw the other jar into the air. Freed from both hinderances, Wei Wuxian went on the offensive, slipping past Lan Wangji’s defenses and knocking the umbrella from his hand.

Glaring, Lan Wangji tried to grab him again, but Wei Wuxian ducked and-

“What the-”

“He-”

Wei Wuxian had jumped froward, wrapping his arms around Lan Wangji’s waist and pushing them both off the roof onto the grass outside the Cloud Recesses.

The umbrella clattered on the ground.

Lan Wangji had broken a rule. He clenched his fists.

Forced or not, he hadn’t done that in years. And, between this and the abyss, his perpetually pristine clothes were constantly getting soaked because of Wei Wuxian. Everyone described him by his impeccable appearance and rule-following. Some people thought that was all he was.

How was it possible for one person to change him so much?

As the rain began to pour, Wei Wuxian slowly moved up so that he was kneeling, rubbing his head in pain and ignoring the water soaking his clothes. Before him, Lan Wangji sat up.

"Hey, Lan Zhan, you're out too," Wei Wuxian informed him with a smirk, panting slightly. "We'd both have to be punished."

The Wen brothers cackled slightly, and even Wen Ruohan lifted an eyebrow at the Lans, wondering what they would do now. It was much easier to be "righteous" when your favorites were never tempted to break the rules; would they stick to their honor before their prized jade?

Nie Mingjue rolled his eyes at their reaction; it was more than obvious Lan Wangji was not at fault here, and that Wei Wuxian was only doing this as another attempt to tease the Lan. No one — not even Wei Wuxian — would expect Lan Wangji to get punished for being pushed off the roof. Making eye contact with Jiang Fengmian, he saw that the other sect leader was in complete agreement.

Immediately, Lan Wangji stood up, glaring down at Wei Wuxian and forcing himself to breathe deeply. It was clear the dam holding back his rage would only take a few more taps before it broke completely.

Then, in an impressive show of restraint, Lan Wangji forced himself to calm down and turned away, making a sound that vaguely resembled amusement.

As Wangji walked back to the Cloud Recesses, Wei Wuxian stood up and assured "But don't worry! I won't tell a single soul. The only ones that know are the sky, the earth, and the two of us!"

In response to both the secretive phrasing and the beaming smile Wei Wuxian sent over, Lan Wangji copied his virtual-self in taking slow, deep, calming breaths.

Meanwhile, Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng were begrudgingly impressed; there was no way Wei Wuxian would get punished for breaking curfew now!

(Or they'd double the punishment for making someone else break curfew.)

The floor of Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng's room was littered with corpses. Everywhere, knocked out teenagers clutching empty bottles slept, making it nearly impossible for someone to walk to the door without tripping over a body.

Jin Guangshan found Wei Wuxian's popularity to be an unsurprising but pleasant addition to his list of the boy's qualities. Besides, it was amusing to see Lan Qiren vibrating with rage and mumbling curses of "never in my fifty years has-" and "that Wei Wuxian!"

Only three people were still awake: Jiang Cheng, Nie Huaisang and Wei Wuxian. Simultaneously, all three gulped down a cup of Emperor's Smile.

Subdued, Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang kept their eyes to the ground, not willing to make eye contact with their infuriated brother/mother, nor their amused sister/father.

“Wei-xiong,” Nie Huaisang sighed in bliss. “This liquor is really good.”

“Of course. Here in Gusu, we shall drink Emperor’s Smile; fragrant and mellow, refreshing yet not aggressive, smooth and powerful.”

“As expected of a master of the six arts, right Wangji?” Xichen asked, noticing his brother's reaction to the poetic description.

Lan Wangji, who had up until that point used Wei Wuxian’s crassness and inelegance to maintain a mental distaste of the boy, refused to answer his bother’s question.

”Just drink the liquor,” Jiang Cheng complained. “You make it sound like you’re describing a person.”

“Jiang-xiong, I disagree,” Huaisang returned. “I think Wei-xiong is making an excellent point. As a wise man once said, fine beauty is just like great wine.”

“Wei-xiong’s language only enhances the experience,” Huaisang added on quietly, nodding in agreement with himself. “Good wine should always be accompanied by a bit of verbal art!”

“And of course you know all the best ways to drink wine, do you?” Nie Mingjue asked, raising an eyebrow. While it wasn’t frowned upon for a young lord to appreciate alcohol, to see him drink it in the Lan sect when he was supposed to be studying made Nie Mingjue more furious than a raging storm.

His brother could only laugh nervously.

”If what you say is true, you’d be able to find your destined partners by following the smell of liquor,” Jiang Cheng pointed out skeptically.

Lan Wangji very carefully did not think about how he and Wei Wuxian met.

Wei Wuxian chuckled, “I’ll be fine, as long as I have wine.”

Jiang Cheng promptly coughed out the sip he just took.

Unconsciously, Jin Zixuan’s lips curled up into a tiny smile at brothers' interactions. Seeing it, Jiang Yanli smiled as well. When they made eye contact, they both snorted and began to genuinely laugh.

”I don’t know how the Gusu Lans can put up with you,” Jiang Cheng decided.

“Hey, I’m adorable!”

~~Lan Wangji did not agree. At all.~~

”It’s you who’s going to have trouble. No one can match your standards.”

“...What standards, Wei-xiong?” Nie Huaisang asked.

“Oh don’t you dare, Wei Wuxian!”

“But-”

”Wei Wuxian-”

“Beauty!” he loudly declared. “Natural beauty.”

“Hey!” Jiang Cheng stood up, pointing at his brother indignantly. “Wei Wuxian!”

Wei Wuxian bounced to his feet and moved to the opposite end of the table, maintaining distance even as he was chased to continue, “Virtuous and caring. And-”

“Wei Wuxian!”

“And comes from a good family.”

“Stop it!”

“Should not be too chatty, and should have a gentle voice-”

“Stop running, Wei Wuxian!”

“Be careful!” Nie Huaisang recommended.

“But not too capable. And there’s more: shall not burn through money, shall be — ah. Ah!”

Humiliation burned in Jiang Cheng’s cheeks as half the people present collapsed on the floor in laughter. Even more than simple embarrassment, shame flooded through him when he saw how amused the Wen brothers were at his ridiculous requests.

Seeing this, Lan Xichen was reminded again that the simulation would reveal information that didn’t belong to the general public. He hoped such instances would be rare from now on.

Just then, the door opened, and another guest disciple walked in.

Then froze.

Before him, Wei Wuxian lay on his bed, getting strangled by Jiang Cheng as Nie Huaisang tried to pull the latter away from their mutual friend.

In the two seconds over which the disciple remained frozen, all three boys immediately got into a proper seated position on the bed next to each other.

(Nie Huaisang even pulled out his fan.)

The disciple slowly walked back out the door and closed it behind him.

Now, even Nie Mingjue was struggling not to laugh.

”Kneel!” a man shouted as Wei Wuxian was slammed to the floor the next day.

“What?!” Jiang Cheng demanded, startled by the sudden scene change.

On the other side of the room, Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang hid behind pillars, watching closely. For a brief instance, the scenery changed to match the simulated heir’s memories, showing nearly thirty disciples in Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian’s room, all lying on the floor in a heap, dead to the world.

Based on the empty bottles and “picture books” around them, it was obvious this was the next morning.

Madam Jin was mostly just grateful that her son hadn’t been involved in that mess.

On the other hand, said son was somewhat regretting he hadn’t gotten to join in.

The door was abruptly slammed open and Lan Wangji entered the room. Everyone inside was still fast asleep, but the frigid chill of his enraged aura began to shock them awake.

Ignoring the dozens of other rule breakers, Lan Wanji walked straight to Wei Wuxian and pulled him up by his collar. Not yet awake enough to know what was going on, Jiang Cheng mumbled a “be quiet” and threw a book in Wei Wuxian’s direction.

One of the rarest “picture books” Nie Huaisang owned.

The Jiang heir flushed bright pink and looked down, refusing to meet his family’s eyes. The looks on the Wen heirs' faces made their thoughts clear as day.

Finally, as several of the corpses on the ground began to wake up, one of them realized the origin of the noise. He blinked in confusion and spoke.

“What’s happening? Where are you taking him?”

Lan Wangji turned his head, speaking one word at a time. “To. Receive. His. Punishment.”

Lan Qiren nodded with, Lan Xichen noted, far more pride than the Lan Sect typically allowed.

They were brought back to the punishment as the Lan servants prepared to begin.

Even as he was being held down by them, Wei Ying didn’t hesitate to look back and coyly demand, “Lan Zhan, are you really going to punish me? That’s not fair.”

“Woah,” Nie Huaisang gasped. “Wei-xiong truly has some nerve. He’s even able to laugh in a situation like this!”

Jiang Cheng scoffed slightly, responding “He could laugh even if the sky was falling.”

No one could disagree with the observations, and Wen Ruohan even smirked slightly, pleased that the boy had a stronger spirit than his sons.

(It was easier to permanently mold someone when you didn’t have to worry about breaking them.)

Madam Yu, on the other hand, glared with the rage of someone who had failed countless times to tame the boy’s wild ~~Yunmeng Jiang~~ spirit.

”According to Rule No. 530 of the House rules of the Lan Clan, ‘No impartiality,’” Wei Wuxian reminded Lan Zhan, speaking the thoughts of most of the watchers. “I wasn’t the only one who broke curfew last night. If you try to play favorites, then-”

His mocking threat cut off abruptly as, before Wei Wuxian’s astounded expression, Lan Wangji swept his robes back and knelt down beside Wei Wuxian.

“What?”

“Is he-”

“He couldn’t be-”

”Wait, wait, wait,” Wei Wuxian rushed to say. “I take that back, I’m sorry! I accept this! I accept this!”

Ignoring the protest, Lan Wangji remained staring straight ahead and commanded, “Strike.”

“...Of course he is,” Lan Qiren refuted, trying to hide his overwhelming pride. It wasn’t proper to brag before the gathered crowd, but he could rest assured that this, at least, hadn’t changed.

(It didn’t matter what the future had implied, his younger nephew was not going to follow Qingheng-jun’s footsteps. Not while Lan Qiren still lived.)

”A-ah, hey! I was wrong, Lan-” the rest of the apology was cut off as the wooden slab was swung down.

“...Quite impressive,” Jiang Fengmian nodded once. “I see your famed righteousness was not exaggerated.”

A single salute was Lan Wangji’s only response, showing the proper respect to a sect leader without any further acknowledgement. The teenagers were stunned; it was one thing to hear of the Jade’s reputation, another to see Wei Wuxian start to crack the facade, and yet another to realize how the rumors were true regardless. This was far beyond what any of them had expected.

Though Lan Wangji had to admit, some quiet, disgusting part of him was secretly happy that Wei Wuxian only started panicking when he realized it was going to happen to Wangji as well.

As the beatings continued, Nie Huaisang and Jiang Cheng's expressions gradually grew pained, seeing the violent punishment being administered. While it was not so far as to be outside of the Lan Clan's rights, it was still unbelievably severe for a relatively minor infraction.

Although she wanted to be pleased, Madam Yu knew from experience that this wouldn't be enough to change Wei Wuxian's behavior. On the other hand-

"Isn't that a little… excessive?" Nie Huaisang asked Lan Wangji, far less scared now that he had seen the jade shell crack to show the human within.

(Slowly, everyone was starting to see what had made the future's Lan juniors like their "Hanguang-jun" so much.)

"...Punishment should be remembered," Lan Zhan responded.

"But, even leaving aside Wei Wuxian, that was the first time you'd broken the rules, right?" Jin Zixuan asked. "And even for just him… it was just curfew."

Normally Lan Wangji would leave his uncle to answer the question, but, thinking ahead, the heirs had gotten close enough to whisper to him, not including anyone else in the conversation. But what was he supposed to say? That his own punishment was likely more for the thoughts in his head than breaking curfew? Obviously not.

So, instead, he simply glared at them until they cautiously backed off.

The punishment stretched on and on, and even Lan Wangji was forced to clench his teeth in pain, sweat dripping down his forehead. Wei Wuxian's dramaticized cries of "Easy!" were ignored as well, the servants having no reason to listen to a rule-breaker's request.

Wen Chao flinched slightly, having been dazed with boredom until the loud noises shocked him awake.

(Wen Qing would never be ashamed of her family, but she had to admit she was somewhat regretful being a Wen meant being grouped with him.)

Groans of pain stretched out across the otherwise-silent hill, and the simulation got into focus so the watchers could see Wei Wuxian being carried by Jiang Cheng. Reaching out, Nie Huaisang began delicately fanning Wei Wuxian's sore back.

"Slow down, Jiang Cheng," Wei Wuxian whined. "I'm about to fall off!"

“You should be grateful I’m carrying you!”

An offended huff, “I didn’t ask you to.”

“If I hadn’t carried you out, you’d end up lying there all day long. It’d be embarrassing! Lan Wangji got 50 more strikes than you, yet he could still walk on his own.”

“Seriously?!” the real Jiang Cheng demanded, awed despite himself. He made eye contact with Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang, all three silently communicating their shock.

It was… nice, to not have to worry about appearances. They might be with the other sects, but it was only the other heirs and leaders, less than twenty people combined. With everyone’s secrets getting broadcasted anyways — including Jin Guangshan’s death and the Wen clan’s defeat — it seemed pointless to try to keep up public appearances.

Once again, Jiang Cheng wished his brother could have come.

”How can you act this way?” Jiang Cheng continued. “Get off me. Walk by yourself.”

Seeing that his brother was straightening up to allow him off, Wei Wuxian only squeezed on tighter. “No way, I’m injured.”

Lan Wanji was definitely not jealous. Not at all.

”You…” further arguments were silenced as the trio turned to their lefts, staring at the pair seated two dozen meters away from them.

“Mister Lan is back,” Nie Huaisang observed.

At the table, Lan Xichen poured Lan Qiren another cup of tea, showing all the grace expected of the heir to the Lan sect. He spoke.

“Uncle, you must be exhausted after such a long journey.”

“It wasn’t too bad, but I’m afraid it will be much harder in the near future.”

“Because of the Wen Clan?”

Wen Ruohan raised an inquisitive eyebrow.

”At the meeting in Qinghe, all the Sect Leaders were afraid to speak their minds. During the journey, I heard hundreds of complaints about how members of the Wen Clan talked black into white and acted wildly. I also heard about the Waterborne Abyss in Caiyi Town.”

Overcome by a sudden surge of anger, he slammed his cup onto the table, allowing the tea to slosh slightly.

“They have gone too far.”

The problem with viewing private conversations was how easily it could spark tensions between the speaker and the subject. When Wen Xu turned a deadly glare on the Lan Clan, Lan Xichen bowed once in an empty apology. Being wrong about the younger Lan had doubled Wen Xu's desire to remind everyone of the Wen Sect's power. They hadn't been beaten yet.

(If they learned the cause of their downfall, they never would be.)

"The Wen Clan has too many followers," Lan Xichen reminded calmly. "We have no choice but to put up with it. The Waterborne Abyss will be hard to get rid of, I'm afraid I'll need your help with it."

"Human life is our top priority, we have no time to lose. I'll go with you today."

As the pair's conversation shifted to the practical means of dealing with the abyss, Wei Wuxian, Nie Huaisang, and Jiang Cheng sneaked closer, peaking at them from behind bushes.

Lan Qiren glared at the duo who were present, reminding "Eavesdropping is forbidden."

"Do not speak ill of others," Wen Xu fired back, forcing everyone to pause. It was no secret that the Wen Clan was unpopular among the other sects, but, in the current situation, talking poorly about the Wen Clan was necessary to prepare for future conflicts. It didn't count.

The rules weren't so omnipotent as to not depend on the circumstances.

(Wen Ruohan, seeing how shaken they were, smiled to himself and decided to return to silence. While he wanted them to forget he was there, it wouldn't do for them to disrespect the Wen Clan.)

"Oh, I almost forgot to tell you. I caught some walking corpses to help with training the disciples. Have Wangji associate with their spirits first, see if they had any wishes before they died."

"Understood, I'll tell him about it," Xichen replied.

"Just now I heard the disciples say that Wangji got punished because of Wei Wuxian," Qiren growled, obviously confused by Wei Wuxian's unchanging behavior despite his many punishments.

Yanli's mouth formed into a genuine smile, and she turned to Zixuan to whisper "He's like this at home too. The only thing that can get him to cooperate is when I offer my soup. Punishment never works."

"Really? Even the Violet Spider can't make him cooperate?"

"Not for a lack of trying," JIang Cheng muttered, causing Huaisang to snort.

At the reminder of the Second Jade, Wei Wuxian curled in on himself, trying to hide his entire body behind the bushes. "I… oh no, oh no, I've already had an earful."

Both Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang gave Wei Wuxian pitying looks.

A sigh, ”Truly, just like his mother.”

Wei Wuxian did a double-take, standing up.

Jiang Fengmian tensed slightly, making eye contact with Lan Qiren at those words. When she saw this, a black bite of jealousy slipped into Madam Yu’s heart.

Xichen paused, turning in the direction of the sounds he heard, only for Jiang Cheng and Nie Huaisang to hurriedly pull yelping Wei Wuxian under the bushes again.

Neither Nie Mingjue nor Jiang Fengmian could resist laughing at the innocent display of friendship.

Rather than punishing the three eavesdroppers, Lan Qiren simply huffed and walked away, leaving Lan Xichen to talk to them.

“Huh?” Wei Wuxian asked. “What does that mean?”

Jiang Cheng frowned, equally confused about the “mother” comment, then responded “He didn’t even want to lecture you. Guess he’s already given up on you.”

‘Is that why you fell to demonic cultivation?’ Lan Qiren wondered. ‘Would I have been able to stop you?’

”Stop hiding there. Come out,” Xichen ordered, making both Jiang disciples do a double take.

In the next instant, all three were standing before Lan Xichen.

Nie Huaisang jumped slightly at the instantaneous change. It was one thing to keep moving between scenes, but it was weird to skip forward in time while their surroundings stayed the same.

The spirits had put quite a bit of effort into making the simulation.

Wei Wuxian’s arm was wrapped around Jiang Cheng (helping himself stand), and Nie Huaisang looked like he was considering hiding behind his fan.

“Hi, Xichen-gege,” he greeted.

“Hello,” the Lan heir returned, then noticed Wei Wuxian’s back and nearly did a double-take. “Is Young Master Wei still able to walk? What happened? Was this the punishment done by Wangji?”

There was an awkward pause as the teenagers internally debated what to say. Of course, Jiang Cheng didn’t dare claim it was Wei Wuxian’s fault. Thinking back, the whole group had ured Wei Wuxian to buy liquor. Each and every one of them should have been punished.

As a result, he only said, “It’s fine, it’s fine, it’s not that serious! He can walk, right, Wei Wuxian?”

Lan Wangji could admit that only punishing Wei Wuxian was, perhaps, not entirely fair.

”I can’t walk,” Wei Wuxian refuted, raising his swollen, red palms. “Zewu-jun, your younger brother is so cruel!”

Lan Xichen examined the hands, agreeing “Yes, that punishment is quite severe, indeed. It’s likely the swelling will not subside for the next three or four days.”

“Why would you do that?!” Nie Huaisang couldn’t help asking, backing up in horror. Although Mingjue was temped to turn this into a lesson for his brother, even he was astounded by Lan Wangji, who had given himself fifty more strikes than Wei Wuxian.

The boy they were asking simply glanced back once, then turned away, refusing to answer.

(Wen Xu huffed, wondering again what it would take to shatter the prideful Jade of Lan.)

“What? That serious? Their legs and back were hit as well! That’s too harsh!”

Jiang Cheng nodded in agreement with his-other self, stunned by the information. He had thought Wei Wuxian was simply playing up the extent of his pain like usual — to be fair, that was probably part of it — so he hadn’t realized it was so genuinely serious.

(Lan Wangji nodded once to himself. If his simulation was thinking the same things he was, he more than deserved the beating.)

Jiang Cheng breathed out in disbelief, forgetting himself for a moment and allowing resentment into his voice as he growled “How could he-”

Wei Wuxian secretly smacked his head to shut him up.

Seeing the slightly forlorn expression on her son’s face, Madam Jin momentarily wondered if Zixuan would have enjoyed a sibling.

(But she refused to sleep with her husband again, and the children of whores weren’t good enough to be Zixuan’s siblings. She rejected the idea immediately.)

Lan Xichen graciously ignored the slight, continuing, ”But don’t worry too much. Young Master Wei, I know of a good way to recover in just a few hours.”

“Huh?”

“Really?” Wen Qing couldn’t resist asking, mentally reviewing the possibilities. The damage was quite severe. A day would be impressive, but a few hours was unbelievable.

Just as Xichen was about to point them in the right direction, Wei Wuxian interrupted, “Zewu-jun?”

“Yes?” Xichen turned back to them.

“...My mother.”

“Oh, Wei-gongzi, back in the day, Cangse Sanren was a classmates with my uncle. My uncle’s behaviour was strictly mannered, and your mother…. How should I say this… she was just like you.”

As Jiang Cheng snickered at the description, Wei Wuxian stared in wonder.

“It is true my uncle is being unusually harsh against you, but I hope you will not hold a grudge against him.”

Qiren sent his nephew a look that was clearly meant to communicate how little he cared about Wei Wuxian’s opinion of him, but, as he couldn’t reasonably say those words aloud, it was easy for Xichen to pretend not to see it.

The sky was encompassed by the ebony of night, as the watchers were brought to a vacant mountain trail lit only by a handful of lamps. They moved forward, and were taken to a wide spring surrounded on all sides by towering cliffs and trees. They were brought even closer, their invisible floor keeping them suspended just above the water as if they were standing on it.

Inside the pool was Lan Wangji.

Flushing slightly, Jiang Yanli hurried to turn around. Wen Qing was a doctor, and Madams Yu and Jin had sons his age, so she was the only one left to feel flustered by the naked figure of the second most sought after young master. Even if it wasn’t much, facing away from the boy made her feel better. Jin Zixuan was very, very grateful that, if no one else, his fiance had turned around.

(Although, after seeing the man’s expression, Zixuan was starting to wish his father had turned around too.)

”Lan Zhan!” a voice called out, and the Second Jade turned to see an enormous splash of water. Once it settled, he was able to see Wei Wuxian standing before him.

Silently, ignoring his wife’s contemptful gaze, Jin Guangshan approached Wei Wuxian, cataloguing the body’s shape and strength as if the boy was an animal he was contemplating buying.

Without even truly thinking about it, Jiang Fengmian moved to stand between the other Sect Leader and his adopted son.

(Madam Yu, seeing her husband once again step in to defend the boy, felt fury surge through her.)

Wei Wuxian, meanwhile, curled in on himself and began rubbing his arms, shaking at the low temperature.

“It’s so cold,” he complained.

Past Jiang Fengmian, Jin Guangshan could see Wei Wuxian’s muscles and back easily. Both he and the Second Jade were impressive, even for cultivators.

A sudden chill swept over Lan Wangji, causing him to momentarily wrap his arms around himself. He forced them down again immediately after, but the sickening feeling remained.

”How did you get here?” Lan Wangji demanded.

“Zewu-jun told me to come!” Wei Wuxian sang, then, horrifyingly, began to move closer.

Lan Wangji’s heart skipped a beat.

“What are you doing?” he demanded.

“It seems warmer over there.”

“Lan Zhan, it’s not fair for you to heal yourself in the Cold Spring without telling me.”

Lan Wangji turned away.

Internally, he praised his simulation-self’s restraint. Externally, Lan Wangji couldn’t force himself to look away from Wei Wuxian’s figure next to his own.

~~He was so beautiful and his hair was so long and they were naked and next to each other and Wei Wuxian’s waist looked impossibly small and his eyes seemed to glow in the moonlight and he was getting closer and Lan Wangji could just turn around and capture him so easily and then he’d-~~

Why on earth did his brother think it would be a good idea to send Wei Wuxian here?

”I came here to cultivate, not to heal myself,” the simulation’s Lan Wangji answered, still turned away. With his back facing Wei Wuxian, the latter had a clear view of the dark, maroon bruises the punishment had left the Second Jade with. He grimaced slightly, guilt momentarily flashing across his expression.

The illogical, undisciplined part of Lan Wangji wanted to turn around and ~~kiss~~ remove the frown from his face.

Hesitantly, Wei Wuxian began rubbing the back of his neck, displaying a rare level of embarrassment.

“Honestly, Lan Zhan, you really impressed me back there. I can’t believe you punished yourself as well. Being as serious and stubborn as you were isn’t something I could do,” he laughed. “You’re so cool.”

Nie Huaisang sighed dreamily, momentarily contemplating to himself. If he could capture even a fraction of their combined beauty in a painting, what would he call it? The Temptation of Water Spirits? Beauties in Moonlight? Stubborn Idiots Who Don’t Seem to Realize How Much They Like Each Other?

Decisions, decisions.

”Hey, Lan-er-gongzi, let’s be friends,” he offered, tapping Lan Wangji’s shoulder twice. Lan Zhan just moved farther away in response.

“I don’t think that’s how you should behave around your friends,” Lan Xichen teased. When Lan Zhan saw that his glare wasn’t enough to make his brother stop, he resolutely walked towards the Jiang, Nie, and Jin heirs, standing halfway between his family and peers.

”Don’t give me the cold shoulder,” Wei Wuxian whined. “There are many benefits to being friends with me. I can take you to Yunmeng to pick lotuses and catch pheasants. It’ll be fun!”

Huaisang sighed again, imagining how much fun that would be. Seeing that, Jiang Cheng glanced at Nie Huaisang, the interested Jin Zixuan, and the still-expressionless but attentively watching Lan Wangji, and wondered if they would accept an offer from him.

But he was the heir to YunmengJiang. As his mother had always told him, he couldn’t just make empty promises like Wei Wuxian tended to.

~~He missed his brother.~~

”I won’t go,” Lan Wangji refused.

Adopting an exaggeratedly contemplative expression, Wei Wuxian began pacing back and forth behind Second Young Master Lan. Then, as if unable to come to a solution, turned to glare at Lan Wangji.

“Stop saying ‘no.’ Girls don’t like it,” he nudged Lan Wangji. “You’re going to be all alone forever.”

“...That’s fine,” Lan Wangji responded.

Ignoring the overly-pitying looks Jiang Yanli and Nie Huaisang sent him was more difficult than Wangji would have expected.

At the shockingly lonely statement, Wei Wuxian turned to Lan Wangji in disbelief.

“...Hey, is every member of your clan so vapid? If your father is as vapid as you, your mother must be so bored!”

Although the other clans didn't know the specifics, it was impossible to miss the way the Lans all flinched at Wei Wuxian's teasing. Nor how the Lan Clan's official statement regarding the Sect Leader had several holes which everyone was discouraged from filling in.

Another pause as Lan Wangji remained facing away, before he spoke, "I don't have a mother."

"That's impossible. You can't have been born out of thin air," Wei Wuxian began, then paused as the implications began to sink in.

It should have been a good thing. Xichen should be happy that, despite everything, Wei Wuxian had become someone Wangji felt comfortable talking to. Even pressed, Wangji would never have admitted anything about their family's history to someone he wasn't close to.

So why did Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan have to be here to listen to it?

The previous joyful air had been switched out for a much more subdued melancholy. Lan Wangji remained facing forward, completely blank, but Wei Wuxian shook his head and forced himself to smile.

"My parents died when I was four," he revealed.

Jiang Fengmian flinched.

"You might think I'd remember them, but I don't. I don't even remember what my parents looked like."

Several people frowned, and Jiang Cheng was shocked. His brother was always so obnoxiously happy. Even when Jiang Cheng's parents fought, he had never brought up his own.

And yet, here Lan Wangji was, getting closer to Wei Wuxian by leaps and bounds in only a few months. Looking at Lan Wangji's still-blank face, it was impossible to tell if the other realized how momentous this was.

(Xichen saw the shock on his brother, and knew he did.)

"But there's one thing I do remember," Wei Wuxian revealed. "I was riding on a donkey with my mom beside me, and my dad was right in front of us. I think my mom cracked a joke, making my father laugh."

A memory of Cangse Sanren that even Jiang Fengmian didn't have. Given how Wei Wuxian had learned better than to talk about his parents in the Jiang household, it was no surprise that he hadn't heard this story.

However, to get it by (unwillingly) spying on a private conversation left a bad taste in his mouth.

Madam Yu wanted to reignite their usual argument at the reminder of her enemy, Cangse Sanren, but, seeing the general mood in her children and husband, hesitated.

Perhaps she would let it go just this once. In Wei Changze's memory, if nothing else.

Shaking his head, Wei Wuxian smiled, nudging Lan Wanji with his shoulder, "Let me tell you, girls in Yunmeng are very pretty — different from the sort of pretty here in Gusu."

Several people had to do a double take at the fast transition. On the other hand, Jiang Yanli was unsurprised. She hadn't expected Wei Wuxian to mention the memory, but covering up his feelings with childish playfulness was an art he had long since mastered.

Doubling the teasing nature of his smile Wei Wuxian winked.

"You sure you won't come?"

His smirk clearly marked the offer as a deal with the devil.

Lan Wangji hesitated, then replaced his melancholy blankness with annoyance.

"I'm sure."

"...He doesn't seem to tolerate Wei Wuxian," Nie Mingjue observed skeptically, watching the youngest Lan's furious gaze. He turned to Xichen, and saw Jiang Fengmian glance over as well. After observing both his real and simulated little brother's expression carefully, Lan Xichen shook his head confidently.

"He's happier than I've seen him in a long time."

And indeed, it seemed that Wei Wuxian's double-attack of companionship and teasing had broken Lan Wangji out of his momentary depression, returning his expression to its usual one of annoyance. It was notable, however, that this annoyance was a far cry from the empty indifference he showed everyone else. Perhaps that wasn't a surprise; who else could cause this but a boy who, no matter how many times he was refused, thrown out, or punished, kept coming back?

The three heirs turned to glance at the boy next to them, who was, once again, glaring at his brother. Upon closer inspection, however, they noticed the red covering his ears. For the first time, they saw what Xichen saw.

"...You like him, don't you?" Nie Huaisang blurted out.

Lan Wangji spun to stare at them, wide-eyed, but couldn't deny it in the face of the red rapidly spreading to encompass his neck. It made Jiang Cheng, Jiang Yanli, and Jin Zixuan blink in awe, finally understanding.

On the other hand, Lan Qiren turned so pale he was almost translucent.

(Wen Ruohan hummed in interest.)

Instead of continuing the conversation, Lan Wangji soon stalked off to a deeper end of the pool. Seeing that, Wei Wuxian ~~adorably~~ pouted.

Hearing a splash behind him, Lan Wangji finally turned around.

He glared and growled, "What are you doing?"

On land, Wei Wuxian snatched his folded outer robe and threw it over his shoulder, "You always refuse me, and I don't like it. Enjoy your bath, Lan-er-gongzi."

With a flip of his hair, he began to walk off.

Lan Wangji couldn't decide if he found the action more infuriating or attractive.

"Give it back."

"Ha. And what if I don't?" he asked, giggling teasingly as he looked over his shoulder, giving him an appraising gaze. "Lan Zhan, you're in really good shape."

"Shameless," he hissed, to Lan Qiren's approval. Everyone else, however, saw the red on his and his virtual self's ears and recognized the emotion as embarrassment rather than annoyance.

(Xichen was, once again, regretting the simulation's focus on his brother. The people present could only read his strongest emotions, but that was still a huge step up from the nothing of before.)

While Wei Wuxian began laughing, Lan Wangji turned away.

"You-"

The shuffling and groaning of a group of gui made both boys freeze.

"Huh?" Wei Wuxian paused. "What's that sound? It… sounds like walking corpses."

Lan Qiren's eyes widened with horror, remembering the walking corpses his virtual self mentioned catching. If they had escaped....

Neither Wei Wuxian nor Lan Wanji had their swords.

Confirming Qiren's thoughts, Lan Wangji explained "My uncle brought back a few fierce corpses and asked me to lock them up in the Mingxiang Tang. How would they have come out?"

Wei Wuxian narrowed his eyes, "Neither of us has our weapons. This is gonna be hard."

"Of course it is!" Jiang Cheng hissed out, scoffing slightly at the understatement to hide his nervousness.

Wei Wuxian turned and began to run, only to be stopped by Lan Wagnji's "Wei Wuxian! Wait!"

"What?"

Lan Wangji stepped out of the pool, glaring "Give me back my clothes."

Beads of water slipped down his chest, and his soaked pants clung tightly to his body.

"Wow," Huaisang murmured, unintentionally repeating his reaction to Wei Wuxian drinking Emperor's Smile an hour ago. He got a glare from Lan Wangji, but, as the jade was used to it, no further fuss was raised.

In the next second, the group was brought along a path, as a Lan disciple led Jiang Cheng after the fierce corpses.

"I'm sorry. We weren't paying attention and let them escape," he explained. "Master Xichen and Master Qiren are not back yet. We must find Lan-er-gongzi as soon as possible."

Jiang Yanli couldn't help sighing slightly; could this get any worse? Noticing her displeasure, Jin Zixuan tried to show support by stepping closer to her. The grateful smile he got in response was blinding.

Hearing the groans of the corpses, the pair skidded to a halt, made terrified eye contact, and leapt off the path to dart through the trees in the direction of the sound.

On another path, Lan Wangji ran past flowering trees, still bereft of his sword. With his pure white ribbon and robes, it was easy for the watching cultivators to be drawn to his figure.

Which is why it took them an extra second to notice the corpse frantically crawling after him.

"No," Lan Xichen whispered, eyes widening in terror as he momentarily lost control of his expression. "No, no-"

"Xichen, he'll be fine," Nie Mingjue whispered, the only one close enough to hear Xichen's worry. "We saw him in the future, remember? Not a scar on him."

"But he doesn't have Bichen."

"He'll be fine," Nie Mingjue assured yet again.

(Huaisang was so proud of his big brother!)

Though, worryingly, Wei Wuxian wasn't there.

The creature moved closer and closer, matching Lan Zhan step for step on the stone path. Then, with a grand twist of his snow-white robes, Lan Wangji spun on his toes mid-step and grabbed a nearby branch.

With a swing, he sent a torrent of spiritual energy towards the beast, using the leaves as a conduct for the attack. The creature was thrown back.

Only for two more to take its place.

Normally, Jin Zixuan couldn't have cared less about what happened to the second jade. They had already seen he would survive, and it wasn't like they'd ever had a personal conversation.

But, somehow, after hours and hours of getting to see genuine emotional reactions from the boy, something in him decided it didn't want to see Lan Wangji get hurt.

Lan Wangji dodged the attacks that followed, remaining close enough to engage the pair in hand-to-hand combat. Despite remaining unharmed, it was clear the attacks were beginning to wear on him, as he moved significantly slower than usual.

Lan Qiren reluctantly admitted he wished cultivators could fight without needing their swords. Talismans were their best option, but most talismans weren't useful in unexpected situations because of the time it took to draw them out.

The only ones he had seen actually be effective were Wei Wuxian's-

(But that was demonic cultivation, and therefore not an option.)

"Lan-er-gongzi!" someone shouted. "Your Guqin!"

He looked up, and saw the Guqin Wangji sailing through the air. Without a second thought, Lan Wangji jumped and caught it mid-air. He spun to face the resentful creatures.

A pause.

Then a shockwave slammed into the creatures.

Madam Yu frowned slightly, witnessing the unquestionable power of an heir to a rival clan.

Now, Lan Wangji moved parallel to the corpses, falling to the ground as they were flung into the air. When they landed, their bodies splattered against the ground motionless, resentful energy purified.

Jiang Cheng ran forward and looked around nervously.

"Where is Wei Wuxian?" he demanded.

"We got separated."

A heavy frown formed on Jiang Fengmian's lips.

A ravenous smile appeared on Wen Ruohan's.

Lan Qiren clenched his fists, fearing the boy was seaking out a corpse to test his demonic theories on.

In a different part of the forest, the watchers were dragged through the trees at a staggering pace, barely giving them time to react to the change in scenery.

Huaisang fell over trying to dodge a tree that he just phased through anyways.

Following Wei Wuxian, two fierce corpses moved in sync, jumping over bushes and under branches just as deftly as he did. Just as he arrived at a clearing, another fierce corpse circled around before him.

"No!" Jiang Yanli yelled.

'Thank God,' Lan Qiren thought, seeing that the boy wasn't secretly experimenting.

Without slowing his pace at all, Wei Wuxian simply bounced off a nearby tree to jump above the fierce corpse, landing on its back and kicking it into the other two. Just like during his mock-battles with Lan Wangji, his environmental awareness and ingenuity were starkly on display.

Despite having been knocked down, the corpse rose again a moment later. With Suibian gone, Wei Wuxian had nothing he could use to purify the resentful energy powering the corpse's movement; he had no choice but to keep running.

At first, Wei Wuxian maintained high ground, using the trees as his escape route from the approaching monsters. However, seeing that it hadn't granted him any advantage, he swiftly jumped down to grab a branch as thick as his forearm off one of the trees and chucked it at the corpses.

Though their approaches differed based on their unique styles, Lan Wangji couldn't help but feel bubbly when he saw the similarities in their strategies.

(Excessive pride and irrelevant comments were forbidden. He added an additional repetition of the rules to his punishment.)

The corpse the branch hit was pinned to a tree, but the other two were left unhindered. By this point, Wei Wuxian was starting to breathe heavily, having sprinted through trees for almost 10 minutes.

For a brief moment, Jin Guangshan pondered how they would find Wei Wuxian once they got out. Would it be a political agreement the Jin and Wen clans could pressure the Jiang Clan into? Or would they be forced to send an army to chase him down? It was inefficient, but he was sure Wen Ruohan would agree taking time to cut off Wuxian's weapons, allies, and resources would be worth it so long as he was the prize.

One more shaky exhale, and Wei Wuxian's brows tightened in determination. Facing them fully, Wei Wuxian prepared himself for their attack.

When the corpse lunged, Wei Wuxian immediately ducked under its grasp and slammed his fist into its cheek. The corpse skidded several meters back, jaw dislocated by the punch.

...Perhaps Jin Guangshan would need to recalibrate his prediction, especially considering this was shortly after Wei Wuxian's punishment, a few minutes in the spring or not.

The next corpse proved to be more troublesome, forcing Wei Wuxian to dodge its attacks. Then, with an overextended lunge, it gave Wei Wuxian the opportunity to tug on its arm and pull its body close, delivering a bone-shattering back kick.

A normal human's ribs would have been crushed by the attack.

While nothing Wen Zhuliu couldn't do, Wen Ruohan found himself impressed. Despite not having access to their swords, both Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had done exemplary — especially given their age. In the current generation, the two were unrivaled.

(Looking at Madam Yu, it was obvious to him that she had noticed the exact same thing, and was far from pleased at the observation.)

Just then, the corpse Wei Wuxian had hit with the branch returned, and began hobbling towards the cultivator. Wei Wuxian swallowed nervously.

Half the gathered watchers swallowed in synch.

"This is stressful," Nie Huaisang murmured, moving toward his brother.

The trio of corpses remained as powerful as ever, approaching Wei Wuxian simultaneously. Now, the boy's labored breathing was even more noticeable, and his determined gaze was laced with wariness.

"They're still alive?"

Protocol or not, Jiang Cheng was going to give his brother the tightest hug ever once he got out of the simulation. At this point, Wei Wuxian was truly running out of options.

'Please,' he silently prayed. 'I don't care what you have to do, just get out of there alive.'

After a few more shaky steps, the corpses broke into a run. Just as they were about to make contact with him, the viewer's surroundings changed.

"What?!"

"Don't cut off now!

Jiang Cheng turned toward the noise.

“Over there!”

“Oh, thank god,” he whispered.

Instantly, the watchers returned to the fight, only to see Wei Wuxian flug back and slammed into a tree. He gasped and coughed, the air knocked out of him.

This incident was not the Wen Clan’s fault, but, surprising even herself, Wen Qing couldn’t help but clench her fists in worry. It made no sense — she didn’t even know Wei Wuxian — but she felt it regardless.

Perhaps, some small, insignificant part of her associated the childish yet kind and protective boy with her younger brother. Personality-wise they couldn’t be more different, but internally-

She silently berated herself for temporarily forgetting that Wei Wuxian would most likely grow up to kill her little brother.

Gulping once, Wei Wuxian turned to hide behind the tree he had been thrown into. In the second’s pause he had, the only sound in the clearing was his own breaths.

‘Without my sword, there’s no way for me to kill them all.’

Unconsciously, Lan Wangji stepped forward, worry gnawing at his heart.

Wei Wuxian was truly out of options.

He turned to his right, trying to peek past the tree at a corpse.

It attacked from behind.

Both Jiang Yanli and Nie Huaisang screamed slightly at jump scare, and Wen Chao looked faint.

Wei Wuxian narrowly dodged yet again, and immediately jumped up a tree to one of the higher branches. Below him, the corpses followed.

Unlike his graceful leap, the fierce zombie climbed the tree like an animal. It groaned and dug its nails into the bark, uncaring of how its climbing destroyed its fingertips. The other two wrapped their arms around the trunk, trying to shake Wei Wuxian off.

Right before the climbing corpse reached him, he jumped out of the way. Then, an enormous shadow covered the ground around him.

Wei Wuxian looked back.

The uprooted tree crashed down.

“Look out!” Jiang Yanli shouted, trying to push him out of the way. However, her hands passed through his body like air, and her shout remained unheard. They could do nothing to help.

The tree slammed into the ground, kicking up an enormous cloud of dust. When the air cleared, the watchers were allowed to see Wei Wuxian's body flat against the ground.

The Jiang siblings rushed to his side, and Nie Huaisang and Jin Zixuan follow shortly after. When he moved slightly, all four nearly collapsed in relief.

He was still alive.

(Of course he was. His death wouldn't happen for another seven years. Because that was so much better.)

While he managed to avoid serious damage, the fact remained that he had been forced to the ground. The three corpses began to approach.

It was undeniable: Wei Wuxian was out of options. In fact, he practically couldn't have fewer options! There wasn't a single thing he could do to escape them.

Jiang Cheng prayed his virtual self would come.

Shakily, Wei Wuxian stood up, pushing off the tree for additional support. Hearing several soft pats to his right, he turned to look.

"...A rabbit?"

The corpses attacked, perfectly willing to crush everything in their way. Wei Wuxian dodged, then turned and ran towards the rabbit.

He picked it up mid-stride.

"What is he doing?" Lan Qiren asked, expecting the worst. Was he going to attempt demonic cultivation by sacrificing a live animal? Throw it at the corpses as a distraction?

Xichen blinked once and answered, "I think he's trying to save it."

Many of the watchers, especially Huaisang and Yanli, loved rabbits and would go out of their way to help them whenever they could. That said, while getting chased by three fierce corpses wasn't really the time. Yes, the rabbit would probably be crushed during the chase, but he had been running for nearly twenty minutes; he wouldn't last much longer if he gave himself a handicap.

'Idiot,' Jiang Cheng thought. 'No one's going to thank you for that.'

Lan Wangji's frown deepened.

As expected, trying to remain alive with a liability was nearly impossible — especially given how tired he was. This time, when he dodged an attack, he got three parallel scratches on his arm as a reward.

Subconsciously, both Jiang Cheng and Lan Wangji moved closer to the running Wei Wuxian, wishing there was more they could do to help.

Stumbling slightly, Wei Wuxian momentarily sank to his knees, only for another corpse to attack his open back.

"No!"

He raised an arm up to block.

And the corpse stopped.

"...What?"

Torn between elation and confusion, the watchers were stunned silent by what they saw.

Slowly, Wei Wuxian blinked his eyes open, then harshly flinched back.

"It's…"

"He didn't even realize," Wen Ruohan observed quietly.

The corpse had frozen centimeters away from his hand, its groaning shifting to resemble cries of pain as the energy powering its body was sucked out.

The excess swirled around Wei Wuxian.

"...Resentment?" he realized.

The abyss had been the confirmation of a theory. When given no other options, he had tried anything he could, causing him to recall an insane idea he had thought up months ago.

This was an instinctual reaction developed by that experience. At this point, he was practically forced to act.

Because the Lan sect failed, he felt his only choice was demonic cultivation.

(Xichen was probably thinking too deeply. Just because that was true this time, didn't mean his eventual use of demonic cultivation was justifiable.)

A heartbeat rang in their ears.

Wei Wuxian's eyes widened as he gasped, trying to move his arm, but was trapped. Resentment crawled up the limb, closer and closer to his body and he tried pulling away but was stuck and his skin paled to deadly white and then the veins in his neck bulged out and he was trying to fight but couldn't fight and then-

"A-Xian!"

Their surroundings switched to a dark void, only illuminated by a beautiful golden orb.

“Isn't that his-”

“Core?” Jiang Cheng asked, eyes widening in horror. Wei Wuxian was one of the most talented young masters of their generation; unlike Huaisang, he had no reason to develop demonic cultivation. But if something happened to his core-

Wei Wuxian doubled over, clutching his chest in pain. Pained gasps escaped him, and he fell to a knee; the veins on his face began to bulge as well. Tremors wrecked his body, and his breaths became thinner and thinner. The resentment was spreading.

Silently, Lan Wangji walked closer to Wei Wuxian, and kneeled next to where the Jiang, Jin, and Nie heirs sat. They turned to him in surprise, but he only had eyes for the ethereal boy who never stopped trying to talk to him and was dying because of his sect-

”Wei Wuxian! Your sword!”

Suibian hit the ground shortly after, and Jiang Cheng flew down from the sky. He landed and dealt with one corpse easily, but Wei Wuxian remained motionless on the ground.

”What?!” Jiang Cheng demanded. “Are you too scared to hold your sword?”

The collection of heirs, still kneeling on the ground, frowned slightly.

Wen Ruohan scowled at the reminder that — regardless of whether he had Wei Wuxian — inventing demonic cultivation was far less easy than the opening narration made it out to be.

The trembling increased, but Wei Wuxian reached forward regardless, unconvincingly declaring “Non… nonsense.”

Jiang Cheng narrowed his eyes, then widened them. He knew what had happened.

The fierce corpse, which had been frozen, woke up, turned, and attacked. It was subsequently purified in the blinding blue light accompanying a guqin note. On a far away hill, Lan Wangji stood with his guqin in hand, watching them calmly.

The real counterpart of the Second Jade relaxed, incomparably relieved that his other-self had helped. In some ways, this had all happened because he got separated from Wei Wuxian. It would have been safer if he had kept the boy in his sight-

He shook his head, recognizing where those thoughts were leading. He would not become like his father; Wei Wuxian would not be trapped like his mother. He wouldn’t allow it.

”Lan-er-gongzi, the remaining three zombies are all here.”

“Bring them back,” he responded as Wei Wuxian forced himself to stand up. “Do not make any mistakes.”

Suibian shook in Wei Wuxian’s grip.

Jiang Cheng couldn't decide whether he was grateful Wei Wuxian's core was unharmed. On one hand, he didn't want his brother to be hurt. On the other, it meant Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation was probably only due to his curiosity.

Seeing the still-bulging veins on Wei Wuxian's hand, Lan Wangji frowned slightly and turned as if to approach, only for Jiang Cheng to step between him and Wei Wuxian.

“Thank you for your help. It is too late right now; I will have to thank you properly another time.”

After hesitating a moment, Lan Wangji turned away with a simple “No need.”

Lan Wangji told himself it was well within Jiang Cheng’s rights to privately confront Wei Wuxian about what he saw. The stinging in his heart remained despite the reminder.

Turning around, Jiang Cheng marched towards his head disciple, grabbed his collar, and slammed him into the tree.

“Wei Wuxian! Tell me, what the hell was that?! Did you really….”

Wei Wuxian’s lack of response was answer enough.

“You… are you out of your mind?! It’s the dark arts! If other people found out, you’d be expelled by every clan!”

Was there anyone Jiang Cheng would want to hide this from more than the gathered clan members? Slowly, cautiously, Huaisang turned his gaze on the fascinated Jin and Wen sect leaders.

“Wei Wuxian! Can you hear me?!”

Despite all the yelling, Wei Wuxian simply allowed himself to get repeatedly slammed into the tree, behaving no different from a corpse.

His skin certainly matched the color of one.

Jiang Cheng clenched his fists. He knew why his other self was acting that way — Wei Wuxian always made the most idiotic decisions — but also knew what sort of response his other self was anticipating. The shouting was meant to force Wei Wuxian to understand the gravity of the situation, teaching him that manipulating resentful energy wasn’t a joke he could mess around with.

Virtual-Jiang-Cheng thought Wei Wuxian wasn’t responding to his words because the other boy didn’t care.

But the real Jiang Cheng had seen what actually happened. It wasn’t a predetermined action or even a split-second decision; Wei Wuxian hadn’t even realized he’d done it until he was already feeling the effects. And, if he hadn’t taken action, he might have died.

Yanli glanced at both her real and simulated brother, understanding the former's anger and the latter's guilt. Yes, for this situation, the problem wasn't Wei Wuxian's inability to comprehend the severity of what had occurred, it was his lack of other options.

If Jiang Cheng wanted to make sure Wei Wuxian never did that again, he should be helping their adoptive brother find a way to carry talismans at all times or force him to always carry his sword. Now, especially after experiencing the effects of resentful energy, Wei Ying didn't need to be told of the danger.

~~So then why did he end up becoming the Grandmaster of Demonic Cultivation?~~

The two brothers stood across from each other, Jiang Cheng ferocious and heaving furious breaths, and Wei Wuxian calm and pliant — almost dead inside.

Then, Wei Wuxian whispered.

"I know."

Jiang Cheng looked up in surprise, shocked by the muted and severe way Wei Wuxian spoke. No jokes or surprise attacks followed, only uncertain acknowledgment of the crime.

"How could I dare to use such awful dark arts?" he whispered.

Lan Qiren wanted to be pleased that the severity of the incident had been understood, but, if the future scenes were correct, then obviously Wei Wuxian was just lying to get his brother to stop lecturing him.

"It won't happen again," Wei Wuxian promised.

Wen Chao snorted in disbelief. As much as they wanted to, no one could truly disagree with him.

(But it looked so genuine.)

Just then, his robes began to shift, and the bunny he had rescued popped its head out.

Several people flinched at that, having forgotten it. Nie Mingjue frowned, sternly reminding himself that the outcome and intentions didn't change the morality of what Wei Wuxian had done. The Nie might use something similar to resentful energy, but, with the exception of qi deviations, they could use it as an effective weapon. Wei Wuxian realized he couldn't control resentful energy; any further application of it couldn't be excused.

"The next day," Lan Sizhui recited.

Within the Cloud Recesses' library, Lan Wangji continued to practice caligraphy. The watchers, however, were situated just outside the study, given a perfect view to watch Wei Wuxian climb up a tree, grab onto a high branch, and hop forward to leave his entire body hanging onto the windowsill.

“Lan Zhan, I’m back!” he shouted. “How’ve you been without me copying scriptures next to you? Did you miss me?”

Did he miss perhaps the only person his age who saw him as a human rather than a piece of jade? If asked, Lan Wangji obviously would have said “no.”

Similarly, his fake-counterpart responded, “Leave.”

“If I don’t, will you throw me down?” Wei Wuxian asked, his eyes glistening like pearls. Combined with his ebony-black hair and blinding smile, the image was enough to leave women from all corners of the world speechless.

Huaisang had to admit that, while no one would have expected the Second Jade to be a cutsleeve, it wasn’t hard to see why Wei Wuxian was the one to turn him that way.

After hesitating a moment, Lan Wangji slammed his hands onto the table and stood up.

“Don’t be so scary!” Wei Wuxian requested. “I’m here to apologize by giving you a present!”

Without thinking twice, Lan Wangji responded “No.”

When Nie Mingjue raised an amused eyebrow with Lan Xichen, the latter couldn’t resist chuckling slightly. Both Lan Wangji and Lan Qiren looked betrayed by his reaction.

“You really don’t want them?”

Smirking, Wei Wuxian reached into his robes, then, as if performing a magic trick, dramatically revealed two adorable rabbits.

“Aw,” Jiang Yanli couldn’t help cooing, making Jin Zixuan mentally review which merchants he could contact to order a thousand bunnies.

Belatedly, Lan Wangji wondered how many presents this version of Lan Wangji would get. First the drawing, now the rabbits.

~~It wasn’t fair.~~

In addition to the white one he had saved, he had also found a nearly identical black one to complete the set. Still smiling, Wei Wuxian hopped over the ledge he had been hanging off to hold them normally.

“It’s really weird here,” he observed. “There aren’t any pheasants, but there’s a ton of wild rabbits. They aren’t even scared of people! So how about it? They’re fat, aren't they? You want them?”

Several seconds passed as Lan Wangji made perplexed eye contact with the bunnies. As Wei Wuxian held them by their ears, it seemed like he was holding two round, chubby snowballs. As he lifted then in front of Wangji’s eyes, they even kicked their legs around.

“Fine. If you don’t want them, I’ll give them to someone else.”

Xichen gleefully noted how his brother flinched slightly at the suggestion.

”...To whom?”

“Whoever’s best at roasting rabbits!”

“No killing in the Cloud Recesses!”

Huaisang flinched at Lan Qiren’s shout, momentarily getting flashbacks to his previous year at the Cloud Recesses. In some ways, though, it made him happy.

If he was reading the Lan’s expression correctly, Lan Qiren was still viewing Wei Wuxian as a student, rather than a demonic cultivator.

”Killing is forbidden in the Cloud Recesses,” Lan Wangji stated, unknowingly parroting the real Lan Qiren. “It is the third rule on the Wall of Rules.”

“Fine, then I’ll go down the mountain, kill them outside, and bring them back to roast.”

There were many things people had (and would) say about Wei Wuxian, but no one would try to argue that he wasn’t a creative problem solver.

”You don’t want them anyways. Mind your own business.”

A pause.

“...Give them to me.”

“Ha! You want them now?” Wei Wuxian observed cheerily. “Look at you! You’re always like this!”

Despite the mocking words, Wei Wuxian set the rabbits down and allowed them to hop over to where Lan Wangji sat. The white one moved slowly, eating a spare lettuce leaf calmly, while the black one imitated a cricket and bounced around the desk, leaving a trail of tiny footprints after it stepped on Lan Wangji’s ink-stone.

Abruptly, Lan Qiren’s eyes widened in horror as he remembered the last “future” scene before being brought to the present. In it, there were several scenic glimpses of the Cloud Recesses, one of which included a hill of bunnies which had not existed before then.

But his nephew was not in love with a demonic cultivator. Lan Qiren wouldn’t allow it.

~~He hadn’t managed to stop his brother, but he would stop his nephews.~~

Then, the two rabbits began rolling around and climbing on top of each other, wresting like children. Or, if you have a mind like Wei Wuxian’s-

“Hey, Lan Zhan, look! They’re piling up,” he stared down contemplatively, then brightened up. “Are they-”

“Both rabbits are male!” his voice rose in indignation.

“Nothing wrong with that so long as they’re faithful,” Madam Jin bit out. Thankfully, no one was looking at Lan Wangji to see his ears turning a cotton-candy pink.

“Male? How befuddling,” he picked them up. “They really are male!”

Now, Lan Wangji had turned away from Wei Wuxian, trying desperately to ignore his wildfire presence.

“Male then, male,” Wei Wuxian allowed. “Though, speaking of it, I’m the one that caught them, and even I didn’t notice their gender. Where exactly where you looking-”

“Get lost!” Lan Wangji turned as if to stand, but Wei Wuxian had already turned and sprinted out of the window, not giving the other boy a chance for retaliation. He cackled madly while in free-fall.

Before Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji had never lost his composure. Now, it seemed like he was shouting “Get lost!” every other day. Lan Xichen silently cheered at his brother for, despite his best efforts, getting his first friend.

Seeing that Wei Wuxian had already left, Lan Wangji simply brought a hand to rub against his temples, elbow on the table. If you looked closely, however, his face seemed to have gained a slight pink complexion.

“The next day, certain that Wei Wuxian was a basin full of jet-black die out to stain his favorite pupil, Lan Qiren told Wangji to stop attending classes with them.”

While most people huffed laughs of shock at the overreaction, Lan Wangji nodded to himself. After his first ~~thrilling~~ encounter with Wei Wuxian, he must have wanted to ~~get to know his equal and~~ punish the troublemaker. Now, seeing that his efforts proved futile, it was time to return to secluded meditation. His uncle had obviously made the correct call.

“...Well, that was exciting,” Huaisang declared.

“Bit of an understatement, don’t you think?” Jin Zixuan sarcastically responded, and Nie Mingjue rolled his eyes as his younger brother’s antics.

“Quite an understatement,” Lan Qiren confirmed grimly. “Considering how quickly he committed heretical cultivation again, I’m surprised Lotus Pier is still standing.”

“What else could he have done?” Jiang Cheng demanded, momentarily forgetting who he was speaking to. “He tried everything else first. He only used it when he had no other options!”

“There are always other options.”

“But he didn’t even realize he’d done it,” Huaisang pointed out. “It was just a reflex to avoid getting his arm chomped off, wasn’t it? I don’t really know, what do you think, Da-ge?”

As the Jiang siblings flinched at the reminder of what had almost happened, Nie Mingjue spoke, “Until now, he didn’t truly understand the danger of demonic cultivation or how it influenced the mind. Before it was excusable, but now that he does know there’s no excuse for him to continue considering it.”

“And yet,” Jin Guangshan hummed, “the far future events showed that he could use demonic cultivation to great effect without letting it influence his mind.”

Nie Mingjue shook his head, “The only way he could have figured out how to do that would be further experimentation, and, with what he now knows, that can’t be excused.”

It took all of Nie Huaisang’s self-control to not sigh; he loved his brother dearly, but Nie Mingjue tended to see in only black and white.

“We haven't seen what leads to that yet,” Lan Xichen pointed out, and his brother also nodded.

“Mn. ‘Do not make assumptions without evidence.’”

“Well of course you think that,” Wen Chao scoffed, either ignoring or (more likely) not seeing his father’s glare. “You fell in love with him.”

“He did not!” Lan Qiren growled, raising his voice higher than he had in years. It made even Lan Wangji flinch slightly, and when the youngest Lan felt his uncle’s glare, he clenched his fists and forcefully schooled his expression.

“...I did not,” he agreed. Although his tone was its usual perfect deadpan, no one except the in-denial Lan Qiren believed the statement.

Sighing slightly at the man’s unwillingness to judge objectively, Madam Jin said “If, hypothetically, there was anything between them, I don’t believe that would be a problem.”

As Lan Qiren glared at the Madam, Madam Yu muttered under her breath, “At least then the brat would have something to offer this family.”

“My Lady,” Jiang Fengmian frowned, but, as usual, didn’t know how to properly disapprove of the comment.

Jiang Yanli frowned. The Yunmeng Jiang sect had hundreds of members, many of whom were raised above their previous station by the chance to become cultivators. None of them were treated like Wei Wuxian — like family — but she disliked that, every once in a while, her parents made the love the Jiangs gave Wei Wuxian sound conditional.

Wanting to get the topic away from his nephew’s nonexistent emotions as soon as possible, Lan Qiren coughed and added “Regardless, as Sect Leader Nie said, nothing will excuse demonic cultivation now.”

“You don’t think he was justified here?”

“Of course not-”

“I admit his intentions, at least, were righteous,” Nie Mingjue allowed. “We’ll see if that stays true from here on out. If his curiosity brings him back to demonic cultivation, allowing it to corrupt his mind and leading him to kill Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan, then it’s a very different story.”

Both families flinched at the reminder of the coming deaths and who was responsible for them.

Lan Qiren paused, then, “It is especially inexcusable for someone with so much talent in righteous cultivation to use — to create — the demonic path. However, I can admit he was once righteous.”

Madam Yu rolled her eyes, but both Jiang Fengmian and Yanli smiled at the admission.

“Then, as we decided in the beginning, our goal will be to use this information to make sure he stays that way, correct?” Lan Xichen asked with a diplomatic smile. From every Sect except the Wen, he got a nod of agreement.

(Internally, Wen Qing wanted to agree. Externally, she knew the importance of not attracting attention.)

Leaning toward his sister, Jiang Cheng frowned and whispered to her, “Is Wei Wuxian improving or ruining the sect’s reputation?”

Reassuringly, his sister just laughed, “A-Cheng, the ancestors of the Jiang Clan were rogue cultivators, advocating frank actions and unrestrained minds. That’s exactly A-Xian’s personality. You don’t need to worry too much. They’re seeing his righteousness; right now, all we should worry about is how to prevent A-Xian from… becoming the Yiling Patriarch we saw at the beginning.”

The terrifyingly indifferent expression he had while taking on an enormous battalion of Wens was not their A-Xian. The single man who the army of Wens was scared of was not the person they grew up with. It was their job to keep him from happening.

Besides, if anything, seeing Wei Wuxian’s righteousness and fighting talent was increasing the prestige of the sect, rather than harming it.

“Regardless, it’s nice to see Wangji becoming so close with someone his age,” Xichen commented, trying to return the conversation to more positive observations.

Only for Jin Guangshan to again pipe up, “And yet Wei Wuxian felt like he had to run away from the adult version of Lan Wangji.”

Like a bucket of ice water had been poured on the crowd, a frigid silence reigned. Watching from the side, Wen Ruohan smirked; learning the cause of such a massive change in relationship would be very telling of the kind of people both Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were.

“At least… we don’t think Lan Wangji was going to hurt A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli tried, to the enthusiastic nods of her brother and fiance. Seeing Nie Huaisang’s obvious relief at the words, Mingjue momentarily had to glance away. No matter what he did later, Wei Wuxian was once righteous.

(So what could have changed that?)

After a full day of teaching, investigation, and planning, there was something truly special about getting some time to relax. With the medical information on the coma-ridden leaders Wei Wuxian had sent over, the other clans had finally stopped panicking and started grouping together. Between the overjoyed Lan elders and the disheartened Jin heirs, all succession conflicts stopped at the announcement that the leaders would be back by the end of the month. No one knew what was happening in the Wen sect, but it was likely they were also reassured by the news.

Wei Wuxian was just beginning to wind down for the day, when A-Yue’s scream shocked him awake. Immediately, he burst out of ~~his~~ Uncle Jiang’s office and ran back to the medical hall.

Inside, A-Yue and A-Lu were knocked back onto the ground, staring in awe at the glowing red characters carved into the air. The resentful energy sparked like Zidian’s lightning.

A return message. They had gotten through.

A grin broke out on Wei Wuxian’s face. He turned and waved off the other concerned disciples who had gathered at the scream, sending them back to their work.

“All under control, nothing to see here!”

Even as their head disciple, the other Jiang cultivators were hesitant to listen to him. Outside of training and pranks, the things he did would usually spark a conflict between Madam Yu and Uncle Jiang, and they wanted to be careful not to pick a side.

Somehow, after four and a half days under his leadership, he’d managed to fool them into respecting him. He hoped they wouldn’t be too disappointed when they found out he actually had no idea what he’s doing.

~~Why isn’t Uncle Jiang waking up yet is he doing something wrong he needs help and Jiang Cheng and Madam Yu and Shi-jie and what if he somehow made it worse and he doesn’t know what to do-~~

If anyone could see past his confident smile, they didn’t show it. As all the unrelated disciples obediently shuffled out, Wei Wuxian internally breathed a sigh of relief.

“A-Yue, can you explain what happened?”

“It wasn’t my fault!” A-Lu rushed to declare, earning himself a furious glare from the sister he interrupted.

Wei Wuxian held up his hands in a gesture of surrender, “I’m not blaming anyone, just trying to figure out what happened. Okay?”

“It wasn’t my fault either,” A-Yue insisted.

“That’s fine, can you tell me what happened?”

Both kids still looked hesitant, reminding Wei Wuxian yet again that he couldn’t replicate Uncle Jiang’s calm, uncritical aura whatsoever. Only one option left then.

With a dramatic flip of his hair, Wei Wuxian knelt down before them and lowered his head, declaring, “Young maiden, young sir, have no fear! I swear by my honor as the Jiang Sect’s substitute sect leader that I and the entirety of the Jiang sect wholeheartedly believe your innocence in this endeavor!”

A-Yue glared, trying to cover up her smile, “That isn’t a real position!”

“What? But of course it is!” he turned to A-Lu. “You agree with me, don’t you?”

A-Lu nodded frantically, a grin splitting across his face.

“He doesn’t actually agree!”

“Yes I do!”

“Well of course he’s telling the truth. I already told you I have the upmost faith in your innocence!”

“We can’t both be telling the truth.”

“Sure you can. And I’ll definitely believe the person who explains to me what happened.”

Both rushed to speak, “We were just standing here-”

“And then there was a red light starting to glow-”

“Above the talisman we recorded that message on-”

“And then we ran to get you-”

“But it followed us-”

“And we couldn’t get away-”

“And then I fell-”

“And then you showed up.”

Wei Wuxian paused for a moment, trying to interpret the sloppily thrown-together story, before nodding his head and drawing out an, “Okaaay. Are Uncle Jiang and Jiang Cheng and everyone else okay?”

The two nodded.

Cautiously, Wei Wuxian turned to face the characters again, observing them closely. Just like he suspected, it seemed to be a return message.

~~Unless he’s wrong but he’s usually right but he’s fifteen and not ready and what if it’s a trap but he can’t wake up the Jiangs on his own-~~

Taking a deep breath, Wei Wuxian reached a hand out and touched the characters 接受, for “accept,” sending it the slightest bit of spiritual energy to activate it like a talisman.

The instant he made contact with it, the world around him rushed away and was replaced by a barren, white field. He looked around, but A-Lu and A-Yue were nowhere to be found.

“Hello,” came from behind him.

Wei Wuxian spun around and jumped back, hand resting on Suibian, ready to draw at a moment’s notice. Appearing before him was a man slightly shorter than himself, with similarly silver eyes but a Jin nose and Lan-styled robes (which, oddly enough, were the same black-and-red color scheme as his own).

“Who are y-”

“Unfortunately, I won’t be able to respond to you since this is all pre-recorded, but I’ll do my best!” the man grinned and winked in a way that actually reminded Wei Wuxian of himself. “My name is Mo Xuanyu. I invented the orb which caused your sect leaders to fall unconscious, but, as you guessed, that isn’t the original purpose. It’s supposed to send information, and was used without my permission to contact them. Rest assured, the culprits were punished appropriately when we received your message.”

So at least Wei Wuxian had done one thing right.

”I don’t know the details of what the sect leaders are being shown, but you don’t need to worry about it. It’s probably just lies or a fantastical story that won’t hurt them in any way; none of it’s true.”

That made sense. Wei Wuxian would be sure to tell the sect leaders that once they escaped.

”No need to worry though, I can get them out. I’ve developed a way for them to leave even before the simulation ends. I’ll make the instructions on how to design it as detailed as possible, so please pay attention. It’s fine if you can’t remember all of it, just contact Wei Wuxian and tell him as much as you can-”

Wei Wuxian blinked. Did he just get volunteered for something?

”-I’m sure, so long as he receives my instructions, he’ll be able to create the escape-array.”

Now, Wei Wuxian was actually getting a little annoyed. While he appreciated the help and the implied compliment, he wasn’t sure why this “Mo Xuanyu” was specifying him specifically. How could someone he had never met before know so much about him?

Were they being watched?

A shiver ran down his spine.

Chapter End Notes

It’s super hard to combine three different interpretations! I wanted to have the Drama's party, but the donghua never shows it and the drama only has three people, while the novel says there were dozens. Or when I want to include lines from Jiang Yanli, who isn’t in Gusu in any other other versions. By the way, in regards to the easy acceptance of LWJ’s crush (minus Qiren), at this point only WRH views WWX as a "little Yiling Patriarch," and https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/abs/10.1300/J236v07n01_08?journalCode=wzgp20 explains that in Ancient China homosexuality was (while not necessarily respected) tolerated.

Thank God for Wen Chao (Wait, What?)

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Waking up to the sound of crying children was rarely a good sign.

Granted, it wasn't exactly unusual for Wei Wuxian (a head disciple who hundreds of children felt comfortable coming to after nightmares tended to experience it a lot), but it still wasn't pleasant.

"A-Yue," he mumbled. "What's wrong?"

"I-I'm sorry!" she cried, sniffling heavily and rubbing her eyes. To her right, A-Lu was bawling and mumbling incoherently.

The genuine terror in their eyes shocked Wei Wuxian awake.

"Hey, what's wrong?" he asked, forcing himself to sit up.

"Y-you touched the red, and-and you just fell and you wouldn't wake up and you were just like Sect Leader Jiang and Madam Yu and we-we thought you were gone and we-"

"Hey, shhhh," Wei Wuxian whispered, pulling both preteens close and squeezing tight. In hindsight, perhaps he should have guessed his body would react the same way the sect leaders' had.

Jiang Cheng always said he needed to take more time to think things through.

(If "Mo Xuanyu" was telling the truth, Jiang Cheng would tell him that again in just a few more hours. He and Madam Yu would probably lecture him for days on end about his carelessness while Shijie gave him a heart-stoppingly disappointed look and Uncle Jiang tried to figure out whether he was amused or disapproving.

If Mo Xuanyu's words were a lie-)

On the bright side, it seemed like he hadn't been unconscious long enough for other people to notice; if they had, Wei Ying had a feeling the Jiang sect would've become almost as chaotic as the Jin sect.

(On that note, maybe he should send more supplies over. They still hadn't really recovered from the arson a third-cousin did on a second-cousin's room.)

Wei Wuxian looked down and wiped the two sets of tears away, smiling reassuringly.

"I'm fine, see? I was just getting some more information on how to get the sect leaders out. It's all going to be okay now, I've got this," he explained confidently.

A-Yue, still sniffling, gave him a highly skeptical look, but didn't voice her concerns. Wei Wuxian couldn't shake the feeling that he was being patronized by a child.

Hiding a mounting headache, Wei Wuxian directed the two kids off to get supplies for him. After a few more sniffles, he finally got a "yes, Da-shixiong" and was left alone.

He understood the basics of what Mo Xuanyu had told him, but he didn't feel comfortable testing the stranger's invention on any of the Jiangs.

Maybe he could test it on the peacock.

(No, no, if anything happened to him, Shijie would be sad. Shoot.)

He sighed, realizing his only choice was to try to replicate the coma's cause in a controlled environment, and test it on that. It would be significantly harder and more time consuming, but every person under the device's effects was a clan member of the Great Sects.

~~They would never allow the son of a servant to touch them.~~

Well, so long as he left more duties to his third shidi, he should be able to work on it around 19 hours a day, provided he avoided sleeping for a while. It wasn't like he had ever expected help from the other sects.

Frustration momentarily struck Wei Wuxian, surging through him at the reminder of how the clans weren't helping but whined and complained and expected him to wake everyone up and he had the Jiang sect but no other connections to help and why wasn't Uncle Jiang or Shijie here and Jiang Cheng was heir and even Madam Yu had the respect of the other sects-

He took a deep breath.

The facts were that the other clans didn't trust him and he didn't have the Jiangs; no amount of complaining would change that. Slapping his face twice to wake himself up, Wei Wuxian forced himself to smile got to work reading through a trade deal for the sect's rice supply as he waited for A-Lu and A-Yue to return.

If nothing else, he could still take consolation in the fact that Yunmeng Jiang was still doing the best among the great sects. Yunmeng's citizens had minimal complaints, night hunts were still occurring, and its wealth had even increased because of how long it took the other sects to contact the merchants again. Once the sect leaders were awake again, he was going to lord it over the other sects — cough, the peacock, cough — until the end of time. Bragging rights were always the best reason to do something.

Shijie and Jiang Cheng would disagree with that statement, but they could complain all they wanted ~~if~~ when they got out.

First, the sounds of gossiping disciples appeared. Then, their bone-white surroundings switched to the Cloud Recesses' walkways as Wei Wuxian, Jiang Cheng, and Nie Huaisang passed by.

Closing his eyes, Nie Huaisang slipped into silent prayer that the simulation wouldn't show any more of his precious spring books. His Da-ge already knew about some of them, but the more explicit ones had been kept hidden for years; he would not appreciate the simulation ruining that!

"...The cold spring was truly a work of wonder," Wei Wuxian explained whimsically, as Nie Huaisang excitedly took in the information.

"And then you ran into those two fierce corpses," Jiang Cheng reminded crossly. "Pay more attention next time!"

"That must have been terrifying!" Huaisang whimpered.

'It was,' several people mentally confirmed for Huaisang's virtual self. Although his face had remained impassive, Lan Wangji was certain his heart-rate had quadrupled while watching Wei Wuxian's escape.

"Scary?" Wei Wuxian repeated, exaggeratedly considering. "I suppose one part was a little scary…. Do you want to know?"

"Yes, yes."

Wei Wuxian cleared his throat, "It was a dark night, shrieking with howling wind. Then, suddenly, a hand stretched out of the cold spring, and dragged us into the pool!"

Remembering the fully-clothed state he had found both his brother and the second jade in, Jiang Cheng gave a heavy roll of his eyes.

Jiang Fengmian felt himself smiling at the interactions between Jiang Cheng and his best friend's son.

"Guess what it was," Wei Wuxian ordered.

"Wh-what?" he asked, as Wei Wuxian leaned in close.

"A Shé-Yao!" Wei Wuxian shouted, all but jumping onto a shrieking Nie Huaisang as Jiang Cheng caved in and brought his hand up for a facepalm.

Watching the playful teasing, Nie Mingjue was once again displeased at Wei Wuxian's incoming fall from grace. There weren't many people in the Nie sect his brother was close to, made worse by his reluctance to train.

That confirmed it; he would do anything he could to keep Wei Wuxian from resorting to demonic cultivation.

"Do you want to know what he looked like?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"Ah, d-don't tell me!" Huaisang rushed to respond, nervously stepping away from his friend. "I'm scared of snakes. Just keep the experience to yourself."

He turned to leave and took several steps, before turning slightly to walk backwards while facing the pair.

“Oh, and don’t forget the lanterns tonight!”

“Just go, just go,” Wei Wuxian instructed, waving Nie Huaisang off.

Neither Jin Zixuan nor Jiang Cheng could resist perking up slightly at the final comment. Despite Yanli’s slight giggles, their enthusiasm at the chance to see the lanterns remained potent.

An empty field took over, and small clusters of guest disciples sat around in groups.

“No, the wind doesn’t go that way. Just do as I told you,” the disciples murmured among themselves.

“Look at this. It’s not stable.”

“Do it like this. Wrap this up first.”

“You’re such a slow learner.”

“Give me that.”

“Ah, you’re so smart.”

It was slightly off-putting to Nie Mingjue to be surrounded by so many softly muttering disciples. At Qinghe Nie, they would first have never tried delicate craftsmanship, but, moreover, would spend their construction time shouting at each other from across the city.

Soft, delicate mumbles were usually a hint that Huaisang had conned them all into helping him skip training; never a good sign.

Somehow, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had ended up working on their lanterns next to each other. After a few seconds of hesitation, Wei Wuxian spoke:

“Lan Zhan, shall we set a lantern together to make a wish? We’ve risked our lives together several times, haven’t we?”

“...I’m used to being alone.”

Huaisang gave a dramatic gasp of sympathy and immediately moved to stand next to Lan Wangji. The other boy glared, but, unlike what Huaisang had been expecting, didn’t move away.

He may not be Wei Wuxian, but it seemed the shared experience was wearing even the Second Jade’s walls down. Huaisang gave a mental cheer.

“You can change such habits at any time. Besides, my lantern was especially made for you. Look.”

On it, a beautifully painted rabbit sat upright.

Lan Wangji stared in shock for a moment, before his mouth crept up into a minuscule — but undeniable — smile.

As Huaisang and Yanli mimicked him in admiring Wei Wuxian's gorgeous art, Lan Xichen found himself incomparably grateful. Wangji had finally found someone who would keep being friends with him no matter how unsocial his brother seemed.

Similarly, Wen Qing was suddenly realizing that Wen Ning would have loved to join in. It was unfortunate that the Wens no longer took part in the disciple exchange.

'No, no. Don't forget, Wei Wuxian kills A-Ning to turn him into the Ghost General. You must remain vigilant.'

Noticing the small smile, Wei Wuxian began to laugh joyfully, teasing "You smiled!"

Lan Wangji frowned at the verbal observation, then reached for Bichen.

"Ah, ah, I'm sorry!" Wei Wuxian blurted out, scrambling back and laughing.

Once again, both Lan Wangjis' faces had returned to being perfectly blank, but the gathered crowd were steadily breaking through. Even if they weren't able to read him, they would never again mistake his blankness for anger or apathy.

Wei Wuxian's laughter lit up the evening up as the first lanterns were released. Before the setting sun, all the gathered disciples sent the lights into the air, the beautifully-painted bunny lantern among them.

Watching them soar higher and higher, Lan Wangji did not notice Wei Wuxian's considering gaze falling on him and returning back to the lantern.

If the gathered watchers hadn't realized Lan Wangji's true feelings thanks to the simulated Xichen's words, they would have thought Lan Wangji didn't care.

In some ways, that made Wei Wuxian's continued attempts at friendship all the more impressive.

Several of the guest disciples excitedly pointed into the air at their floating lanterns, but the majority quickly clasped their hands together, closing their eyes in silent prayer.

"Please let me graduate successfully so I don't have to come back here again," Nie Huaisang whispered.

He got a highly unimpressed look from both his brother and Lan Qiren at that. Instead of pointlessly reminding them that he hadn't made the wish, Huaisang shuffled closer to Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng for moral support.

"Please allow my family to live happily," someone else murmured.

Madam Yu nodded once, pleased at the Jiang disciple's filial piety.

"I, Wei Wuxian, wish to always stand with justice, and live with no regrets."

Lan Wangji blinked once, then turned to him in surprise.

The more he saw, the harder it was for Lan Wangji to come up with reasons to avoid thinking about the kind, clever, beautiful person before him.

On the other hand, Yanli giggled slightly at the wish, feeling a strange sense of melancholy. Really, it had only been a few hours since she last saw Wei Wuxian, but everything she had learned made it feel like it had been years.

Seeing her slightly-forced smile, Jin Zixuan turned to her bowed once, complimenting "Your brother — Wei Wuxian, I mean — is… truly righteous. It's pretty rare to find someone like him."

Swallowing back bitterness, Jiang Cheng nodded and responded with an only partly-sour "Of course."

"Thank you Young Master Jin. I think he'll be a… good uncle for Jin Ling," she finished hesitantly. Instead of the disgust she had somewhat feared, Jin Zixuan blushed deeply and nodded in clear agreement.

As Madam Jin smiled proudly at her son, Lan Qiren, Wen Ruohan, Jiang Fengmian, Jin Guangshan, and Wen Qing contemplated Wei Wuxian's promise. If it was truly as genuine as it seemed — and it most likely was, given Wei Wuxian's actions around the abyss and escaped fierce corpses — then what could have happened to turn him into a monster capable of killing 5,000 cultivators in a single night?

Lan Wangji continued to silently watch Wei Wuxian, as the world around the watchers twisted into a mess of colors, refocusing on a classroom the next day.

Lan Qiren's voice read aloud, "The founder of the Lan Clan grew up in a temple as a devoted Buddhist. He was clever, gifted, dedicated, and extraordinary. His sermons attracted people from far and wide. Many admired his wisdom and piety. At the age of twenty, he resumed secular life, changed his surname to "Lan," and becoming a musician, writing and playing music."

A soft, dreamy sigh escaped Huaisang at the idealistic, art-filled life being described. He was sure the Lans would take offense to the comparison, but it was a nice daydream nonetheless.

"He transversed the world cultivating," Lan Qiren continued, staring at the pictures carved onto the wood before him. "When he arrived in Gusu, he met 'The One' and got married. Together, they established the Lan Clan. After his wife died, he returned to the temple and died there. These four pictures depict the life of Lan An, the founder of the Lan Clan."

"Hoh?" Wei Wuxian muttered leaning towards Jiang Cheng.

“They show him as a monk, a musician, a husband, and at the end….”

Apparently, the students or spirits these memories were based off were no longer interested in Lan Qiren’s lecture, as his voice was drowned out to allow the watchers to focus on Wei Wuxian.

Wei Ying grinned, “So, Lan Zhan’s ancestor was a monk? No wonder they have so many rules here. Though, come to think of it, he ventured into the mortal world to meet one person, and, as she went, he went as well, leaving nothing behind on this earth. Why would a person like him produce such unromantic descendants?”

Lan Wangji’s heart erupted into a panicked flutter, torn between elation at Wei Wuxian’s focus on him and dejection at the “unromantic” adjective. Then as Lan Qiren’s frown deepened, shame was added in too. It would not be appropriate for him to forget the dangers of the Lan Clan’s love.

“Lan An looks like an angel from heaven,” one disciple observed. “I wonder how exceptional ‘The One’ really was.”

His eyes drawn over by the voice, Wei Wuxian nearly did a double-take when he saw Jin Zixuan standing between him and the one who had spoken.

Flushing slightly, Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli made eye contact, then quickly looked away from each other.

“Do you guys ever pay attention?” Nie Mingjue grumbled at Huaisang, who promptly raised his hands in surrender despite the virtual-him not having spoken. Lan Qiren grumbled, privately annoyed by the undeniably true observation but unable to lecture when it hadn’t technically happened.

“We’re not short of beautiful or refined ladies now, are we?” someone reminded. “Zixuan-xiong, who do you think looks the best?”

An uneasy chill swept over Jin Zixuan. Now, after getting to see Jiang Yanli’s bravery and kindness first hand, he would never try to call her “boring.”

But that-him didn’t know her.

Instead of answering, Jin Zixuan made a careless noise of indifference and walked away.

Despite having expected it slightly, Jiang Yanli felt her smile falter seeing the act. In addition, it made Jiang Fengmian frown deeply.

From what he had seen so far, Jin Zixuan took more after his mother than his father. That said, if he got any indication that Jin Zixuan would take after Jin Guangshan, he would do everything in his power to end the engagement. Being forced into a marriage wouldn’t require him to take after his father, but it certainly brought him closer to the Jin’s marriage (and his own) than Jiang Fengmian preferred.

Arranged marriages almost always led to either miscommunication or mistreatment. He would not allow that to happen to his daughter.

One of the boys he had been talking to scoffed slightly.

“Do you even need to ask? He’s engaged. He would have to pick his fiancée.”

Jin Zixuan’s lips momentarily dipped into displeasure.

“He is?” the other boy asked. “What sect is she from? She must be extremely talented.”

Jiang Yanli flinched slightly, knowing full well what her reputation was.

“Drop it,” Jin Zixuan ordered.

“What do you mean, ‘drop it?’” a voice demanded. Jin Zixuan turned toward the speaker with a disdainful glare, and everyone else looked over in surprise.

Usually, Wei Wuxian had an unchangeable grin on his face. He had never become angry, even when he was scolded or punished. And yet, there was an obvious look of hostility on his face. In addition, Jiang Cheng, who usually scolded him for his actions, remained darkly silent.

Yanli’s eyes glistened, her face switching between despair, surprise, gratitude, and fear, then landing on determination-

“A-Xian, don’t,” she warned pointlessly, her lips pursed into a false smile as she clasped her hands tightly enough to bruise. It wasn’t like she hadn’t known what Zixuan thought, but it still hurt to hear.

Glaring, Jin Zixuan continued “Is the phrase ‘drop it’ too difficult to understand?”

“The phrase itself isn’t hard to understand. Rather, it’s hard to understand how on Earth you’re unsatisfied with your engagement to my Shijie.”

Wei Wuxian crossed his arms and smiled cockily, yet maintained a decidedly dangerous aura.

“Stop making trouble,” Madam Yu whispered, but, for the first time, couldn’t draw up any genuine anger. He really should know better than to offend Zixuan.

~~But were his reasons really wrong?~~

“Huh?” one Jin boy turned to whisper to the other, not noticing Jin Zixuan’s hand curl into a fist. “So it’s that plain Jiang Yanli.”

“I suppose she’s a bit unsuitable.”

“No wonder Jin Zixuan-”

Jiang Cheng moved forward as if to attack, but Wei Wuxian held him back.

Then, finally-

“Wouldn’t it be better to ask what about her I could be satisfied with?!” Jin Zixuan fired back.

Yanli bit her tongue so hard she tasted copper in her mouth.

Wei Wuxian calmly walked forward so that he was standing eye-to-eye with Jin Zixuan, fists clenched, and spoke:

“Think you’re pretty satisfying, don’t you? Where did you get the guts to be so choosy?”

“If she’s unsatisfied, tell her to get rid of the engagement!”

“You-”

“What? Am I wrong? If you like her so much, why don’t you talk to her father? If you want her, I don’t think he’d object. Doesn’t he treat you better than his own child or something-”

Before he had even finished his sentence, Wei Wuxian rushed over and punched him to the floor.

He immediately struck back.

“Hey-”

“They’re fighting!”

The scene cut away, but the watchers were silent.

On one side of the room, the Nie brothers backed away awkwardly, feeling as if they had gotten a glimpse into something they weren’t supposed to have seen. Neither Zixuan’s feeling on the engagement nor Jiang Fengmian’s relationship with his ward were secrets, but it still felt inappropriate to see it displayed so openly.

Wen Ruohan and his sons varied between an amused smirk and full blown cackles, finding the pathetic situation a sect heir was stuck in hilarious.

The Lans were infuriated both by the fighting taking place, and the unrighteous words Jin Zixuan had used to provoke Wei Wuxian’s attack. While Lan Xichen and Lan Wangji knew the rule forbidding fighting was an important one, they weren’t surprised Wei Wuxian broke it given the situation.

The Jiangs were standing defensively around Yanli as she tried desperately to swallow her cries. In the dimension they were in, there were no walls to hide behind or rooms to leave to. She had no where she could flee to.

And Jin Zixuan?

He had never hated himself more.

The simulation seemed to have known they would need time to process, as it simply spread out to different parts of the Cloud Recesses, not continuing the memories.

As the pause progressed, it rapidly became apparent that they weren't about to be distracted by anything else. That was good — great, even. It gave Jin Zixuan time to correct the misunderstanding.

He just had to say he didn't mean it-

But he had. But he-

He didn't now. Now, he liked-

'The Jin heir must do everything he does with pride.'

He couldn't say that but he couldn't stay silent but she was crying but he couldn't help but it was his fault but his dad seemed pleased but Jin Guangshan hadn't liked the engagement anyways but he was sect leader but Mom was angry but the Chief Cultivator wasn't but his new friends were and he cared about them but all he could see was the way Jiang Yanli shook silently, trembling in her seat.

That kind, beautiful, cheerful, happy girl was choking back tears because of him.

"I-" he tried. "I don't-"

Jiang Cheng turned a furious glare his way, probably planning out what he'd do once they were able to touch each other again.

He had to apologize.

But he was the Jin heir. Showing weakness would allow the vipers to trap-

But these were his friends-

Not all of them-

He had to-

Couldn't-

Yanli was crying-

He-

A high pitched, mocking chuckle rang out over the crowd.

“Well,” Wen Chao purred. “That’s only to be expected, I suppose. Trying to pair the heir of the Jin sect with her was bound to end-”

“Such comments are forbidden,” Lan Wangji spoke sharply, and Jiang Cheng turned toward him in surprise. Wen Chao opened his mouth to speak again, but was interrupted.

“Please mind your words,” Jiang Fengmian requested. Madam Yu rubbed her hand, momentarily forgetting Zidian wouldn’t work. They had to be careful; Wen Chao was of the Wen Clan, and Wen Ruohan was watching them all. While Wen Ruohan might be willing to treat arguments among the children as isolated incidents, Jiang Fengmian’s involvement could be an excuse to make it a political issue.

Unaware of the possible implications but determined to impress his father, Wen Chao continued “Oh, so even her own parents can’t deny it. We all know someone like her isn’t suitable for a great sect-”

“Do we?” Huaisang sang with false ignorance. “Given who you spend your time with, I’m not sure I trust your judgement.”

“Oh, don’t pretend.”

“Be silent!”

“We all know it was doomed to fail, right?” Wen Chao asked, interrupting Madam Yu. “The engagement was set up because Jiang Fengmian’s too weak to resist the wife who trapped him in marriage. But I supposed it all worked out. Otherwise, that weak girl couldn’t have gotten any husband. We’ve all hear the rumors about her. Can’t cultivate and spends all her time in the kitchen like a common slave. Even the son of a servant like Wei Wuxian would be far too good a fate for a useless, ugly bitc-”

“Shut up!”

It took Zixuan several seconds to realize he was the one who had spoken.

“What?” Wen Chao demanded. “You’re the one who said-”

“You’re wrong! I was wrong!” he disagreed, and, for the first time, all thoughts of his reputation and position were blinded by the memory of Jiang Yanli crying and-

“What-”

“That-me doesn’t know her. He’s-I’m just angry about the engagement and don’t know and it’s… she’s wonderful and kind and mature and happy and perfect and lovely and-a-and she deserves everything and I was blind and stupid and an idiot and I don’t deserve her but I’m not going to stand here and let a disgusting piece of trash like you talk that way about the most amazing woman I’ve ever met!”

Jin Zixuan stood, panting breathlessly after his speech, as what he just said slowly began to sink in. His audience was then greeted to the sight of his face turning pink, then red, then purple, then blue.

“Are…” Yanli began, wiping her tears as her smile began to turn genuine again. “Are you alright, Jin-gongzi?”

All the oxygen had left Jin Zixuan’s brain. So, he did what any sensible person would do.

Fled.

With energy multiplied by the adrenaline running through his veins, Jin Zixuan easily vaulted past his chair and ran though the people behind him, the no-touch system improving his escape. Within seconds, he had already bypassed the crowd and gotten nearly a dozen meters away from them.

Then, he vanished.

“Huh?” the watchers heard.

From the opposite direction.

They turned their heads and saw that Jin Zixuan had apparently teleported to the opposite end of the room. He turned and tried to run the other way, but teleported back to where he had originally disappeared from. The simulation physically prevented them from leaving the zone.

And there was no where to hide in an empty circle with a diameter of 30 meters.

The color of Jin Zixuan’s face was actually impressive.

He turned away, unable to face the avidly watching crowd he had just confessed his feelings in front of, and buried his face in his hands as if denying their existence would make them all go away. Most people were too shocked by the teleportation barrier to do anything — it certainly explained why their attempts to escape in the beginning’s darkness proved futile — but Jiang Yanli’s focus was entirely on Jin Zixuan.

Wiping the last of her tears, she stood up and walked over to him with the pride one would expect of Madam Jin. Hearing her approach, Jin Zixuan’s now-just-red face turned to meet her, his gaze fearful and tentative.

His apprehension met her blinding smile.

“Thank you, Young Master Jin,” she leaned close to whisper into his ear. “I love you too.”

His face returned to its purple hue as he gave a high-pitched squeak.

They had known of each other for years, but had only spent a few hours actually getting to know each other. Some might say it was too soon to call that love.

But, during that time, they had seen their once-would-be-not-yet son, and spoken in shared whispers of growing companionship. With the flash forward of them holding Jin Ling in the second segment, it was obvious that if their feelings didn't count as love yet, they would soon.

Jiang Cheng had been hesitant before, but, seeing both the way Jin Zixuan defended her and the forgiveness his sister gave him, nodded to himself and walked over as well. Huaisang followed along like a gossip-fueled duckling.

"If you ever insult her again, I'll never forgive you," Jiang Cheng growled, making Jin Zixuan nodded immediately. Both of them ignored Huaisang quietly pointing out that the real Zixuan hadn't said anything rude yet.

Silently, Yanli cast a glance towards Lan Wangji, the first person to speak up in her favor. She didn't even know him, but he had defended her all the same.

'Hanguang-jun, indeed.'

As the crowd of teenagers returned to their previous spots and the adults resumed conversation amongst themselves, Jiang Fengmian stepped forward to kneel beside his daughter.

"Are you alright?" he asked. She smiled at him and nodded.

Her mother, who had been watching with concern, lifted her head proudly at that, fears assured and confidence in her daughter's maturity taking over. Jiang Fengmian's expression remained conflicted as he tried tried to reconcile his anger at Wen Chao and Jin Zixuan with his gratitude at the latter. If the glimpse at the future was true, then it seemed Jin Zixuan was truly different from his father.

Perhaps he didn't need to worry.

He returned to his seat and began speaking with Lan Qiren.

Madam Yu stood next to Madam Jin, the pair watching their children interact. There were many things people could and did say about them — their jealousy, their spitefulness, and their dissatisfaction with their husbands were all common gossip — but no one could deny that they were fiercely protective of what they deemed as theirs. They would both gladly offer their children the world, and nothing would make them happier than knowing they were right about the engagement.

Lan Wangji glanced down, not feeling comfortable with the overly-affectionate scene before them. On the other hand, Lan Xichen made eye contact with Nie Mingjue. When Huaisang had left him to join Jiang Cheng, Nie Mingjue had unconsciously looked toward Xichen, and found the other staring back. They shared a smile, amused by the younger teenagers (and vindictively spiteful against the Wen brothers, who were being kept silent under their father's glare).

Separated from everyone else, Jin Guangshan watched Wen Ruohan speculatively. Normally, the Jin Sect Leader would have stopped his heir before he spoke out against (and offended) the Wens, but Wen Ruohan's expression had given no trace of annoyance or disapproval. Even when his son's arguments were refuted, the man treated the loss of face as little to no concern. It was quite unusual. It was true that the gathered people would likely learn everything about each other anyways, but he had prevented his sons from speaking before-

Ah. He wanted to see how watching the simulation had changed everyone. Gathering data on the future was pointless if everyone changed as a result. And, as he himself hadn't said anything, the only ones thrown under the bus where his sons, who didn't have much of a reputation to begin with.

How very like the man.

Wen Qing shivered, and did not watch the group of teenagers gathered around Jiang Yanli with envy. She had her brother, she didn't need friends from other sects.

Nearly two minutes later, the simulation began again.

Outside of an ancestral shrine, Wei Wuxian kneeled on the ground. Given Lan Qiren's presence beside him, this was undoubtedly punishment for the fight he had initiated in the previous scene.

Soft footsteps echoed lightly in the hallway as Lan Wangji approached, face as impassive as ever. Then, as if attracted by a flash of light, his eyes turned to Wei Wuxian. From the watchers' positions next to Lan Wangji, they could only see Wei Wuxian's back, but his downturned head implied a certain degree of regret.

A sting of guilt struck Jin Zixuan, but he was too emotionally exhausted to worry about it.

Nearby, Lan Qiren stood, glaring down at the boy's kneeling figure.

"You are truly unruly and ignorant," he lectured.

Even with the knowledge of why the fight had occurred, Lan Qiren remained stubbornly unwavering in agreement with the punishment. No matter the circumstances, if the rules were thrown away in favor of emotional decisions, everything would fall apart.

~~Maybe if he told himself that enough times, he would start to believe it.~~

"Kneel here and wait for Sect Leader Jiang to come," he ordered, not noticing his nephew duck behind the giant pillars. Then, with a huff, Lan Qiren left.

'Wei Ying!' Lan Wangji's thoughts gasped out as he stepped toward to the other boy. His emotions were still difficult to see, but with the thought's tone and slight furrow of his eyebrows, it was obvious Lan Wangji was far more concerned than he let on.

Simultaneously, Huaisang, Yanli, and Xichen had cover their mouths to avoid squealing at the adorable scene. Having just finished his own confession, Jin Zixuan silently cheered Lan Wangji on.

(To distract from what he had just done, if nothing else. Besides, his mom and fiancée seemed wholly in support of the relationship, so he might as well join in too.)

The scene was overcome by darkness, before a light shined to reveal Wei Wuxian's face before them. Fat, wet tears streamed down his face.

Instantly, the entire Jiang family did a double-take.

"What the-"

Wei Wuxian's defeated sobs rang out as he whined, "I was not only punished for fighting someone, but I also got Uncle Jiang in trouble!"

After this declaration, the whole image flew up, connected to Lan Wangji's head by two black dots. It was a thought bubble.

Lan Wangji's ears flushed bright red as he realized what was being shown.

The "that's so cute!" from Huaisang was neither necessary nor appreciated.

Then, one of Wei Wuxian's hands landed on the ground as if he was unable to sit upright. Lan Wangji stepped forward in concern when he saw.

This time, Lan Wangji's imagination showed them a Wei Wuxian clutching his stomach in pain as blood dripped out of his mouth.

Sweat rolling down his forehead, Wei Wuxian hissed, "Jin Peacock, how could you use your spiritual power?"

They were brought out of Lan Wangji's imagination again. With his nearly-blank face, it would be impossible to tell how concerned he was without further information.

To the people who had just seen his thoughts however, it was easy to tell what he was feeling.

"I wouldn't do that," Jin Zixuan denied, and was pleased to see Lan Wangji's ears turn bright red. Good; as childish as it was, it was nice to not be the only one embarrassed.

Lan Xichen was quietly happy with the bonding experience his brother was being dragged through.

Finally, Wei Wuxian leaned further down, his arms seemingly failing him.

His face truly displaying concern for the first time, Lan Wangji stepped out entirely and quickly walked over to the kneeling Wei Wuxian.

"Wei Ying," he called out.

"Hm? Lan Zhan, what are you doing here?" a perfectly-fine Wei Ying asked. "I thought you were mad at me."

This was perhaps the single most embarrassing day of Lan Wangji's life. It was undeniable: the creators of the simulation were pure evil. How was one supposed to defend their thoughts?

As every single person — even Wen Qing — laughed at Lan Wangji's surprisingly wild imagination, Nie Huaisang came to the realization that whoever put together the simulation was obviously a divine deity. Someone had blessed the cultivation world and decided to grant them unparalleled joy while also fixing all their relationships. How nice.

"Oh! Were you punished too?" Wei Wuxian lit up. "Hey, guess what? I found an ant nest. Here, let me teach you how to play with it."

Indignant, furious, and offended didn't even begin to describe the look on Lan Wangji's face. Normally, it wouldn't have surprised anyone, but the knowledge that he was angry at himself rather than Wei Ying gave the viewers a whole new perspective.

As Lan Wangji's eyebrow twitched with rage, Wei Wuxian turned back to the ant mound and explained.

"First, put bait in it."

The imagined crying Wei Wuxian appeared in a bubble to Lan Wangji's left and stabbed through his heart.

"Then, get a twig."

The hurt Wei Wuxian speared Wangji's chest.

Finally, stab the nest!"

The collapsing one did the same.

Jiang Cheng, Jin Zixuan, and Nie Huaisang were all rolling on the ground with laughter, and even the more reserved watchers were forced to wipe tears of joy from their eyes. While some, such as the Wen brothers, giggled in scornful mocking, Lan Xichen smiled at the plethora of good-natured amusement almost everyone else. His brother obviously didn't see it that way, but Lan Xichen brightened at the realization that his brother was finally gaining a few friends.

(His privacy had to be breached to get there, but, as Xichen was powerless to change that, there was no harm in looking at the positive side of things.)

"Isn't this fun?" Wei Wuxian asked, turning around with a blinding grin on his face. "Lan Zhan, give it a try!"

Giving a single, heavy sigh, Lan Wangji calmly turned around and began walking away.

"Eh? Eh?! Why did you go away? It's really fun…. Are you sure you don't want to stab it?"

Frowning, he looked back down at the ants.

'What a shame. He didn't get to see my masterpiece.'

Curious, Nie Mingjue tried to step closer to see the creation, but was only greeted by a large blur. It seemed the spirits who created the scene hadn't gotten to see whatever was being described.

Huaisang pouted, having grown a deep appreciation for Wei Wuxian's sense of humor and artistic ability.

In an instant, the bright day faded away to a clear night sky, well lit even with just the soft glow of the crescent moon above.

Hesitantly, as if at war with himself, Lan Wangji stepped closer to the hole Wei Wuxian had been playing with. He glared speculatively at the mound, but, ultimately, his curiosity won out.

Reaching a stick in, Lan Wangji poked around and scared the ants out. They quickly scattered, chasing after Wei Wuxian's bait into specifically chosen lines.

Lan Wangji stepped back from the ants nervously, but they were uninterested in anything besides the bait which had been left out for them.

Then, Lan Zhan's face switched into a scandalized scowl.

Wei Wuxian had recreated his "Lang Wang ji" wolf-and-a-chicken painting out of bait, so that the ants made that shape on the ground.

Lan Wangji's fists clenched at the sight and he turned away, ears red in embarrassment.

"Cheeky brat."

"Hey, Wangji-xiong," Nie Huaisang greeted, stepping far closer than he would have before the simulation. "...You're much cuter than you seem, aren't you?"

"...I'm not," he denied.

"Don't be like that!" Huaisang declared, channeling his inner Wei Wuxian shamelessness and waving the other two heirs over as well. "I still can't read you all that well, but your thoughts can't lie."

"Not mine."

"They belong to another version of you, at any rate," Jiang Cheng pointed out, stepping closer. Jin Zixuan followed along. If Lan Wangji wasn't willing to take the leap and join them, then their only option was to join him.

The second jade paused for a moment, obviously contemplating whether or not to leave, then simply nodded once and allowed them to stay.

He wouldn't join them himself, but he wouldn't object to their presence either. All three boys gave internal cheers.

Opposite them, Lan Qiren found himself conflicted. While seeing Wangji's thoughts (and having a Xichen translator) made Lan Wangji much easier to read, it was also undeniable that his nephew was showing far more emotions than he ever had before.

No, he was experiencing more emotions.

Qiren had always been proud of his nephew, but it had not escaped him that Wangji never seemed happy. He was content, but ever since the death of his mother he often seemed completely devoid of personal desire. It was always simply duty and obligation — the ideal Lan.

Why did Wei Wuxian have to be the person that ~~Wangji did not have a crush on him but~~ changed his nephew so much?

But, if Wangji was happier now than he had ever been before, who was Lan Qiren to stop him?

~~No, no, that was the mindset that allowed his brother to lock himself away from the world. Qiren had to remain vigilant.~~

Both Jiang Fengmian and Jin Guangshan appeared, sitting at tables across from each other as Lan Qiren sat at one in the middle.

"It happened quite suddenly," Lan Qiren explained. "Although it was just a quarrel between teenagers, it relates to the troth between your clans. I dared not make a decision on my own."

"To do that, I have to know the details of the affair," Jiang Fengmian responded, then bowed slightly. "Wei Ying is a troublesome boy, and has inconvenienced you several times. My apologies."

"Jiang-xiong, there's no need," Jin Guangshan rejected. "I know something of the incident. Rest assured, I will take care to scold my son for his words."

'Not that you'd care if Maiden Jiang was anyone else's daughter,' Jin Zixuan thought, surprising himself with the spiteful thought.

"You may do that privately. In accordance with the Clan rules, I ordered them to kneel," Lan Qiren explained. "Though, in regards to the engagement, you must think it though seriously."

'It is thought through,' Madam Yu thought, remembering her to-be grandson. 'And then Wei Wuxian messed everything up.'

After considering Lan Qiren's words for a moment, Jiang Fengmian said, "A-Li's mother was the one who insisted on having this engagement in the first place, and I didn't agree. Looking at it now, as neither of them are keen, it's best if we don't force it."

Here, Madam Yu gave a vivacious scoff, demanding "And you two can make that decision all by yourselves, can you?"

"That isn't-"

"Oh, I see how it is. It's because it was my idea, isn't it? Who cares that he obviously loves her now, all that matters is that you don't feel like another marriage is being forced-"

"Mother, please, that's not-"

"Are you really going to argue against me? Your fiancée just confessed to you and you think now is the time to support breaking off the engagement? You know you wanted the marriage, and yet he has the audacity to claim 'neither' of you are keen?!"

Seeing her anger, Jiang Fengmian fell silent. While he knew his virtual-self had no reason to believe Jin Zixuan would treasure A-Li, the confession and glimpse into the future ~~and his grandson~~ allowed him to acknowledge that it might have been a little too hasty.

That said, Yu Ziyuan already knew why he thought Jin Zixuan would never value Yanli, so there was no point in arguing about it.

After a long, thoughtful pause, Jin Guangshan frowned and spoke, "What do the children know. They can play around however they want to. Fengmian-xiong, you and I don't need to pay them any attention."

Although Jin Zixuan had seen his father in action around the other sect leaders many times, it still made him slightly uncomfortable to hear himself talked about in such a way. Especially since the only reason his father was objecting was the power of the Jiang sect, rather than his or Yanli's wishes.

"Jin-xiong, although we can set the engagement for them, we can't carry out the marriage in place of them. After all, they are the ones who will be spending the rest of their lives together."

"And what is that supposed to mean?!" Madam Yu demanded.

Standing with her friend, Madam Jin added, "Do you have a problem with their continued relationship?"

"Not at all," Jiang Fengmian refuted. "I believe that version of me didn't realize your son's feelings. My apologies. I meant nothing further by it, My Lady."

But his position didn't really need to be defended. While Yanli had been pleased with her marriage to Jin Zixuan, it was hardly her father's fault he felt their relationship wouldn't work out. She frowned again as her mother continued to glare, but, as Madam Yu had pointed out, she couldn't say anything that would leave Jin Zixuan with the impression that she didn't desire his affections.

Luckily, her fiancée noticed her conflict.

Getting out of his seat and saluting the adults, Jin Zixuan explained, “Thank you for your comments. If you will allow me to speak my mind I… don’t believe that version of me knew A… Yanli well enough to feel that way. I… do not believe Sect Leader Jiang made the wrong decision.”

Madam Jin seemed displeased with her son speaking out against her, but, when she considered her joy at her son finally appreciating Yanli, she let it go.

A truly angelic smile greeted Jin Zixuan as he sat back down, and Yanli leaned in to him to whisper, “You can call me ‘A-Li,’ if you want to.”

His face darkened to a deeper shade, but he whispered back, “I would… appreciate it if you called me A-Xuan as well.”

As weird as it was to see his sister worrying about romance, Jiang Cheng was too pleased by the peacock’s appreciation of her to care.

After some consideration, Jin Guangshan agreed to the offer.

Yanli and Zixuan took consolation in the fact that, despite this breakup, they did eventually end up together. Even better, it was most likely for love this time around.

A pink aura surrounded the happy couple.

“Ah, Lan Zhan!” Wei Wuxian called out cheerily. Another day of kneeling, it seemed; Lan Qiren was truly furious.

After making eye contact for a moment, Lan Wangji turned on his heel and walked away, pure-white robes fluttering in the breeze.

“Eh? What’s wrong? Why was he upset this time?”

“What else could it be?” Jiang Cheng responded. “I don’t think he’ll ever want to see you again.”

While probably true, it was most certainly not true for the reason Jiang Cheng thought it was. Silently, the real Jiang Cheng tried to kick his virtual self for giving such an incorrect observation to his brother.

(When his foot only phased through, he sighed heavily and mentally cursed other-him’s idiocy.)

Wei Wuxian laughed at the comment, then asked “Oh, right. Where’s that idiot Jin Zixuan?”

After what he had said to Yanli, Jin Zixuan had no defense to the “idiot” designation.

“I hear he’s very proud of his good looks, like a peacock,” Wei Wuxian continued, patting his face as if he wasn’t also extremely handsome. “He must be appalled when he looks in the mirror.”

“I wanted to hit him as well. If you hadn’t stopped me, the other side of Jin Zixuan’s face would also be ruined.”

“Nah, his face will look worse when it’s asymmetrical.”

Rather than making her protectively glare at Jiang Cheng, this statement made Madam Jin glare at Jin Zixuan. He ducked his head, fully understanding why she was angry.

Madam Jin smiled; it was good to see her real-son had finally realized what a gem Jiang Yanli was.

Hearing something from his right, Wei Wuxian turned and nearly did a double take, recognizing a figure in the distance.

It was Jiang Fengmian.

“If Uncle Jiang is here, is Shijie also here?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“Why would she be here? To watch you make a scene?”

Wei Wuxian just clicked his tongue.

Jiang Cheng paused, glancing down at his brother, then said “Next time, don’t be so impulsive-”

The rest of his scolding was cut off by the tinging of a bell as his father approached, announcing the man’s arrival. “Wuxian,” Jiang Fengmian spoke kindly. “Come on. Let’s go home.”

Despite the fighting and punishment, nothing in the Jiang Sect Leader’s gaze spoke of anger. Wei Wuxian looked up at him just as happily.

However, Jiang Cheng, standing beside the pair, suddenly gained a look of dejection.

“Oh, of course, come for the bastard child, but not-”

“My Lady, he isn’t,” Jiang Fengmian corrected sternly, though his eyes remained on his son. Jiang Cheng looked far more hurt by his presence than he had expected.

Although the pair kept their voices fairly low, it was clear to everyone what they were talking about. Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli looked down in shame at the repeated argument.

Nie Huaisang, on the other hand, was confused. Disciples of equal standing would often get into various disputes and arguments, and those could usually be settled within the Cloud Recesses. However, this was the Jin sect heir getting into a conflict with the son of a servant and rogue cultivator — head disciple or not. Wei Wuxian had tried to help by preventing Jiang Cheng from attacking, but in some ways taking all the blame onto himself just complicated the issue further. Normally, Wei Wuxian wouldn't have even been allowed to attend the Cloud Recesses due to not being a clan member. Of course it was a more serious incident than if Jiang Cheng had done so. With the complicated engagement on top of everything else, why wouldn't Sect Leader Jiang have come?

Then again, he knew all too well that, despite Nie Mingjue gruff exterior, his Da-ge coddled him like a mother hen. Logical reasoning or not, Jiang Cheng's feelings would not go away.

He shifted closer to the Jiang heir, trying to reassure with his presence.

Next, the watchers drifted just over water, getting a scenic view of the exterior of the Yunmeng's Lotus Pier. The towering white walls did not stop a large quantity of townspeople from gathering around, mingling with the cultivators and selling goods right outside the cove.

Returning to their home made all three Jiangs relax slightly, but most of the other sects were slightly thrown by the whiplash. The Cloud Recesses were exclusively for cultivators, and any servants in the area did their best to remain out of sight while the disciples were around. The Nightless City was only for clan members, but the non-cultivating clan members often fulfilled other roles. Qinghe's capital was open for any who were useful, but the high concentration of warriors determined the personalities of anyone else who came.

Yunmeng Jiang was the great sect closest to the common people, reflecting their rogue cultivator origins amicably. Less otherworldly, but righteous all the same.

On the edge of the pier, a lovely woman wearing lavender robes walked out to the very edge, obviously waiting for someone. When they got close enough to see her features, the watchers recognized her as Jiang Yanli.

She flushed slightly under the sudden attention, making both Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan step in front of her. The act was wholly unnecessary, of course, so she laughed lightly at their protectiveness.

Her bodyguards blushed, but remained in place.

"Ah, Miss Jiang, you're here. Do you want to try some fresh melon?" one of the civilians asked, far more casual than any other sect would have allowed, but with an undeniable layer of respect, rather than fear.

Jiang Yanli turned her sweet gaze on the man, responding "I would. Thanks a lot."

Jin Zixuan was going to commission a painting of his fiancée. No, a carving. Or a statue. Something that would prove to everyone how wrong they were when they tried to claim her beauty was just slightly above average.

"Shijie!" someone called excitedly. She turned back to see Wei Wuxian's approaching boat, an enthusiastically waving Wuxian standing on top.

“A-Xian?”

“Shijie! I’m back!”

Wen Ruohan thought it was notable how, even now, Wei Wuxian showed no sign of guilt or regret. It was true he hadn’t been expelled — as far as Wen Ruohan could tell, Sect Leader Jiang had simply decided to take him back due to the political implications of what he had done — but most students sent home disgracefully would not have been anywhere near as excited.

Then again, Wei Wuxian obviously hadn’t learned anything at the Cloud Recesses. The only reason he would have to stay would be the people there and the library, both of which were things he could find substitutes for at Lotus Pier. It was unfortunate that incentives and punishments regarding his reputation wouldn’t be effective, but Wen Ruohan was confident the boy could be molded regardless.

As soon as his boat was close enough, Wei Wuxian jumped down and ran towards his senior martial sister. He sped past lotus sellers, light as a feather despite the heavy trunk he was carrying, and paused right in front of her with a grin.

“Shijie! I’ve missed you so much!”

“You’re… not actually… I mean, right?” Jin Zixuan stuttered, seeing their close relationship. Jiang Yanli blinked for a moment, then understood. If they had a good relationship, it would not be surprising for a sect’s head disciple to marry the sect leader’s child. And their relationship seemed to be one of the best he’d ever seen.

Luckily, she shook her head.

“He hasn’t been officially adopted, but he is my brother. You have nothing to worry about.”

Both Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji did their best to hide their overwhelming relief.

“I thought it’d be one whole year?” Yanli asked with a smile. “Why are you back so soon?”

“Because I… missed you so much!”

Wei Wuxian’s habit of lying to spare the feeling of others was admirable, but one Yanli had spent years trying to break. One of these days, it would get him into trouble that he couldn’t get out of.

~~Like making him a demonic cultivator all the great sects united to murder.~~

“You sweet talker.”

“Oh, right,” he set down the case he was carrying. “It’s for you.”

Inside, were five high-quality moon cakes.

“For me?”

“Mmhm!”

“Thank you,” she told him, sincerely. With two golden smiles right next to each other, the viewers were lucky they didn’t go blind.

“I’m glad you like it. I missed your lotus and pork ribs soup!”

A glance at Wen Chao told Zixuan that the other was arrogantly recalling his earlier comment about Jiang Yanli’s time in the kitchen. Feeling unusually defensive, Jin Zixuan stepped between them. There was nothing wrong with Yanli making soup. In fact, he was certain it would taste far more delicious than anything the Wen or Jin clan’s prized chefs could cook up.

A slight scratching sound alerted the watchers to the ramp having been lowered, allowing the non-Wei Wuxians to get off the boat. Jiang Fengmian stepped off, giving a pleasant smile to the civilian sellers around him. Once again, the townspeople didn’t have even the slightest bit of fear in their eyes.

“Welcome back, Clan Leader,” one of them greeted, and the other bowed slightly with a smile on his face.

Lan Qiren had observed it during previous visits to Lotus Pier, but it still surprised him to see how comfortable the civilians were with the cultivators. Caiyi treated Lan cultivators like holy saviors, Qinghe treated Nie cultivators like the dangerous weapons they were, Lanling treated the Jins like princes, and Qishan treated the Wens like minor (dangerous) gods. No choice was inherently better or worse, but it was still strange to see even the Sect Leader spoken to casually.

“I’ve already made some soup,” Yanli informed him as her father approached.

“And sour and spicy lotus root!”

Jiang Cheng sighed, then, to Nie Huaisangs confused stare, explained, “He likes spice far, far too much.”

He and Zixuan raised their eyebrows skeptically, obviously not understanding the gravity of Wei Wuxian’s lack of functioning taste buds.

“Really? Make them really spicy!”

Yanli laughed and pinched his cheek, “Spicy enough to make you cry!”

Seeing Jiang Yanli’s interaction with her brothers filled Wen Qing with a sense of melancholy. She had done everything in her power to keep Wen Ning out of the sect leader’s sight, so it would have been awful for him to be present. She knew that.

~~She still missed her brother.~~

Both Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen smiled at the scene, making eye contact with Jiang Yanli and gaining a sense of companionship only doting older siblings could have.

Once Jiang Fengmian had gotten close enough, Jiang Yanli glanced away from her brother to salute respectfully.

"A-die," she greeted.

Jiang Fengmian smiled softly and asked, "Where is your mom?"

"At… the drill ground."

Subconsciously, Jiang Cheng gave a slight twitch of pity. Whoever his mother was projecting her anger onto would not be happy that day.

With wobbling knees and rivers of sweat pouring down their faces, several Jiang disciples trembled in the scorching heat.

"Hold it!" Madam Yu's voice ordered.

"Yes! Yes… Madam," the Jiang disciple agreed. He stood up straight again, keeping his head high and arms out despite the heavy weights in his hands.

With a slight glare, Madam Yu scoffed at the obvious struggle the disciples were experiencing.

(This was still better than Wei Wuxian, though. Whenever she ordered him to hold weights, he would act like they were lighter than a flower. It was infuriating!)

A trail of five Jiang disciples were all standing with their arms extended in front of them, heavy weights carried in each hand.

"If you can't deal with something this simple, what will you do with fierce spirits?!" Madam Yu demanded. "You want to die?"

Neither option seemed fun to Nie Huaisang, but he kept that thought to himself. Although he did note that even his Da-ge seemed to feel the training was a little too intense.

"Practice for two more hours!" she demanded, twisting Zidian as she commanded them. "You should focus on improving your skills, not fooling around! You're just like that good-for-nothing Wei Wuxian!"

That was… an interesting way to talk about one's head disciple.

Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan couldn't understand why the Jiang sect wouldn't do everything in their power to keep a tight hold on an inventive, creative prodigy, but certainly weren't going to complain about it.

Perhaps, when the kind Jiang Yanli married into the Jin sect, her loyal brother would come as well.

Madam Yu scoffed, "We sent him to Gusu to learn, and he still managed to cause trouble. Are you following his lead?!"

Lan Wangji frowned slightly and turned to gaze at Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli, but the siblings, while embarrassed, did not look surprised a their mother's comments.

His frown deepened.

"A-Niang," Jiang Yanli's soft voice greeted.

"Ah, A-Li," Madam Yu responded as her daughter saluted, her furious glare turning into a softer smile. Then, when she noticed Wei Wuxian behind her daughter, the glare returned.

"Yu-furen," Wei Wuxian greeted, preforming a deep salute. It was a far cry from the affectionate and casual way he had greeted the Sect Leader just a few hours ago.

It seemed, despite his apparent shamelessness, he was highly attuned to the opinions of others.

(Minus Lan Wangji, but, without reading his thoughts, no one could have read him.)

Finally, Madam Yu's eyes drifted to the last member of the trio: her husband. However, after making eye contact for a moment, she glanced away with a huff of scorn.

Jiang Fengmian's gaze turned regretful. Despite that, there was no anger or hint of coming retribution. Nor was there indifference.

Madam Jin loved her friend and would support her no matter what, but, every once in a while, she couldn't help but feel like Yu Ziyuan was making something out of nothing.

"San-niang," Jiang Fengmian spoke. "Haste makes waste. The level these children can reach depends on many factors. If you push them too hard, it won't help."

Madam Yu glared and stood up, shouting "You're always defending them, that's why they won't achieve anything!"

'Overworking them won't help either,' Lan Xichen thought, before his face grew grim and he exchanged a glance with Nie Mingjue. Relationships among teenagers were one thing, but broadcasting the a sect's internal politics and possible weaknesses was something else.

And Wen Ruohan would take full advantage of it.

Both Jiang Fengmian and Yu Ziyuan frowned, the latter practically daring the other clans to comment on her personal life.

“Especially Wei Wuxian,” she continued. “He always picks fights with others, and you had to clean up his mess.”

“Mother, he was defending A-Jie and-”

“Do you think telling me solves anything?” she snapped back. “We’re all powerless here. What can I do to change the simulation?”

“I’ve never seen such impudence!”

Her words allowed the watchers were allowed to see Wei Wuxian almost wilt with guilt, a far cry from the laughing, uncompromising boy from before.

Frowning, Jiang Fengmian looked away from Wei Wuxian to give a warning “San-niang.”

“What? Am I wrong? He’s always messing around here, and now he has disgraced us in Gusu! He knew of Yanli and Zixuan’s engagement, but he still fought with Zixuan!”

Even now, having heard word-for-word what Jin Zixuan had said about her daughter, Madam Yu’s feelings remained unchanged. Zixuan had confessed; he did love her daughter. All Wei Wuxian had done was make it take longer for them to get together. Her husband was just being biased. Wei Wuxian, regardless of the reason, had embarrassed the sect before all of Gusu.

~~But, for the first time, she was starting to doubt her opinion of him.~~

Jiang Fengmian’s frown deepened, but he clearly realized the argument was not going to lead anywhere productiv, especially given that he had just ended his daughter’s engagement.

Jin Guangshan was shocked. If his wife had said that to him — not that he cared about any of his disciples — he would have gone to the nearest brothel for the rest of the day. Why on earth was Jiang Fengmian allowing his wife to speak that way to him without complaint? While both their wives were intimidating, he wasn’t stupid enough to remain loyal to an arrogant, insensitive, uncompromising witch.

Then again, he had always known the Jiang Sect Leader liked to remain neutral in most conflicts. It seemed that philosophy extended to his private life as well.

Pathetic.

Jiang Yanli looked back and forth between her parents nervously as the wind picked up dangerously, reminding several viewers of the effects of the future Jiang Cheng’s anger against Lan Wangji. As Jiang Fengmian continued to refuse to meet her eyes, Madam Yu’s fury grew.

She made a motion as if to step forward, only to pause when Jiang Yanli grabbed her hand.

“A-Niang, don’t be angry. They say Jiang Cheng is doing well in Gusu. Even Lan Qiren praised him.”

Jiang Cheng smiled slightly at the comment, though wondered if that would still be the case had Lan Qiren found out he had also been involved in the party. Due to Lan Wangji’s personal feelings, Wei Wuxian was the only one who had been punished (and then been forced to fight several fierce corpses). It made him slightly conflicted to know his good reputation was party due to Wei Wuxian taking the fall.

But, surely, that was a one-time thing.

After listening to her daughter’s words, Madam Yu took a deep breath and fondly huffed, “That boy. At least he didn’t let us down.”

While Jin Zixuan did want to absorb the obviously complicated family situation going on in the Jiang household, he had a mission to complete first.

Leaning to his right, he got close to ~~Jiang~~ A-Li’s ear and whispered “Good job.”

She smiled at him, and he found his admiration for her multiplying. Even he made sure to avoid his mother when she was angry, and Madam Yu was just as scary. His fiancée was truly amazing.

“Jinzhu, Yinzhu, let’s go,” Madam Yu ordered.

“Take care, A-Niang,” Yanli said.

Neither Jiang Fengmian nor Wei Wuxian had moved from where they stood, one lost in thought and the other uncharacteristically downtrodden. Then, Wei Wuxian shook his head and forced himself to smile again.

“Thanks, Shijie!” he called out.

She smiled back, “The other disciples haven’t seen you in a while. Go and say hello.”

“He’s popular, I take it?” Nie Huaisang asked, remembering how many guest disciples had been invited to the party they had. Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes.

“You wouldn’t believe how much he loves the kids.”

“And they love him back,” Jiang Yanli pointed out, sharing a glance with Jin Zixuan. It was obvious who both of them were thinking about.

~~Jin Zixuan’s smile flickered, as he prayed yet again that the time travel involved wouldn’t erase Jin Ling’s existence.~~

Wei Wuxian turned toward the panting and exhausted disciples, who instantly brightened upon seeing him.

“Da-shixi-” one began, then cut off, glancing hesitantly at Jiang Fengmian. Wei Wuxian also turned to look at his sect leader, who only smiled deeper, silently giving permission.

Wei Wuxian brightened up again and ran towards his fellow disciples, jumping towards them and sending them all crashing to the ground in a giant mess of limbs.

It made Jiang Cheng feel incredibly selfish to be envious of this. There was no reason to, and he had plenty of friends, but sometimes it felt like some people only spent time around him because of Wei Wuxian.

~~“It’s because he’s too much like me, isn’t he?” his mother had once shouted at his father. “Can’t fit in with the disciples at Yunmeng Jiang. Not like Cangse-”~~

As the trio got up from Wei Wuxian’s surprise attack, the latter wrapped his arms around them affectionately.

“Did you miss me?” he asked.

“Da-shixiong. Did they also do this to you in the Cloud Recesses?”

Wei Wuxian sighed, “No, they made me copy books instead. It’s even worse than physical punishment.”

“And yet you never stopped,” Lan Qiren grumbled.

Nie Mingjue coughed to cover up a snort, and Lan Xichen fought to keep his lips from twitching up. Especially when he saw the furious nod of agreement Lan Wangji gave.

Yunmeng Jiang’s head disciple left his brother so confused.

“Did you meet Lan Wangji?” one of them asked. “Is he really that good?”

“Hmm… he’s good,” Wei Wuxian decided. “We’re neck and neck.”

‘Good,’ Lan Wangji’s mind repeated. ‘He thinks I’m good. He thinks I’m good. He thinks I’m good.’

As the Second Jade of Lan, Lan Wangji had been complimented hundreds of times before. In fact, there had even been poems written about his beauty, personality, and skill.

And yet none of them mattered as much as that one comment.

On the other hand, most of the adults found it interesting that none of the Jiang disciples doubted Wei Wuxian’s claim of being Lan Wangji’s equal. While the claim was true, it also likely meant that no one in Lotus Pier had ever given Wei Wuxian a challenge in a fight.

In some ways, it seemed almost inevitable that the two would start paying attention to each other.

The disciples were eager to hear more.

“They say he can freeze people if they get too close. Is that true?”

Nie Huaisang gave the nearby Lan Wangji an exaggerated gasp of horror. He received a glare in response.

Wei Wuxian laughed, “He’s a man, not a monster.”

“Do they really have 3,000 rules?”

“Yeah, it’s true. They carve them into a huge rock.”

“And what about…”

The voices faded away as their surroundings darkened to pitch black, lacking even the moonlight a night sky would have. Then, from above, silver light began shining down as the moon and the rest of the scenery phased into existence.

It seemed that from now on, every time Lan Wangji looked at the moon all he would be able to see was Wei Wuxian’s eyes. Luckily, curfew was at nine, so that would rarely be a concern.

A glowing red dragonfly flew in front of the viewers, and soon thousands more joined it. The night sky above lotus pier was filled with a cloud of red light that gave it an ethereal glow.

Jiang Fengmian walked through the pier, approaching Madam Yu.

Seeing himself, Sect Leader Jiang gave a wary look around. What had already been shown was bad enough, but he most certainly wasn’t comfortable with displaying any more.

Lan Xichen frowned, seeing the invasions of privacy he had feared come to light.

“San-nian,” Jiang Fengmian greeted as Madam Yu set down her cup of tea. At the words, she turned to glare furiously at her husband. After observing him for a moment, she looked away.

“I went to your room to look for you. Jinzhu said I’d find you here.”

“...What’s the matter?”

Silently, Jiang Fengmian set down an intricate box and pushing it towards her. Scowling slightly, Yu Ziyuan slid it open to reveal a beautifully carved jade hairpin.

Once again, Jin Guangshan tilted his head in confusion. Did Jiang Fengmian want another heir? But cultivators had even less reason to need a spare due to their long lifespans. Then what was the point of the pin?

It couldn’t be love — everyone had heard about how little he cared for his wife.

“Why buy something so useless just to appease me?”

“The hairpin is high quality,” Jiang Fengmian explained. “It was beautiful, so I bought it.”

Madam Yu was silent.

Both Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli shrank down slightly as if expecting judgement. It made Jiang Fengmian feel guilty for the embarrassing display being shown, but there was nothing he could do to stop it.

Unbeknown to the Jiangs, however, no one felt they had any room to talk. Nie Mingjue was unmarried and had no plans to get married, due to the danger of his cultivation technique. Lan Qiren was also unmarried, and had seen a far worse marriage in his brother. Madam Jin wanted to support her friend, but couldn’t help the bitter feeling growing in her chest when she saw Jiang Fengmian’s actions. The Wens were all still following Wen Ruohan’s implied orders to remain silent. No one would judge them.

Jiang Fengmian sat down, leaning one elbow on the table as he stared at his wife’s back.

“...San-Niang, I went to Gusu and discussed A-Li’s engagement with Sect Leader Jin.”

“Zixuan’s mother and I arranged their marriage when they were little. Is there a problem?”

The problem was Jin Zixuan’s complete and utter disinterest in Jiang Yanli, which, while solved now, was a genuine concern for the people in the simulation’s universe.

Madam Yu refused to think about that.

“Sect Leader Jin and I have decided to call off the marriage.”

Madam Yu’s eyes widened in shock.

“What? Why would you do that?”

“I thought the two children loved each other, but I was wrong. We shouldn’t force it.”

“A-Li has met Zixuan several times. She obviously likes him.”

And Zixuan was continuing to curse himself for not getting to know her during that time.

“Did Zixuan say something rude?” Madam Yu demanded, then stood up, knowing the answer. “He’s too young to understand it now. A-Li is a great girl. Zixuan will realize that after he gets to know her.”

Given what had occurred for the real versions, it was obvious that was true. However, having heard what the simulation’s Jin Zixuan said about Jiang Yanli, no one could fault Jiang Fengmian for his decision.

“Besides, Zixuan’s mother and I are good friends. Our families were allies when we were children. The Jin Clan will be our ally if they get married.”

“...Getting married means they’ll spend the rest of their lives together. If they don’t love each other… if they’re forced to be together just to further their families’ interest….”

“Just like us, right?”

Jiang Fengmian flinched slightly, while Yu Ziyuan glared at the simulation as if it was personally responsible for her marriage. The other clan leaders remained silent, but their minds instantly recalled the gossip.

When the marriage between them had originally been proposed, the previous leader of the Jiang Sect was quite interested, but Jiang Fengmian had no such intentions. He didn’t like Yu Ziyuan’s conduct and felt that they wouldn’t be an appropriate match. He politely refused the offer a handful of times. However, the Meishan Yu sect set about multiple factors, putting pressure on Jiang Fengmian, who at the time was still fairly young and had nothing to lean on. Although Jiang and Yu were married, they had ever since been a grudging couple. They continued living apart and often had open disagreements, or so everyone said.

No simple solution to a relationship formed from politics. Although she was quite happy Zixuan returned her sentiments, Yanli was thankful her for her father’s consideration.

As Madam Yu’s anger spiked, a turbulent wind began to pick up again. Her cultivation was forming a miniature storm around them.

“San-niang, that’s not what I meant.”

“...Wei Ying, that little brat. He causes trouble wherever he goes.”

Privately, Jiang Cheng wondered what his mother would have said if he had been the one to punch Jin Zixuan. In some ways, he didn’t want to know.

(If she was supportive, it meant every time she complained about Wei Wuxian wasn’t a result of his actions but his-)

Jiang Fengmian was momentarily taken aback by the abrupt change in topic, before he sighed and turned away from her.

“There you go again, blaming him for everything.”

Madam Yu slammed her hand against the table, jousting the porcelain and shouting “I shouldn’t blame him?! If he hadn’t fought with Zixuan, none of this would have happened! Ha. Ever since you brought him here, you’ve always favored him, even over your own son! If it was Jiang Cheng who made a scene, would you rush to Gusu like you did? Never!”

“San-niang!” Jiang Fengmian shouted in synch with his virtual-self.

“What? I can’t change what it shows us now! What do you expect me to do?”

The simulation's Madam Yu glared further for a moment, before continuing "This time he got between Yanli and Zixuan. Who knows what he's capable of doing next time!"

Given that they had still gotten together, no one was especially worried about that.

"But it's alright, isn't it?" Yu Ziyuan asked scathingly. "Because you'll be there, cleaning up after him!"

Before he could respond, she had walked away.

If there was any silver lining to all this (not that any member of the Jiang family was willing to see it that way), it was that everyone already knew the complexities of their relationship. And knew of the Jin relationship. And, although it wasn't confirmed, had suspicions about the Lan.

None of them would be too judgemental despite the obviously-personal scene.

(None except Wen Chao, who was snidely chuckling at their expense.)

At the drill ground, Wei Wuxian stood, shadowed further by the branches of a tree. He was gazing across the lake at Yu Ziyuan and Jiang Fengmian as the former angrily stormed off.

After some hesitation, Wei Wuxian began making his way back as well. In his mind, Madam Yu's warning rang out like an echo.

'This time he got between A-Li and Zixuan. Who knows what he's capable of doing next time.'

Wei Wuxian continued to walk, down trodden, and softly whispered.

"Shijie."

"Not your fault, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered, as Jin Zixuan felt guilt attack him all over again. Why couldn't he have just gotten to know her years ago? Everything would be so much simpler then.

He turned a corner, and found Jiang Yanli sitting down, tea before her. He moved his foot forward, as if to descend the staircase, only to pause, then put it back.

"A-Xian, is that you?"

Wei Wuxian, flinched slightly, looking up at once.

The kind, unwavering, troublesome boy was for a moment so raw and open that Lan Wangji's first instinct was to hold him tight. But it was still only a simulation; there was nothing he could do.

(Thank god. At this point, he obviously couldn't trust his brain to make rational decisions.)

Wei Wuxian tentatively approached his martial sister, bowing as she began to pour them both a cup of tea.

“S… sorry, Shijie. I…” he couldn’t bring himself to finish.

Yanli shook her head kindly and responded “Silly boy. It’s not your fault.”

“But… I made you sad.”

Now that Jin Zixuan was looking at Wei Wuxian as a to-be brother in law (rather than an enemy or a romantic rival), he felt nothing but appreciation for the care and concern he showed for Jiang Yanli.

Jiang Cheng frowned, knowing that without Wei Wuxian, he would have been the one to make his sister sad.

She glanced back at him, eyes kind, and instructed, “A-Xian, sit down first.”

He did.

“...Ever since I was little, I thought Zixuan would be my future husband,” she explained. “I’ve only met him a few times, but a charismatic man like him is hard not to like.”

If Zixuan didn’t concentrate on taking deep breaths, he was sure his face would start turning red again. At this point, he had to save any face he had left.

“But when I really thought about it, I realized… I didn’t like him that much.”

He flinched, but realized he fully deserved that for what he had said. However, his fears were assuaged when Jiang Yanli shook her head.

“That version of me still barely knows you. The me now feels differently,” she whispered, placing her hand on top of his. Her body phased through, but he understood her offer and smiled back.

Yanli herself abruptly realized the truth in what she said. She had always admired his appearance and talent, but his consideration — when he noticed her interest in the icecream — his humor — from his interactions with her brother — and his willingness to learn from his own mistakes (leading to an adorable awkwardness) were all new to her. She was glad that the simulation had so much to teach them.

“Surely, I could spend my life with him, but if we don’t love each other….”

“Shijie….”

Jiang Yanli glanced over, and, seeing Wei Wuxian’s concerned expression, began to laugh.

“Well, he must have said something unpleasant about me, right?”

Wei Wuxian avoided eye contact and denied, “He didn’t. I just… don’t like him.”

With this lie on top of all the faked confidence and laugher, Wen Ruohan was starting to wonder how much of the future Wei Wuxian’s jokes were genuine. While his personality seemed mostly the same, there was a notable awareness in the Yiling Patriarch that the current Wei Wuxian lacked.

Yanli laughed and held out a cup, “You can’t fool me. We grew up together, I know you too well. You don’t hit people just because you don’t like them.”

Jiang Fengmian smiled slightly, pleased by the efforts from his daughter and his ward to cheer each other up. Their innate kindness was obvious to anyone who saw.

Similarly, Lan Xichen found himself impressed with Jiang Yanli’s maturity. Feelings of rejection and self-loathing would be inevitable after what had happened, but she held herself high and refused to blame her younger brother, even though that would be an understandable reaction.

Quite the kind older sister.

(Wen Qing wondered if Yanli and Wen Ning would get along.)

“A-Xian, it’s not your fault,” Jiang Yanli concluded, standing up. “Jin-gongzi is great, but I’m willing to wait for a man who truly loves me. Someone who I can spend the rest of my life with.”

“I promise I will, Maide… A-Li,” Jin Zixuan reassured in a low whisper.

After pausing for a moment, Wei Wuxian looked up and declared, “Shijie, Jin Zixuan isn’t good enough for you. He’s spoiled and vain. You deserve someone better than him!”

In Jin Zixuan’s room, said heir abruptly sneezed.

Jiang Cheng was suddenly torn between joining his brother and defending the man whom his sister had given her heart to less than an hour ago. Luckily, as Jin Zixuan had apparently decided Wei Wuxian’s words weren’t a problem, there didn’t seem to be any point in raising a fuss.

Several months later, the lotus flowers were in full bloom. Their beautiful light pink petals brightened up the pier into a scene out of a dream.

“Jiang-xiong, Jiang-xiong,” Nie Huaisang whispered. “You have to take me there when they bloom. I want to paint them — or, even better, convince Wei-xiong to paint them.”

Unlike last time, when he had been too uncertain to invite anyone, Jiang Cheng immediately nodded.

“Sure. And you two can try A-Jie’s soup while you’re there.”

Jin Zixuan gave an internal cheer.

The water landscape changed to a forest, where an ignorant pheasant ate casually. Behind several bushes, Wei Wuxian notched an arrow and aimed.

'Where do you think you're going?' he thought, lips drawn into a playful smirk. With the burning grin, he released the arrow and the pheasant's whail rang out through the forest.

Watching the head disciple's hobby made it instantly clear how he became so skilled at archery. Wen Ruohan idly wondered if he could replicate it when training his own sect.

Though, without Wei Wuxian's talent, it was hard to tell if any of them would be able to get the pheasants in the first place. The Wen Sect wasn't exactly known for subtlety.

Soon, Wei Wuxian was walking back through town, carrying his dead prize over his shoulder. Hearing a sound from his left, his gaze drifted out toward the water. In an instant, his face was encompassed by an innocent delight that made him look an impossible mixture between childish and seductive.

~~Lan Wangji's control over his mind had officially disappeared.~~

A boat bearing the flag of Yunmeng Jiang returned to the shore, and its passenger got up and stretched. Jiang Cheng then looked down, seeing a body floating in the water.

"Wait-"

"Wei Ying?" Lan Wangji asked.

"Stop," Jiang Wanyin ordered the servant, looking down at his brother. Then, picking up the bamboo pole, he began poking Wei Wuxian.

The unimpressed look his mother gave him was even more crushing that hearing Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan begin laughing simultaneously.

Wei Wuxian began releasing bubbles of air, making Jiang Cheng frown and lean down to get a closer look.

"Yaah!" Wei Wuxian shouted, jumping up and surprising Jiang Cheng into falling back. Laughing delightedly, Wei Wuxian leaned onto the side of the boat to speak to the collapsed Jiang Cheng.

"Wow! You're finally back!" he exclaimed. "I thought you fell in love with a girl in Gusu, and were planning on staying there forever."

'Would Wei Ying truly dislike that?' Lan Zhan wondered, suddenly dejected. Luckily, as his brother was still the only one who could read him, no one noticed.

Jiang Cheng wiped hair out of his face, lips breaking into a laugh, before he forced them back into a scowl.

“I’m not you,” he declared.

‘Would he give himself away so easily?’ he thought, his dejection changing into fear.

Wei Wuxian continued to laugh, climbing onto the boat and offering Jiang Cheng a hand. The other took it, pulling himself up.

“Where are the others?” Jiang Cheng asked.

“Practicing archery on the grounds. The Wen Clan will be holding a Discussion Conference soon. There will be an archery competition on the first day.”

At the mention of their clan, both Wen Xu and Wen Chao perked up.

“Oh? The Wen Clan?”

“Yes, in Nevernight City,” Wei Wuxian confirmed. Their surroundings turned back to white.

A sense of unease filled the room. If the simulation was willing to skip months ahead for this, then something was going to happen at the conference.

“Well, that was a boring segment,” Wen Chao decided.

“Boring?” Madam Yu repeated. “You weren’t even paying attention, and yet you believe you can pass judgement on-”

“San-niang,” Jiang Fengmian whispered, eyes planted firmly on the watching Wen Ruohan.

“And don’t even get me started on you!” she continued. “You can see right in front of you how much A-Li and Zixuan love each other, and yet you dissolved their engagement?!”

“San-niang, all I knew about was what he said, I had no no way to-”

“‘No way?’ You didn’t even check! But of course you didn’t bother looking further. Wei Wuxian supported it, so there was no way it could be-”

“Madam Yu,” Nie Mingjue interrupted, seeing that the argument was stressing his brother out. “Given what had just happened-”

“Are you trying to imply something about my son?” Madam Jin fired back.

Wen Chao scoffed, “The fact that he likes that inferior brat says enough-”

“Don’t talk about my sister that way!”

“Oh?” Wen Ruohan asked, making the Jiangs freeze.

“I-I mean-”

“With all due respect,” Jin Zixuan stood up, cheeks beginning to flush again. “Thank you for your support, Madam Yu. But I-I acknowledge that I was out of line speaking that way about someone I never bothered to get to know.”

Madam Jin frowned, then allowed “I suppose my son might have deserved that punch.”

He wilted.

“...Even if he was out of line, do you really think that justifies his murder at the Yiling Patriarch’s hands?” Jin Guangshan asked, cheerily glancing around at the now-blanching faces. “I hope you didn’t forget that. He didn’t even deny it. Should one comment as a teenager really equal death?”

Absolute silence. Nothing from this segment had related to demonic cultivation; it was easy to forget what this version of Wei Wuxian was destined to become.

“...Why would he kill Maiden Jiang?” Huaisang finally asked, glancing toward her.

Lan Xichen nodded, “Yes, from what we just saw, it’s extremely unlikely that he would have actually done so.”

“And yet he admitted it, didn’t he?” Wen Ruohan countered.

”Wei Wuxian is a monster! Yanli treated him like her own brother!” a voice had said.

“How could I say that to him?” Wei Wuxian asked himself, not denying the accusation..

“...With all due respect, Sect Leader Wen,” Jiang Yanli stood up and bowed low. “I ask that we refrain from coming to any conclusions until we have all the information.”

“You would risk you life on your faith in him?”

“I’m certain we can handle it,” Yu Ziyuan responded. “If nothing else, this at least proves he won’t fight against our sect for no reason.”

“Of course, of course. If you ever need any assistance-”

“Thank you, Jin-xiong,” Jiang Fengmian bowed emptily. “I will be sure to tell you, if that becomes necessary.”

“If you need it, you have our recourses,” Nie Mingjue said.

“We would be glad to offer our help as well,” Lan Qiren agreed, though he was notably less aggressive about taking action against Wei Wuxian than before. Lan Xichen turned a confused glance on his lost-in-thought Uncle, unaware that the man was mentally replaying the lantern scene in his head.

If nothing else, Lan Qiren was starting to believe that Wei Wuxian wouldn’t fall for no reason. Nothing would justify what he ended up doing, but perhaps the sect’s didn’t need to be as worried as he once thought.

(About Wei Wuxian, that is. His concerns about Wen Ruohan were only growing.)

Tension spread out among the watchers.

Then-

“Hello? Jiang Cheng? Helloooo? A-Cheng~”

“A-Cheng?” he repeated, scandalized by the simulation’s embarrassing nickname.

“Oh, it is you! Thank god!”

...The simulation shouldn’t be able to respond to them.

“Wei… Wei Ying?” Jiang Cheng asked. “Wei Wuxian?”

“That’s me! How’ve you been?”

“...What? How are you-”

“No immediate danger then? Okay, it’s a long story. So I have no idea how much you know about all this, but basically all the sect leaders collapsed. If my research is right, you should be with-”

“We’re here, A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian confirmed.

“Uncle Jiang! Is Shijie here too?”

“Yes, A-Xian.”

“Hello! Okay, so, the thing that’s affecting you was created by humans. It involves a few talisman characters that use time. It needs you to be able to talk with each other, so it slows down your perception of time so that it can send the signal back and forth between you all. It’s probably been about 3-ish hours in there, but it’s been over 4 days out here. I haven’t figured out what all the time-characters are meant to do, but I think that’s most of it.”

“The talisman’s also from the future,” Nie Huaisang pointed out.

“...What?”

It suddenly, horrifyingly occurred to the watchers how difficult it would be to convince anyone. The simulation required too much personal information to have been made by strangers, and yet was far too complicated to have been made by a sprit. Through the hours they had spent watching it, they had slowly been convinced of its authenticity.

To anyone who hadn’t experienced it, however-

“Hey, A-Yue,” Wei Wuxian began, speaking to someone from the outside world. “Can you make a note for me to contact the Lan Sect asking for a book on seeing through illusions?"

"What?" Jiang Cheng shrieked. "We're real!"

"Mmhm."

"I'm serious. You-the first day you arrived at Lotus Pier, I-" he paused glancing to his father, then looked away. "I threatened you with Princess and Love!"

"With what?" Jin Zixuan laughed, not seeing the way Jiang Fengmian's eyes widened in surprise.

"...We never told anyone that."

"That's right," Jiang Yanli sang. "Just the three of us knew. Though I suppose it's not a secret anymore."

"...A-Yue, change that note to finding a book on soul-cleansing."

"We're not possessed!"

"Would you know if you are?"

"A-Xian," Jiang Fengmian interrupted. "We're sure. It seems highly unlikely that any spirit or human could take control of all of us. Did you find any records of something similar happening before?"

"...No."

"That much power would take time to build up. You know we're real. Nie-gongzi was just… joking."

"Ooooh. Okay, got it."

The crowd relaxed at the Jiang family successfully proving their authenticity. It was probably a good thing they had let the Jiangs talk to him; if people he had never met knew personal information about him, he might have panicked and treated them like spirits or tried to force them out. However, it did bring up a good point: even if all of them supported the same story, how would they convince anyone that they had been shown the future? Especially a future involving war, reincarnation, and demonic cultivators.

They might be Sect Leaders, but no one would believe that.

Though, on the plus side, Wei Wuxian's personality perfectly matching the one shown in the simulation did help confirm everything they had seen was true. Lan Wangji felt his chest flutter slightly at the thought.

"Is Lotus Pier alright?"

"Yup. I've been taking care of it. Withhold your horror, Jiang Cheng, I've done great!"

“I didn’t say anything!”

“Qinghe Nie’s doing pretty well since everyone there’s pretty independent. The Gusu Lan elders are in charge over there, but they keep switching between spokespeople since the clan usually handles talking to the disciples and they can’t seem to come to any agreements on the important stuff. Last I heard, Jin Zixun and four other cousins pretty much calmed down the mess going on at Koi tower, so at least the fires were put out, and I’m not sure what’s going on at Nightless City. They put the whole place on lockdown.”

The sect leaders frowned, considering the report.

“Wei Wuxian!” Madam Yu spoke commandingly. “How did you contact us?”

“Oh, it was really cool. I traced the signal back to its origin and left a distress message. The characters seemed meant for information sharing, rather than anything malicious, so I figured it couldn’t hurt. And then this guy named Mo Xuanyu — silver eyes like me, slightly shorter — sent back help. I’ll be able to get you all out!”

At the beginning — or even just after the first episode — the watchers would have all gladly left. They would have figured the simulation was a lie, and put the incident out of their minds.

But now?

“Can we… not?” Nie Mingjue asked.

“Er-Sect Leader Nie?” Wei Wuxian checked. “And I think I heard Huaisang-xiong earlier… wait, is everyone there?”

“...Yes.”

”Oh, uh, greetings, Sect Leader Jin, Sect Leader Nie, Acting Sect Leader Lan, Your Excellency. I… thought only the Jiangs could hear me, my apologies.”

It was so, so strange to hear Wei Wuxian addressing anyone formally. Then again, if they had really been gone for days, perhaps he had been forced to pay even more attention to his complicated status than usual.

“I… guess you don’t have to leave. The exit out will be an array that will look like it's inscribed on the “ground” somewhere in the area. To leave, you have to stand in it for a few seconds. But… why would you stay in there?”

“It is necessary for the future of the cultivation world,” Lan Xichen responded, so confidently and politely that the statement had to be taken at face value despite its vagueness.

“I… alright, I guess. I’ll just install it, and if you don’t want to leave I suppose you… won’t have to.”

“Can you contact us again?”

”There are these little fluctuations every once in a while where it becomes easier to contact you. I can try to hit the next one?”

The resting spaces between segments, everyone assumed.

“That would be great.”

“O… kay? Any last questions before I go, I guess?”

“Yes,” Jin Zixuan rushed to say, then caught himself and cleared his throat, running through how to phrase it. “Um, do you know if… sending this message back to us affected the people over there in any way? Like, is there anything tying them here?”

“Tying them here? Well… I guess there was this one bit of data I couldn’t figure out. It seemed like it tied the five souls that I presume used this to contact us — counting Mo Xuanyu — to other souls like the reincarnation cycle. Maybe.”

“Can you explain more?”

“Um… Mo Xuanyu’s signature just fused with me for some reason, and then one connected to Shijie and Jin Zixuan, one went over to an engaged couple of Lans, one headed to Nightless City, and one went to Sect Leader Ouyang and his wife. I’m not sure what it means though.”

‘It means my son will still be born,’ Jin Zixuan thought, lighting up.

“Is that what you wanted?”

“Yes!” Jin Zixuan turned to Yanli, declaring “As long as we… um, well, I think we can make Jin Ling happen!”

Her eyes widened, and Jiang Cheng let out a sigh of relief as he and the other Jiangs realized the implications. As long as they did the same thing, they didn’t have to worry about writing their son/grandson/nephew out of existence. He would grow up differently, but it would still be his soul.

“Um… okay. I’d appreciate if you at least send one person out though. I don’t think everyone believed me when I said I could get you out of here, and if I just say you all ‘didn’t want to’ I’d probably get thrown out of the conferences so… yeah. Bye!”

The real Wei Wuxian’s voice disappeared, and the watchers were left alone again.

Chapter End Notes

We all hate Wen Chao, but sometimes he has his uses. And yes, I snuck Mo Dao Zu Shi Q in there! It’s so adorable!

Everybody Gets a Wen Ning!!!

"Well. That happened."

"Eloquent," Nie Mingjue scolded teasingly toward Huaisang, who, in his defense, had been the first person able to speak after the bombardment of revelations they were given. He felt like he should get some credit for that.

"Wait, he said Mo Xuanyu sent it back?"

"You don't think-"

"The older him-"

Jin Guangshan hummed smugly, commenting "I suppose if anyone could find a way through the time travel created by Wei Wuxian, it would be the boy's younger-self."

Jiang Fengmian frowned slightly, disliking Jin Guangshan's continued focus on his young ward.

"Um… maybe the future Wei Wuxian just wasn't willing to send back messages to anyone else?" Jiang Yanli suggested, trying to redirect the sect leader's attention.

Wen Chao nodded in complete agreement.

"Of course. There's no way that low-born brat could be the only one to succeed unless the odds were stacked in his favor!" he cackled.

Ironically, the fact that Wen Chao was the one to say this only made the others more convinced that it was Wei Wuxian's unique brilliance that allowed him to trace it back. They had seen the future version in Mo Xuanyu's body — "silver eyes like me, slightly shorter" Wei Wuxian had said — and had personally witnessed his mind. In both investigation and inventing, it was clear he was unparalleled.

In some ways, this only proved the simulation's authenticity.

"He said we should pick one person to go, didn't he?" Jin Zixuan suddenly pointed out, glancing to the blood-red array that had slowly faded into existence on the invisible platform they stood on. It had appeared gradually, but, now that it was fully-formed, the crackling of resentful energy flickering off the crimson characters couldn't be more obvious. They finally had a way out of the prison.

And no one wanted to take it.

Glancing at his wife, Jin Guangshan suggested, “Perhaps you should go. Based on what he said, it seems like our sect needs the most guidance.”

“Then why don’t you go?” Madam Jin fired back, despite being well-aware of the reason. “I need to stay and make sure Wei Wuxian isn’t a threat to A-Xuan and A-Li. You must realize only one of us needs to be present for that, right? There’s no need for you to be here.”

“I-”

“Unless, of course, there’s something else you’re interested in?”

Even Jin Guangshan wasn’t shameless enough to admit his interest to the Jiang Sect leader’s face.

“I just don’t think I’m the best person to leave.”

“Of course,” Wen Ruohan agreed seamlessly. “As Sect Leaders, it is our duty to gain this knowledge.”

As much as he usually disagreed with Wen Ruohan, Lan Qiren was forced to admit, “Indeed. While your emotionally-driven excuses are important, learning how to prevent the invention of demonic cultivation is far more vital to the sects.”

Jin Guangshan’s lips twitched, wondering if Lan Qiren truly thought Wen Ruohan wanted to stop Wei Wuxian.

“If we take out the Sect Leaders, there aren’t many people left,” Jiang Fengmian pointed out, not volunteering to go but feeling the point needed to be raised. He turned to his wife.

“Don’t look at me,” she snarled. “Until I find out why that brat killed A-Li and Zixuan, I’m not moving from this spot.”

And that was another point: with the no touch system in place, they physically could not force anyone to leave the simulation. Whoever went would have to volunteer for the role.

“Everyone will need to believe the speaker,” Lan Wangji calmly pointed out, eyes glued to the array crackling behind him. “All the sects will.”

Xichen nodded, “The person who goes doesn’t necessarily have to be respected amongst all the sects, but they must at least have some sway.”

“Are you volunteering?”

“...Not unless there are no other options. Based on what I saw in the future, it seems the Lan Sect is heavily affected by the coming events.”

The only sect whose future had not been hinted at was the Nie sect, but, even ignoring how Nie Mingjue leaving would be openly disagreeing with Wen Ruohan (inevitably inciting conflict), he knew he couldn’t. He would not leave Nie Huaisang as the only Nie in a room containing both Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan, nor would he let his brother try to explain the situation to the other sects. Not only would they not believe him, but the stress it would put Huaisang under was inexcusable.

Nie Mingjue spoke, “I don’t think any sects would believe the claims of possibly-possessed teenagers trying to explain that we all wanted to stay here. The only possible exception is Lan Wangji, who is obviously heavily-involved in future events.”

Abruptly, Lan Wangji’s face became conflicted. Although no one else could tell, Xichen saw his brother’s mind war with itself over the situation. He would leave if he was told to — if everyone agreed he had to — but if he could choose to stay, he would.

~~He wanted to see more of Wei Ying~~.

Wen Qing frowned, glancing across the crowd. Normally, she would do whatever his excellency told her to, but, the more she thought about it-

Who could she trust to tell her about A-Ning? Even if the others seemed hopelessly ~~kind~~ naive, would they truly betray Wei Wuxian to tell her the truth? Of course not, that would be ridiculous.

But if his excellency refused-

But hadn’t the others been supporting each other all this time? Even without being close, she, at the very least, must be able to rely on the boy who would become the righteous Hanguang-jun. He would-

No, he wouldn’t back her up. It was foolish of her to hope. The Wens would go to war with the Lans, he had nothing to gain from letting her stay. But then, Wen Qing’s eyes made contact with Jiang Yanli’s, and the Jiang girl realized her panic.

“...Given what apparently happened to Wen-guniang’s brother, I don’t believe she should leave either,” Jiang Yanli requested, making Wen Qing flinch back slightly at being so easily read. However, within an instant, she coughed and straightened up, making eye contact with Wen Ruohan.

“I also believe my medical experience will be a unique and valuable perspective,” she added, lying through her teeth and only relaxing when Wen Ruohan gave a careless nod.

Huaisang frowned slightly, thinking through the mess.

“...If we take out the younger teenagers, and the Sect Leaders, and the furens, and Wen Qing, the only person left is-”

“Me, yes?” Wen Xu asked, smirking cockily.

“...Yes.”

The tension in the room once again spiked. The constant changes in seriousness and stress were starting to become exhausting; Huaisang was almost tempted to walk to the array and leave. Of course, if he did that, then he would be met with responsibilities and expectations in the outside world. Probably best to just stay with his Da-ge. In addition, it was kind of fun to see everyone try puzzling this out.

Wen Xu was certainly old enough to have his Clan's respect, and, so long as the Wen Clan supported one story, the other clans would have no choice but to concede. However, he was also loyal beyond a doubt to Wen Ruohan.

While that was usually a good thing between an heir and a leader, it could prove catastrophic for the younger Wei Wuxian waiting outside. No one outside knew anything about the predicted future, and would have no reason to suspect Wen Xu until it was too late.

Yu Ziyuan scowled, and moved to object-

"Alright," Jiang Fengmian allowed.

Every head swiveled in his way, most watchers gaping wide-eyed at the Jiang Sect Leader.

"...I would have thought you would be the most opposed," Nie Mingjue observed curiously. Jiang Fengmian smiled at him for a moment, before turning his now-cold eyes on a curious Wen Xu.

"I have faith in A-Xian's mind," he explained. "Don't forget, he'll contact us again at the end of the next segment. If he's truly as aware of the other sects' situations as we think he is, then I'm sure he'll be able to update us on any strange circumstances, don't you agree?"

It was said in the same calm, near-passive tone that Jiang Fengmian always spoke in, but the implied threat was heard nonetheless. No one could deny that the Wen brothers were the only two willing to leave, nor that, of the two, Wen Xu was the only one people would trust.

If there was nothing that could be done to prevent this from happening, their best option was to try and mitigate the damage as much as they could. Wen Xu's smile faltered slightly, hearing the very genuine threat loud and clear. If something happened to a sect, its sect leader could leave.

And if they were the only leader out, it was entirely possible for them to launch a pre-emptive strike on another sect. The room was tipping back and forth in a delicate balance; if one of them left, they would all leave. Then, none of them would have knowledge of the future.

Wen Ruohan's speculative gaze turned on Jiang Fengmian for a moment, before nodding once and glancing back at to his son.

"As Sect Leader Jiang said, it would be best to not give those of us who stay here any reason to worry, especially with the time advantage you'll have. Allow them to rest assured that you'll stick to gaining connections and supporting those who deserve it."

"Of course, father."

Wen Xu wouldn't do anything overt, but that didn't mean he couldn't start trying to win Wei Wuxian over. Several people tensed, but acknowledged that there were no better options.

“No complaints then?” Wen Xu asked, giving the crowd a glance, before stepping through them to the array on the ground. As soon as his feet touched the center of the circle, a blinding blood-red light filled the room as the sounds of static doubled in magnitude. For the first time since he was brought into the simulation, Wen Xu could feel something — heat, coming from below his feet, where the array sat.

Then, two seconds later, he was gone.

With a gasp, Wen Xu awoke.

“Wen-gongzi!” a woman shouted from his right, hurrying over. He turned to her, and recognized her as one of the healers from Wen Qing's branch family.

Soon, there was an onslaught of people gathered around the room, attracted by the shocked shout. Luckily, the healers kept them out to prevent patients from being disturbed.

“Wen-gongzi,” the healer began again, hesitantly. “Do you feel pain anywhere?”

“I’m fine,” he rejected, pulling his hand away from where she had been trying to feel his pulse. A younger man, also a healer, quickly brought over a glass of water.

“Gongzi-”

“Leave,” he ordered calmly, and they both cowered away.

Wen Xu’s eyes drifted toward the people watching him from outside the room, and saw the overwhelming relief on their faces. They also, however, kept turning to the still-sleeping Wen Ruohan’s body with unconcealed confusion.

“Wen-gongzi,” Wen Zhuliu greeted, stepping forward and saluting lowly. “Do you know why you woke up?”

“Yes, YunmengJiang’s head disciple figured something out,” Wen Xu revealed, taking note of how, despite there being surprise, there was a distinct lack of astonishment. It seemed Wei Wuxian had kept the other sects up-to-date on his research, or at least the existence of it.

Good, then no one would be surprised by his sudden interest in the boy.

“Do you know why His Excellency hasn’t woken?” Wen Zhuliu prompted, straight to the point as always.

“I do,” Wen Xu confirmed, then turned toward the crowd. “Send word to the other sects: the Great Sect Leaders are being granted knowledge that is vital to the future of the cultivation world. I was chosen to return and maintain order while they continued to gather information.”

“They chose to stay?” someone asked, flabbergasted.

“They did. They felt they had a moral obligation to find out the truth being offered to them, and all agreed to remain. When they are ready to leave, they can exit using the array YunmengJiang's head disciple created. Until then, they will stay."

"Understood, gongzi," Wen Zhuliu bowed again. "I shall inform the other sects at once."

"Good. And, when you're done-"

Wen Xu frowned. He needed to begin gaining Wei Wuxian's trust, but going himself would raise far too many questions, especially with the sects in such disarray. No, he needed someone who Wei Wuxian could grow to trust, but was still tied to the Wen sect.

Someone who the future-him was known to work with.

"Gongzi?"

"After, tell Wen Qionglin — Wen Ning — to take a group to Yunmeng Jiang and offer help as thanks for his assistance in allowing me to escape."

"Understood."

Thanks to how long their discussion took, the watchers barely had time to sit down again before the next segment started.

The sun appeared, shining down on a clearing which was surrounded on all sides by natural stone pillars. Inside, an archery target was set up.

Then, a heavy sigh was heard.

'God, we already had to sit through the clans' debates early in the morning! Now I have a headache, why is this place so hard to navigate on top of all that?' Wei Wuxian asked, groaning to himself. Unlike his usual black-and-red outfit, Wei Wuxian was fitted into a festive red and gold outfit — the uniform for the discussion conference.

His gaze drifted around the open field until he heard a soft thump from his right.

"Huh?" he asked, turning towards it.

A second later, another arrow flew forward and hit the bull's eye.

"Not bad," Lan Xichen admitted.

"Xichen-ge, who do you think it is?" Nie Huaisang asked, receiving an equally unsure expression in response. Based on what the simulation had shown, it seemed like it was skipping over unimportant details.

Whoever this was, they would likely play a significant role.

"The shooter's hand is firm and steady. Who's this excellent archer?" Wei Wuxian asked, moving around the target to get a better look.

"A-Ning?!" Wen Qing couldn't help revealing in shock.

"What?" numerous people shouted, most doing a double take.

Before them, a young boy in Wen robes stood, brow creased in determination. Carefully, he lifted his arms and aimed another shot. His concentration peaked, and his surroundings faded away until his focus rested solely on the target before him.

"Nice shot!" Wei Wuxian shouted.

With a scream, Wen Ning startled and launched his arrow towards Wei Ying.

"A-Xian!"

"Woah," Wei Wuxian said, catching the arrow with his bare hand.

"Wow," Nie Mingjue muttered.

Wen Ruohan raised an eyebrow, impressed with both Wei Wuxian's reflexes and Wen Ning's skill.

(He had thought the boy was only useful as a hostage, but now-)

Seeing his gaze, Wen Qing focused on maintaining a blank face, trying to hid how she clenched her fists in abject terror.

"That was close," Wei Wuxian continued, before looking up and smiling at Wen Ning. "Don't be so nervous. What's your name? You're such a good archer!"

Hearing Wei Wuxian's usual social exuberance, Wen Qing relaxed slightly. She should have expected it, given what she had seen so far, but Wei Wuxian's open positivity was still staggering.

~~'No, no. You can't forget what he does. One of these days, he'll kill A-Ning to turn him into an unstoppable weapon. Don't get your hopes up.'~~

Still smiling, Wei Wuxian continued "I'm serious. That was really amazing. It's rare to see such a skilled arch-"

"I'm sorry!" Wen Ning yelled, then turned and sprinted behind one of the rock formations, hiding like a scared rabbit.

For a moment, there was silence. Then-

"Wait…. That's the Ghost General?!?!"

"...Couldn't be," Lan Qiren muttered, remembering the fierce corpse's unparalleled power and ferociousness. "I… suppose they look similar, but he-"

Then, Yanli giggled.

“He’s so cute,” she whispered. Wen Qing turned away at the words — unwilling to risk letting her mask break — and missed seeing Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue nod in synch.

“Huh? Am I really that intimidating?” he asked, staring at the stop where Wen Ning had stood just moments ago. “Hm. Whatever.”

With a casual toss, Wei Wuxian speared the arrow straight through the distant target. Most people wouldn’t have been so powerful or accurate even with a bow.

Jiang Cheng let out a breathless sound halfway between a gasp of awe and a jealous sigh. As far as he could tell, the additional year this-Wei-Ying lived had made him significantly more powerful. Not surprising, given that he was one of the most powerful of their generation despite beginning his cultivation late.

~~“As expected of the favored child,” his mother’s voice mocked.~~

“This place is a maze!” he complained again. “Where’s the archery field’s entrance?”

From behind the stone wall, Wen Ning tensed slightly, then, hesitantly raised a hand to point to the right.

“Well, it’s… over there,” he explained.

“Hm?” Wei Wuxian glanced in the indicated direction, then smiled and bowed to Wen Ning. “Thanks! I’m Wei Ying from Yunmeng Jiang. Courtesy name Wuxian. May I have your name, gongzi?”

It really wasn't fair for him to be so constantly upbeat. Although she was confident she could remember to hate him, Wen Qing noticed herself slipping every time she relaxed.

Slowly and cautiously, Wen Ning crept out from behind the stone, his hands clasped together.

“I… I’m Wen Ning from the Wen Clan. Courtesy name Qionglin.”

Once again, Jiang Yanli barely kept herself from cooing at the adorable behavior of the young Wen. Xichen obviously felt the same, and, although he was trying to hide it, it seemed like Nie Mingjue wasn’t too far behind them.

With her most inviting smile, Yanli turned to Wen Qing and said, “I had no idea your younger brother was so skilled at archery, Wen-guniang.”

“I was also uninformed,” Wen Ruohan added.

The hesitant smile that had begun to creep onto Wen Qing’s face instantly vanished and she bowed lowly to her sect leader.

“My apologies for not informing you, Your Excellency. However, my brother is only capable when acting alone; as soon as he tried to practice with someone else, he becomes completely incapable. In addition, he only began practicing recently, so I neglected to inform you. My deepest apologies."

It pained her to speak so dismissively of her A-Ning, but she could not allow Wen Ruohan to consider using him as anything beyond a hostage. If he was sent on one of Wen Ruohan's attacks (used to corral smaller clans into obedience) and got hurt-

And yet, despite her best efforts, he had died anyway, hadn't he? Their glimpse of the future had confirmed at least that much.

Wen Ruohan hummed, but allowed the subject to drop.

Then, one after another, five flags were raised in the air. Gusu, Yunmeng, Qishan, Lanling, and Qinghe all proudly displayed their symbols in a line.

Drums began to beat, and the ground below the flags switched to the competition's starting point. Banners fluttered, music played, and the disciples gathered around into small groups.

"Wei Wuxian, where did you go?!" Jiang Cheng demanded.

"I got lost," he explained as he came to a stop in front of an enormous tarp with the Wen Sect's sun painted in the center. "Wow! This must be the famous Qiong Qi Drum! Spectacular."

As Wen Chao preened at the compliment, Wen Qing worked to withhold an exhausted sigh. She loved her position, her brother, and the rest of her family, but she was not blind to the less-than-savory ways the Wen heirs represented her sect.

"Is it really made out of the skin of Qiong Qi?"

"If it is, the legend that the Wen Clan's ancestor Wen Mao killed Qiong Qi must also be true."

Wen Chao's eyes arrogantly surveyed the crowd, pleased by the discussion about his ancestor. The simulation might have proven Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji 's power, but they could never hope to kill a divine beast of the same magnitude as his ancestor did!

"Qiong Qi is an ancient fierce beast," Jiang Cheng reminded. "No one has seen it. Who knows whether or not it was true. As for the drum… Father did say it wasn't ordinary."

With a laugh, Wei Wuxian ran forward and wrapped an arm around his third shidi's shoulders.

"What? You want it?" he asked, making the other boy laugh. "Don't worry. When I find out where the beast is, I'll kill it and bring it back to make an even bigger drum!"

Behind them, someone tested the strength of his bowstring several times, making a musical sound. Wei Wuxian looked back, then lit up.

“Hey! Lan Zhan! Is that you?”

Lan Wangji glared back, then began to walk away.

“Wangji-xiong!” Nie Huaisang protested. “Why would you do that! Wei-xiong is never going to realize you like him if you give him the cold shoulder!”

“I don’t like him,” Lan Wangji responded evenly.

Jiang Cheng scowled, about to argue that Lan Wangji didn’t deserve Wei Wuxian, until he saw the slight red on Lan Wangji’s ears and quieted down. He supposed he didn’t have any room to talk when it came to hiding affection under anger and aloofness.

“Lan Zhan, why are you ignoring me?” Wei Wuxian whined. “We were at least classmates before. No need to be so cold.”

“At least classmates?” Madam Jin repeated disbelievingly.

“Well, no offense,” Nie Mingjue muttered glancing at the Lan brothers, “But I don’t think any of us would have figured it out without his thoughts and Xichen.”

As Lan Xichen began to laugh and Lan Qiren glared, Lan Wangji looked down slightly. Affection and romance always led to disaster in his clan; encouraging Wei Ying should be the last thing on his mind. Why couldn’t everyone leave this alone? He was perfectly fine on his own.

Why did it have to be his life on display for everyone to see?

After a several-second-long glare, Lan Wangji gave a heavy sigh.

“Excuse me,” he said. Wei Wuxian faltered for a moment, then covered it up with a cheerful grin, sweeping his arm dramatically as he allowed Lan Wangji to pass.

Then, as soon as Wangji was a sufficient distance away, Wei Wuxian smirked and shouted, “Lan Zhan! Your forehead ribbon isn’t straight!”

His hand immediately slapped his head in a rush to check.

Panicking slightly, the real Lan Wangji also brought his hand up to check his own ribbon. The sight made a majority of the teenagers snicker, only to fall into a mischievous silence under the Second Jade’s ferocious glare.

Realizing that his ribbon was already perfect, Lan Wangji glared darkly at the snickering Wei Wuxian. For a moment, the day’s light seemed to fade under his fury, and the wind picked up into a dangerous rumble. It remained like this for a few seconds more, before he spun on his heel and marched off, Wei Wuxian laughing uproariously the whole time.

Jiang Fengmian sighed fondly, privately delighted by his ward’s open playfulness, only to hesitate slightly when his wife turned a terrifying glower upon him.

“Absolutely shameless,” she hissed. “What is that boy thinking!”

“San-niang, there’s no harm in a little teas-”

“Would you still think that if A-Cheng was the one doing it?! No, I suppose you would approve of such reckless chaos; it’s what your sect values, isn’t it?”

“San-Niang, enough. That isn’t-”

“Isn’t it?”

Although they had endeavored to keep their voices down, perhaps subdued by the scenes showing their family, it was obvious to everyone what they were saying. While most of the unwilling audience pretended not to hear, Wen Ruohan gave them a highly considering look.

Then, with a gust of wind sending his hair flowing back, Lan Wangji appeared on a cliff overlooking the grounds, presumably several minutes later.

“Wangji-xiong! Wangji-xiong!” someone called from below.

Lan Wangji turned his gaze down, making eye contact with a beaming Wei Wuxian.

“Ah, Lan Zhan!” he exclaimed with a smile.

Wangji glared.

“I’m sorry for earlier!” Wei Wuxian declared unconvincingly. “You were ignoring me; it’s not my fault.”

He branched off from the crowd of people surrounding him to get closer to Lan Wangji, not noticing the mix of amused and forlorn gazes watching him go.

Nie Huaisang huffed a slight laugh, seeing Wei Wuxian’s ever-so-constant popularity. Given that, it was almost unbelievable that he had become friends with the weak, air headed Nie heir at the cloud recesses. It probably didn’t mean much to Wei Wuxian, but Nie Huaisang couldn’t understate how much he appreciated the unconditional offer of friendship.

His Wei-xiong was truly special.

“Wangji-xiong!” Wei Wuxian repeated.

Lan Wangji turned away.

“Huh?” Wei Wuxian blinked, confused.

Xichen snorted.

Laughing slightly, Wei Wuxian moved so that he was just under the ledge where Lan Wangji stood.

Realizing escape was impossible, Lan Wangji sighed and asked, “What is it?”

Smirking, Wei Wuxian reached into his qiankun sleeve's pocket and pulled out an enormous present. As Lan Wangji jumped down, Wei Wuxian leaned on the box and cleared his throat.

"Last year I was away and missed your birthday," he explained. "So I made sure to specifically get you a gift for today."

"Unnecessary."

"Eh?" Wei Wuxian asked, doing a double take.

Ignoring the chortling teenagers around him, Lan Wangji focused on taking deep breaths, his mind caught up in a destructive war with itself. He couldn't tell if he was proud of his simulation-self's calmness, angry at the refusal, or jealous over his other-self getting yet another present from Wei Wuxian.

His simulation-self didn't realize how lucky he was.

Wei Wuxian stared after the departing Lan Wangji, gaping openly. Then, he turned and chased after.

"Don't be so cold," Wei Wuxian advised. "I put a lot of effort into it! I really hadn't known you'd never read it-"

Suddenly realizing what he was talking about, the trio of teenage heirs gave Lan Wangji apprehensive stares.

"It's a beginner's one this time," Wei Wuxian explained with a smirk. "You can definitely accept it!"

Cheerfully as always, Wei Wuxian held out Entry-Level Erotic Depictions with Tips for Love. Lan Wangji scornfully gazed down, before turning his head away with a huff.

"Ridiculous."

"Saw that coming from a mile away," Nie Mingjue whispered to a giggling Xichen.

"Eh?" Wei Wuxian exclaimed, sounding genuinely confused with Lan Wangji's refusal. Nevertheless, he shook off his first failure and shown with renewed determination.

This time, he pulled out a plate painted red with chili powder.

"I also brought you a specialty of Yunmeng: Spicy Mantis Shrimps-"

"No one can tolerate that except you," Jiang Cheng denied.

"Or this calligraphy I wrote!" he laughed, holding up a scroll with a portrait he drew of the Lan heir next to the words 'Lan Wangji is so attractive!'

Ears slowly turning red, Lan Wangji added the three additional presents to his mental list of the gifts his ungrateful other-self got to receive.

“Hey, Lan Zhan, talk to me!” Wei Ying requested, blocking off his fleeing friend. “Which one do you like?”

In response, Lan Wangji notched an arrow and aimed at his smiling crush. Instantly, Wei Ying’s face changed to one of panic.

“If you don’t like any of them, I’ll get you something else!”

Jiang Yanli laughed slightly, finding the now obviously-mutual crushes between the boys adorable. While she made sure not to show it, Wen Qing was feeling much the same.

Lan Zhan released the arrow.

Even though his encounter with Wen Ning proved he could simply catch the arrow, Wei Wuxian responded to the second jade’s attack by ducking down and screaming.

“Help! Lan Zhan is trying to kill me!”

Then, he paused and looked back at where the arrow had landed, noticing the practice target there.

“Lan-er-gongzi has hit the bullseye,” an announcer proclaimed.

~~Lan Zhan did not think Wei Ying’s befuddled expressions was adorable. He did not.~~

Although it wasn’t a surprise, Jiang Fengmian nodded to Lan Qiren with respect, impressed by his prized student’s archery. It took everything in the other man to bow back without preening.

(The stressful experience they were in had all-but shattered his self control.)

Wei Wuxian stared at the arrow for a moment, before his face lit up as the illusion of a sun appeared next to his head.

Nie Huaisang couldn’t resist laughing at the adorable way the simulation’s creators had shown Wei Wuxian having an idea.

Presumably several minutes later, Lan Wangji was once again poised to take a shot. He narrowed his eyes in concentration, only to lose it when an arrow flew by from directly behind him, slicing his previous arrows in half upon impact.

“Wei-gongzi has hit the bullseye.”

Wen Chao scoffed, muttering something that sounded suspiciously like “I could do that too,” before Wen Ruohan’s glare shut him up.

“Wei Ying!”

With smug disregard, Wei Wuxian cheekily responded, "What? The target isn't just yours. Why can't I shoot it?"

"...Whatever."

Head buried in his hand, Jin Zixuan mumbled a soft, "You two are so cute."

"We're not," Lan Wangji snapped back, glaring. The Jin heir was undeterred, however. After he had decided that his mother and fiancée might be onto something with their investment in the two's relationship, he had also begun paying more attention. Now that he was, their mutual unaware pining was mortifyingly sweet.

"Look how hard they're trying," Jiang Yanli whispered at him.

Jin Zixuan nodded back with a, "I can't believe Wei Wuxian got him so many presents."

"And they're all personalized."

"And-"

"Quiet," Lan Wangji hissed. Lan Qiren looked like he was about to gaze disapprovingly on his unusually-flustered nephew, but stopped at Lan Xichen's thoroughly pleased smile.

After refilling Wangji's quiver, the pair's match began again.

An arrow hit.

"Lan-er-gongzi has hit-"

Another one.

"Or — Wei-gongzi has hit-"

Another one.

"Lan-er-gongzi has hit — Wei-gongzi has hit-

"Oh my god-"

"Lan-er-gongzi has hit the bullseye! Wei-gongzi has hit the bullseye! Lan-er-gongzi has hit the bullseye! Wei-gongzi has hit the bullseye-"

"Seriously?"

"Lan-er-gongzi has hit the bullseye! Wei-gongzi has hit the bullseye! Lar-er-gongzi has hit the bullseye! Wei-gongzi has hit the bullseye!"

"Now they're just showing off!" Jiang Cheng protested.

"Lar-er-gongzi has hit the bullseye! Wei-gongzi has hit the bullseye! Lan er gong-Wei-gongzi. Hit, hit, hit… they both hit it."

“Oh, that poor announcer,” Nie Huaisang bemoaned pitifully.

Everyone else was either smirking in amusement or staring slack-jawed at the display before them. There had never been any doubt the two were talented, but this was something else.

Nearly an hour later, all four nearby targets were decorated with a plume of arrow feathers located smack dab in the middle. Every one of the dozens of shots had been a bullseye.

Wei Wuxian sneaked forward and gazed appreciatively on the display they had created. He laughed as he stared at them.

“These bouquets are nicely arranged!” he winked. “There’s mine in yours, and there’s yours in mine.”

“I guess that’s where his fourth place ranking comes from,” Jin Guangshan cackled, raising an eyebrow in surprised appreciation. Jiang Yanli frowned, but, realizing who she was up against, refrained from mentioning Wei Wuxian’s complete and utter lack of experience in romance.

Lan Wangji gripped his bow tighter and glared, “You were provoking me.”

He spun on his heel and began to storm off, only for Wei Wuxian to pop in front of him again.

“You didn’t accept my gifts!” he pointed out. “I had to do this.”

Silently, Wei Wuxian held out one of the feather bouquets, offering it to the second jade.

“Here, your birthday gift.” Wei Wuxian declared as Lan Wangji’s expression shifted to one of shock. “Lan Zhan, do you like it?”

One thing was undeniable: no god or dream or immortal or deity could possibly compare to the beauty on display before them. As the afternoon's warmth created a soft halo of light around them, Wei Wuxian tilted his head and gave an angelic smile. Coupled with his beautiful aura, the air around him seemed to shine like the sun. Meanwhile, the equally beautiful Lan Wangji turned a soft pink — pale skin blushing a beautiful rose — and looked away. The flush had spread from his ears to his cheeks, and down his neck. The wind brushed their hair back, long tresses flowing like smooth rivers around them. One could almost believe their mere presence blessed the land.

No matter how hard they tried, no artist could possibly recreate the scene’s beauty.

“...That is so unfair.”

No one had to ask what Nie Huaisang was referring to. Lan Xichen held the title as the most sought after bachelor in the cultivation world, but seeing the perpetually-apathetic Lan Wangji suddenly blush was unquestionably more precious than Lan Xichen’s constant smile, even if just for the rarity. Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, had maintained spot four even with no family background, meaning his over-exuberance being replaced by genuine romantic attempts created a siren song of a vision.

Jin Guangshan hummed to himself, mentally tallying up how much their faces could earn if someone knew how to use them well. Politically, their appearances would be combined with their talents and connections, creating a package that would leave any manipulator salivating in anticipation.

Trembling slightly, the still-turned-away Lan Wangji finally uttered out a soft, "Ridiculous."

Simultaneously, Jiang Yanli and Lan Xichen cooed.

"Xiongzhang!"

"I'm sorry, Wangji, but it's-"

"Adorable."

The real Lan Wangji began to tremble, torn between utter humiliation and his meger leftover pride. Despite what was being displayed before them, he refused to show weakness.

However, he had to admit, it was much easier to accept everyone's reactions when he had also gotten to see them through the simulation. When compared against the Jiang marriage, Nie Huaisang's cheating, Jin Zixuan's confession, and the Wen's supposed defeat, the ~~flirtatious~~ interactions between himself and Wei Ying seemed comparably insignificant.

A short while later, the beat of the drums picked up in intensity.

An announcer stood tall and declared, "Leaders of Lanling Jin Clan, Yunmeng Jiang Clan, and Qinghe Nie Clan, as well as Lan Qiren-xiansheng have arrived!"

The disciples all stood in straight rows as four men walked down the path in the middle. At the front of the four leaders stood Nie Mingjue, his head held high.

Both Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian broke formation slightly to gaze happily at their sect leader as he passed, a stark comparison to Lan Wangji, standing at Wei Wuxian's right, who remained calmly facing forward.

The watchers were brought up the steps with the sect leaders, only stopping when Nie Mingjue came to a halt. The man turned to glare at the places laid out for them, then up at the elevated centerpiece where Wen Ruohan would soon sit.

Realizing what had been laid out, the real Nie Mingjue also turned to glare, only receiving an amused chuckle in response. Jiang Fengmian stepped forward slightly, attracting Sect Leader Nie's attention, and shook his head once.

'It's not worth it,' he conveyed. 'If you anger him enough, he'll send Wen Chao to Wen Xu, and have his sons destroy Qinghe Nie while you're gone. If you follow, you'll lose information on the future.'

Nie Mingjue growled slightly, but could not deny the statement.

Similarly, as the simulation's Nie Mingjue angrily turned on his heel, Lan Qiren spoke.

"Easy, Sect Leader Nie," he advised.

"Us four Clans and the Wen Clan always sat together as host and guests, but now Wen Ruohan is acting like he's the Leader of all Clans!"

A loud scoff.

"Are we not?" Wen Chao snidely asked. "What exactly can you do against us?"

Nie Mingjue immediately stood up, only to belatedly remember their inability to touch each other. As Wen Chao began to snicker, Nie Huaisang spoke.

"Eh?" he asked. "But we already know the answer to that question, don't we? We fought, and we won. That was the first thing we heard, wasn't it?"

Just as he predicted, even with Huaisang's exaggeratingly ignorant tone, the reminder was enough to infuriate Wen Ruohan. He gave a low growl of warning, making Nie Mingjue stand protectively in front of an innocently-tilting-his-head-Huaisang.

"He has mastered many powerful skills, and merged three established clans in the North," Lan Qiren steadily reminded. At this point, he is powerful enough that he no longer needs to pretend to be friendly with us."

"Hm. Fine then. I'm fed up with all this hypocrisy anyways."

He began walking toward the exit, only for Lan Qiren to hold out a hand, stopping him.

"Sect Leader Nie, please. I know you want to avenge your father, but the Wens' influence is immense. And they're known for their ruthlessness."

The younger teenagers — who until that point had only ever known Lan Qiren as a terrifying teacher — were somewhat awed by the man's calm speech and political mindset. Then again, it wasn't like Wei Wuxian was by any means a normal student, so their perception might have been slightly skewed.

"For the sake of your clan, you have to bear it for now," Lan Qiren concluded as Jin Guangshan sat down. A moment later, the man began to chuckle with false pleasantry.

"Exactly," he agreed. "No need to be angry, Sect Leader Nie. Why not just sit down and have a drink?"

Nie Huaisang and Jin Zixuan glanced awkwardly at each other, usure of how much they agreed with their sect leaders. While Nie Huaisang loved and respected his Da-ge above all else, he knew the Nie Clan couldn't stand against the Wens alone. Jin Zixuan, on the other hand, felt uncomfortably reminded of his father's penchant for overindulging in both alcohol and women.

As Nie Mingjue huffed and took a seat, Jiang Fengmian moved to his own spot.

"It's not important where we sit now," Jiang Fengmian said, glancing across the walkway towards the additional seat. "I'm more interested in seeing who will be sitting with us."

There was a spike in Wen Qing's heart rate as Wen Ruohan leaned back in his chair, consideringly. He glanced at the other sect leaders and thought to himself.

This was a predicted future which had already said the Wen Clan lost the Sunshot Campaign, and the presence of the other sect leaders made it more important than just a random theory. If the Wen Clan failed during the archery competition, then their main source of pride, their strength, would be brutally insulted.

And yet, there was no way the sect leaders could secretly launch an attack right now. Was there any point in worrying about the competition when it technically hadn't happened yet? Would it not be smarter to focus on what the Wen Clan could do differently once they got out?

Wouldn't it be best to see how Wei Wuxian managed against the others?

(If the pheasant hunt was any indication of his skill, this would be an interesting competition.)

Once again, the announcer stepped forward to gather everyone's attention.

"His lordship, Wen-er-gongzi, has arrived!"

Wen Chao immediately snapped upright, his interest in the simulation multiplying.

With a smirk on his face, Wen Chao marched up the steps, then took a seat across from the sect leaders. He glanced over, then gave them a careless salute that was even ruder than Jin Zixuan's had been to Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian.

Madam Yu hissed "The audacity-"

Nie Mingjue scoffed, "Sect Leader Jiang, are you satisfied with this answer?

Instead of growing angry, Jiang Fengmian gave a soft, amused smile and inclined his head once.

In the rows of disciples below, discontentment grew.

"This Wen Chao. Does he think he's the future leader of us all?" Jiang Cheng demanded. He and Wei Wuxian both wore displeased scowls on their faces, and the latter nodded in agreement.

“I guess that’s why they arranged the seating this way.”

“Going to kick up a fuss?” Wen Chao demanded, completely forgetting his father’s silent commands in his excitement at seeing himself. “What exactly do you think you can do?”

Lan Qiren frowned as he drank, warning “Such arrogance forecasts incoming chaos.”

It was clear that Jin Guangshan was the only sect leader who had no problem with it. In that way, the discussion created a clear line dividing the cultivation sects in half.

Nie Huaisang glanced around, cataloging the reactions to each sect leader’s emotions.

The beat of the drums returned, causing ripples in the leader’s cups. As expected, the announcer stepped forward again to introduce the final ruler.

“His Excellency, Wen Ruohan!”

Now, even Jiang Fengmian had stopped smiling. As calm as can be, Wen Ruohan stepped up to his elevated throne, ignoring the other leaders. While Lan Qiren, Nie Mingjue, and Jiang Fengmian had all become more tense, Jin Guangshan had slipped into a genuine smile for a moment, pleased at his ally’s presence. However, a moment later, he noticed the reactions of the others and returned to a neutral expression, fanning himself lightly.

Jin Zixuan wanted to sink into the floor. It was one thing to be close to the Chief Cultivator, but now, when they knew it would result in war, Jin Guangshan’s friendship with him gained a very different light. Seeing his confliction, Jiang Yanli shifted slightly closer.

The second Wen Ruohan sat down, graceful and elegant, yet arrogant and dangerous, the entire congregation of Wen disciples dropped to their knees in unison.

They recited, “Sect Leader Wen of renowned prestige, will live as long as heaven and earth!”

Wen Ruohan hummed. He liked the knowtowing, but the words “renowned prestige” might need to be edited a little. The complete unison was well done though.

Next to him, Jin Guangshan chuckled slightly in considering appreciation, ignoring the barely-hidden disgusted looks thrown his way by his wife and heir.

Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng made displeased eye contact, before saluting Jiang Fengmian as well (though keeping it at an expected level of respect, rather than full-on worship).

“All of you, rise.”

As Wen Chao smirked up at his father, the speaker began again.

“The year of Jimao under the reign of Xuanzheng, the archery competition of the Cultivation Conference begins now! Open array!” he commanded, causing the barrier to melt down. “Hundreds of evil spirits dwell in the stone forest. The one who shoots the most evil spirits wins. Black signals will appear for wrong shots or missed shots, indicating that the participant must leave. When the fireworks begin, you may start.”

Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng made eye contact, both nearly vibrating in excitement at the competition. They had experience hunting and practicing on targets, but the competition was given a more unique spin by isolating the available targets to just spirits.

Huaisang didn’t seem interested in joining their excited eye contact, but Lan Wangji gave them a calm-yet-intrigued glance that made them both start laughing.

Wen Chao took another sip, before glancing over and nearly spitting it out.

“Hold on!” he commanded. “Who’s standing at the end of the line?”

Said person flinched slightly at the harsh voice, before glancing back and revealing himself as Wen Ning. A Wen servant slipped next to Wen Chao, whispering the boy’s name.

“He is Wen Ning.”

“Right, him. What’s he doing here? He’s just a distant relative, who let him in here? Look at him! Can he even draw his bow?”

Were it not for Wen Ruohan’s constant presence, Wen Qing would have paralyzed every one of his limbs. She wondered if he’d still be able to maintain his cocky arrogance while getting his stomach slowly and carefully slit open.

Though, as fun as it was to daydream about it, she knew better than anyone how impossible that would be. She tried to not allow her frustration to show, but must have been more obvious than she thought, as Jiang Yanli gave her an understanding smile.

Wen Qing glared.

“You-”

“Who said he couldn’t draw his bow?”

“What?” Wen Qing gasped out, staring at the simulated Wei Wuxian.

“Yes! Go Wei-xiong!” Nie Huaisang shouted.

Wen Ning’s eyes had widened at the question, and he turned his vulnerable gaze upon Wei Wuxian. Yunmeng Jiang’s head disciple walked toward Wen Chao, head held high.

“Not only can he draw it, he can also shoot very well.”

Wen Qing's breath stuttered slightly as she watched. Why was Wei Wuxian standing up for Wen Ning? There was nothing he could get out of it and he did seem nice but this was the man who would one day turn her brother into a corpse so why-

"Hm," Nie Mingjue muttered. "Good for him."

"You're… Wei Wuxian?" Wen Chao asked.

Wen Ruohan stood and moved to stand directly between his son and Yunmeng Jiang's ward, observing the two. One was the second of his heirs; the other, the heir to his legacy as the cultivation world's strongest monster. As time went on, it was becoming more and more obvious which was the greater investment.

"They say your archery is pretty good," Wen Chao scoffed.

"Good enough for shooting pheasants~"

Was it a coincidence that Wei Wuxian always responded to praise by highlighting his own childishness? Probably. But several people couldn't shake the feeling that had someone taught him to stay as far away from looking like an heir as possible.

Wen Chao laughed, "Then you've got to be careful; our evil spirit targets are nothing like your stupid pheasants. They won't stay still and wait to be shot!"

Among the people too young to control their expressions, utter disgust was clearly displayed. Glancing between the stuttering Wen Ning and the two smirking Wen Chaos, a single thought flew through everyone's minds.

'I didn't think I could hate him any more than I already did. I was very, very wrong.'

(Wen Chao was very proud of his simulation-self; it really showed his wit and power.)

Despite the implied insult against his first disciple, Jiang Fengmian remained calm. Almost too calm, showing no traces of worry as he drank his tea and making no effort to silence Wei Wuxian.

"What? You're not going to stop him?" Madam Yu hissed. "He's destroying our sect's reputation!"

Given that Yunmeng Jiang's reputation was specifically about gaining excellence through valuing freedom and righteous actions, Madam Jin wasn't entirely sure what her friend meant.

Just like his sect leader, Wei Wuxian remained cheerfully smiling even in the face of Wen Chao's words. To his left, Wen Ning shrank down, trying to hide inside his robes like a turtle slipping into its shell.

"Wen Ning!"

The boy flinched.

Unconsciously, Yanli stepped forward and tried to put her hand on Wen Ning's arm for reassurance.

"He said you can shoot," Wen Chao continued. "Let's see what you've got."

As instructed, Wen Ning pulled back an arrow and lined up in front of the target. However, the second he got in place, his arm started trembling frantically.

"A-Ning!" Wen Qing breathed out, stepping next to Yanli and putting her hand on Wen Ning's other arm. Her hand went through, but, with Wen Ning preforming before Wen Ruohan, was too stressed to care.

Wen Ning's nerves tore through his stance. Instead of watching the target, his eyes kept drifting the the audience of skeptical Wens surrounding him. It couldn't be further from the dangerously collected Wen Ning who had shot the arrows alone.

Nie Huaisang stepped toward him as well, feeling an unusual sense of kinship.

"Relax!" Wei Wuxian cheerily advised from the side. "You were doing great just a little while ago."

Rather than the intended effect, Wei Wuxian's advise shocked Wen Ning into releasing the arrow. It missed the target entirely.

Although she was unsurprised by the result, Wen Qing felt fear tear through her nonetheless. Even worse than Wen Ruohan's response, she suddenly realized the danger of Wei Wuxian's.

In an act of truly unique kindness and valor, Wei Wuxian had stood up for her brother. He had put his own reputation on the line to give her brother a chance, and Wen Ning had just embarrassed him in front of the entire cultivation world. His offer had come back to bite him.

Now, Wen Qing would never dream of blaming her brother for this, but what if Wei Wuxian did? She had spent the whole time wondering why such a seemingly kind boy would murder her brother to make him into a weapon, war or not!

Perhaps she had just gotten her answer.

Immediately, Wen Chao snorted and began to cackle, having to put his tea down as he doubled over in mocking laugher.

"Great! So great!" he shouted sarcastically. "What were you waiting for? Waiting for me to kick you out? Find someone else!"

Used to the cruel words, Wen Ning simply lowered his head, staring in disappointment at the arrow he had shot. Wei Wuxian approached him, his Jiang bell ringing as he stepped.

Wen Qing's heart skipped a beat, too filled with fear to care about the real Wen Chao's laughter.

“You were just too nervous,” Wei Wuxian whispered calmly. “Don’t worry so much. You’re really good, you know that, right? Among the disciples from all the clans, there are at most three guys better than you!”

Wen Ning looked up at him, awed by Wei Wuxian’s radiance.

‘He doesn’t sound like he’s lying,’ Wen Qing thought, mouth slightly agape. ‘But then, what else could it be?’

On the opposite end of the simulation, Madam Yu glared at the grinning-Wei Wuxian. She was far from unaware of how popular Wei Wuxian was among his shidis and shimeis. They all loved the days he took over teaching them, and had occasionally compared his teaching style to Jiang Fengmian’s (though Wei Wuxian’s was always inevitably more chaotic).

For the first time, she was seeing what they meant.

~~Of course the favored son would be a combination of him and Cangse Sanren. The apple never fell far from the tree, after all.~~

Smirking, Wei Wuxian motioned at Jiang Cheng and continued, “See? You’re better than this one.”

“Hey!”

“Huh?” Jiang Cheng asked, then glared and elbowed Wei Wuxian’s back. “Shut up!”

Wei Wuxian went careening forward, arms pinwheeling as he regained his balance. When he stood up again, he rubbed his sore back while regaining eye contact with Wen Ning.

“I’m serious. There’s nothing to be nervous about. You just need some practice. Next time, you’ll leave them all shocked!”

“Why are you still chatting? Hurry up and get ready!” Jiang Cheng demanded.

When Jiang Yanli smiled at the interactions of her brothers, Wen Qing glanced over and was momentarily overwhelmed by a sense of companionship.

Then Yanli glanced back at her with her ever-constant kindness, and Wen Qing was forced to look away.

“Alright, alright,” Wei Wuxian allowed, not noticing Wen Ning’s slack jawed expression behind him. A moment later, that shock melded into a warm joy, proving at once how effective Wei Wuxian’s comfort was.

Fireworks went off, and the disciples rushed to the fields.

Wen Qing was frozen. That was practically the opposite of her expectations. She hadn’t been sure of why it would happen, but, once she realized how kind Wei Wuxian was to most people, she had been sure some misunderstanding took place between him and her brother that would lead to such hatred.

Surely, there had to have been some reason Wei Wuxian hated A-Ning more than all the other Wens. Why else would he turn her beautiful brother into a corpse?

~~And yet, the look in his eyes when he first saw the Ghost General had been the opposite of hatred, hadn't it?~~

A deep fog swept past the watchers, making the gray stone in the hunting grounds even duller. In one section, Wei Wuxian, Jiang Cheng, and a handful of other Jiang disciples stood, looking around.

“Wait, where are the evil spirits?” one of them asked.

Their only answer was silence as the desolate ground around them remained barren. Another cloud of fog swept by, further obscuring vision, and Jiang Cheng made a decision.

“Let’s go separate ways and meet at the exit.”

“Oh, I don’t like this. I don’t like this at all,” Nie Huaisang whispered, glancing around the ominous fog with worry. Nie Mingjue sighed at his brother’s antics, but motioned for him to come closer regardless. A few seconds later, a considerably-happier Huaisang was, once again, hidden in his brother’s chest.

The simulation’s no-touch rule was surprisingly helpful~

A few moments later, the watchers were brought to the top of two adjacent plateaus. In the crack between them, Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian shuffled through, forced to walk sideways by the small space.

Seeing Wei Wuxian pressed against the wall like that infuriated Lan Wangji. All his life, he had been praised for his control and discipline; yet now he kept imagining himself pressing his chest against the annoying disciple and trapping him in the small space and leaning closer and bringing his lips to-

How could one person possibly be so unbearably distracting? And it was made worse by the blinding smile he always had. It was just like the one on an orphan Wangji had given a rattle drum to years before. And just like that boy had been, Wei Wuxian was dirty and expressive and pointlessly smiling and he was also a troublesome, undisciplined rule breaker and yet so incomparably dazzling that Lan Zhan wanted to-

Wangji once again cut off his thoughts, realizing where they were leading.

Grunting slightly, Wei Wuxian smiled and asked, “Jeez, where on earth are you leading us to?”

“Stop complaining. Just keep u-”

Jiang Cheng flinched and cut off as he bumped his head into an extended piece of rock. Wei Wuxian's laughter shook the walls, and Jiang Cheng clutched his bruised forehead tenderly.

With a cough, Jin Zixuan tried and failed to cover up a snort. With Huaisang also snickering on the side, Jiang Cheng was forced to pick which one of them to elbow in annoyance.

And then he remembered that they wouldn't feel it regardless, so he sent them each his sternest glare until they stopped chuckling.

(It was completely unfair that Jiang Cheng couldn't do anything to stop the simulated Wei Wuxian's laughter, but he would take what he could get.)

Even with Wei Wuxian's constant giggles, the Yunmeng heir remained undeterred. Soon, the pair was crawling across the narrow ground, barely slipping through the small space.

"Hey, how about we just go back to where we started," Wei Wuxian suggested through his laughter. "Don't worry, I won't tell anybody."

"Shut up, you!" Jiang Cheng commanded, then- "Gah!"

Madam Yu's unimpressed gaze was even worse than Wen Chao's scornful cackling as the virtual Jiang Cheng crashed into yet another rock. Soon, Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang were literally crying in laughter, and even Lan Wangji seemed slightly amused.

As soon as they got out, Jiang Cheng was going to burry himself in a hole and hibernate for the next 100 years. Secluded meditation was a perfectly respectable decision.

...Maybe he'd bring a few dogs too. At least then Wei Wuxian wouldn't bother him.

When they got out, a slight lump was visible on Jiang Cheng's forehead, making Wei Wuxian's laughter resume every time he noticed it. The only up-side was that Jiang Cheng's cultivation would heal it quickly, hopefully bringing an end to Wei Wuxian's amusement.

Sliding forward, Wei Wuxian whispered, "Hey, Jiang Cheng!"

"What now?!"

"Look!" Wei Wuxian said, pointing to the sky. Five phantoms floated at around the same elevation, about 30 meters above them. "Those are the evil spirit targets."

They were blankets of shadow, with a head and collarbone resembling the shape of a human's, but a swirling skirt of fabric-like darkness from the chest down. Swirls of maroon energy swept around the greyish forms, dancing across the beings' glowing red eyes.

Even knowing he couldn't be touched, Nie Huaisang stepped further into his Da-ge to hide from the terrifying creatures.

The spirit looked down, then its stitched-together mouth stretched open into a ravenous grin. With an inhuman sound, it catapulted towards them.

Glaring determinedly at the figures, Jiang Cheng swiftly removed an arrow, notched it, and shot down one of the creatures. A second later, he removed the other one.

But the third was centimeters away.

"A-Cheng!"

He flinched back just as the spirit moved to bite down on him, only for it to dissolve away. The arrow which had pierced it fell to the ground.

A second later, the final two were destroyed. Wei Wuxian stood on a nearby cliff — a perfect vantage point for shooting down the spirits. Rather than the cocky grin many were expecting, Wei Wuxian looked back at Jiang Cheng with an open smile of camaraderie.

"You're welcome!" he sang.

He had been too slow.

That realization struck through Jiang Cheng, filling him with annoyance and frustration. It was hardly a new realization, but it seemed Wei Wuxian's archery had surpassed his by an even greater distance than before. And Jiang Fengmian looked as proud of his head disciple as ever.

And why wouldn't he be? His ward had shot down the spirits easily, while his heir had taken them the wrong way and then nearly gotten hurt right after the competition started!

So caught up in his internal musings, Jiang Cheng didn't notice the concerned Jiang Yanli and Nie Huaisang, the impressed Lan Wangji and Jin Zixuan, or the fact that, above all else, Jiang Fengmian was happy that Wei Wuxian had protected his son.

It was Wei Wuxian's job to keep Jiang Cheng safe; as the Jiang heir had done far better than most disciples would have done in that situation, Jiang Fengmian didn't realize his son wanted additional reassurance.

Directly above where the spirits had been shot, fireworks burst into the air. They were the emergency signals pertaining to each sect, allowing the judges to keep score.

"Wow, Sect Leader Jiang," Jin Guangshan commented, standing up. "Your disciples' archery skills are unmatched. I'm certain the winner will be from your clan yet again."

As Jiang Fengmian bowed slightly to the real Jin Guangshan, Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen made eye contact. Seeing how Wei Wuxian's skills compared against the other disciples, one thing became clear.

Madam Yu and Lan Qiren might want to claim Wei Wuxian's actions made the Jiang sect lost face (and considering the sect's emphasis on freedom, even that was inconsequential), but a clan's reputation was truly determined by the skill of the disciples produced.

Overall, Wei Wuxian was helping the sect, not hurting it.

Smiling calmly, Jiang Fengmian responded, "I'm flattered. However, no one can know the result until the match ends."

Shortly after, two Lan, one Jin, and one Nie signal shot into the air. From his seat across from the sect leader's, Wen Chao's eyebrow twitched angrily.

'If I was out there, the Wen Clan would be the only one making any hits,' Wen Chao thought arrogantly.

He looked over, and glared at the sect leaders who were continuing their conversations with each other. Nie Mingjue and Jiang Fengmian seemed to be congratulating each other, and Jin Guangshan was cheerily speaking to Lan Qiren.

When the next firework ended up being for the Wens, Wen Chao smirked and laughed to himself. However, a moment later, five pale suns shot into the air.

Five members of the Wen Clan were out.

Wen Ruohan frowned slightly, but didn't show nearly as much anger as everyone was expecting.

"Gosh, five Wen disciples are already eliminated?" Jin Guangshan observed.

With a clang, the simulation's Wen Chao slammed his cup onto his table. Jin Guangshan hesitated at the reaction, not wanting to alienate his ally, but Nie Mingjue smirked mockingly.

Completely coincidentally, at this moment clouds began to block the sun, dimming its light.

Although he tried to resist, the real Nie Mingjue felt a similar smile working its way onto his mouth. It hadn't technically happened yet, but it was hard for him not to be happy with this.

Nie Huaisang, who was peaking his way out of Nie Mingjue's chest, also grinned slightly.

Jin Guangshan frowned nervously, glancing up at Wen Ruohan once before sitting down and trying to make the Wens forget he had ever offered Jiang Fengmian any praise.

Outraged, Wen Chao immediately stood up, marching to the base of the platform upon which his father sat. He bowed down and spoke.

"Father, please allow me to compete."

Lan Wangji glanced between the two self-satisfied Wen Chaos, furrowing his brow slightly. While Wen Chao wasn't bad at archery, Lan Wangji didn't think he had ever been good enough to turn the tide in the competition. Then again, no one had known of Wen Qionglin's skill, so perhaps the Wen Clan simply didn't care about announcing their archers.

Lan Wangji couldn't shake the feeling that his theory was unlikely.

Back in the competition's grounds, Wei Wuxian chased after yet another spirit. He imbued an arrow with energy, allowing it to follow the moving target and pierce through. The second spirit dodged, but, as the arrow had already hit one, that didn't matter.

The second spirit moved to chase after Wei Wuxian, gaining on him until he punched it into a rock formations ten meters away. A large cloud of dust appeared at collision.

Jin Guangshan gave an appreciative whistle.

Wen Ruohan couldn't resist a slight smile of intrigue.

As Wei Wuxian approached, the armless spirit lay collapsed on the ground, unable to move after the heavy blow. Laughing to himself about the surprising weakness of the spirits, Wei Wuxian notched his arrow and slowly aimed at the being.

Then dodged as another arrow flew at it from behind him.

He turned and saw Wen Chao standing on one of the nearby rock formations.

While technically not against the rules, Nie Mingjue couldn't help feeling disgusted by Wen Chao stealing a spirit that someone else had already taken down. In such a big hunting grounds, the point was to spread out and act like they were on a night hunt.

Stealing someone else's prey was unquestionably unrighteous by comparison.

"Wei Wuxian!" Wen Chao shouted out. "Since I'm here, your people have no chance of victory."

Wei Wuxian ignored him.

While technically frowned upon, Jin Guangshan supposed Wen Chao could have done worse. Wei Wuxian was undoubtedly one of the best archers in the tournament. Normally, there would be no way for anyone to find out about what happened inside the grounds, so following him around (while unsubtle) wasn't the worst idea Wen Chao could have come up with.

From there, as Wei Wuxian ran, a group of six Wen disciples followed along. Nearly every time he moved to shoot a spirit, one of the Wens would hit it first.

Despite that, Wei Wuxian limited his resistance to angry glances back, refusing to get into a fight. It was a stark contrast to his behavior at the Cloud Recesses.

Now that Lan Qiren had an opportunity to directly compare Wei Wuxian's behavior here with how he acted at the Cloud Recesses (or even with how he acted around Jiang Fengmian versus Madam Yu), one thing became clear: Wei Wuxian was well aware of his standing.

When he acted out and was punished with lines, he continued to do so because he thought that was an acceptable price for the fun. The second time he snuck out to get alcohol, he only started rejecting the punishment when he realized Lan Wangji intended to get punished as well. When he hit Jin Zixuan, he was content (even happy as he terrorized the ants), because he had decided getting kicked out was worth Maiden Jiang's honor.

Lan Qiren had thought he was simply uncontrollable, but it seemed like Wei Wuxian thought things through much more deeply than any of them had realized.

Now, Wei Wuxian tried to get an advantage by sticking to high ground. When compared against Wen Chao — who had helpers regularly handing him arrows and another group on the lookout for spirits — it wasn't much of an advantage, but it was better than nothing.

As usual, his helpers ensured that Wen Chao got to take a shot first.

However, those assistants couldn't increase his talent. He missed his shot, and Wei Wuxian got the spirit.

"Huh? What the-"

Wen Chao's question remained unfinished as a purple signal for Yunmeng shined, proving his victory. Simultaneously, a gray signal flashed into the air, signifying his own loss.

His son began to tremble, but Wen Ruohan paid that no mind. Instead, he stared very intently at Wei Wuxian as the boy landed gracefully.

Even with six people helping him look, one person providing arrows, and a status that kept Wei Wuxian from complaining about the advantages, Wen Chao had lost. Wen Ruohan had given his son every lead imaginable, and yet Wei Wuxian's natural talent allowed him to succeed nonetheless.

It seemed it was now undoubtable which boy was worth more. And, judging by the trembling, Wen Chao knew it.

Turning to Wen Chao, Wei Wuxian nodded playfully.

"Thanks," he teased.

"Wei Wuxian! You…."

Seething with anger, Wen Chao didn't notice the concerned look the arrow-holder gave him. Instead, he instantly grabbed an additional three arrows and took aim.

"Hey! You were-"

"Nothing can be done now," Wen Ruohan countered, silencing Nie Mingjue's righteous fury.

“Is there something wrong with your eyes?” Wei Wuxian asked mockingly. “Or is there some other reason you haven’t noticed the big ‘Out’ sign?”

“What did you say?”

“Cheeky brat!” Wen Chao hissed, still trembling with fear. Everyone outside of the Wens and Madam Yu gave Wei Wuxian a mental cheer, thanking him for speaking out against Wen Chao the second he got a rule-based reason to. Even the Wens couldn’t argue against their own rules.

“Black signals will appear for wrong or missed shots, indicating that the participant must leave,” Jiang Cheng recited as he regrouped with Wei Wuxian. “Are you going to break your own rules?”

“Hm. Rules? I am the rules!”

All three Lans frowned at the declaration.

“He’s completely unreasonable,” Jiang Cheng muttered. “Why bother setting the rules in the first place then?”

Normally, Wen Chao would have raised an eyebrow at the statement, daring anyone to deny the truth of the words. Now, however, he only glanced nervously towards his father, who, at the very least, didn’t care enough at the moment to watch him. While Wen Ruohan was undoubtedly furious with his son’s failure, his mind seemed consumed with thoughts on Wei Wuxian.

An accompanying disciple from a minor clan — the Ouyang heir — scoffed, muttering “He thinks he’s above the rules just because he happens to be a Wen.”

“What did you say?” Wen Chao demanded.

Within a second, the Wen heir had turned around and aimed the three arrows at the last person. Due to the Ouyang heir walking away, the Yunmeng Jiang boys were too far away to catch the projectiles.

“Ouyang! Watch out!” Jiang Cheng shouted.

The boy turned around, eyes wide, and the three arrows were reflected in his eyes. In the next second, a multitude of things occurred.

First, Lan Wangji, likely drawn over by the noise, appeared overhead as he jumped from one of the rocks. His red competition robes floated elegantly in the air, ribbons and hair fluttering around him. An instant later, he aimed and shot an arrow. It split through one of Wen Chao’s, shattering it and causing the others to fall off track once the pieces collided. Imbued with spiritual power, his arrow continued its path and made contact with one of the spirits, simultaneously earning the Lan sect a point.

““Wow,”” Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan gaped simultaneously, looking at Lan Wangji in awe. Jin Zixuan nodded in respect, but Jiang felt his fists clench slightly.

It was obvious from the simulation that Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian were deeply personally connected. As time went on, their similar values and growing closeness — they were still using each other's first names — became more and more obvious. However, all relationships had to start from something.

The reason Wei Wuxian had originally been so interested in Lan Wangji was because ~~Jiang Cheng~~ the other Jiang disciples couldn't challenge him. As the gap between Wei Wuxian and himself grew larger, would Wei Wuxian become closer and closer to Lan Wangji?

Right as Jiang Cheng scowl began to grow, Jiang Yanli reached a hand out. When he looked over, she play-acted giving him a hug, the best she could do in the no-touch simulation.

Jiang Cheng relaxed.

Now, Wei Wuxian, Jiang Cheng, and Lan Wangji were all standing against Wen Chao, a combination few people could hope to beat.

"You, you people…" with a huff, Wen Chao threw his bow into the air for his servants to catch and stalked off, glaring at them as he departed.

Madam Yu glared after him, furious at the brat who had dared believe himself to be above her son.

"Lan Zhan, nice shot!" Wei Wuxian shouted, and, once again, was ignored. When the watchers turned to the departing Lan heir however, they noticed something off.

Frantically, Lan Wangji brought his hand up to his own forehead ribbon, ensuring it was still in place.

On the other hand, the virtual Lan Wangji didn't notice. The only one who did was Wei Wuxian.

"Hey, Wangji-xiong!" he shouted. "Your headband isn't straight!"

"...Liar," Lan Wangji decided, barely glancing back.

"It's true this time," Wei Wuxian refuted, running closer. "Here, let me help you."

Then, in an act neither of the Lan brothers could have predicted, Wei Wuxian reached a hand of to the end of the pure white ribbon and pulled down. Due to the structure of the knot, that slight tug was all that was necessary for the entire thing to come fluttering down.

As if in slow motion, the watchers saw Lan Wangji's eyes widen in horror as he noticed the pressure on his forehead loosen. He trembled slightly as the white silk slipped down his face and fell towards Wei Wuxian. Furious, bloodshot eyes glared at Wei Wuxian, and the boy flinched back.

The real Lan Wangji looked away from the simulation, turning to stare at his brother. Although most saw his gaze as a dark, terrifying level level of anger they had never witnessed before, Lan Xichen was able to see the lost, conflicted fear in his brother's widened eyes.

"Xiongzhang, he-"

"Wangji, I know, I-"

'I just ripped off a headband, right?' Wei Wuxian thought. 'It's not like it was part of his body or anything.'

At the additional reminder that Wei Wuxian didn't even know what it meant, Lan Wangji growled. Nie Huaisang, Jin Zixuan, and Jiang Cheng backed up warily, intimidated despite being as clueless as Wei Wuxian about why Lan Wangji was angry.

A dark cloud appeared as Lan Wangji glared at Wei Wuxian. He hesitated slightly in confusion at the jade's fury, but his face soon deflated into genuine regret.

"I'm sorry. I really didn't mean to do that."

At those words, Lan Xichen finally saw the source of the confliction. To Lan Wangji, even worse than the shamelessness and implications of the action, was the fact that Wei Wuxian didn't mean it. He had accidentally broken the rules in a way that left Lan Wangji completely and totally vulnerable.

At first, Xichen had thought his brother wanted a friend. After seeing them interact so much (and witnessing the actions of the future Hanguang-jun) he had realized there was a little more to it.

Now, was the first time he was truly getting to witness the depths of Lan Wangji's emotions.

"H-here. You can tie it back yourself," he offered, bravely holding it out despite the pitch-black glower he was being given. The Second jade looked like he would gladly bite Wei Wuxian's hand of if it got too close.

Staring terrifyingly down at the offered ribbon, Lan Wangji's fist clenched tighter and tighter around his bow until it shattered into a million pieces of wood.

The shards fell to his feet.

Huaisang may or may not have eeped.

Wei Wuxian flinched at the action, and Lan Wangji swiftly snatched the ribbon from Wei Wuxian's open palm. Without waiting for a response, he turned and left the area.

'What's… what's wrong with Lan Zhan?' Wei Wuxian wondered.

Although no one could see it on his face, Lan Wangji's heartbeat was speeding ahead at several hundred times the rate it would normally go at. He was now certain that the demons who made the simulation were did so in an effort to give him a heart attack.

“What?” Wei Wuxian asked, back on the conference grounds once the competition ended. “Lan Zhan left before the match finished?!”

Some people had expected Lan Qiren to be annoyed at his nephew’s emotional reaction, but instead the man nodded several times in agreement.

“That evil demonic cultivator,” he hissed.

“When did that happen?!”

“After you tore off his headband,” Jiang Cheng explained, making Wei Wuxian glance behind himself.

“It’s just a headband, what’s the big deal?”

“You know how much they value their forehead ribbons. You were just asking for trouble.”

Behind them, Lan Wangji stood, gaze down, as Lan Xichen comforted him.

Jiang Fengmian sighed slightly. It wasn’t a well known fact, but all the sect leaders knew the specifics of why the forehead ribbon was considered so sacred. He wasn’t sure if Lan Wangji thought Wei Ying pulling the ribbon was better or worse than a stranger, but it had undoubtedly shaken the Lan.

“Lan Wangji will hate you forever,” Jiang Cheng declared right as the boy sent Wei Wuxian yet another furious glare.

Suddenly, future-Wei Wuxian’s certainty that Lan Wangji hated him was making a lot of sense to Xichen. It seemed likely these miscommunications weren’t a one-time thing.

Several of the younger heirs glanced over, but, luckily, the adults didn’t seem interested in explaining. It looked like everyone was willing to spare Lan Wangji the embarrassment of having the others know why he was so mad.

Soon, the watchers saw a grumpy Wen Chao sitting across from the sect leaders. A scroll was unrolled, and the announcer began to project his voice.

“The champion of the archery competition this year goes to…”

The audience tensed.

“Yunmeng Jiang’s Wei Wuxian!”

Just like his virtual self, Jiang Cheng had lit up at the first two words, and then blinked in surprise at the second two.

And, just like Yunmeng Jiang’s third-shixiong and fourth-shixiong, Nie Huaisang and Jiang Yanli began cheering at the declaration (though their joy was considerably muted compared to the screaming and suffocating hugs of the exuberant Jiang shidis).

“Da-shixiong is the best!”

“We won! Da-shixiong is the best!”

On the side, Wen Ning smiled at the trio.

“Congratulations,” Lan Xichen said genuinely.

“Very impressive,” Nie Mingjue agreed, nodding once to Jiang Fengmian.

Lan Wangji’s mouth didn’t lift into a smile, but Xichen could tell how it softened in happiness.

“Well, Xichen-ge,” Nie Huaisang whispered. “If you’re going to lose to anyone, the to-be Yiling Patriarch is pretty impressive.”

Xichen chuckled slightly and nodded in agreement.

“Third place goes to Jin Zixuan from the Jin Clan.”

“Good job,” Yanli whispered, turning him bright red.

“Fourth place goes to Lan Wangji from the Lan Clan.”

“Eh?” Nie Huaisang asked. “But you left early!”

Lan Wangji glanced back once, then looked away. While not uncommon behavior from the second jade, Huaisang was a little sad he hadn’t gotten a nod back. He had thought they were getting closer.

The thing with the ribbon had really shaken him.

“Wow,” someone whispered. “Two out of four are from the Lan Clan. Impressive.”

“Ah,” Yunmeng’s fourth shixiong said. “Lan Wangji left halfway through but still managed to rank fourth!”

“Look at the Wen Clan,” third shixiong added. “They didn’t even finish in the top four. That’s so embarrassing.”

Nie Mingjue smirked slightly and glanced to the side. Everyone knew the Nie sect specialized in sabers and close combat training, so it was no surprise that they hadn’t been in the top four. However, the Wen Clan was meant to be far more balanced, so their defeat was surprising.

However, Wen Ruohan’s eyes simply remained on Wen Qing, who was standing impossibly stiff as she lifted her head in a show of arrogance. Instantly, the gathered crowd was reminded of the to-be ghost general.

If Wei Wuxian was right in his prediction — and he probably was — then Wen Ning would have been in the top four. Wei Wuxian was highly skilled, and very aware of the capabilities of others. If the competition was repeated several times for accuracy, the results would have most likely been Wei Wuxian first, Lan Xichen and Lan Wangji second or third, Wen Ning fourth, and Jin Zixuan fifth. When the actual archery competition happened, there was no doubt that Wen Ning would be one of the participants.

Wen Qing's upturned nose seemed to be to remind the other sect leaders of this fact.

(Though, if Nie Huaisang's guess was right, a lot of the confidence Wen Qing was currently showing was to cover up her fear.)

Hearing the musings of his shidi, Jiang Cheng coughed slightly to remind them of where they were.

"Shut it," he warned.

An ominous wind seemed to pick up, as the virtual Wen Ruohan, unlike his real counterpart, began to seath in anger.

"Very nice," he chuckled. "The four clans have some great talents indeed. Since the match has ended, I'll take my leave now. My guests, take your time."

"Goodbye, Your Excellency," the Wen disciples recited.

Nie Mingjue couldn't resist rolling his eyes at the theatrics.

Wen Chao walked before them, commanding, "All rise!"

Jin Guangshan stared nervously after the departing chief cultivator, fanning himself lightly.

"You can tell he's unhappy," Sect Leader Jin observed. "Those youngsters made a hit here. Trouble's coming our way."

"It was a competition, wasn't it?" Jiang Fengmian asked. "The futures of our clans lie in the hands of those youngsters. Besides, the future is unpredictable."

And who could have predicted the invention of demonic cultivation? The clan members frowned, vowing to keep their minds open for the rest of the simulation.

The sunset faded behind the mountains.

"I suppose that at least confirms one thing," Lan Xichen turned to Jiang Fengmian. "I believe the civilians in the first segment described him as a 'prominent figure from an established clan.' He has brought great honor to the Jiang sect."

"Brought honor?" Wen Chao repeated. "You saw what happened, didn't you? All this has done is prove that the simulation is fake. There's no way I would lose to a-"

“Silence,” Wen Ruohan growled. “There is only evidence in favor of it being true.”

“Of course,” Lan Qiren coughed his throat and glanced at Jiang Fengmian. “As Xichen said, your disciple is, despite his manners, highly skilled.”

Jiang Cheng’s smile turned bitter for a moment, before he shook away his negative thoughts and smiled genuinely, pleased at his brother’s success.

Similarly, Jiang Fengmian smiled gratefully.

Madam Yu only huffed in annoyance.

At the end, the other three winners had been from the main branches of the great clans; Wei Wuxian wasn’t even a clan member! Someone like him coming in first just brought more attention to the improperly of the situation. Because of him, Jiang Cheng had-

In her flurry of furious thoughts, she didn’t notice the judgemental looks the others were giving her. In the previous segment, she had complained about that “good-for-nothing” Wei Ying. And yet, a cultivation sect’s reputation among the public was far more dependent on the skill and approachability. In terms of the latter, Wei Wuxian’s personality and gargantuan number of friends more than proved his worth.

In terms of the former, Wei Wuxian was Lan Wangji’s equal in swordsmanship, and had just proven himself to be the best archer in the sects.

While Lan Xichen smiled sadly, understanding how the complications of Madam Yu’s marriage influenced her opinion of Wei Wuxian, Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan raised disbelieving eyebrows. Although they didn’t say it outloud, it was clear what they felt.

If Madam Yu was foolish enough to alienate and unjustly berate the person who did the most to improve her sect’s reputation, then the Jiangs couldn’t complain if someone else snatched him up.

“What made you so mad about the ribbon, Wangji-xiong?” Nie Huaisang asked, sneaking closer. He got a glare in response, but his question also made Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng inch closer as well.

Tilting his head, Jiang Cheng added, “Is it somehow different than my Jiang bell?”

Wangji sighed.

“The forehead ribbon is sacred and… intimate. It was inappropriate for him to touch it.”

The insulting suggestion that his ribbon was at all similar to the Jiang bell prompted him to answer, but, now that he had, he silenced further questions with a frigid glare. In the awkward silence that progressed afterwards, Jiang Yanli tried to catch Wen Qing’s attention.

“Your brother is quite sweet, Wen-guniang. I heard you raised him without much help, is that true?”

“Ah, yes,” she responded, lowing her voice in an effort to not bother Wen Ruohan. “I suppose your… your brother was quite kind. I appreciate the help Wei Wuxian tried to give A-Ning. And watching your brothers try to navigate the arena was… entertaining.”

Jiang Cheng flushed.

Hearing Wen Qing’s comment, Wen Chao laughed, “Don’t be ridiculous. Wei Wuxian is so stupid. If he had succeeded in getting Wen Ning to join the tournament, he probably would have lost! I suppose he’s lucky Wen Ning was just incopentent enough to not get the chance to earn our true victory.”

There was a stunned silence for a moment as everyone wondered if Wen Chao had somehow forgotten that he was the one who had forbidden Wen Ning from competing.

“A-ah, of course, gongzi,” Yanli bowed, realizing no one knew how to respond to that. Jin Zixuan felt his admiration for her skyrocket all over again.

“Um, I’m just checking, but…” Nie Huaisang paused and peaked at Wen Qing from behind Nie Mingjue. “You’re sure the ghost general was your brother?”

Her mood soured instantly.

“I am. I know what he looks like. As for his personality changes, I hope you remember what he was turned into,” she hissed, the implied ‘idiot’ ringing loud and clear.

Although no one argued with her, the disbelief in their expressions was clear. If there was one word that the teenage Wen Ning embodied, it was ‘adorable.’ No one could deny how innocently cute the boy they saw had been, so there was no doubt as to what words should be used to describe him. At worst, Jin Guangshan’s mental ‘pathetic’ could be considered.

So where did ‘violent,’ ‘dangerous,’ and ‘Ghost General’ come in?

A spurt of silence encompassed the room once again as people struggled to find something else to discuss, not wanting to risk attracting the wrath of the cultivation world’s greatest doctor.

Then-

“I’m baaaaack~”

“Finally!” Jiang Cheng commented, feeling suffocated under the room’s political tension. “Took you long enough!”

“Sorry, sorry. Next time, I’ll be sure to be at your side the second you want me, your Grand-iest Honored Lordship. My deepest apologies.”

“Shut up!” Jiang Cheng ordered as Nie Huaisang and Jin Zixuan burst into laughter.

“Is that really them?” a different voice asked.

“Huh?”

“Wei Wuxian!” Madam Yu barked. “Who is that? You’ve allowed strangers into our rooms?”

“I, um,” the new voice stuttered.

“Wen Xu send him,” Wei Wuxian explained. “Don’t worry, I’ve kept him away from your bodies. But his sister’s also stuck there, and he helped me figure out how to contact you from farther away!”

“Sister?” Wen Qing repeated, suddenly realizing why the voice sounded familiar.

“Mmhm. This is Wen Ning, courtesy name Qionglin. Say ‘hi,’ A-Cheng!”

While Jiang Cheng sputtered at the patronizing nickname, Jiang Yanli smiled and said, “It’s nice to officially meet you, Wen Qionglin. I hope my brother has been treating you well?”

“Shijie! Did Jiang Cheng tell you something about me? Don’t believe him!”

“A-ah, yes, he-he has. Very nice. I was… I was sent over with some of the other healers from our branch of the Wen family, and since Wen-gongzi made me the leader we had to talk but a guard we brought with us wasn’t listening to me so then Young Master Wei helped and, I mean-I, thank you!”

“I already told you, you don’t need to thank me for that.”

“Right, sorry.”

“I-”

“A-Ning,” Wen Qing interrupted. “Are you okay?”

“A-jie?” he asked. “Y-yes. I’m fine. Are you okay?”

“Yes.”

“A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian raised his voice. “What is the situation outside?”

“Well, it took some time, but it seems like everyone’s accepted Wen Xu’s explanation of how you don’t want to come out. Or, at least, they’re not openly opposing it. The Jin Clan is doing much better now that someone is in charge, relatively speaking, and the other clans started contacting me to get more cooperation while you’re gone. Hey, guess what Shijie?”

“Yes, A-Xian?”

“A few hours ago, I got a message from Gusu! They want to start a collaboration with me to make sure you guys stay okay! Can you believe it?”

Smiling warmly, Jiang Yanli answered “Of course I can. Our A-Xian is a genius.”

"Or they finally got bored of their endless rules," Wei Wuxian suggested. The boy's resounding laughter followed, but it was clear Wei Wuxian was embarrassed by the compliment. He made a sound as if to continue talking with his sister, only to be stopped by Wen Ning.

“Um, Young Master Wei, wasn’t there something you were going to ask them?”

“Hm? Oh, yeah. Uh, I contacted Mo Xuanyu again, and he had a few things to say. First, are you sure you want to stay there? The things you’re being shown are all fake, right?”

“What makes you say that?” Nie Mingjue asked.

“Well… that’s what Mo Xuanyu said, I guess.”

“Wei Wuxian,” Lan Qiren commanded. “Describe Mo Xuanyu’s personality.”

“Huh? Um… I guess he seems like he has a sense of humor? And he was pretty confident, and he obviously knew what he was talking about so I’m pretty sure he was telling the truth when he said he invented the talisman that caused all this? But he said not to worry about what you’re being shown, since none of it’s true.”

That claim only served to confirm for the viewers that everything they had seen was true. Mo Xuanyu looked like the Mo Xuanyu they had seen and was desperate to deny it; a simple “it was all fake” wasn’t an adequate explanation for that.

“Any other questions? Do you want me to keep contacting you or-”

“Yes, actually,” Lan Xichen confirmed. “Some of this is a bit… uncomfortable. We don’t have any way to block ourselves off from it; did Mo Xuanyu mention anything?”

By “uncomfortable” he meant “an enormous breach of privacy,” but that wasn’t an important distinction.

“I mean… I guess. He had a few addition instructions for something imbuing a soul that could judge situations for emergencies but… why not just leave if that-”

“We don’t need to explain to you!” Madam Yu growled, silencing further objections from Wei Wuxian. Privately, she was pleased; if nothing else, this was an opportunity to prove to all the other sect leaders that the Jiang Sect still (begrudgingly) had control over Wei Wuxian.

“O… kay. I guess I can work on that. Might take a while though.”

“I-I can try to help,” Wen Ning whispered.

Although he had remained silent — hoping to make Wei Wuxian forget about his presence — Wen Ruohan couldn’t resist smirking slightly at the discussion. If Wen Xu had sent Wen

Qionglin over, there was no doubt that he was working hard to foster an emotional bond between Wei Wuxian and the Wen sect.

It seemed he had nothing to worry about.

Jiang Fengmian made eye contact with Lan Qiren before suggestion, “Check in every once in a while. I would like updates every two to three segments.”

“Okay! I’m running out of power now, so I’ll have to cut this a bit short. Bye, Uncle Jiang, Madam Yu, Shijie, Jiang Cheng, and everyone else.”

“Goodbye, A-Jie, stay well.” Wen Ning whispered. “I wish you good health, Your Excellency.”

“Ah, thank you for your time, Your Excellency,” Wei Wuxian added, seemingly having forgotten that people outside of his family where there.

“Goodbye, A-Xian.”

“Bye, idiot,” Jiang Cheng mumbled.

In another timeline twenty years in the future, the Yiling Patriarch waited restlessly for his friend to arrive. Once Wen Ning had returned with Sizhui, he had taken to using his body to his advantage and night hunting nearly 24/7. He only relaxed for any significant amount of time when Wei Wuxian or Sizhui pestered him into visiting them. Therefore, it was Wei Wuxian’s duty to tempt Wen Ning to stay for as long as possible.

“Wen Ning!” he called out, bounding over. “How was the hunt?”

“Hello, Young Master Wei,” Wen Ning bowed slightly. “It went well. You said you had something you wanted my help with, right?”

“I mean, part of it is that you wouldn’t have visited otherwise-” he teased, Wen Ning flinched slightly and Wei Wuxian began to pat him on the head. “But if you’re feeling up to it, we can start now.”

“But… do-do the people in the Cloud Recesses know I’m coming?” he asked tentatively.

“I told Lan Zhan, and he told his uncle. It’s a bit of an important matter, so they were willing to give permission,” he explained, beginning the walk towards the Cloud Recesses. “Though I’m half convinced the only reason they were so willing was because Jiang Cheng kicked up a fuss about it when he visited.”

“Ah, I-I heard about that.”

“Really? Wow, my fame never ceases to amaze me. Even in a place like the Cloud Recesses, no one can resist spreading gossip about how Sect Leader Jiang nobly prevented the Yiling Patriarch’s latest scheme.”

“W-well, everyone kept talking about how angry he was when he got back from the Cloud Recesses. He kept screaming your name and people were a little concerned he’d start hunting down demonic cultivators again.”

“He hasn’t though?”

“He hasn’t,” Wen Ning agreed, allowing Wei Wuxian to sigh in relief. If there was one upside to Jiang Cheng’s knowledge of his core, it was that he had stopped looking for demonic cultivators entirely. It was beyond just losing his excuse to; Jiang Cheng no longer wanted to hunt them down.

“That’s… that’s good.”

“Did you two… fight again?”

Wei Wuxian ran a hand through his hair, sighing slightly, “No. Not really. There was just a bit of a problem with one of my inventions and it set him off. That’s actually the thing I’ll need your help with.”

Seeing his friend’s momentarily bitter scowl, Wen Ning forgot himself for a moment and asked, “Do you miss him?”

“Who? Jiang Cheng?”

A nod.

“...I do. Of course I do. But things can’t — shouldn’t — go back to the way they used to be. Too much has happened for us to be kids again.”

With his own guilt on top of everything else, trying to repair their relationship even to just tolerance was guaranteed to end in disaster. He knew that.

~~That didn’t stop him from wanting.~~

“We probably shouldn’t talk to each other.”

“But you want to be able to move on.”

“...Yeah. I… we both need to be able to move on. At the very least, it would be nice to be able to be in the same room without a fight breaking out.”

Not feeling comfortable talking to Jiang Cheng didn’t stop him from wishing they could look each other in the eyes. Even with Jin Ling’s help, that seemed like an impossible dream.

“Thank you.”

“Young Master Wei?”

“For letting me talk about this,” he shook his head. “Anyways, I’m sure we’ll figure something out. On another note, I wanted to tell you that Lan Zhan and I picked a date for our official wedding. Do you think you can spare some time in three months?"

"Didn't you already get married?"

"Yeah, but the elders want an 'official' one. On the plus side though, they said I could be in charge of the decorations! I can't wait to see the looks on their faces!"

Suddenly apprehensive, Wen Ning asked "D-did Hanguang-jun approve of your plans?"

"Kinda."

If he hadn't been a fierce corpse, Wen Ning's eye would be as wide as dinner plates. He took a nervous step back, glancing towards the Cloud Recesses as if it was an unspeakably dangerous beast.

(Which, considering he was quite possibly the strongest fierce corpse in existence, was not a good sign.)

"Don't worry. It'll be fine, I promise!" Wei Wuxian vowed. "Lan Zhan and I will make sure nothing happens to you. Besides, don't you want to see A-Yuan?"

A-Yuan, as always, was the straw that broke the camel's back, making Wen Ning relax and resume his trek towards the Cloud Recesses.

"S-so," he began. "What is it you need my help with?"

Wei Wuxian smirked, "Well, I may or may not have tried something a little dangerous, and I need a brave, strong fierce corpse such as yourself to deal with the issue. So, what do you know about time travel?"

"...I'm sorry, what?"

Chapter End Notes

> You know, everyone always says Wei Wuxian is super oblivious. They're definitely right in terms of Wei Wuxian's awareness of his own feelings, but literally only Xichen could have guessed Lan Wangji didn't hate Wei Wuxian at the beginning. And after-resurrection LWJ thought Wei Wuxian remembered his confession, so that just made it more confusing!

In the mountains of Gusu, a cool fog swept over the ground.

“Huh. It’s so quiet here,” Wei Wuxian observed. Behind him, Wen Ning followed like a frightened duckling, constantly looking to the left and right and only staying on the path because of the grip he kept on Wei Wuxian’s sleeve. The Lan disciple leading the pair glanced back, but made no move to answer.

When the Wen guard behind them glared at the trembling Wen Ning, Wei Wuxian glared right back and forced him to back off. If Wei Wuxian needed Wen Ning’s help because the other boy had a talent for helping regulate energy, then no one had any right to object to his presence.

“We’re here,” the Lan disciple announced.

Although she was speaking to them, she didn’t bother looking them in the eyes. Instead, she kept her gaze stubbornly facing forward, even as she stepped to the side and allowed them to pass. Apparently the rumors were right: losing the main clan had quadrupled the sect’s stress.

Wei Wuxian wondered if they’d appreciate an invitation to a pheasant hunt. That usually helped him calm down.

“You’ll find the healers and Lan Qiren-xiansheng at the end of this hallway,” she explained.

“Thanks~” Wei Wuxian sang back, leading Wen Ning and the latter’s “guard” (Yi Wanqiu, a somewhat-talented Wen sect outer disciple) inside. From what he understood, Lan Qiren and the Twin Jades were all being kept in separate rooms, allowing the healers assigned to them to devote their full attention to just one. It seemed a little excessive to Wei Wuxian, but, if nothing else, he understood their paranoia.

~~He had woken up Wen Xu, but the Jiangs weren’t waking up why weren’t they waking up why were they leaving him alone he needed help please shijie!~~

As the door swung open, every healer in the room instantly turned suspicious glares on Wei Wuxian. Wen Ning squeaked in response, while Wei Wuxian gave an overly cheery wave.

“Hi there. I’m Wei Wuxian, and this is Wen Ning,” he introduced with a slight salute. “I was told there was something for me to check out here.”

“Yes,” a woman from the Lan Clan stepped forward, her elaborate robes proving she was the Lan sect’s head healer. “We have tried using cleansing to limit the effects of the resentful energy, but found it entirely unsuccessful. You released a statement claiming that this process was man-made, but that shouldn't indicate that our efforts are useless. If something goes wrong with your cure, we need to be able to get them out."

As she began to bring up the effects of musical cultivation, Wei Wuxian had a sudden epiphany. For some time now, he had been brainstorming ways to create the solution to Lan Xichen's (vague) concerns about being uncomfortable, but found dead ends at every turn. The most important piece of this would be creating something that could recognize the intentions of the watchers, but talismans and arrays couldn't do that.

Musical cultivation, however, could. If he wanted to manipulate the resentful energy of the simulation, wouldn't using music be the most effective route?

Realizing she had finished her explanation, Wei Wuxian smiled and gestured to Wen Ning.

"My friend over here is actually the younger brother of Wen Qing," he explained, cueing a nervous eep. "We've worked out a few theories for why that might be the case. Would you like to discuss them?"

"If you don't mind."

"Well, first of all, we think when you use musical cultivation on their bodies you're trying to change the effect, not the source. Instead, you should try to…"

When the void around them darkened, Wen Chao sucked in a breath. Based on what had just been shown, he had a feeling he knew what was coming.

The moon glowed brightly above the Nightless City, giving the sky a dull, grey sheen contrasting against the yellow fires shining below. In front of two massive wooden doors, Wen Chao knelt lowly.

Trembling, he excused, "Father, I have let our family down due to my incompetence during the archery contest. The-the four families worked together to chicane me!"

"Trick you?" Lan Wangji repeated sternly, making it clear exactly what he thought about that excuse. Given what they had seen, it would be far more accurate to say Wen Chao had tried — and failed — to cheat against Wei Wuxian.

When Wen Chao glared back, Lan Xichen moved protectively in front of his brother, silently begging Wangji to not continue the argument (even if he was right). Lying was against the rules in their family, but to attempt to discipline Wen Chao now would be foolish.

However, Wen Ruohan simply raised his hand, silencing his son. Xichen supposed that, since Wen Ruohan was the one being lied to, he didn't mind the reprimand.

(Many of the watchers silently thanked Lan Wangji for being willing to say something.)

"I-If they hadn't, I-"

A loud thump rumbled through the hall, silencing Wen Chao's words. Gazing up, Wen Chao's fear made his already-shadowed face resemble that of a corpse.

Once again, Huaisang glanced between father and son, cataloging his observations for later use. Jiang Cheng did the same, before glancing towards his own father with a look of confused gratitude.

(It didn't mean much, but at least he had never been scared of his father.)

Jin Zixuan, on the other hand, refused to acknowledge the amused chuckles coming out of the Jin sect leader; as much as he hated Wen Chao, this was far from an amusing scene.

Creaking slightly, the doors before Wen Chao swung open, revealing the figure of His Excellency, Sect Leader Wen Ruohan. The golden lights behind him left his facial features completely shadowed.

Wen Chao's breath turned frantic as Wen Ruohan stepped forward. The man walked past his son to gaze out over the field which had hosted the competition just a few hours before.

"Chao-er," he spoke. Wen Chao instantly spun around to prostrate himself before the imposing man.

"Yes, Father?"

Wen Ruohan smirked, "Since we've realized the four families' arrogance, it is time to teach them a lesson on the rules of immortals, and respect for the hierarchy."

At the accusation of "arrogant," Nie Mingjue nearly stood up in fury. Luckily for the watchers as a whole, Nie Huaisang's sudden gaze halted him in his tracks.

Smiling slightly, Huaisang shook his head, then glanced at the concerned Lan Qiren and Jiang Fengmian. With the delicate truce between them, they couldn't risk making Wen Ruohan send someone to Wen Xu. The Wen Sect had entered the simulation with the greatest number of people; they were the ones who could most easily send someone to make changes in the real world.

The Nie, who only had two people, were in a far more precarious position.

They couldn't do anything yet.

"One week later," Sizhui explained.

Among the buzzing songs of the cicadas, dozens of bodies lay flat against the ground. The rolling heatwaves made it a bit hard to tell at first, but it soon became clear that the watchers were surrounded by shirtless Jiang disciples.

"Wait… what?"

Flipping themselves over like sizzling pancakes, the disciples complained.

“So hot….”

Due to the laws of the simulation, the watchers couldn’t feel the heat being experienced by Wei Wuxian and the other Jiang disciples. Therefore, when combined with the abrupt tone shift, they were left more than a little befuddled.

Composing herself, Madam Yu scoffed and glared at Jiang Fengmian for his disciples’ undisciplined display. The leaders of the other Clans were witnessing their weakness! Why wasn’t he doing anything?

A sigh.

‘If only it was as cool here as it is in the Cloud Recesses,’ Wei Wuxian thought whimsically.

‘Then stay there with me,’ Lan Wangji’s mind responded before he could stop himself. Instantly, his ears heated into a humiliated-red, utterly ashamed at his thoughts. How could he be so undisciplined as to be distracted by Wei Ying yet again?

He internally resolved to do everything in his power to resist the boy’s unearthly temptation.

Having heated the wood under him to his own body temperature, Wei Wuxian once again flipped over. However, at the exact same time, Jiang Cheng turned over as well, Jiang Cheng’s arm landing on Wei Wuxian’s leg.

“Jiang Cheng, move your arm. You’re like a piece of coal,” Wei Wuxian complained.

“Move your leg.”

“An arm’s lighter than a leg! It’s harder for me to move my leg, so you should move your arm instead!”

“Is this really important?” Nie Mingjue couldn’t resist asking, laughing to himself. After being shown Wen Ruohan’s continued ambitions in taking over the entirety of the cultivation world, this seemed more than a little out of place. The whiplash had left most watchers stunned.

Jiang Fengmian smiled slightly, then suggested “Well, perhaps it’s a final reminder of what we stand to lose.”

Jiang Cheng glared, “I’m warning you, Wei Wuxian! Shut up and don’t overdo it. It gets hotter the more you talk!”

“Stop arguing, alright?” Sixth-shidi requested. “I feel hot just listening to you two argue. I’m even sweating faster! Please just be quiet!”

Ignoring their begging junior, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng continued.

“Go away!”

“You too!”

“No, no, please, go right ahead.”

“No thanks, you’re welcome to leave first!”

Jin Zixuan snorted.

“Oh, shut up!” Jiang Cheng hissed angrily. The Jin heir smirked and raised his hands in surrender, covering up a sting of jealousy.

If this was what having a brother was like, then he wanted one too.

Jiang Cheng continued, “You go right ahead-”

“Fight outside if you have too!” a now fed-up shidi shouted.

“Please leave together, won’t you?”

“We’re begging you!”

Wei Wuxian glanced over, then teased, “You hear them? They’re asking you to leave. Let… let go of my leg! It’s going to break, Jiang Cheng!”

“You — they’re clearly telling you to leave! Why don’t you let go of my arm first!”

Suddenly, swishes of a long dress could be heard approaching, and the pair immediately snapped apart. Then, Yanli lifted the bamboo curtain and peaked inside.

“Oh, so this is where everyone is hiding.”

Wen Qing lifted an eyebrow slightly, impressed by the unquestioned respect Jiang Yanli’s two rambunctious brothers had for her.

(If that thought made her miss her brother a little more, no one had to know that but herself.)

Everyone greeted her warmly.

“Shijie!”

“Hello, Shijie!”

Some of the shier ones snuck away to the corners, covering their bare chests with their arms. Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, happily glanced over at his martial sister without an ounce of shame.

Despite his best efforts, Lan Wangji was unable to stop his eyes from following a bead of sweat trail down from Wei Wuxian’s neck, to his collarbones, to his chest, to his abs. It was only when the drop started getting lower that he managed to snap himself out of his shameful observations.

Meanwhile, Jin Zixuan was trying to decide whether to be grateful that A-Li wasn't paying attention to Wei Wuxian's body, or disgusted that his father was.

(Jin Guangshan recalculated his earlier calibrations, realizing that Wei Wuxian was, politically, worth even more than he had thought. An arranged marriage with him would be highly sought after.)

"No sword practice?" Jiang Yanli asked. "Slacking off, aren't you?"

"It's scorching hot today!" Wei Wuxian protested. "The training grounds are on fire! We'll shed a whole layer of skin if we go out and practice. Don't tell anyone Shijie!"

Madam Yu was unimpressed with their excuse.

Instead of answering, Jiang Yanli glanced between her brothers and asked, "Were you two fighting again?"

"Nope!"

"Then who made this footprint on A-Cheng's chest?"

Wei Wuxian spun around to check, seeing that there was indeed a footprint left on Jiang Cheng.

Once again, Jin Zixuan's lips crept up into a smile, and he glanced at his fiance with unparalleled warmth.

'She's so cool,' he couldn't resist thinking.

As if able to read his thoughts, Madam Jin smiled warmly at her son and made pleased eye contact with Madam Yu. Creating the engagement had truly been the right decision (even if it had apparently taken the dissolution of that engagement for their kids to realize that).

In some ways, they owed this to Wei Wuxian, didn't they? Silently, Madam Jin made a mental note to try and pay back the favor in the future; if nothing else, she could support Wei Wuxian's own relationship. A perfect reward for allowing Jiang Yanli and her son to make the perfect couple.

(Then, she remembered who killed that couple, and her good mood vanished instantly.)

Laughing slightly, Yanli held out a plate, saying "If no one's interested in fighting anymore, why don't you have some of these?"

Perking up, the whole slew of boys immediately buzzed over to take bites out of the juicy watermelon pieces.

Nie Huaisang felt his mouth salivate at the scene.

Immediately, Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian began to compete in their watermelon-eating, scaring the other disciples away from them. With force and guile, they fought so hard that the others cleared out a whole area for their competition.

Jiang Cheng blushed, refusing to make eye contact with his disgusted mother.

At first, Wei Wuxian was quite engaged in the competition. However, a minute later, he suddenly began to laugh.

Alarmed, Jiang Cheng demanded, "What have you done?"

Lan Qiren tensed apprehensively.

Wei Wuxian grabbed another piece and explained, "Nothing! Don't misunderstand, I'm not doing anything. I just happened to think of someone."

"Who?"

"Lan Zhan!"

Simultaneously, Lan Xichen and Jiang Yanli let out surprised but delighted laughs. That was shortly followed by Lan Qiren's body being wracked by scandalized coughs, and Lan Wangji's ears turning redder than an apple.

Nie Mingjue smirked and leaned next to Lan Xichen, whispering "It seems like the crush is mutual."

"It appears so," Lan Xichen agreed with an amused smile.

"Why would you think of him for no reason?" Jiang Cheng demanded. "Reminiscing about copying rules?"

'Not even close,' the real Jiang Cheng realized with a horrified expression. He turned to his sister for emotional support, but found her still giggling, and therefore no help at all!

Wei Wuxian spat out a seed, "It's fun to think of him. You have no idea — he's just way too amusing. I told him 'Your sect's food is disgusting. I'd rather eat stir-fried watermelon peel than eat your food. If you have time, come have fun with me at Lotus Pier and we'll-"

"You invited him to Lotus Pier?" Jiang Cheng repeated. "Are you mad, or trying to torture yourself?"

It took all of Lan Wangji's self control not to glare at the Jiang heir.

"Why are you so upset?" Wei Wuxian asked. "My watermelon almost flew away! And besides, I was just being polite. Of course he won't come. Have you ever heard of him going anywhere to have fun?"

"Let me make this clear. I don't want him to come. Don't invite him."

Lan Wangji seemed to buzz in place for a moment, unable to decide whether to be angry at Jiang Wangyin, Wei Wuxian, himself, or his simulation self. On one hand, he knew full-well that it would be completely improper for him to visit Wei Wuxian just because he wanted to have fun, and Jiang Wangyin's words were understandable.

On the other-

Jiang Yanli frowned slightly, recognizing the slight jealousy in both real and fake Jiang Chengs' expressions. Having grown up with the knowledge that she would one day leave for Lanling, Jiang Cheng wanted more than anything to keep Wei Wuxian by his side.

She hoped that wouldn't cause problems later.

Wei Wuxian tilted his head in confusion, "I didn't think you hated him so much."

"I've got nothing against Lan Wangji, but if he came, my mom might have something to say, comparing me against him. And you wouldn't have it easy either."

Madam Yu glared, silently asking her son how he expected to improve if he never compared himself against others.

"Don't worry," Wei Wuxian assured. "There's nothing to be scared of even if he does come. You could just tell Uncle Jiang to let him sleep with me."

Lan Qiren collapsed.

"I'll drive him mad in less than a month," Wei Wuxian declared.

Filled by a million conflicting emotions he couldn't even begin to name, Lan Wangji's mind promptly short-circuited. No one could tell by looking at him, but all his thoughts had come to a complete halt.

One phrase played on repeat.

'Tell Uncle Jiang to let him sleep with me. To let him sleep with me. Let him sleep with me. Sleep with me. Sleep with me. Sleepwithmesleepwithmesleepwithme-"

If he had been standing, Wangji would have surely collapsed to the ground like his uncle.

Meanwhile, Jiang Cheng just snorted, "You want to sleep with him for an entire month? You'd be stabbed to death within a week!"

"You think I'm scared of him? If we really started fighting, there's no telling who would win!"

The other shidis immediately started cheering for him. Although Jiang Cheng outwardly mocked his thick skin, he knew Wei Wuxian wasn't just boasting.

Jiang Yanli sat beside them and asked, "What are you two talking about? A friend you made in Gusu?"

“Yeah!”

Xichen smiled slightly, once again pleased that his brother had finally made a friend. And someone who seemed to treasure him equally at that.

~~But then why had Wei Wuxian wanted to run away in the future?~~

Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes, “What a shameless ‘friend!’ Why don’t you go ask Lan Wangji what he thinks! See if he actually wants you as one.”

“Wants more than that,” Jin Guangshan whispered softly, glancing at the real version of the boy.

“Shut up! If he doesn’t want me as a friend, I’ll just bother him until he does!” he turned to Jiang Yanli. “Shijie, do you know Lan Wangji?”

“I do. He’s the Second Young Master Lan who everyone describes as handsome and talented, isn’t he? Is he really that handsome?”

When Jin Zixuan squeaked in worry at her question, Jiang Yanli giggled and shuffled closer to him.

“He is!” Wei Wuxian answered confidently.

Lan Wangji was literally becoming light-headed from all the blood rushing to his face.

“Compared to you?” she asked.

Wei Wuxian thought about it for a moment, then formed a tiny space between his fingers and responded “Maybe just a little more handsome than me.”

“Not true,” Lan Wangji whispered softly.

Wen Chao, bored with the non-Wen-related incidents, started to fall asleep.

Taking the plate away, Jiang Yanli responded “He must be truly handsome, then. It’s a good thing you made a new friend. In the future, you two can visit each other in your free time.”

Jiang Cheng spat out his watermelon.

‘Except that isn’t what happened, is it?’ Wen Ruohan thought consideringly. ‘Instead, Lan Wangji had to drag Wei Wuxian back against his will.’

He glanced at Lan Qiren, smirking when he saw the man’s face tense as he made the same realization.

“Forget it, forget it,” Wei Wuxian decided. “All that’s in the Cloud Recesses is bad food and a lot of rules. I’m not going there ever again.”

“Then you can bring him here. This is a good opportunity, why not invite your friend to stay in Lotus Pier for some time?”

“Don’t listen to his nonsense, A-Jie!” Jiang Cheng protested. “He’s super annoying at Gusu! Lan Wangji would never want to come home with him.”

“Ah, Jiang-xiong,” Nie Huaisang tutted. “You are truly naive in matters of the heart, aren’t you? How could you mistake-”

“Oh, shut up!” he shouted back.

“What are you talking about?” Wei Wuxian asked back. “Of course he would.”

“Oh, wake up. Lan Wangji was constantly telling you to ‘get lost,’ wasn’t he? Did you forget that?”

Over time, it was becoming more and more clear why Wei Wuxian might think the future Lan Wangji hated him.

“What would you know?” Wei Wuxian demanded. “Even though he told me to get lost, I know he secretly wants to come and play with me in Yunmeng. In fact, I think he’d love to!”

“I've wondered this for years, but where do you get so much confidence?”

“Stop worrying about it. If I’d thought through a question for so many years without coming to an answer, I’d have given up a long time ago.”

Jiang Cheng shook his head, about to throw his watermelon on the ground, when violent footsteps began shaking the pavillion. A moment later, a woman’s voice sternly spoke.

“I was wondering where everyone went. As expected….”

As the Jiang disciples rushed to stand, Nie Huaisang jumped back inside his Da-ge’s chest, phasing through to hide inside. It was bad enough being forced to watch his friends fight terrifying monsters, but this was far, far worse. In Nie Huaisang’s humble opinion, no monster was even a tenth as scary as the Violet Spider.

Nie Mingjue sighed slightly, but allowed Huaisang to stay hidden away.

The boys who had rushed to stand were then greeted by the ferocious figure of Madam Yu, whose violet robes gave her the aura of a spirit exiting a cloud of purple smoke. On her face was a chilling rage.

When she saw the boys’ unsightly state of undress, her expression twitched dangerously.

Immediately, the boys all turned to run in terror. Seeing this, Madam Yu finally realized exactly who was present, and her expression turned even darker.

“Jiang Cheng! Go get some clothes on! You look as uncouth as a barbarian! What would people think of me if they saw you like this?!”

The real Madam Yu’s expression conveyed exactly the same thing, making her children shrink in on themselves under a heavy coating of embarrassment. Seeing this, Nie Huaisang and Jin Zixuan slipped closer to them, while Lan Wangji turned a vaguely reproachful gaze on Madam Yu.

Jiang Cheng’s top had been tied at his waist. Hearing his mother’s complaint, he hastily pulled it over his head. Then, Madam Yu turned her gaze on the rest of the disciples.

“And you boys! Can’t you see that A-Li’s here?! Who taught you brats to dress like this in front of a girl?”

Even though it wasn’t at all appropriate, Jin Zixuan couldn’t help but wonder what Jiang Yanli would think if he dressed like that. He quickly dismissed the thought, but his rosy cheeks made Jiang Yanli giggle slightly.

As usual, Madam Yu’s next sentence was “Wei Ying! Do you want to die?!”

Those outside the family turned to gaze at Madam Yu in confusion at the sudden demand.

“Sorry! I didn’t know Shijie would come. I’ll go get my clothes right now!”

These words made Madam Yu even angrier.

“How dare you run? Come back right now and kneel!” she shouted, letting her whip lose with a flick of her wrist. A moment later, Wei Wuxian felt an intense pain sear across his back in a slash.

“Ow!” he shouted, nearly tripping.

“Wei Ying!” Lan Wangji whispered frantically, tensing as he and many of the others present flinched at the attack.

Madam Yu moved as if to attack again, only to stop when someone quietly whispered in her ear “A-Niang, do you want to eat some watermelon?”

While Madam Yu startled at Jiang Yanli’s sudden voice, all the boys managed to disappear. Annoyed, Madam Yu turned to Jiang Yanli and pinched her cheek.

“Eat, eat, eat — all you ever do is eat!”

When Wen Chao snorted, obviously reminded of his earlier comments about Jiang Yanli’s time in the kitchens, Jin Zixuan sent him an infuriated glare.

Jiang Yanli almost cried from her mother’s pinching, mumbling “A-Niang, A-Xian and the others were hiding here to escape the heat, and I came on my own. Don’t blame them. Do… do you want some watermelon? I don’t know who gave it to us, but it’s really sweet. Eating watermelon in the summer is great for cooling down and quenching your thirst. Here, I'll-I'll cut some for you if you want me to."

Letting out a slight gasp of awe, Jin Zixuan glanced at his brave, kind, courageous fiancée and tried to give her a supportive smile. He was sure she wasn't comfortable with these details from her personal life being shown, so the least he could do was try to help her though it.

The more Madam Yu thought about everything, the angrier she became. With the summer heat on top of all that, her increased anger made her really crave watermelon. With that thought… she grew even angrier.

Although Madam Yu kept her head tall, completely agreeing with her other-self, Jiang Cheng had steadily begun hiding with Nie Huaisang, who was currently wishing he had a fan to lend his friend.

As Jiang Yanli tried in vain to tame her mother's temper, the watchers' surroundings shifted again. On the Lotus Piers, the group of disciples ran out and hopped onto boats, laughing as they did.

Seeing that, Jiang Fengmian's mouth twitched up in a smile, while Lan Qiren raised an unimpressed eyebrow. However, despite their undisciplined, carefree actions, Lan Qiren remained silent. He was well-aware of how different the Jiang and Lan sect's cultures were, so he resisted the urge to comment.

After a while passed without anyone chasing after them, Wei Wuxian managed to relax. Exerting force, he rowed the boat a couple of times away from the pier, only to pause.

He could still feel some pain on his back, and felt it would be unwise to continue. Tossing the paddles to someone else, Wei Wuxian sat down and felt along the stinging piece of flesh.

"How unfair!" he whined. "No one else was wearing anything, why was I the only one to get beaten up?!"

"Because you're the most difficult to look at when you've got no clothes on," Jiang Cheng mocked.

Wei Wuxian gave him an annoyed look.

As several people laughed, the three Lans blinked in confusion. What they saw before them was completely at ends with the Cloud Recesses' culture.

Although every person who had attended Wei Wuxian's party during the disciple exchange should have gotten punished (rather than just Wei Wuxian), there was a logic behind it. Wei Wuxian had been the one sent to get the alcohol, and had done so multiple times. Lan Wangji's own bias might have contributed to the extent of the Wei Wuxian-only punishment, but one could easily justify it.

But, this time, it was quite clear that everyone had broken the same rules. And yet, when Wei Wuxian was singled out for punishment, no one was surprised. Even Jiang Cheng, who had been shown to care for Wei Wuxian, treated it like a joke.

Lan Qiren frowned, vowing to keep that in mind.

Suddenly, Wei Wuxian turned and lept into the water, and was instantly followed by his shidis. Soon, Jiang Cheng was the only one left in the boat.

Jiang Cheng scowled, "What the hell are you doing?"

Wei Wuxian glided to the side of the boat and struck hard. It instantly flipped over.

"Wei Wuxian!" Jiang Cheng shouted as he watched his simulated-self be tossed into the water. Both he and Madam Yu gave Wei Wuxian identical outraged glares, while Jiang Fengmian and Jiang Yanli tried (and failed) to cover up their laughter.

The boat flopped over, creating a perfect board for Wei Wuxian to climb on top of and sit, crossing his legs. Resting his chin on a hand and his elbow on a knee, Wei Wuxian smirked down.

"Do your eyes still hurt from being forced to watch me, Jiang Cheng?" he asked.

'Never,' Lan Wangji's traitorous mind supplied.

After several seconds with no response, Wei Wuxian frowned and wondered "Why is he taking so long?"

"Did he drown?!" sixth shidi exclaimed.

"That's impossible."

Despite Wei Wuxian's confident words, his face began looking more and more concerned. Then, just as he was about to go down and help Jiang Cheng out, he suddenly heard a shout from behind him.

A moment later, he had been pushed into the water!

Seeing the boys' interactions, Jiang Fengmian was no longer able to hide his laughter behind fake-coughs. Even as Madam Yu glared, a majority of the people present had fond smiles on their faces. Even Wen Ruohan was smiling.

However, his smile was one of malicious amusement. After all, despite the seemingly-unbreakable bond between the boys, the simulation had proved that it would soon change. In the next five years, Wei Wuxian would become the Yiling Patriarch, get kicked out of the Jiang Sect (he was an "ally" of the four sects, rather than a member), and be murdered by his former shidi.

Now, Wen Ruohan only needed to wait and see how it happened.

Blissfully ignorant of the future, the two boys smirked and began circling around each other, watching the other vigilantly. The other Jiang disciples spread out to observe the show without interfering, although some continued to splash each other.

Wei Wuxian taunted, "What's with the weapon? Put down the paddle; we can fight with out bear hands!"

"Do you think I'm an idiot! You'll take it the moment I let go!"

Jiang Cheng was mortified by his simulation-self's childishness. As he turned away from the scene and covered his ears, he found himself wishing for the sweet release of death; only then would he forget this embarrassment.

The pair then began to battle in earnest, Jiang Cheng brandishing the paddle while Wei Wuxian was forced to duck and hide. As Wei Wuxian moved left and right, he finally got enough air to respond.

"How could you think I'd be so shameless?"

Boos came from all around him, "Da-shixiong, I can't believe you have the face to say this!"

Witnessing the close interactions between Wei Wuxian and his junior disciples, Lan Wangji was once again struck silent. As the head of punishments in the Cloud Recesses, he had a similar position to Wei Wuxian.

And yet, no Lan disciples would ever be willing to say something like that to his face.

Lan Wangji didn't dislike that. His position at the Cloud Recesses suited him well, and he wouldn't be comfortable trying to be who Wei Wuxian was. However, the striking difference between them only served to remind Wangji of how hard the future Wei Wuxian had tried to escape him.

Hadn't he wanted to visit the Cloud Recesses? Why had his future self dragged him there against his will?

Still unaware of the thoughts of the watchers, the simulated pair of Jiang disciples continued their match. Soon, the crowd had sunk into a chaotic water-fight. From the Jab of Justice to the Plant of Poison to the Bolt of Brutality — Wei Wuxian finally gave Jiang Cheng a kick before climbing onto the boat. Spitting out a mouthful of lakewater, he frantically waved his hand and shouted down:

"Wait, wait, stop — I call a truce!"

"Why are we stopping, let's continue," the adrenaline-filled shidis called. "Are you begging for mercy just because you're at a disadvantage?"

"Who said I was begging for mercy? We can fight later, I'm just too hungry to keep going. Let's get some food first."

Begrudgingly, Lan Qiren noticed that, despite the rebellious attitude of the Jiang disciples, they all followed Wei Wuxian's instructions. They pouted and whined and complained, but did as he asked all the while. Even if he was unfathomably ridiculous, they respected him as their Da-shixiong.

But they were children; their respect meant nothing.

"Then should we go back?" sixth shidi asked. "We can have a few more watermelons before dinner starts."

"If you go back now, you'll get nothing but whips," Jiang Cheng reminded.

"Then we won't go back," Wei Wuxian decided. "We'll go pick lotus seed pods!"

"That sounds tiring," Nie Huaisang muttered.

"You mean 'steal,' don't you?"

"It's fine, we repay them, don't we?"

"You encourage this behavior?" Lan Qiren couldn't resist asking. Normally, he would have respected Jiang Fengmian too much to raise a complaint over something inconsequential. But, unfortunately, being stuck in this place and having their personal information broadcasted made it hard to maintain discipline.

Luckily, Jiang Fengmian merely smiled and explained, "Aside from the fun, it allows them to get a better understanding of who they'll be using their cultivation to protect. Sometimes, a difference in determination will be the deciding factor in a match."

Lan Qiren frowned, then nodded in understanding. Considering Wei Wuxian had just proven himself the best junior archer in the sects, he couldn't objectively say that was a bad strategy.

A flash forward, and the watchers were greeted to a view of the disciples crowded around a boat in a lotus lake. While one person paddled the boat, the others snapped off branches of lotus pods.

"The ones with their stems attached taste the best, Wei Wuxian thought," Sizhui's voice explained. "He had no idea if it was true or not, but he confidently said so to everyone he told."

Wen Qing snorted slightly, feeling another mysterious rush of parental affection for the boy who would one day kill her brother.

As Wei Wuxian worked, he began humming to himself something along the lines of "I'll treat you to lotus pods; what will you treat me to?"

Instantly, the entire crowd swiveled to look at Lan Wangji. He flinched and blushed at the attention, but felt a slight flutter in his stomach at the thought that ~~his~~ Wei Ying might be thinking about him.

Furrowing his brow in confusion, Jiang Cheng demanded "Who are you treating these to?"

"Not you, that's for sure!" Wei Wuxian responded instantly, then flinched back slightly and shushed his friends. "The old man's here today! We're dead!"

And, just as he'd said, the old man who farmed the lotus seeds was indeed making his way towards them. Although Wei Wuxian didn't know his age, he had long since considered anyone older than Jiang Fengmian an old man. Therefore, this man who had been at lotus pier since Wei Wuxian first came was called as such.

When the other shidis noticed him, they also paled and scrambled, shouting "Let's run!"

They fled, but when Wei Wuxian turned around he noticed something strange.

"How's that boat going so fast?" Jiang Cheng asked, following Wei Wuxian's eyes and noticing the same. Despite the old man not bothing to use his bamboo pole, the boat was cutting through the water even faster than the juniors' was. It was only when the boat moved past them that they realized why.

"Is that a water ghoul?" Lan Xichen asked, bewildered. At those words, Nie Mingjue stepped forward to closely observe the white shadow swimming under the man's boat.

As far as he could tell, Lan Xichen's words were correct.

Wei Wuxian turned around and brought his index finger to his lips, reminding everyone to stay silent. Nodding in agreement, Jiang Cheng then began rowing the boat towards the pair. When the boats were only a few feet apart, an ashen hand reached up and snatched a few lotus seed pods from the boat.

Nie Huaisang flinched and began sneaking farther back.

A few moments later, the empty shells floated to the water's surface.

"...Wow, so even water ghouls steal lotus seed pods."

The words alarmed the old man, who turned around and swung the bamboo pole into the water. The splash startled the water ghoul, who instantly vanished from their sights.

"Come back here!"

Wei Wuxian crashed into the water and dove underneath, then emerged with a cocky smirk and something bone-white grasped in his hand.

"I caught it!" he declared.

'Takes initiative,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'And a good swimmer.'

The pale water ghoul curled in on itself in fright, appearing to be no older than a child.

Jiang Yanli found herself frowning slightly in pity.

Suddenly, the old man's pole swished around as he cursed, "Messing around again?!"

When the pole came into contact with Wei Wuxian's back, he yelped and almost loosened his hands. Although his cultivation-enhanced body could usually withstand the pole, the whipping done by Madam Yu just a short time before left him quite sore.

Several people flinched and allowed themselves to gape in confusion at the man.

With a shaky, calming breath, Lan Wangji carefully reminded himself that frowning at Madam Yu for something that was within her rights to do and hadn't actually happened was illogical.

(Still, her being allowed to single out Wei Wuxian for whipping didn't make it right.)

"Hey!" Jiang Cheng raged. "Speak plainly. Why would you hit him all of the sudden? How ungrateful!"

"I'm fine, I'm fine," Wei Wuxian assured. "Old… Sir, look carefully. We're not ghouls. This one here is the only ghoul."

"Don't be ridiculous. I'm only old, not blind! Hurry up and let it go."

Wei Wuxian was startled. The water ghoul caught by him clasped its hands together in salutation, its dark eyes glistening in quite a pitiful way. It was still gripping the plump lotus pod it had stolen, reluctant to let it go. Although the pod had been broken, the ghoul had only eaten a couple of bites before Wei Wuxian pulled it out.

Momentarily, Wen Qing found the whimpering water ghoul reminding her of her brother, though its skin was far too pale for that.

When her subconscious pointed out that the paleness did match the Ghost General, she nearly clenched her fists hard enough to break skin.

Clearly thinking that the old man had gone insane, Jiang Cheng turned to Wei Wuxian and ordered "Don't let it go. We'll take it back to the pier."

Nervously turning to look at his mom, Jiang Cheng was pleased to find that she thought he had made the right decision.

However, the old man lifted up his bamboo pole again, making Wei Wuxian lift his hands in surrender.

"Don't, don't! I'll let it go. I promise."

"What?" Jiang Cheng demanded. "You can't! What if it kills someone!"

Nie Mingjue nodded in agreement, and Madam Yu scoffed at the boy's constant refusal to follow simple instructions.

“There’s no scent of blood on it,” Wei Wuxian explained. “It’s too young to swim out of this area, and there hasn’t been any word of deaths occurring around here. It’s probably never killed anyone.”

“It’s still a ghoul,” Lan Qiren pointed out, not understanding why Wei Wuxian wasn’t noticing the obvious.

“Just because it hasn’t killed anyone, doesn’t mean that it won’t in the future-”

Before Jiang Cheng could finish speaking, the old man’s bamboo pole struck him. Arm sore from the impact, Jiang Cheng’s expression turned enraged as he shouted.

“Are you out of your mind, old man?! You know it’s a ghoul — aren’t you scared it might kill you?!”

“Why would a man who’s halfway across the threshold already be scared of a ghoul?” the old man responded.

Once again, Madam Yu scoffed, glaring at the man who had hit her child and muttering, “Who exactly does he think he is? He lives on my territory and yet-”

“San-niang, there’s no need for that-”

“Isn’t there? If you would just keep them under control-”

“Stop fighting, stop fighting,” Wei Wuxian ordered, halting both the simulation and real-Jiang’s arguments. “Jiang Cheng, it won’t be able to get far, don’t worry so much. I’m letting go!”

And indeed he did, allowing the ghoul to slip back under the old man’s boat and hide away from the humans. As the soaked Wei Wuxian climbed back onto his boat, the old man tossed another lotus seed pod into the water for the ghoul to eat. When the ghoul paid it no attention, the man tossed in an even bigger one, which was soon devoured.

“Why would he let it go?” Nie Mingjue muttered in confusion, only to look up when his brother sneaked close.

“From what I’ve seen, Wei-xiong doesn’t like hurting people on what ‘might’ happen,” Nie Huaisang whispered back. “If the ghoul really isn’t going to hurt anyone, then it isn’t a problem, right?”

“...I guess not,” Nie Mingjue decided.

Watching it savor the lotus seeds, the boys were bewildered.

“Sir?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Why is it that when it wants your lotus pods, you let it steal them and even hand some over, but when we do it, you always beat us?”

The old man answered, “It helps me with the boat, so what’s wrong with giving it a couple of pods? And you lot, on the other hand… how many did you steal just today?”

Madam Yu sighed yet again, annoyed that this was the version of the sect being shown to all the leaders. On the other hand, Jiang Fengmian was slightly pleased; few actions could display the ideal of his sect — to do what was right, even if it seemed impossible — more than Wei Wuxian's decision to let the ghoul go.

The boys were embarrassed by the man's accusation. When Wei Wuxian glanced back and saw the pile of pods gathered in the corner of the boat, he knew it couldn't end well.

"Let's go!" he ordered.

As the boys all fled, Jin Zixuan turned to the Jiang siblings and asked, "Is this what we'd be doing if we visited Yunmeng Jiang? I'm not sure Nie Huaisang will be up for that sort of thing."

As Nie Huaisang nodded in agreement, Jiang Yanli laughed and said, "Well, only if you come when they're ripe. If you come some other time, I'll have no choice but to let the boys surprise you."

"I honestly can't tell which option I'm more afraid of."

"Hey!" Jiang Cheng shouted.

As the boys paddled the boats and fled, the man kept swinging his pole. However, over time, one thing became clear: the only one he was aiming at was Wei Wuxian!

He covered his head and yelled, "That's not fair! Why are you only hitting me? Why is it only me again?"

Suddenly, Lan Xichen wondered if part of the reason for Wei Wuxian's interest in "Lan Zhan" was the fact that he had accepted an even greater punishment than he had given Wei Wuxian.

On the other hand, Wei Wuxian's shidis were wholly unsympathetic.

"Keep it up, Shixiong!" a shidi shouted. "It's all up to you!"

"Yeah, keep it up," Jiang Cheng added.

At these words, Lan Qiren was reminded of the thought he had bookmarked before. If this was meant to be a representation of what everyday life was like in Yunmeng Jiang — and, by the reactions of the Jiang watchers, it was — then perhaps it was obvious why Lan Qiren's attempts at disciplining Wei Wuxian wouldn't work.

Some of it was certainly his personality, but a lot Wei Wuxian's actions seemed to be done under a philosophy of "if I'm going to be punished anyways, then I've got nothing to lose."

Perhaps that was something to consider when he met the boy in the real world.

(No, no. He couldn't forget that, regardless of what happened, Wei Wuxian became a demonic cultivator. There was no excuse for that.)

The man continued to swing the pole at Wei Wuxian until he snapped, "No! I'm not taking it anymore! Catch!"

As he spoke, he grabbed a lotus seed pod from the boat and hurled it out. It was quite a big pod, and made a rather large splash in the water when it landed. As expected, the old man's boat paused, then backtracked as the water ghoul moved to giddily follow after it.

Using the opportunity, the boys quickly paddled away.

Yet another instance of Wei Wuxian being resourceful during combat. In some ways, Wen Ruohan was even more impressed by this one than the ones from the fights against Lan Wangji. Here was an entire group of Jiang disciples, and yet Wei Wuxian was the only one to think of a way to permanently escape.

Perhaps the differences and similarities between Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian had more to do with them than their sects.

After getting a sufficient distance away, one shidi asked, "Da-shixiong, do ghouls taste anything?"

Just like they had been shown in the future, Wei Wuxian was treasure trove of information, and had an aura that made it easy for younger disciples to ask him questions. Lan Wangji recalled the delighted smiles on the juniors' faces when his future self had appeared, and, for a moment, wondered if he could raise a child with Wei Wuxian.

Then he flinched — his ears turning bright, blazing red — and removed the nonsensical thought from his mind.

"...Usually not, I think. But I'd say this little one pro-probably… Ah- ah-choo!"

A cold breeze chilled him to the bone, a stark contrast to the blazing heat from before.

Shivering slightly, Wei Wuxian continued "Probably couldn't get any lotus pods before it died, and drowned in the lake when it snuck inside to steal some. And so… ah- ah-"

"And so it ate lotus pods because that was its wish," Jiang Cheng finished. "It gains a sense of fulfillment through it."

"Uh huh, that's right."

Madam Yu smirked, pleased that Jiang Cheng had been able to answer when Wei Wuxian couldn't. Really, why hadn't the younger disciples just asked her son to begin with?

Tenderly, Wei Wuxian felt his back which was covered with both old and new scars. Finally, he found his anger boiling over, and he couldn't hold back the question any longer.

"How awfully unfair! Why am I the only one who ever gets beaten up when something happens?"

Lan Qiren frowned at the final confirmation that this series of events was the usual state of things at the Jiangs. Based on their expressions, none of the Jiang disciples saw anything abnormal about that.

Wen Ruohan, realizing the same, hummed. What a strange way to treat one's head disciple.

Laughing slightly at Wei Wuxian's whining, the disciples all offered different answers.

"Maybe it's because you're the most handsome!"

"You have the highest cultivation!"

"You look the best with no clothes on!"

Everyone nodded.

The four older siblings laughed at the declaration, amused at how it directly countered Jiang Cheng's answer to that very same question from earlier.

"Thanks for the praise, you guys. I'm even starting to feel some goose bumps."

"You're welcome, Da-shixiong! You protect us every single time! You deserve even more."

'Every single time,' Lan Qiren mentally repeated, frowning even deeper.

"Oh, there's more?" Wei Wuxian asked. "Alright, let me hear it then!"

"Shut up!" Jiang Cheng complained. "If you guys don't start talking properly, I'll stab a hole into the boat and we can all die together!"

Both Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang snorted, while Lan Wangji's lips twitched slightly in amusement.

Just then, the boat passed through an area of water which had farmlands on both sides. On the right were a few petite-figured female farmers, working in the fields. As the saw the boat pass, they ran to the shore and cheerfully greeted the Yunmeng boys from afar.

"Hey!"

The boys responded in the same way, before nudging Wei Wuxian and whispering "Shixiong! They're calling you! They're calling you!"

'Number four on the list of young masters, indeed," Jin Guangshan acknowledged.

Wei Wuxian looked carefully, recognizing the woman who was leading the group. His mood immediately lifted and he stood up to wave.

"What's up!" he shouted.

If it weren't for Lan Xichen's incredible self-control, he would have fallen over laughing at the way Wangji pouted at Wei Wuxian's chipper response.

"You boys went to steal lotus seed pods again, didn't you?" they guessed.

"Tell us how many hits you got!"

"Or did you spike someone's dog food this time?"

Listening, Jiang Cheng almost wanted to kick Wei Wuxian off the boat, eyes filled with distaste.

"Your reputation sure loses face for our sect, doesn't it?"

'But they all did that,' Jin Zixuan thought, tilting his head in confusion. 'If anything, since Wei Wuxian won the archery competition, doesn't he help the sect's reputation the most?'

Similarly, Wei Wuxian protested, "They said 'you boys.' We're all in the same boat, right? Even if I'm losing face, we're all losing face together!"

Madam Yu rolled her eyes.

Interrupting them, a woman asked, "Was it good?"

"What?"

"The watermelon we gave you," the woman clarified. "Was it good?"

"Next time we go shopping, let's go to Yunmeng with Wei Wuxian," Nie Huaisang told his brother. "I bet we'll get all sorts of free treats and goodies if we do."

Nie Mingjue rolled his eyes, but didn't object.

"So you were the ones who gave us the watermelon! It was delicious. Why didn't you come in and sit? We could've poured you some tea!"

The woman smiled, "You lot weren't there when we visited, so we left without going in. I'm glad to hear it tasted good!"

"Thank you!" Wei Wuxian shouted, then fished out a couple of lotus seed pods from the bottom of the boat. "Here are some lotus seed pods! Next time you visit, come and watch me train!"

This present wasn't even his to be jealous over, and yet Wangji felt a wave of it nonetheless.

Jiang Cheng snorted, "Why would anyone want to watch you train?"

"Those girls certainly seemed interested," Jin Guangshan muttered, making Madam Jin glare at him.

Ignoring Jiang Cheng, Wei Wuxian threw the seeds to shore. Despite the far distance, he managed to land them lightly in the woman's hands. Then, he grabbed a few more and turned to Jiang Cheng.

"Why are you just standing there? Hurry up!" he instructed.

"Hurry up and do what?" Jiang Cheng asked back, finally taking them after Wei Wuxian shoved them into his hands a few times.

"You ate the watermelon too, so you also have to return the gift, don't you? Here, here! Don't be embarrassed. Start throwing, start throwing."

"Has he ever been in a relationship with one of them?" Madam Jin asked, to which Yanli confidently shook her head.

"No, he enjoys flirting, but I don't think he's ever considered going any further than that."

Madam Jin nodded, pleased, and mentally awarded Wei Wuxian a few extra points for enthusiastically returning favors without an ulterior motive.

"You must be joking," Jiang Cheng responded, glaring at Wei Wuxian. "What is there to be embarrassed about?"

However, even after all his shidi began throwing the seed pods, Jiang Cheng still refused to move. Wei Wuxian raised an amused eyebrow, then waved a hand towards the women.

"If it's really not embarrassing, then throw some! If you throw a few seed pods this time, then next time you can ask them if the seed pods tasted good, and you'll be able to start a conversation again."

The Jiang shidi were in awe of their da-shixiong.

"So that's why. What a lesson! You have so much experience in these things, Shixiong!"

"You can tell he does this on a regular basis."

Wei Wuxian laughed.

Lan Wangji sat up, back straight, face emotionless. Regardless of what his brother's barely-suppressed laugh seemed to imply, he was not, by any stretch of the word, jealous.

Jiang Cheng moved as if to throw one off, only to pause at the last second, realizing how shameless it was. He scowled and peeled the lotus seed pod to eat by himself.

"Jiang-xiong, at this rate, you'll be all alone in the future," Nie Huaisang warned, then ducked an attack from Jiang Cheng that just phased through anyways.

The boat continued, the maidens running along the shore and catching the green pods the boys were throwing at them. Wei Wuxian put his right hand above his brows, taking in the scenery. Then, amid the laughter, let out another sigh.

“What’s wrong, Da-shixiong?”

“You’re sighing even when girls are chasing after you?”

Lan Wangji frowned, moving closer to Wei Wuxian as if he could offer some comfort.

“Nothing,” Wei Wuxian responded. “I was just thinking that I sincerely invited Lan Zhan to come to Yunmeng, yet he still dared to decline the offer.”

Wangji flinched back, blinking in shock.

“Wow, that’s Lan Wangji for sure!”

Wei Wuxian stayed in high spirits, “Shut up! Someday, I’ll drag him here and kick him off the boat! I’ll fool him into stealing lotus seed pods and let the old man beat him up with a bamboo pole for a change. And then he’ll be chasing after me from behind!”

‘Sounds good,’ Lan Wangji thought.

“Ridiculous,” he said aloud.

After laughing for a while, he turned and looked at Jiang Cheng, who was sitting at the front of the boat eating the leftover lotus seeds with a long face.

Jiang Cheng flushed.

Wei Wuxian’s smile gradually disappeared and he sighed.

“Well, what an unteachable child.”

“Oh, shut up!” Jiang Cheng shouted.

Jiang Cheng fumed, “So what if I want to eat alone?”

“Look at you, Jiang Cheng. Nevermind. You’re hopeless. Just get used to eating alone for your whole life.”

“Ungrateful brat!” Madam Yu hissed, then turned to glare at a frowning Jiang Fengmian.

Then, at long last, the boat pulled up at Lotus Pier, stuffed with riches.

The world faded to black.

Jiang Yali smiled, feeling strangely homesick at the sight of the pier against the setting sun.

The sky brightened again, and the watchers were brought to the Cloud Recesses. Before the Lanshi, two white figures stood in the hall. As a breeze swept by, their robes fluttered gently, yet they remained motionless.

Lan Xichen and Lan Wangji were standing.

Upside-down.

“What are you doing?” Jin ZIxuan asked, flabberghasted.

“Training.”

“Training?!” Nie Huaisang squeaked, looking slightly faint at the word.

Finally, after a long pause, Lan Wangji broke out of his meditation and spoke, “Brother.”

“Yes?” Xichen asked, calmly leaving his own state of meditation.

“Have you ever picked lotus seed pods before?”

“...No.”

Lan Wangji tilted his head downwards, “Brother, did you know?”

“Know what?”

“Lotus pods with their stems attached taste better than those without stems.”

Realizing Wei Wuxian was mostly just saying that, Lan Wangji ducked his head in embarrassment. Soon, both Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue were laughing at his reaction.

“Really? I’ve never heard of that before. Why do you ask, all of the sudden?”

Without landing, the two switched the hand holding them up from their right to their left, moving uniformly and soundlessly; not a ruffle in their robes.

The sight was a true testament to the twin jades’ grace. Both Nie Huaisang and Jin Guangshan wondered if the scene would look better depicted in embroidery or a painting.

Lan Qiren glared at them both.

Lan Xichen was about to ask again when his eyes focused on something and he teased, “Wangji, you have guests.”

At the edge of the wooden hallway, a black ball of fluff slowly crept over. The rabbit clung to Wangji’s left hand, its pink nose sniffing at his robe.

“Are those… the ones from Wei Wuxian?” Jiang Cheng asked.

“Oh my god, that’s so romantic!” Nie Huaisang squeaked.

“How did it find its way here?” Xichen asked.

“Go back,” Wangji commanded.

And yet the rabbit didn’t listen. Instead, it began to nibble on the edge of Lan Wangji’s forehead ribbon and pulled with force, as though it wanted to use the ribbon to drag Lan Wangji away.

The action abruptly brought Lan Wangji back to the ribbon-removal during the archery competition, and became even more traumatic when he realized it was Wei Wuxian’s bunny pulling on it.

His perfect posture broke slightly, another round of light-headedness running over him.

“Perhaps it wants your company?” Lan Xichen suggested.

The rabbit, unable to move Wangji, hopped around the pair in a flurry. Lan Xichen was quite amused.

“Is this the boisterous one?”

“Too much so.”

“There’s no harm in being boisterous.”

At “the boisterous one,” Lan Qiren finally realized what was being implied.

“No pets in the Cloud Recess!” he screamed. “Especially not ones from Wei Wuxian!”

“And why not?” Madam Jin demanded. “I may not approve of the person Wei Wuxian grows up to be, but right now it seems obvious that this crush is requited.”

“Mom!” Jin Zixuan protested, blushing heavily.

“There is nothing between my nephew and Wei Wuxian!”

“If you really think so, why don’t you ask him?! See what he says!”

“I-”

Lan Wangji was cut off by Madam Yu’s, “Well, I can understand if the Lan Clan doesn’t want to have their name sullied by associating with a brat like that.”

“He-”

“And what’s so bad about Wei Wuxian?” Nie Mingjue asked, once again interrupting Lan Wangji. “He might be a bit shameless, but he works hard and acts righteously! I don’t see why you went out of your way to whip him first when those boys had all done the exact same thing.”

“Well-”

“You have no authority over the Jiang sect, Sect Leader Nie. Or do I have to remind you-”

“San-niang, enough. He didn’t mean it like that. And besides, the boys are too young to make any huge decisions based of their feelings at the current time.”

“I don’t-”

“What are you trying to say? That you want to end A-Li’s engagement now that it’s finally started working out? But I guess all you care about is Wei Wuxian’s happiness, huh.”

“It-”

“There is nothing between them!” Lan Qiren shouted again. Lan Wangji closed his mouth, realizing he wouldn’t get a chance to speak.

“Uncle!” Lan Xichen shouted, raising his voice for the first time in quite a while. “I don’t believe now is the time to discuss this. We’ve missed quite a bit.”

The adults glanced back at the simulation, only to see that it had moved on without them. They turned to Lan Xichen, who smiled slightly and explained.

“My simulation-self reminded Wangji that there are two bunnies. I asked why the first one was alone, and the second one followed shortly after.”

As the watchers turned back to the simulation, it changed to show the Lan brothers eating watermelon.

Lan Wangji kept his eyes glued to the floor. All this time, he had tried desperately to convince himself that he would eventually learn to ignore his feelings for Yunmeng Jiang’s head disciple.

Now, some doubt was starting to creep in.

“...Brother.”

“What is it?”

“Have you ever had watermelon peel before?”

Realizing where this was going, Nie Huaisang laughed into his sleeve and turned to Lan Wangji, exclaiming, “Both you and Wei-xiong are so cute! You’re always thinking about each other!”

Wangji blushed, but, this time, didn’t deny it.

“...Is watermelon peel edible?”

“I heard it can be stir fried.”

“Perhaps it can.”

“I heard it tastes quite good.”

“I have never tried it.”

“Neither have I.”

Lan Qiren sighed at the Wei Wuxian-influenced conversation, but, like his nephew, avoided making any further comments on the matter. In hindsight, it had been foolish of him to start an argument.

(And yet, every time he closed his eyes, all he could see was Wangji forcing Wei Wuxian to enter the Cloud Recesses. Their forms would then shift until it wasn’t Wei Wuxian he saw being forced back inside, but Madam Lan.)

“Hm…” Lan Xichen turned completely. “Do you want someone to stir-fry it for you?”

After some thought, Lan Wangji shook his head, his expression solemn.

Lan Xichen let out a sigh of relief. For some reason, he didn’t feel like he had to ask “who told you all of this?” The answer was made apparent by the slight flush on Wangji’s ears.

“...You two are sickeningly sweet,” Jiang Cheng muttered. He hadn’t wanted to believe it at first, but getting beaten over the head with their interest in each other so many times made their mutual feelings impossible to ignore.

The scenery around them transitioned to a marketplace where Lan Wangji was looking around for someone to ask for directions. After a bit of trying, he found himself stuck.

He didn’t want to approach others, and they didn’t want to approach him.

He was too different — too pristine — to fit into the messy hustle and bustle of the market. Everyone around him hurried to avoid him, either fearing the arrogant heir his clothes implied, or the cold expression resting on his face. The only ones who wanted to look at him were women, and they were too nervous to do more than sneak glances out of the corners of their eyes, giggling with each other as he passed.

“That’s almost impressive,” Wen Qing carelessly muttered as she watched the crowd part into a large space around Lan Wangji. She tensed slightly when she realized she had spoken without thinking, but relaxed when Wen Ruohan glanced away, dismissing her comment.

Jiang Yanli tried to give a supportive smile, pleased the other girl was speaking more.

Finally, after walking for quite some time, Lan Wangji found an old woman sweeping the ground before her house. He walked towards her and spoke.

“Excuse me, where is the closest lotus lake from here?”

“...Ah,” Lan Xichen laughed, glancing at his brother. “I was wondering what you were doing.”

Lan Wangji refused to acknowledge the comment in any capacity.

The woman panted, unable to see clearly, and pointed, "Go two or three miled this way. One house has been planted over an acre of lotuses."

Lan Wangji nodded, "Thank you."

"Young master, they don't let anyone inside at night. If you want to go, you should hurry up and get there before dusk."

"Thank you."

Just as he was about to leave, he saw the woman struggle to shake a branch down with the end of her broom. With a flick of his finger, he directed his sword to knock the branch to the ground, and continued on his way.

Both Lan Qiren and Lan Xichen gave him identical proud smiles, and he relaxed slightly under their gazes.

The watchers were quickly brought to a distant path, soaked by the pouring rain. Due to Lan Wangji's speed, it was clear that the two to three mile journey would not take him very long.

Suddenly, he saw half a dozen people in the field before him.

"Oh, no," Nie Huaisang muttered worriedly.

Despite the rain, none of these people had any umbrellas, nor sought shelter. Instead, they stood circled around something, talking worriedly. Lan Wangji went over, and saw a farmer lying on the ground, moaning in pain.

Jiang Yanli flinched and glanced away from the gruesome sight, making Jin Zixuan stand protectively beside her.

A few sentences between the villagers cleared up what had happened. Apparently, an ox had run into the man, leaving him unable to get up. Someone had run to get a doctor, but it had started to storm shortly after, and there was no telling when the man would arrive.

"Damn, it's only been a minute, and the rain is already crashing down," a man grumbled, trying in vain to block the water above the collapsed man.

After a moment, another farmer pointed and said, "Let's prop up the shed over there. It'll hold up for a little while."

"I thought we weren't supposed to move him."

"A… a few steps should be fine."

The earlier parts were understandable in Wen Ruohan's eyes; they were a clear representation of Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian's feelings, making later motivations clearer to the watchers.

Focusing on this, however, seemed completely illogical. Why were they being shown a random farmer?

Two of the men went to lift up the shed roof, their faces turning red from the exertion but not causing the wood to budge even a centimeter. Shortly after, two more farmers went to help out, but the result was the same.

It was quite strange. Although it wasn't light, the roof wasn't so heavy that four men wouldn't be able to lift it up. And yet, it was quite clear they weren't able to budge it even an inch.

Realizing what had happened, Lan Wangji walked to the shed, bent down, grabbed a corner of the roof, and raised it with a single hand.

The farmers were shocked speechless.

"Wow," Jiang Cheng couldn't help but utter.

"It's all the handstands they do," Nie Mingjue explained. "Training and punishment all in one."

"Wangji and I rarely do it as punishment," Lan Xichen corrected. "But yes, it's rather effective. Perhaps Huaisang should give it a try?"

"Xichen-ge, you traitor!"

After several seconds, the farmers finally got over their shock and moved to take the injured man inside the hut. Nervously, one of them stepped towards Lan Wangji.

"Y… Young Master, you can let go. We-we can hold it."

Wangji shook his head, causing another farmer to continue, "You're too young. You won't be able to hold out."

They raised their hands to the roof to take some of the burden. After thinking it over a moment, Lan Wangji relaxed his hand slightly and the farmer's expressions changed instantly.

"Never underestimate Lan strength," Jiang Fengmian advised, giving Lan Qiren a smile.

Lan Wangji turned to the roof again, letting his strength flow back. Embarrassed, the farmers went back to squatting with the rest of their group. Even if they wanted to, they wouldn't be able to carry it without Lan Wangji.

Inside, the farmers shivered.

"Why is it colder now that we're inside?"

‘Ghoul,’ Wen Ruohan realized. Unlike the simulated Lan Wangji, the only things they were able to sense were spaces of highly concentrated resentful energy, so it took him a bit longer to notice.

And he was right. None of the farmers could see it, but hanging in the middle of the shed was a ragged figure, hair tangled and tongue stretched out. As wind and rain hit the shed from the outside, the figure swung back and forth, creating a slight breeze within the shack’s walls.

“Why do we keep having to see these things?” Nie Huaisang whined, burying his face into his hands. Although his reasons for feeling that way were entirely different, Wen Ruohan felt the same.

What was the simulation trying to show them?

The roof creaked slightly in synch with the figure’s swings, proving that it was the reason why the farmers had been unable to lift the roof. No ordinary person would ever be able to carry it.

Unfortunately, Lan Wangji didn’t have his guqin with him which he would normally have used to liberate the spirits. Due to the creature’s lack of malicious intent, Wangji wasn’t willing to tear its soul apart, meaning elimination was not an option. Therefore, his only choice was to continue to hold up the roof, and report it to the appropriate people once the rain had stopped.

With a flutter of her eyelashes, Jiang Yanli glanced between the real and fake Lan Wangjis, thinking to herself. Noticing the movement, Jin Zixuan leaned closer to her and gave her a concerned look. She smiled.

“It’s nothing,” she whispered. “I just… thought it was interesting. Both Lan-er-gongzi and A-Xian are refusing to act against non-malevolent spirits. Do you think it was intentional that these scenes were put side-by-side like this?”

“Probably,” Jin Zixuan agreed. “Not many cultivators would bother to check something like that, so I guess this is just meant to show their similarities.”

Yanli thought for a moment, then suggested “Once we get out, we should arrange for the perfect meeting between these two. I want our A-Xian to realize the same thing this version of A-Xian did.”

Somewhat excited by the idea of a group project, Jin Zixuan nodded and said, “If we work together, I’m sure we’ll be able to come up with something better than the emperor’s smile meeting!”

They smiled conspiratorially at each other, and Lan Wangji hid a shiver of fear.

The spirit continued to swish back and forth, then complained, “It’s so cold….”

“...”

The spirit looked around for something warm to lean on, finally landing on one of the farmers. The farmer suddenly shivered, causing Wangji to give the spirit a stern look.

The simulated Lan Wangji's cold gaze seemed to make the room drop in temperature. Quietly, several people sneaked closer to Wei Wuxian's array, which was the only source of heat in the matter-less simulation.

The spirit shivered at Lan Wangji's glare, returning in misery. Still, it extended its tongue and continued to complain.

"Th-the rain is so heavy. And it's so wide-open like this…. It's really so cold."

"...."

Even when the doctor arrived, the farmers couldn't build up the courage to talk to Lan Wangji. When the rain stopped, they moved the injured out of the shed, allowing Lan Wangji to set the roof down and walk away.

Lan Xichen frowned. He knew his brother didn't expect anything else — the virtual Lan Wangji was unsurprised by the distance the farmers kept — but it still made Xichen sad. Wangji spent all his time alone, never with anyone he would consider an acquaintance, much less a friend.

Well, until Wei Wuxian came bounding into his life.

By the time he arrived at the lake, it was already past sunset. Lan Wangji had spent the whole day traveling because he kept stopping to help people, and had never gotten so much as a thank you.

"Oh, I get it now," Jiang Cheng suddenly said. "My future-self said that you 'go wherever the chaos is.' I guess any time you travel somewhere, you do things like this."

"...I wouldn't know. We haven't seen where that saying comes from."

"I suppose that makes sense," Jiang Yanli giggled. "It was quite impressive."

"...Thank you."

Silently, Wen Ruohan considered what the Jiang heir had suggested. If that was indeed the reason for the scene's inclusion, then whoever had designed the simulation must believe that such behavior was normal for the Second Jade of Lan. If that was the case, then Lan Wangji's title — a testament to his character in addition to his power — was all the more impressive. Perhaps he would need to pay more attention to the boy.

Lan Wangji moved towards the lake, but, just as he was about to step onto a boat, was stopped by a voice.

"Hey, hey, hey! What are you doing here?"

"Picking lotus pods."

“It’s just after sundown! We don’t let anyone in when it’s dark! Today isn’t going to work, come again some other time!”

‘So his so-called righteous actions kept him from getting what he actually wanted?’ Wen Chao realized. ‘What an idiot.’

“I will not stay for long.”

“Don’t talk back to your elders. Do not make excuses.”

“I’m sorry, Uncle.”

“No means no. That’s the rule. I don’t make the rules here, you’d have to ask the owner.”

“Where is the owner of the lake?”

“He went home a long time ago, so there’s no point in asking me. If I did let you in, the owner would be furious with me. Don’t make it so difficult.”

Realizing it was pointless to continue asking, Lan Wangji nodded and said, “Apologies for the disturbance.”

“Such a polite young boy,” Jiang Fengmian complimented softly. Lan Qiren hesitated for a moment, then sighed and forced himself to admit the truth.

“Your Wei Wuxian has taken… righteous acts. When he let the ghoul go, and when he saved the rabbits. I… may have been a little too harsh earlier. My apologies.”

Jiang Fengmian smiled in response.

(Madam Yu frowned, wondering why Lan Qiren’s response was about Wei Wuxian rather than Jiang Cheng.)

As Lan Wangji began walking off with a calm expression, an aura of disappointment was prominent in his steps. The woman frowned slightly as she watched him, then-

“You came too late today. Come earlier tomorrow. Where are you from? The rain was so heavy earlier. You child, you didn’t run over here in the rain, did you? Why didn’t you take an umbrella? How far away is you home from here?”

“Ten and a half miles.”

The woman choked when she heard that.

“For lotus seeds?” Nie Mingjue asked.

“Wangji-xiong, you are a bit terrifying,” Huaisang mumbled.

“So far? You must have spent a long time getting here. If you really wanted to eat lotus seeds, you could have just bought some in the streets. There are plenty.”

“The lotus seed pods sold on the streets do not have stems on them.”

Lan Wangji couldn’t shake the feeling the Lan Xichen, Nie Mingjue, Jiang Yanli, and Wen Qing were all giving him the identical patronizing-yet-affectionate looks all loving older siblings seemed to develop. He kept his eyes trained forward, refusing to glance over on the off chance that he’d see (and therefore have to acknowledge) their gazes.

“Do they really need to have stems on them? It’s not like they taste different.”

“They do.”

“They don’t!”

“They do. Somebody told me so.”

Unable to resist any longer, Lan Xichen covered his mouth with his sleeve and whispered “adorable” to Nie Mingjue. The Nie sect leader nodded in agreement, glancing fondly at Huaisang for a moment.

“Who in the world told you that? Such a stubborn young master — it’s like you’re possessed by something.”

“By love!” Nie Huaisang sang, hiding behind his brother when Wangji glared.

After a moment, the woman continued, “Is your home really that far?”

“Mn.”

“What if… what if you don’t go home today? Settle down somewhere nearby and come tomorrow.”

Although he tried not to show how pleased he was, Lan Qiren was overjoyed that, even though the reason for his journey was Wei Wuxian, Wangji had retained his respect for the rules.

The woman hesitated, scratching her scalp as she thought. Then, after a long pause, she gave a heavy sigh and nodded her head once, speaking softly.

“...Fine, I’ll let you in. Just for a little while, okay? Hurry up if you’re going to pick lotus pods; if someone sees you the owner will blame me. It’d be embarrassing to get scolded at my age.”

Jin Zixuan’s eyes widened as he turned to Yanli and said, “The people there are so nice!”

Yanli nodded, “It seems like a beautiful place. Would… would you like….”

She hesitated, glancing away.

Blushing heavily, Jin Zixuan tried to pick up where she left off and asked, “Would you like-to-gotogether?”

She turned back with wide, surprised eyes, before they softened into a cheery joy and she nodded once in agreement.

A moment later, the simulation returned to the Cloud Recesses. Smelling the fragrance of the magnolia trees after the rain, Lan Xichen was struck by a bout of inspiration and set down his papers to instead paint by the window.

Excited, Nie Huaisang quickly snuck over to the painting, only to deflate in disappointment. It seemed the spirits whose memories were being used never saw the painting, so it was just a blank canvas.

How tragic! Shouldn’t he get some reward after bravely watching Lan Wangji deal with that terrifying ghost?

Through the window’s hollowed out carvings, Xichen saw an approaching figure. Without pausing in his brush strokes, Lan Xichen greeted them.

“Wangji.”

“Xiongzhang.”

“I heard you mention lotus seed pods yesterday. Uncle happened to have them brought up the mountain today. Do you want some of them?”

“I already have.”

“Already?”

“Mn.”

Although still confused, Xichen nodded and accepted the answer. The conversation ended after a few more words, and Lan Wangji returned to the Jingshi.

Xichen returned to painting, but continued finding his eyes drift to the lotus pods with stems, curiosity flitting by his face every so often.

“Oh my god,” Jiang Cheng sighed. “Wei Wuxian has gotten both the twin jades to believe that stupid urban legand!”

The two in question blushed, but had no counter argument.

After much contemplation, Xichen chose not to peel one of the ones with stems and try it for himself. He was still curious about the differences between lotus seeds with and without stems, but he resolved to figure it out another day.

'If Wangji looks so happy, they must be quite a delicacy indeed.'

"Unless that's not why he's happy," Huaisang cheekily pointed out, getting a glare from his brother.

"In the 19th year of the reign of Xuanzheng, the year of Yimao, Wen Clan of Qishan successfully annexed Wang Clan of Runan, Fu Clan of Hedong, along with dozens of other clans," Sizhui's voice narrated again, sounding like he was reading from a textbook.

The abrupt jump back to the prelude of the Sunshot Campaign startled several people, but Wen Chao perked up in glee. Dozens of clans had been absorbed into the Wen.

How much more powerful were they now?

The scenery around them changed, switching from a field covered with the corpses of the Wang Clan to Wen Ruohan himself, playing a game of Weiqi.

"Where there is conflict, there is bound to be a flood of blood," Sizhui explained. "The other clans do not dare speak for their own safety. That year, a message was sent to all the sects."

Wen Ruohan set down a piece, and a raging fire burned.

By now, the cheerful joy which had spread throughout the interactions between Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had vanished, replaced by a tense silence.

Sizhui spoke calmly, "A month later."

A line of Jiang disciples stood on the bank of the river. With bows in their hands, they turned their gazes towards distant objects in the sky; it was obvious what they were doing.

Lan Qiren had never been impressed by Yunmeng Jiang's method of "shooting kites" to practice archery, but if it was able to make someone as skilled as Wei Wuxian, then perhaps he had been a little too hasty.

Jiang Cheng stared at his own kite, glancing at Wei Wuxian's every once in a while. Wei Wuxian's kite had already flown high up in the sky, but he seemed unconcerned and made no move to draw his bow. With his right hand over his brows, he grinned and looked up, as though he felt like it hadn't yet gone far enough.

With another glimpse at Wei Wuxian's beautiful, shameless confidence, Lan Wangji found himself becoming enthralled all over again.

By now, Jiang Cheng's kite had nearly drifted out of the area in which he could be certain he could hit it. Gritting his teeth, he positioned his arrow and drew the bow. When he released the arrow, the kite painted like a one-eyed monster was pierced straight through, and fell downward.

“It hit!” he shouted.

When Jin Zixuan, Nie Huaisang, and Jiang Yanli smiled encouragingly at him, Jiang Cheng felt a reflection of their joy bounding through him. When Madam Yu gave him a single, proud nod, Jiang Cheng felt that satisfaction multiply nearly a hundred-fold — he was overflowing with happiness.

“Is Wei Ying not going to shoot?” Lan Wangji asked, watching the final kite drift farther and farther away.

“Yours has already flown so far,” Jiang Cheng told Wei Wuxian. “Are you sure you can hit it?”

“Wanna guess?”

He finally pulled out an arrow and aimed, drawing the bow back as far as it could go, then released.

A hit!

“I suppose that’s to be expected,” Lan Xichen said, thoroughly impressed. He now understood why the Jiangs were unsurprised by Wei Wuxian’s victory during the archery competition.

“Well, he is the to-be Yiling Patriarch,” Nie Huaisang added on, finding that he greatly enjoyed the sound of Wei Wuxian’s future title.

Jiang Cheng frowned.

At the same time, the simulated Jiang Cheng’s brows scrunched up again, a humph coming through his nose. All the boys put away their bows and went to fetch their kites so they could rank the distances. The closest kite would, as always, receive the lowest ranking.

“This seems kinda fun,” Jin Zixuan admitted, having only ever practiced by himself.

The one which was closest belonged to the sixth eldest. Some of the other boys playfully poked fun at him for that, but the sixth-eldest didn’t care at all.

“His is always the closest,” Jiang Cheng explained with a fond roll of his eyes. “But he, like Wei Wuxian, is too shameless to care about such things.”

Huaisang laughed at the explanation, feeling a sense of kinship, then asked, “How far do you think Wei Wuxian’s kite got? I could barely see it anymore.”

Wen Ruohan nodded slightly, feeling even more impressed with the boy than he was before.

Both Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng didn’t feel like getting their kites — obviously first and second farthest, respectively — and so went to play in the water instead. A short time later, two young, slender women appeared before them.

Jin Guangshan leered as he looked them over, but quickly backed off when his wife glared. It wasn't like he could touch them, so they weren't worth getting into an argument over.

The two women were dressed as armed maids, carrying short swords. The taller one, holding a kite and an arrow, blocked the boys' path, glaring coldly. Jinzhu and Yinzhu, as always, were displeased with the boys.

"Whose are these?" she demanded.

"They're mine," Wei Wuxian answered.

She laughed, "You're an honest one, aren't you?"

The two women stepped to the side, revealing Madam Yu standing behind them. The corners of her lips lay between a frown and a smile — she was a natural at sneering, just like Jiang Cheng.

"Mom!" Jiang Cheng realized, smiling when he saw her.

Meanwhile, the rest of the boys greeted her with respect: "Madam Yu."

Wen Chao scoffed, refusing to admit to even the slightest intimidation. Really, what was Sect Leader Jiang thinking? Everyone knew how Madam Yu often went out on night hunts, rarely staying at Lotus Pier. Based on the simulation, the few times she was home she just went around punishing and whipping disciples! And, most unbelievably of all, he allowed her to call herself "Madam Yu" instead of "Jiang."

In Wen Chao's humble opinion, Sect Leader Jiang offered his wife far too much freedom.

Madam Yu glanced at Jiang Cheng, "Playing around again? Come, let me see you."

When Jiang Cheng went to her side, Madam Yu squeezed his arm with her slender fingers, then slapped his shoulder loudly, scolding "There isn't any improvement in your cultivation at all! You're seventeen already, yet you're still like an ignorant child, fooling around with others all the time. Are you the same as them? Who knows what sewers other people go splashing around in, but you're going to be the leader of the Jiang Sect!"

Jiang Cheng stumbled from the slap, not daring to protest.

At the sight, Wen Chao burst into laugher.

"What? No response? You can't even look her in the eyes!"

"Just like you with your father, isn't it?" Nie Huaisang asked back innocently.

"You-"

"San-niang," Jiang Fengmian whispered. "There was no need to be so harsh on him. A-Cheng is doing exceptionally well, he-"

“He didn’t even place at the archery competition.”

“Which doesn’t mean he’s bad or that this practice doesn’t work.”

“Oh, of course. So long as Wei Wuxian does well with the Jiang practices, I guess that’s all that matters. A-Cheng’s failings certainly make it easier to make Wei Ying your heir-”

“San-niang, enough! That isn’t what’s happening!”

Both Jiang siblings looked down, trembling slightly.

“Wei Ying, what trouble are you stirring up this time?”

Lan Qiren frowned, wondering if his earlier theory about Wei Wuxian’s punishments was going to be proven yet again.

Accustomed to such accusations, Wei Wuxian stepped forward without complaint.

“You’re always like this! If you don’t seek to improve yourself, then the least you can do is stop dragging Jiang Cheng along to fool around with you. You’re a terrible influence on him!”

Wei Wuxian looked startled, “I don’t seek progress? Haven’t I progressed the most amongst anyone in Lotus Pier?”

“A-Xian, don’t provoke her,” Jiang Yanli whispered pleadingly.

“Wei Wuxian, shut up!” Jiang Cheng hissed, then turned to Madam Yu, “It’s not even like we want to shoot kites, it’s just that none of us are allowed to leave!”

“What?” Nie Mingjue asked.

“The Wen Sect took over all the night hunting grounds! Even if I wanted to go out and hunt, there isn’t anywhere for me to go! Didn’t you say to stay at home and not provoke a fight with the Wen Clan?”

Strangely, his virtual-self’s description of the situation reminded Jiang Cheng of the future's Dafan mountain. His older-self had taken over the entire place for Jin Ling, and scared away or trapped the other cultivators. It seemed nearly impossible to imagine a world without the Wen Clan at the top, and yet they’d already seen it, hadn’t they?

Madam Yu smirked bitterly, “This time, you’ll have to leave regardless of whether you want to.”

Without elaborating on the ominous statement, Madam Yu turned and left, Jinzhu and Yinzhu glaring at Wei Wuxian as they followed after her.

“When evening came,” Sizhui explained. “They finally understood. The Qishan Wen Clan ordered the other clans to send their descendents and twenty disciples to Nightless City, in order to correct the sect’s teachings and avoid wasting talents.”

“You dare!” Nie Mingjue shouted, standing up.

But Wen Ruohan only smirked slightly, responding “I suppose so.”

If his other-self was willing to do this, then he must feel prepared for war.

He wondered how much more powerful the simulation’s Wen Clan was, and why they still lost despite that. If his hunch was right, then the whole simulation had been showing him the answer to that exact question.

Wei Wuxian was far more interesting than he could have guessed.

The lotus pier conference room trembled as Jiang Cheng growled.

“The Wen sect really said this? They know no shame, do they?”

Wen Chao opened his mouth to make another comment, but when his eyes passed over an innocently smiling Huaisang, he backed down. He wasn’t sure why — he obviously wasn’t scared of the pathetic cultivator — but he suddenly didn’t feel like taunting the Jiangs anymore.

(Huaisang's many passive-aggressive responses were starting to wear at him.)

Wei Wuxian shrugged, “Well, they think they’re the sun shining above all other sects. It’s not the first time the Wen sect has acted so shamelessly. In the past year, they’ve used their power to stop all other sects from night hunting. Just how much prey and land do you think they’ve stolen?”

Jiang Fengmian frowned at them, advising “Watch your words and eat.”

Although both Lan Qiren and Jiang Fengmian had always tried to be careful when it came to speaking openly against the Wen sect, they were suddenly struck by a sense of uncertainty. They had continued not doing anything when the Wen sect took down those other sects, and yet their children had still been told to come to the indoctrination.

They had not provoked the Wens, and yet the war was still going to happen. They had stood by as the Wens took over smaller sects, and now they were targeting to the great sects.

~~Was this their fault?~~

Unlike her children, who had returned to eating at their father’s warning, Madam Yu looked back and forth between the food and her husband, astonished.

“How can you be so calm?” she demanded.

Wei Wuxian frowned, then began nervously biting his lip. At the same time, Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli glanced towards the ground, knowing exactly how this would end.

Both the Jiang siblings unconsciously shifted closer to Jin Zixuan, the only other person who could relate to their family dynamic.

"...Why are you so anxious?" Jiang Fengmian responded.

Instantly, the room seemed to tremble as Madam Yu slammed her hand down on the table.

"Anxious?" she repeated. "How can you be so calm and unconcerned?! What do you think they plan to do if we 'dare' to disobey their orders? Wen Ruohan is pushing his luck!"

It went without saying that, if they rebelled, the Wen Sect would accuse their sect of outlandish things, and wipe it out without hesitation.

Madam Yu glared down at Wen Ruohan, furious at the man's audacity.

"How arrogant," her simulation-self finished. "Either A-Cheng or A-Li must go…. We're literally sending them there just to be hostages!"

"A-Niang, don't be mad, I'll go," Jiang Cheng offered, standing up and saluting her.

"Of course you'll be the one to go!" Madam Yu shouted back. "We can't send your sister, can we?"

A grateful smile crossed Yanli's face as she nodded in appreciation towards her brother, covering up her internal bitterness. If she was just a little better at cultivation, then maybe Jiang Cheng wouldn't be forced to risk himself for her sake. She knew her talents laid elsewhere, but she couldn't help but-

Her thoughts abruptly cut off when Jin Zixuan laid a hand near hers, their pinkies phasing through each other. She glanced over, and made eye contact with him.

Earlier, people had mocked her as unsuitable for him due to her low cultivation; now, he was doing everything in his power to show that he didn't care. She was so, so much stronger than anyone outside her family realized, and her kindness ensured they would never be a copy of either of their parents' relationships.

In a way, she was perfect for him just the way she was.

Yanli relaxed and smiled back.

Head lowered, Wei Wuxian silently ate a few more mouthfuls. Then, he felt a slight tug on his sleeve, and glanced over to see Jiang Yanli holding out a dozen peeled lotus seeds for him to take.

Despite himself, Jin Zixuan couldn't resist glancing over and wondering if Yanli would be willing to peel lotus seeds for him as well.

“Thank you, Shijie,” he whispered with a grin. Jiang Yanli smiled, her somewhat-mild features lighting up with the warm, pale pinks of a sunrise.

“A-Li, stop peeling that!”

Her daughter flinched slightly, setting the lotus pod down. Madam Yu glared harshly, looking down her nose at both her daughter and her ward.

“You’re the master here, not somebody’s servant!” she reminded.

'Neither is Wei Wuxian,' several people wanted to say. And yet, with Madam Yu and the lack of an official adoption, he didn't technically count as a member of the family either. With so many mixed signals, it seemed like no surprise that Wei Wuxian's position in the family was debatable.

Wen Ruohan smirked; the more he saw of the Jiangs, the easier obtaining Wei Wuxian seemed to be.

“San-niang,” Jiang Fengmian uttered warningly.

“What? Did I say something wrong?” she asked mockingly, glaring at her husband. “Servant.”

She repeated the word slowly and deliberately, watching Wei Wuxian’s reaction with unconcealed malice.

“Not willing to hear that word? Jiang Fengmian, tell me. Are you planning to let him go?”

Jiang Fengmian sighed, answering “It’s up to him. He can go if he wants to.”

“I’ll go!” Wei Wuxian immediately answered.

Madam Yu glared, about to ask why only Wei Wuxian got a choice, when Lan Qiren asked, “You’d let him go?”

Most of the sect leaders were shocked. It was obvious by their interactions that Jiang Fengmian cared for Wei Wuxian on a personal level. An heir would have to go, but Wei Wuxian….

“You didn’t even put up a fight,” Lan Wangji whispered without meaning to. Wei Wuxian’s guardian — pretty much the only adult in his life who actually cared about him — was willing to let him unnecessarily become a hostage of the world’s strongest sect, putting up no complaint when he volunteered.

Having expected to have to defend himself on the opposite side, it took Jiang Fengmian a moment to respond, “The… children will be safer if they’re together.”

“Of… of course,” Jin Guangshan nodded, unable to hide his skepticism.

"...How does anyone think you care about him more than your son?" Nie Huaisang couldn't resist whispering, making Jiang Cheng do a double take.

After taking a few moments to collect herself, Yu Ziyuan rolled her eyes and spat out "Great. So it's all up to him, huh? He can go if he wants to, but if he doesn't want to, it's definitely possible for him to stay! Why is it that A-Cheng has to go no matter what? Sect Leader Jiang, what a great man you are, raising someone else's kid like this."

"San-niang, you're tired. Why don't you go back and rest."

'Just avoiding a confrontation for as long as possible," Wen Ruohan noticed. 'They're really a terrible match.'

"...Mother-"

"What? Do you want to tell me to shut up as well?" Madam Yu snapped at her son. "You really are an idiot. I told you long ago that you'll never in your whole life be able to surpass the one sitting beside you!"

Madam Jin looked to her friend in confusion. She had thought, based on the rumors, that Jiang Fengmian was the one going around saying those things. What did Yu Ziyuan hope to get out of crushing her son's self-confidence in such a way? And why bring Wei Wuxian into the reprimand?

Were the rumors about Wei Wuxian's real parentage true?

Madam Yu laughed, "You can't pass him in cultivation, night-hunting, or even shooting kites! You'll become the Jiang Clan's leader one day. But look at you. You still haven't improved one bit."

Jiang Cheng flinched in his seat.

"I've told you countless times not to fool around with him, and yet you continue defending him. Just how did I give birth to a son like you?!"

"Enough, San-niang," Jiang Fengmian snapped.

"Jiang-xiong," Jin Guangshan whispered. "Things would be much easier for you if you just allowed her to say what she wanted to say while in private. Women like that can't be reasoned with."

Madam Jin growled.

"I… I'll keep that in mind," Jiang Fengmian accepted, not understanding why anyone wouldn't defend their own son in such a situation.

After staring at her husband for a moment, Yu Ziyuan gave a self-deprecating laugh.

"Well, of course," she acknowledged bitterly, standing up and marching out of the room. "You mother is no match for his mother after all."

Wei Wuxian flinched slightly.

The door slammed shut behind her.

Yu Ziyuan growled, threatening everyone away from reading too deeply into her last comment. Wen Chao shrank down in fright.

Although Nie Mingjue didn't have any experience with marriage, he couldn't help but feel exhausted by the scenes before him. Throughout it all, he continued getting the feeling that this was an avoidable situation. The things Yu Ziyuan was angry about were understandable, but most of the problems she experienced were made up or self-imposed.

Her anger was causing her to make her life difficult for everyone around her and herself.

(Nie Mingjue knew that, in a few short years, he would exhibit similar symptoms as he began to feel the effects of his cultivation. He would need to be careful not to repeat her mistakes then.)

After a tired sigh, Jiang Fengmian continued with, "Let's eat now."

While Yanli continued to watch the direction her mother had just left in, Wei Wuxian turned around to look at Jiang Cheng. His downturned face switched between an unnatural pale and purple, and he trembled with a cataclysmic hurricane of emotions.

Jin Guangshan snorted.

"...Is something wrong, Jin-xiong?" Sect Leader Jiang asked, his voice neutral but his eyes cold. Over the course of the scene, Jiang Cheng had moved to sit down, and was now trying to make himself look as small as possible from his curled-up position on the ground.

"Not at all, Jiang-xiong. My apologies, I just thought of something funny."

Hearing the empty appeasement, Wen Ruohan smirked slightly.

"...Tonight," Jiang Fengmian began. "Tonight I'll count eighteen more people. You'll depart tomorrow."

Jiang Cheng nodded, but could not bring himself to ask anything else. He never knew how to speak with his father, while Wei Wuxian was highly competent.

"Uncle Jiang, do you have anything to give us?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Jiang Fengmian smiled, "I've given them to you long ago. Your swords are by your sides, and you keep our motto in your hearts."

"Oh, to 'do what is right, even if it seems impossible!'"

"Which doesn't mean you should stir up trouble even when you know it'll make a mess!" Jiang Cheng immediately pointed out. In an instant, the heavy air over them had lifted.

As Lan Xichen watched the interactions, many things began to make sense. Jiang Wangyin, who took after his mother's personality, had trouble communicating with his father, while Wei Wuxian didn't. Jiang Fengmian didn't seem to know how to fix the problem — or even realize there was a problem — so the situation progressively got worse. From there, Madam Yu took her own insecurities and projected them onto the situation, leading to the rumors about Wei Wuxian's parentage and Jiang Fengmian's favoritism.

That was… not an easy situation to fix.

(Though, at the very least, they seemed to be better than his own parents.)

The world around them twitched, flickered, and then reformed into a courtyard with dozens of disciples — hostages — under the care of the Wen sect. Unlike during the archery competition, where they all stood side-by-side, the four sects were gathered inside, while the Wen sects surrounded the field as guards.

Wen flags fluttered in the wind, resting high above the male and female disciples. As Wei Wuxian glanced around, his eyes landed on someone he was extremely excited to see.

Suddenly, a hush passed over the crowd. Someone walked into the head pavilion.

During the discussion conference, Wen Ruohan had been the epitome of lethal grace, not a step uncalculated. He had swept his robes out of the way and glided to his seat, showing the poise expected of the man closest to immortality.

His son's footsteps clunked as he marched to that same seat, collapsing down with a groan and swinging his own feet onto the table, chuckling as he did. Then, he reached out and pulled a laughing woman in. She was Wang Lingjiao, a servant from the recently conquered Wang clan.

Wen Chao gazed appraisingly upon the woman who would soon become his concubine, not noticing the disgusted stares from most people present. Meanwhile, Wen Ruohan smirked. If his future self had put Chao-er in charge of the hostages, then it was obvious what his true intentions were.

He was trying to provoke them.

He would weaken some of the Great Sect's strongest fighters, prevent an attack until the Wen Clan was ready, and probably gain an excuse to attack all in one. It was quite a brilliant move; a pity that it wouldn't work now that the other clans were seeing the results.

"Who's that woman?" Wei Wuxian asked as Nie Huaisang moved to hide behind him.

"Her name is Wang Lingjiao," Nie Huaisang explained. "She was one of Wen-furen's maids, but Wen Chao is a womanizer, and then…"

Both Wen Chao and Jin Guangshan felt a chill creep up their spine when Madam Jin began to growl. The power imbalance between Jin Guangshan and many of his targets had not escaped her notice, so Wen Chao's relationship with a servant made her highly uncomfortable.

"You just know everything about everyone, don't you?" Jin Zixuan asked Huaisang, awed. The latter had no comment.

Despite the woman hanging off his arm, Wen Chao's mind was focused elsewhere. In the middle of the crowd, a beautiful young woman in a soft pink robe glanced around nervously.

Seeing his gaze, Wang Lingjiao hissed angrily.

"Who is she?" Nie Mingjue asked, glaring slightly at Wen Chao. He lifted his hands in surrender to show that he didn't know, but that only made Mingjue's view of him fall.

"I… think I've seen her before," Jin Zixuan observed. "I think she's either an outer disciple or a maid from my sect. I'm not sure what her name is though."

"Luo Qingyang," Madam Jin answered after a moment of thought.

Inwardly, Jin Guangshan smiled. The heirs had to be sent, but it was best for the other 19 disciples to be low-ranking meat shields; really, he had no idea what Jiang Fengmian was thinking in letting Wei Wuxian go. Jin Guangshan would never have sent Jin Zixun or anyone else he was personally attached to!

Glancing between Wang Lingjiao and the object of Wen Chao's attention, Wei Wuxian huffed a laugh.

"Seems that maid is pretty narrow-minded," he decided.

Neither Madam Yu nor Madam Jin were able to hide their absolute disgust. Did that woman have no sense of pride? Hanging off the Wen's second young master and wearing barely anything to cover herself!

How dare someone like that try to stand above their children?!

At the sound of a fractured breath behind him, Wei Wuxian turned around. Among the tense Lan disciples, Lan Wangji stood with a slight hunch, clenching the fabric of his robes as he gritted his teeth in pain.

Lan Qiren felt his heart stop.

"Wangji?" Xichen asked, hurrying over to the pained simulation of his brother. Seeing the slight trembles in the virtual-Wangji's body made his heart sink with dread.

What could have happened? If Wangji was injured, why didn't Xichen go to the indoctrination instead? Why would he subject his brother to this?

"Something doesn't seem right with the Lan Clan of Gusu," Wei Wuxian observed. However, before he could go over and investigate, Wen Chao directed the announcer from the archery competition forward.

“Listen up!” the man ordered. “Hand in your swords one by one.”

“What?!” Lan Qiren gasped out.

Similar discontent was mumbled throughout the crowd until no one person’s voice could be made out. Among the indecipherable mumble, the simulation specified specific voices.

A Jin inner disciple shouted, “How can we just hand our swords over to you like this?!”

“This is absolutely absurd,” Jiang Cheng agreed.

“A cultivator’s sword should never leave their side! Why should we hand them over?!”

The Wen sect wanted them to just give up their main form of protection?

Madam Yu stood up and glared, “How can you have the audacity to require-”

“Who said that?” Wen Chao demanded in between getting pieces of fruit fed to him by Wang Lingjiao. The Nie disciple who had spoken glared defiantly up at him.

Then, Wen Chao glanced behind him, and nodded once.

Jiang Fengmian felt his blood turn to ice. Wangji gasped.

“Wen Zhuliu!”

Even before Lan Wangji had finished speaking, Wen Zhuliu had landed before the Nie disciple. He preformed a palm-strike that sent the Nie disciple flying, purple energy slithering around his arm like a snake.

Lan Wangji ran forward and caught the disciple, cringing when he applied too much force on one leg.

Lan Xichen glanced towards his brother again in concern, but everyone else kept their eyes trained on the Nie disciple. Given that it was Wen Zhuliu who had preformed the attack, there was no doubt as to what had occured.

The Core Melting Hand wasn't known for his mercy. Wen Chao now had one of the world’s most dangerous weapons at his beck and call.

Witnessing Wen Zhuliu’s power first-hand filled the other sect leaders and heirs with a sensation of suffocating doubt.

How on earth could the Wen Sect be defeated when they had him?

Powerful though many of them might be, they were nothing without their cultivation.

“Wei Wuxian, wait!”

Jiang Cheng's shout was the watchers' only warning before Wei Wuxian ran to the Nie disciple's side, kneeling next to Lan Wangji as the disciple gasped and heaved on the ground.

Suddenly, the world around them turned black except for a golden orb floating in the sky. Soon, the core was surrounded by writhing purple tendrils which dived in, shattering it to dust. It dissipated in seconds.

Back outside, the disciple screamed.

He fell over unconscious, and the other hostages were shocked into silence.

"That was quite enlightening," Wen Ruohan murmured, fascinated by the visual representation of a technique which, until now, Wen Ruohan had only understood in theory.

"You… he-"

Wei Wuxian grabbed the now-pale man's wrist, then flinched back in frustration.

"His golden core was… melted."

Everyone sucked in a breath.

Trembling slightly, Jiang Yanli forced herself to sit down so that she didn't fall over. Even to someone with a weak golden core like her, such an act was horrible to witness.

To the other heirs, it was nearly traumatising.

Their golden cores were what they spent their whole lives developing. Nearly every waking moment was spent working on them, refining their power so that they could be useful. Cultivators shaped their lives around their cores; losing it meant losing your power, rank, future, livelihood, and, sometimes, your reason to live. After all, what kind of person could possibly accept becoming a shallow husk of their former selves?

The warmth of their cores — that steady thrum of power and life — was part of any cultivator who possessed one, no matter how weak. It was thousands of hours of blood, sweat, and tears. In a way, they were nothing without their cores. To just lose it-

"I can't imagine anything more horrible."

Their silence was imitated by the gathered disciples. Then-

"It's… it's the Core Melting Hand, Wen Zhuliu!" someone screamed in terror.

Wen Chao immediately burst into cackles, suddenly much more excited about the coming events. If he had Wen Zhuliu with him, then those other heirs would stand no chance!

"Who else dares to disobey?" the simulated Wen Chao demanded amidst his own laughter. "People like you who rebel and act disrespectfully have set bad examples. It is my job to civilize you all!"

Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, and Jin Zixuan stood next to each other, all glaring up at Wen Chao. Past grudges and other relationships were being set aside in favor of standing united against the Wen Clan.

Just as Wei Wuxian tensed and moved as if to step forward, Jiang Cheng blocked him, whispering, "Stay out of trouble. There are far too many cultivators whose futures were destroyed because of Wen Zhuliu. You can't risk your life for nothing."

Nie Huaisang frowned slightly. He understood why Jiang Cheng said that — temporarily agreed with it, even — but had trouble supporting it when he knew the person who just had their core crushed.

'Li Chiyan isn't 'nothing,'" he thought. Yes, during this time of being hostages without backup, it was probably best to cooperate, but-

But they knew for a fact that the war was coming, and every time they made concessions for the Wen Clan that sect only grew stronger.

"Hand in your swords!" Wen Chao repeated.

A Wen servant stepped forward and held his hand out in front of Wei Wuxian. Hesitantly, Wei Wuxian looked back and forth between Suibian and the man, his uncertainty obvious. After several seconds, he held it out.

He glared at the ground, incomparably frustrated by his own powerlessness.

When it was Jiang Cheng's turn, he unconsciously held Sandu tighter, causing the Wen disciple to struggle for a moment before Jiang Cheng forced himself to release it. On the other hand, when someone stepped up to take Huaisang's sword, he handed it over without complaint, smiling as he did.

The sight made Nie Mingjue, who had spent years trying to make sure his brother didn't hide his sword away to avoid practice, smile slightly. Of everyone, this order probably affected Huaisang the least.

Jin Zixuan was the most angry of all with the order, but, when Wen Zhuliu began to approach, he handed his sword over without further complaint.

Worried, Wei Wuxian glanced back at Lan Wangji. Despite the other boy's ice-cold expression, he unstrapped his sword and handed it over.

Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren both breathed out sighs of relief. If Wangji was truly injured, this was not something worth going against the Wens for.

"Gongzi, we have appropriated all the swords."

"Very good. Now, hand that stuff out to them."

Immediately, a paperback book was trust into Wei Wuxian's hands. He blinked several times, reading the title.

Wen Chao explained, "The Quintessence of Wens is the collection of the Wen Clan's past generations of Sect Leaders' famous sayings and warnings. From now on, you will only follow these principles in your cultivation. Everyone must be able to recite it backwards fluently and remember it at all times. I will ask someone to recite it at every sunrise, noon, and midday from now on. Those who cannot will be punished in accordance with the Wen Clan's rules. You can begin."

"Only those rules?" Lan Qiren repeated, crossly. Even the Lan Sect didn't restrict disciples to that extent. In addition, he doubted every disciple would be able to memorize the book.

On this, at least, Jiang Cheng wasn't worried. Despite his infamously terrible memory when it came to other people, Wei Wuxian could soak up new information and texts like a sponge.

Somewhat-reluctantly, the disciples all opened up their booklates. While Jiang Cheng began reading, Wei Wuxian simply flipped through pages without care.

"Seems all kinds of nonsense can become quotes," he observed.

"Undisciplined brat," Wen Chao hissed. "How dare he-"

"Chao-er. Enough."

He continued flipping through, eyes barely skimming the pages, until he suddenly stopped flipping to look at a quote more closely. An amused smirk crept onto his lips.

"Hm. This is a pretty good phrase."

"A-Xian," Jiang Fengmian whispered warningly despite knowing that it was pointless. He knew that look on Wei Wuxian's face; it only appeared when he was up to mischief.

Back at the Lotus Pier, the Jiang Sect's purple flags fluttered majestically in the fierce wind. Inside, Jiang Yanli sat down at a table, eating in silence. Both of the seats next to her were empty.

"I'm here now, A-Jie," Jiang Cheng whispered when the real Yanli also started looking a bit down. She nodded at him with a smile, but sympathized with the stress her other-self must be going through.

Neither of them had any way to contact A-Xian.

"I wonder how A-Cheng and A-Xian are doing," she told her father.

"Don't worry so much. Disciples of Yunmeng Jiang aren't so weak as to crack under just one of the outside world's waves," he assured.

'That doesn't mean Wei Wuxian should keep going against the Wens,' Jiang Cheng protested internally, wishing his brother would just keep his head down for once.

As their view changed to mountain paths, Lan Sizhui's voice explained, "Wen Chao's 'special education' turned out to be more than just the memorization. During night hunts, he made the disciples do the brunt of the work, tracking down and subjecting demons, until he swept in and easily took out the prey that had already been beaten to a pulp."

The simulation showed these events, displaying Jin Zixuan and another Jin disciple fighting a dangerous Yao with their bare hands, only for Wen Chao — who still had his sword — to confidently kill the prey that had already been taken down. Once he did, the other Wens congratulated him.

"Thanks to Young Master, we killed the demon!" one said.

"Young Master is really amazing."

"Pft, it was trivial," Wen Chao responded.

"You shameless, arrogant-"

"Da-ge," Nie Huaisang whined, cutting off Nie Mingjue's next words. "Don't worry so much, I'm sure it's fine."

"Can't even handle such a weak monster?" Wen Chao asked, glancing down his nose a Jin Zixuan. "Aren't you supposed to be a skilled archer or something?"

"You-"

"Excuse me?" Jin Zixuan demanded, bristling. "If you weren't such a-"

"A-Xuan," Jiang Yanli whispered, "We know. You'll gain nothing from arguing."

"Zixuan, let it go," his friend advised. "It's not worth it."

Both inside and outside the simulation, everyone was walking on eggshells around the Wens. They couldn't push too much without potentially putting their sects at risk, so they didn't.

~~And yet the war happened anyways, didn't it?~~

"Wen Chao had boasted that he would win first place at the archery competition," Sizhui reminded them. "However, Lan Zhan, Jin Zixuan, Lan Xichen, and Wei Wuxian made up the top four. Since Lan Xichen wasn't present, Wen Chao took a special delight in ordering around the three who remained, making sure to scold them every day."

Wen Chao smirked, delighted by the thought.

(Both Madam Yu and Jiang Cheng frowned, frustrated at the additional reminder that Jiang Cheng hadn't made it in the top four. It made the simulated Madam Yu's earlier words ring in their heads again, and, worst of all, Jiang Fengmian seemed pleased by the reminder.)

(Jiang Fengmian, on the other hand, couldn't understand why they would want Jiang Cheng to be targeted.)

"Hurry up," Wen Zhuliu ordered as Wen Chao moved on to the next target. Even the brash, arrogant, and pampered Jin Zixuan wasn't willing to risk provoking him; Wen Ruohan couldn't have chosen a better guard dog.

Jin Guangshan almost couldn't believe that Wen Ruohan had managed to secure such loyalty from the Core Melting Hand. Despite being ordered around by Wen Chao, he never even tried to complain. It was truly impressive.

Unlike Jin Zixuan, Lan Wangji seemed to be in a state of inner peace and absolute indifference, as though his soul had already risen from his body. He never reacted to any of Wen Chao's words, and, beyond an unnatural limp in his leg, appeared divided from the physical world.

"Go, Wangji-xiong," Nie Huaisang cheered, getting an exhausted glance back but no further comments. Both Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren internally agreed with Nie Huaisang's cheer, adding words of encouragement in their heads.

Finally, Wei Wuxian, who had been through years of Madam Yu's diverse methods of scolding when he was at Lotus Pier, seemed almost amused by Wen Chao's attempts. Several times, he appeared to be choking back laugher at Wen Chao's attempts to humiliate him, hardly blinking an eye to such actions.

As impressive as Wei Wuxian's unwavering confidence was, Wen Ruohan still found himself disappointed. The constant beatings which had been implied to take place at Lotus Pier had refined Wei Wuxian's mental strength to a level beyond what the other people his age were capable of. That would also make it significantly harder for him to break Wei Wuxian's will and loyalty.

The Jiangs had done an excellent job turning Wei Wuxian into the perfect soldier. By giving him a mix of people to be loyal to and people to be afraid of, they could mold him as they saw fit without breaking his affection for them. Wen Ruohan doubted it was intentional on their part, but it would prove to be annoying nonetheless.

(Luckily, the simulation would give detailed instructions on exactly how to turn the boy into the Yiling Patriarch.)

Now the crowd was being herded up a mountain like livestock, surrounded on all sides by Wen disciples, and led by Wen Chao and Wen Zhuliu.

"Dusk-Creek Mountain," Sizhui explained.

As they traveled deeper into the forest, the branches over their heads became thicker and thicker, and more and more of the sun became blocked out. Every small noise made by a bug or animal seemed amplified in the silence, until some of the hostages began laughing.

“Ah, what a fragrant smell,” a female disciple said. Wei Wuxian turned to look, and saw a cluster of four girls talking to each other. One was Luo Qingyang, whom Wen Chao had focused on before.

Lan Qiren turned to pay more attention. If the simulation specified her, then the servant girl would surely be an important factor in future events.

“Good thing you brought your perfume sachet, MianMian. The bugs stayed away from us all day!”

“It smells good too. I feel so much more awake~”

Curious, Jiang Yanli drifted closer, only to remember belatedly that they couldn’t smell anything in the simulation.

Luo Qingyang, or “MianMian,” smiled, explaining “The inside is filled with medicinal plants, so it’s both pretty and practical. I’ve still got a couple left. Do any of you want one?”

“MianMian! Save me one too!” Wei Wuxian sang out, skipping over.

Madam Yu only sighed in defeat, knowing she couldn’t do anything to change the simulation.

“Who are you? Why are you calling me MianMian?”

“They were calling you MianMian, so I thought that was your name. What? Am I wrong?”

After a moment of speechlessness, she shouted, “You can’t call me that!”

“Tell me your name, and I won’t call you MianMian anymore. Sound like a fair deal?”

“Does he… always do this?” Lan Wangji asked, remembering the Jiang shidis’ earlier comments.

“Flirting?” Jiang Cheng asked, tiredly. “All. The. Time.”

“He never goes any further than that, though,” Jiang Yanli assured the frozen jade.

Scoffing slightly, MianMian asked, “Why should I tell you? You should say your own name before asking for someone else’s.”

“Sure. I’ll tell you, so keep it in mind,” Wei Wuxian promised, crossing his arms casually. “My name is Yuandao.”

Several people scrunched their brows in confusion. Getting it right away, Lan Wangji just sighed tiredly.

“Yundao?” MianMian and her friends repeated.

“MianMian,” one girl spoke, pulling her friend close. “I can’t think of any young master who bears this name. But judging by his look and demeanor, he’s not a nobody.”

The girls frowned and glanced at him, until, finally, Lan Wangji spoke up.

“Wordplay,” he explained.

“Huh? Oh!” Nie Huaisang smiled, delighted. “Oh, Wei-xiong. Good one!”

“No! It’s not a ‘good one!’ I can’t believe he did that!” Jiang Cheng added.

“Very impressive,” Jin Guangshan purred.

All the while, Lan Wangji glared at the ground. “Green, green, the riverside grass // It’s ceaseless bounds yearn for miles and miles,” was turned into “MianMian yearns for Yuandao.” Wei Ying had flirted with her using poetry.

Wangji had never been more jealous of someone.

Flushing, MianMian’s eyes went wide as she spun around and shouted, “Who’s yearning for you? You really have no face!”

One of her friends laughed and said, “Wei Wuxian, you’re really shameless! I’ll tell you, her name is-”

The last revelation was cut off by Luo Qingyang’s frantic and flustered movement, shouting “Don’t you dare tell him that! Let’s go!”

Madam Jin had been slightly worried when the flirting began, but her fears were assuaged when Wei Wuxian made no move to chase after the girls. As Yanli said, he really just enjoyed playing around; he wouldn’t push anyone farther than that.

(Not like her husband.)

Smiling, Wei Wuxian crept back to Lan Wangji, who asked, “Do you behave in such a frivolous manner with everyone you meet?”

“...I guess so?”

“Impudent.”

“Jealous?” Xichen whispered.

“No,” Wangji snapped back.

Wangji sped away, leaving Wei Wuxian to fall back with Jiang Cheng and a few other disciples.

“Ah, Wangji-xiong, Wangji-xiong. Wei-xiong is never going to understand how you feel if you-”

“Be. Silent.”

There were a few minutes of tension caused by Wen Chao's closeness, but soon people relaxed. They were still far enough away to avoid being heard. Conversation then shifted to insulting their ever-so-gracious hosts.

“Those damn Wen-dogs!” someone grumbled.

“I can’t believe they’re making us do this!”

“Every Wen-dog should go straight to hell,” Jiang Cheng agreed. Wei Wuxian looked like he was about to join in, but a moment later, his eyes inadvertently glanced back instead.

Just like before, Lan Wangji was keeping his face as blank as possible. However, he couldn’t hide the fact that his right leg was hitting the ground lighter than his left, as though he couldn’t put any pressure on it.

Lan Xichen, who had been standing by the simulated Lan Wangji as soon as the indoctrination started, felt relieved when he noticed Wei Wuxian’s eyes. Perhaps they would finally learn what was wrong.

Granting Lan Xichen’s unspoken wish, the simulated Wei Wuxian turned to Jiang Cheng and said, “Hey, Jiang Cheng. Doesn’t it look like Lan Zhan is limping? He’s not putting any pressure on his leg-”

“Stay out of it if you know what’s good for you,” Jiang Cheng hissed.

Xichen understood Jiang Cheng’s hesitance, but he couldn’t help but frown at his warning.

Although he didn’t press Jiang Cheng for answers, Wei Wuxian kept looking back at Lan Wangji as they walked, expression coated with worry. After a few seconds had passed, he finally couldn’t stand it anymore and slipped back to where Lan Wangji was, body language the picture of casual grace.

“What happened to your leg?” he asked.

“Nothing,” Lan Wangji responded, still looking forward.

Jiang Cheng sighed, “You and Wei Wuxian are both such idiots.”

“If there’s nothing he can do to change what’s happened to me, then there’s no point in explaining,” Lan Wangji responded, to the disappointed head shakes of both Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang.

“Wangji-xiong, Wei-xiong is super capable. You can rely on him a little!”

Huaisang’s brilliant argument was seamlessly ignored.

Grinning slightly, Wei Wuxian slipped around Lan Wangji to walk backwards while facing him.

“We’re so close, but you won’t even look at me? How cold.”

“Not close,” Lan Wangji pointlessly refuted, but it was obvious (to Xichen) that even he didn’t believe that.

“Come on, is your leg hurt?” Wei Wuxian asked, continuing to pester. “When did it happen? Don’t force yourself if you’re hurt. Do you want me to carry-”

His words were cut off as Nie Huaisang dragged him aside. Allowing himself to be pulled along, Wei Wuxian was brought ahead to where Jiang Cheng and several others waited for him.

“He’s even moodier than usual,” Wei Wuxian complained. “What’s wrong with his leg?”

“Why don’t you worry about yourself before you worry about him?” Jiang Cheng requested again.

Even though Lan Wangji wasn’t looking at him, Jiang Cheng glanced to the ground when he made the comment. Over the course of the simulation, they had slowly started to become… friends.

He prayed his simulation-self wouldn’t ruin that.

But one of the disciples beside them leaned closer to Wei Wuxian and whispered, “Of course he looks pale. Last month, the Wen Clan burned the Cloud Recesses down.”

“Burnt down?!”

“What?” Lan Qiren demanded, growing pale.

“What about Xiongzhang?” Lan Wangji asked, wide-eyed. “I was… the one sent to….”

If the Lan Clan sent him while he had a broken leg, then something even worse must have happened to Lan Xichen. The future Lan Wangji wasn’t Sect Leader Lan; surely, that meant Xichen was still alive.

But, until now, they hadn’t had any reason to question whether that was true.

(Suddenly, the fire that spread from Wen Ruohan’s go game made much more sense.)

As Nie Mingjue moved to stand by and support the shocked Lan Xichen, he thought self-deprecatingly to himself. Of course the Cloud Recess was attacked for the archery competition.

Because the other Four Great Sects had stood by as the Wen Clan decimated smaller sects, they had allowed the Wen Clan to grow powerful enough to attack them.

“By the Wen Sect’s people?” Jiang Cheng asked, having heard similar rumors in the past few days.

“...You could say that. You could also say… that the Lan Sect burnt everything down itself.”

Lan Qiren gritted his teeth in worry.

As the explanation began, their surroundings changed to Gusu at night. Wen Xu stood before a kneeling, captured group of Lan disciples, presumably demanding information on how to get in.

In a voice-over, the watchers heard the explanation continue, “The eldest son of the Wen Sect, Wen Xu, went to Gusu. He accused the Lan Sect’s leader of something and forced the Lan people to burn the down their own home! They said something about cleaning up the place and allowing it to be reborn in firelight. Most of the Cloud Recess and the surrounding forests have been burnt down.”

He had hoped, given the glimpse of the future, that the Lan sect had not been heavily impacted by the Sunshot Campaign. However, Lan Qiren now knew that those hopes were futile. The Lan Sect had been heavily hit by the Wens for no justifiable reason, just like the dozens of minor clans that came before.

The other Clan Leaders frowned in worry; if the Lan Sect had been attacked, then another great sect would surely follow.

Wen Xu, still silenced, seemed to be shouting at the captured Lan disciples. Then, frustrated, motioned to his men. A Wen soldier slit a Lan’s neck.

“Lan Yi!” Lan Xichen gasped out. Cultivators occasionally died in night hunts, but watching someone die from an intentional act of human cruelty was somehow much more unsettling.

One by one, the disciples were dispatched, until finally the one at the front seemed to shout something. Wen Xu grinned and brought down the barrier surrounding the Cloud Recesses. Su She had sold them out.

“That traitor!” Jiang Cheng shouted. “Isn’t he the one-”

“The one who Wei Wuxian and Wangji saved from the abyss?” Xichen guessed, expression even colder than his brother’s. “Yes, he is.”

Right before Wen Xu moved to kill Su She as well, Lan Wangji ran into the grotto, allowing the surviving disciples to escape. Instead of speaking, however Wen Xu immediately motioned to his men.

They moved to burn down the forest.

The disciple’s voice-over continued, “Just like that, hundreds of years of paradise were destroyed. The leader of the Lan Sect was also heavily injured; no one knows if he’s alive.”

“Father?” Lan Wangji asked, unable to add anything else. Quickly, Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, and Nie Huaisang gathered around him in a protective barrier.

“Is Lan Zhan’s leg related to this?”

In his shock, Lan Wangji didn’t even have the mental capacity to be flustered by Wei Wuxian’s fixation on him. All he could see was the fire beginning to spread before Wen Xu’s delighted gaze.

“It is. The first place Wen Xu ordered them to burn down was the Library Pavilion. He declared that he’d teach anyone who wasn’t willing to do it a lesson. Lan Wangji refused. He was attacked by Wen Xu’s people and they broke one of his legs. It hasn’t even healed yet, and he was dragged all the way out here. Who knows what they’re planning.”

The vision changed to the Library Pavilion, showing a limping Lan Wangji standing before the blazing doors, his cracked guqin laying on the floor before him. Despite the soot covering his face and the tremble in his stance, his golden eyes were alive with the most intensity and emotion the watchers had even seen from him. They glowed with unwavering determination.

At the direct contrast between Lan Wangji’s and Su She’s response to the Wen Clan, Lan Qiren turned to his nephew and nodded once. Although he rarely said it aloud, this time he felt it was necessary.

“Good job, Wangji. I’m proud of you.”

There was silence for a moment as Lan Wangji turned to him in shock, not understanding why his uncle was congratulating him after he, obviously, failed to stop the Wens.

He refuted, "I apologize for my failure."

These words made Wen Chao’s snickers turned into uncontrolled laughter that shook the room. He turned his gaze on the Second Jade of Lan.

“Not so arrogant now, are you?” he demanded. “Your cowardly tricks during the competition won’t work against the true might of the Wen Clan!”

Lan Wangji glared furiously in response, but no one could make a sound. The Wen Clan’s might had grown large enough to attack the other Great Sects unprovoked. They had started by cutting off one of their greatest threats, the knowledge kept hidden in the Cloud Recesses’ libraries. The Sunshot Campaign was starting.

With the exception of Wen Chao, no one mocked the Lan Clan’s weakness. It was a well-known fact that the Wen Clan was almost as powerful as the other great sects combined.

And, if they were willing to go against one, attacks on the others couldn’t be far behind.

Wei Wuxian moved as if to go over to Wangji again, only to be stopped by Jiang Cheng.

“What’s wrong with you now? Are you really going to provoke him some more? You’re just digging your own grave!”

“I’m not going to provoke him. Look at his leg. We’ve been walking for so many days — the state of his injury must have worsened. If he keeps walking like this, I doubt he’ll ever be able to use that leg again.”

Lan Qiren flinched again at the declaration of the severity. His only consolation was the fact that the future Lan Wangji had obviously been perfectly capable of moving around.

But to think that the unruly, unscrupulous, rebellious Wei Wuxian was the one most concerned with helping Wangji. It was ridiculous. He refused to accept that Wei Wuxian had a crush on Wangji (and doubly refused to accept the fact that it might be mutual).

But, for the first time, some part of his brain whispered to Qiren that maybe Wei Wuxian wasn’t the worst person for Wangji to be interested in.

After thinking the problem over for a moment, Wei Wuxian decided, “I’m gonna carry him.”

“What?”

Lan Qiren officially took back every good thing he had just thought about Wei Wuxian.

“It’s not like you’re close to him,” Jiang Cheng protested, pulling Wei Wuxian even closer. “Don’t you see how much he hates you? You’re gonna carry him? He probably wants you to stay as far away as possible!”

When Huaisang gave him an indescribably disappointed look, Jiang Cheng protested with “What? In that future, everyone thought he and Wei Wuxian hated each other. It’s not just me!”

“It’s all right if he hates me — I don’t hate him. I’ll get him onto my back the second I grab hold of him. What? Do you think he’ll try to choke me to death when he gets on my back?”

“We aren’t even able to take care of ourselves! We don’t have time to care about the trivialities of others!”

“First, this isn’t a triviality. Second, someone needs to do something about this.”

The differences between Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng were becoming more and more prominent as time went on. To Jin Guangshan, the most obvious divergence was in their priorities: Jiang Cheng wanted to protect the Jiang Clan, while Wei Wuxian wanted to protect everyone. The former used their pre-existing relationship as a way to determine whether to help, while the latter used his own moral code, an understandable difference due to their upbringings.

He wondered where his son — another heir — would land on this scale.

With that declaration, Wei Wuxian pulled away from Jiang Cheng and walked back over to Lan Wangji. They had been told to search around the mountain for the cave, and Lan Wangji had been forced to sit down because of his damaged leg. Wei Wuxian kneeled in front of him, facing away.

“Lan Zhan, get on. I’ll carry you.”

“Shameless,” Lan Wangji muttered, much more quietly and fondly than his previous outraged declarations.

“Come on up,” Wei Wuxian continued. “Your right leg can’t take much more. Besides, we’re good friends, aren’t we? Don’t be so embarrassed.”

Lan Wangji huffed and turned away, “No thanks.”

“Hey, what are you doing?!” a Wen disciple demanded. “No slacking off!”

Lan Wangji forced himself to stand up and walk. Wei Wuxian stared after him in shock, before another Wen disciple shoved him forward with another reprimand. The look on Jiang Cheng’s face was very much an ‘I told you so.’

In the privacy of his mind, Lan Wangji sent out a quiet ‘Thank you, Wei Ying.’

“You all spread out and look for it!” Wang Lingjiao ordered. “The monster’s cave Young Master Wen is looking for is nearby. If you delay Young Master Wen’s night hunt, you’ll regret it.”

“Just look at her,” Jiang Cheng muttered. “Even a lowly maid can order us around.”

The reminder made Madam Yu growl once again. Even Jiang Fengmian’s reproaching gaze did nothing to quell her rage at the audacity of the Wen Clan.

“Just let her be,” Nie Huaisang advised, hiding behind Wei Wuxian. “Don’t mess with her. That branding iron is so scary, leaving scars as soon as it touches your skin! It may even damage meridian points in the worst cases! Anyways, just avoid it as much as possible.”

“Do you think they’re animals?!” Madam Yu demanded, unable to restrain herself any further.

Jin Guangshan laughed nervously, “Now, now. We’ve agreed to not punish for things that have yet to occur.”

“And that makes it right?”

“Well, this is a surprise,” Wen Ruohan smirked, raising an eyebrow. “You’re the last person I expected to disapprove. Don’t you take great delight in whipping your ward whenever you find the slightest excuse for it? So often that no one was surprised when you specifically targeted him?”

“How we train our disciples in Yunmeng is no concern of yours.”

“You mistreat your most powerful disciple,” he continued, glancing at Jiang Cheng to make the full insult clear. “A head disciple who embodies the Jiang Sect motto is regularly singled out. Doesn’t that prove the necessity of the indoctrination camp? We’re simply using your tools on the right people.”

“The people that object to the Wen Sect's values?” Jiang Fengmian couldn’t resist asking.

“But of course, as your son so eloquently put it, your own motto is just an excuse to stir up trouble even when you know it’ll make a mess.”

“That’s not what I-”

“I know, A-Cheng,” Jiang Fengmian assured. Although he was speaking to his son, he made sure to maintain eye contact with a smirking Wen Ruohan. After several long seconds, Wen Ruohan finally glanced back at the simulation, apparently deciding to hold off on causing another argument.

For now, at least.

A woman’s scream resounded from behind the trio, and Wei Wuxian turned to look.

Jin Guangshan raised in eyebrow, recognizing the tone of that scream intimately.

“Please don’t do this, Master Wen!” Luo Qingyang begged, backed against a tree. Wen Chao loomed over her, grinning down as he laughed and approached.

“You sick, deplorable beast!” Madam Jin shouted, turning a furious glare on Wen Chao. He shrank closer to his father, only to back away again when he found no support.

Wen Ruohan didn’t particularly mind what was happening, but he certainly wasn’t going to endorse it in front of the other sect leaders. Even he wasn’t that shameless.

As Wen Chao crept closer to the trembling woman, he grinned asked, “Don’t do what? Don’t hold your hands, or don’t kiss your pretty face?”

Right as he leaned in to kiss her, a leaf appeared in front of his mouth. Holding it as a barrier, Wei Wuxian smiled conspiratorially.

“Yes,” Jin Zixuan hissed, disgusted by his father’s comfort in the situation. “Go Wei Wuxian! You can do it!”

Wen Chao scowled.

“It’s not at all funny when you use force, right Wen-gongzi?” Wei Wuxian asked, grinning in a childish mischief that was the opposite of Wen Chao’s earlier smug lust.

“You-”

“What’s the rush?” Wei Wuxian leaned close to whisper, then made a beckoning motion. “Wen-gongzi, I’ve got something even better! The best erotic paintings.”

Luo Qingyang looked back and forth between the pair in confusion.

“I… suppose that’s one way to solve it,” Nie Mingjue muttered hesitantly. To someone like him, who favored direct and forceful solutions, Wei Wuxian’s roundabout teasing were more than a little perplexing.

However, it was notable that Wei Wuxian’s method protected the girl without making the Jiang Clan a target. Perhaps Jiang Cheng’s warnings were being heard after all.

As Wen Chao turned his grubby hands on the book, Wang Lingjiao came running over.

“Wen-gongzi, I found it!” she called. “I found the cave!”

“Ah? Where is it? Take me there right away!”

He stood up to follow her, not noticing how Wang Lingjiao’s smile vanished the moment she laid eyes on MianMian. It was clear what had almost happened. As they walked, she grabbed onto Wen Chao’s arm even tighter than usual, turning her simpering maiden eyes up to eleven.

“Wen-gongzi, I went through a lot of trouble to find it~” she sang.

Wen Chao highly approved of his new concubine.

“MianMian, are you okay?” one of the girl’s friends asked.

“I’m… I’m fine.”

“Wei-xiong, where did you get those erotic paintings?” Nie Huaisang asked.

Wei Wuxian smirked, reaching into his robes and pulling out the book he had tempted Wen Chao with just a few minutes ago. It was The Quintessence of Wens.

“Clever, clever,” Wen Ruohan muttered, recognizing the boy’s characteristic resourcefulness. In addition, Wei Wuxian’s ability to seem perfectly natural despite making it up as he went along was highly impressive. Though that did mean Wen Ruohan would need to carefully monitor Wei Wuxian at all times.

It wouldn’t due for the boy to slip out of his cage, would it?

Ignoring Nie Huaisang’s shocked exclamation, Wei Wuxian reached down and picked up one of the aforementioned perfume patches off the ground, dropped during the earlier scuffle.

“Woah, this sachet smells so good!” he complimented. “Can I have one, MianMian?”

She turned towards him with a conflicted expression, trying to reconcile her annoyance at Wei Wuxian's "Yundao" comment with how he had just saved her. Seeing her hesitance, Wei Wuxian smirked.

"You're ignoring me? Then I'll start asking around! I'm sure there'll be someone willing to tell me your name!"

"Fine, just take it!" she shouted, storming off with a bright red flush on her cheeks.

As she left, a Wen disciple shouted, "What are you doing? Let's go now!"

Wei Wuxian rolled his eyes, but walked towards the cave nonetheless.

"...What do you think is in the cave?" Nie Huaisang asked, suddenly getting nervous. Seeing that, Nie Mingjue tried to offer some reassurance.

"I'm sure it's nothing. At most, a few low-level yao. It would be unreasonable to expect you to fight anything more than that without your swords."

Despite his best efforts, his words did very little to comfort the crowd.

"This must be it!" a Wen disciple shouted as the scenery reformed around the watchers into a large hole in the ground. The hostages all moved to look down the hole, but no one could make out anything but darkness.

Suddenly, Nie Huaisang stepped back in fear and tilted over.

"Huaisang!" Nie Mingjue shouted.

Two Wen disciples caught him before he hit the ground, and Wen Chao looked down his nose at him. However, due to Nie Huaisang's reputation, no one was surprised; after all the walking they did, the terror of the hunt must have been too much for him, causing him to faint.

"Idiot," Wen Chao cursed, motioning at his officers to take the Nie heir away.

Although he wanted to be annoyed at Wen Chao for the insult, Nie Mingjue was too relieved that Huaisang wouldn't be in danger to care.

(His powerlessness, both inside and outside the simulation, was starting to wear at him.)

Under Wen Chao's orders, the disciples all began climbing down a large tree trunk, soon reaching the bottom. However, even with their torches, they couldn't make out what they were trying to find.

"Why is it so dark in here?" someone whispered. "What are we looking for?"

Huaisang desperately hoped they wouldn't get the answers to those questions.

"Careful."

“Listen, I hear water droplets.”

“Come on, let’s go check it out.”

“Please be safe,” Jiang Yanli whispered, disliking the building tension caused by the search. Opposite her, Wen Chao cackled slightly, eager to see the ferocious beast he would soon kill.

They crept through the empty cave, barely able to make out even the rock formations along the walls. Then, finally, they reached a pool of water which reflected the light of their torches as a blue glow. This light allowed them to make out the island in the middle of the water.

Wei Wuxian gave an impressed sound.

“Ah? What are you standing around for?” Wen Chao demanded, loudly. “Get in here now!”

“Idiot,” Nie Mingjue muttered, astounded that Wen Chao was being stupid enough to shout when he hadn’t identified the location of whatever they were hunting. The insult made Lan Xichen’s lips momentarily quirk up into a smile, before they fell back down again.

He hadn’t forgotten the injury Wangji had; would he even be able to fight with it?

“Master Wen,” Jin Zixuan said. “You should at least tell us what we’re hunting for so we can deal with it together.”

Madam Jin nodded at her son, pleased that he hadn’t been so intimidated by the Wens as to not look out for his own safety. His pride as the Jin heir remained intact.

But Wen Chao just sighed at him, “For the last time, I give the orders, you follow them. You are only working under my commands, so don’t tell me what to do!”

“It almost seems as though you don’t want them to survive,” Jiang Fengmian couldn’t help but observe. Despite his even tone, the tension in the group tripled when they heard his words, all aware of their accuracy.

“I suppose we’ll have to wait and see,” Wen Ruohan dismissed with a wave of his hand.

“Now go!” Wen Chao commanded.

The placements of the disciples immediately changed, alerting the watchers to a flash-forward in time. Sighing heavily, Wei Wuxian ran a hand through his hair and complained.

“What kind of monster are we hunting anyways? It’s been two hours, and it still hasn’t shown up.”

“Two hours?!”

"...It must have taken a while to walk into the cave," Lan Qiren supposed, trying (in vain) to cover up his distaste for the poorly run night hunt.

"I hope it's not too difficult to handle," Jiang Cheng responded, continuing to look around. Water continued to drip into the center pool, falling at a steady pace. Jin Zixuan and a few other disciples checked out the far shore of the lake, while Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng were by the near shore.

They looked and looked and looked, but couldn't find anything.

"Why is it taking us forever to find it?!" an impatient Wen Chao finally demanded.

"Perhaps it would be easier to find if we knew what we were looking for," Jin Zixuan suggested angrily.

Jin Guangshan immediately turned placatingly at Wen Ruohan and said, "Though Chao-er's method works fine as well. My apologies for my son's words."

The glare Madam Jin sent her husband could boil ice.

"Hey, you!" Wen Chao finally shouted. "Go hang someone up and let some blood drip to lure that monster out!"

"What?!"

"You dare-"

"This isn't even hostages anymore!" Lan Xichen shouted. "Now you want live bait?!"

Wen Chao flinched back slightly, "They wouldn't necessarily have-"

"No," Jiang Fengmian said, his voice gaining a steel-like quality few had heard from him before. "This in unacceptable. For a cultivator to allow this to happen — to order it — is inexcusable."

If someone was made live bait, they would almost certainly die. The disciples there were most definitely not hostages anymore.

"I can't wait to have some fun," Wen Chao smirked.

"Completely unrighteous," Lan Wangji declared, glaring at Wen Chao. Before, Lan Qiren or Lan Xichen would have pulled him back to avoid potentially offending the Wens, but now-

If this was what Wen Ruohan was planning, then perhaps attacking sooner wouldn't be so bad after all.

After looking around for a moment, Wang Lingjiao, still hanging off Wen Chao's arm, pointed at Luo Qingyang.

"Just take her," she suggested.

Yanli paled even more at the order, turning to the girl whose sweet-smelling perfume bag had caused several adorable interactions with Wei Wuxian. And she was going to be strung up and forced to bleed out.

Seeing Yanli's fear, both Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan frowned.

"Her? Er… how about we chose another one?"

Wang Lingjiao draped herself over Wen Chao, whining, "Aw. But I don't want to. She's the only one I want to pick."

"That disgraceful whor-"

"San-niang, enough," Jiang Fengmian interrupted. She turned to him as if to start an argument, but acknowledged, for now, what was most important was paying attention to the simulation.

"Why?" Wang Lingjiao whined. "Don't tell me you'll miss her?"

"Eh… ah, ha. Nonsense. What do I have to lose? We can do whatever my Jiaojiao wants!" Wen Chao assured. "Come, tie her up."

Unconsciously, Jiang Yanli moved to defend MianMian, making Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan follow shortly after. The Wen disciples in the simulation passed straight through them, nearly making Yanli's eyes water with her own helplessness. She turned toward the vision of the terrified girl.

"A-Jie," Jiang Cheng whispered mournfully. "There's nothing we can do."

They couldn't interfere with the simulation. They couldn't do anything but watch.

The frightened MianMian soon turned and ran, fearing for her life.

"Whoever dares protect her," Wen Chao warned. "I'll make sure you never get out of this cave!"

"And now you're threatening all their lives?!" Madam Yu demanded, unable to be held back anymore. If Wen Chao was willing to go that far, then he was willing — and probably trying — to kill them all.

One of the Lan disciples who MianMian had hidden behind then frowned, and, slowly, got out of the way.

"Su She!" Lan Qiren shrieked, making everyone recognize the disciple who had not only been saved by both Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji, but had also sold out the Cloud Recesses.

"Unrighteous."

"Cowardly!"

“Foolish,” Lan Wangji finally commented, agreeing with both Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue’s words, but adding on his frustration. If Wen Chao was wiling to kill someone (and, since Wang Lingjiao was the one to chose MianMian, didn’t seem to care about who was killed), then cooperating with him would only delay the inevitable. Not to mention how it would go against everything the Lan Sect valued and taught.

He understood their fear, but it was time to fight.

Wei Wuxian moved forward as if to step in, but Jiang Cheng held him back.

“A-ah, good,” Wen Chao stuttered. “At least the heir is trying to keep a leash on him. Thank you for your cooperation.”

Suddenly feeling disgusted, Jiang Cheng stepped away from the Wens. His other self wasn’t okay with what was happening, he was just-

As the other disciples closed in, MianMian made one final attempt to run. She quickly ran to hide behind the only disciples who hadn’t moved away from her.

Lan Wangji and Jin Zixuan stood proudly.

“Step aside!” a Wen disciple ordered.

Jin Zixuan just huffed in response, while Lan Wangji remained perfectly still.

“Good job, A-Xuan,” Yanli whispered. She had always been attracted to him, but seeing things like this showed even his pride could be an indisputably valuable quality. He wouldn’t bow to the Wens.

The more she got to know him, the more she fell in love.

Similarly, Lan Qiren nodded once at his nephew, worried beyond belief given Lan Wangji’s broken leg, but grateful for Wangji’s moral excellence. The Lan Sect might have been burned down, but its values were immortalized in Lan Wangji’s actions. Wang Lingjiao allowed her jealousy to cause this, Lan Wangji rose above his jealousy to prevent it.

He wouldn’t hesitate to act.

Wen Chao stepped toward them, laughing as he did and asking “Why are you just standing there? You can’t understand human speech? Or do you just want a chance to save the damsel in distress?”

Jin Zixuan lifted his brows and asked, “Really? It wasn’t enough to use us as meat shields? Now you want to let live humans bleed to death to serve as your bait?”

’Huh,’* Wei Wuxian thought. ‘So Jin Zixuan has the guts to stand up after all.’

At the unexpected compliment from his maybe-one-day-brother-in-law, Jin Zixuan blinked in surprise. It seemed like Wei Wuxian’s anger wasn’t enough to blind him from the good sides of a person.

Underneath Jin Zixuan's fear and desperation, a little celebration took place. Perhaps, one day, they would be friends.

Except, "one day," Wei Wuxian would kill him and Yanli, wouldn't he?

Infuriated, Wen Chao continued "Are you rebelling against me? I've been tolerating you up until now, but — hang the brat up with your own hands, or none of the people from you sect can expect to return!"

Wen Ruohan smirked; that was probably about what his future-self had expected when he allowed Wen Chao to lead the camp. If anything, he was surprised it had taken so long.

Everyone else, however, was frozen. Here Wen Chao was, demanding that they comply with the murder of an innocent, or be responsible for the deaths their martial siblings. But that wasn't his real goal at all, was it? He was just picking them off in groups so that, eventually, none of them survived.

The Wen Sect had asked for their heirs and twenty other disciples. If they were picked off like this, the foundations of the next generation would crumble.

Both Lan Wangji and Jin Zixuan glared in response to the demand, realizing the same.

They hadn't expected anyone to help them, but they also hadn't expected their own to go against them. They were proven wrong when a scream forced them to turn around, and they saw Su She trying to drag MianMian away.

"Let go of me! Let go!" she shouted.

Lan Xichen forced himself to breathe out slowly. They had agreed to not punish for things that had yet to occur once they got out, but….

But their motto — everything their lives and rules were based on — was to "be righteous." He wasn't sure he wanted Su She in the Lan Sect anymore.

Su She continued to tug at her, only to blink up in shock when sparks of blue light crashed into him and slammed him into the cave wall. Lan Wangji had attacked him.

The disciple moved to stand up again, but shrank down under Lan Wangji's deadly glare. Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng tensed.

'In this situation, it's impossible to only worry about yourself and hope that no blood will be lost.'

Ferocious glares were sent toward the Wens.

Wen Qing refused to make eye contact, causing Jiang Yanli, who had hoped they were reaching an understanding, to frown.

Wen Chao was enraged.

“How dare you?! Kill them!”

The Wen disciples ran toward the pair, attacking with all their might. However, despite being the only ones with swords, they were unable to beat the heirs of the Great Sects.

“Go, Zixuan!” Madam Jin shouted. “Don’t let up!”

Knowing they would die even if they complied, a large number of Jin disciples also joined the fight, beating back the armed Wen cultivators with their bare hands. Unlike Su She, they were willing to join their heir. The Jin Sect disciples were trained to follow Jin Zixuan’s orders, while the Lans had always been trained to rely on the Twin Jades for help. This difference was evident now.

“You dare to disobey me? Just who do you think you are?” Wen Chao demanded. “Kill them! Kill them all!”

Throughout the conflict, the Core Melting Hand remained a steady and silent warning behind Wen Chao’s back, guarding his master’s son. And he was right; he didn’t need to attack.

Not only were the Lan and Jin fighters outnumbered and unarmed, but Lan Wangji, their strongest fighter, was injured before it even began. Although their progress was slower than they expected, the Wen disciples eventually began gaining ground against the rebelling forces, pushing them and MianMian into a corner of the cave.

“Wangji,” Xichen whispered nervously, subconsciously moving closer to his brother. On the side, Jiang Cheng glanced down, ashamed.

He understood why his simulation-self was acting that way, but that didn’t change the fact that he was preventing Wei Wuxian from saving Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji.

The virtual Jiang Cheng didn’t know them, but the real one-

The real one was terrified for his new friends, and starting to hate his virtual self’s decision.

Seeing his approaching victory, Wen Chao’s mood greatly improved.

He spat, “Talking back to me? Just who do you think you are? People like you really do deserve to be killed!”

“That’s right! Those who use their clan’s power to bully others really do deserve to be killed!”

Having almost tuned out the speaker as soon as “That’s right” was said, it took the watchers a moment longer to realize the actual sentiment. They blinked, then turned to the source of the comment.

“Wei Ying?” Lan Zhan asked.

“What did you say?” Wen Chao demanded.

“I said, all those who rely on the power of their Clans to oppress others and do evil should be killed! Not only that, they should be beheaded and cursed by all people as a warning to future generations, right?”

Recognizing the quote, Wen Ruohan snorted in amusement.

Wen Zhuliu seemed to ponder as he glanced at Wei Wuxian.

There was a long pause as Wen Chao thought his words over.

‘That’s just pathetic,’ Jin Guangshan thought, wondering how Wen Ruohan could stay so calm and composed despite his embarrassment of a second son. Then, however, he saw the way the man’s eyes were trained only on Wei Wuxian, and realized the answer.

He didn’t care about Wen Chao. He'd already decided which one he valued more.

After a half dozen seconds of awkwardness, Wen Chao suddenly tensed and turned to Wei Wuxian with fury and realization on his face.

“You-” he gasped. “Wei Wuxian, how dare you say such absurd, outrageous, and pretentious words?!”

Wen Zhuliu sighed and shook his head in disappointment.

Several people snickered at the reaction.

Wei Wuxian lifted the corners of his mouth, then immediately burst into unbridled laughter. Under everyone’s shocked eyes, he laughed so hard he was out of breath, clutching Jiang Cheng’s shoulder.

“Absurd? Outrageous? I’d say you’re all of those!” he smirked, pulling out the Quintessence of the Wens. “Wen Chao, don’t you know who said those words? Let me tell you, this was said by the most famous cultivator in your sect, the one who founded the whole thing, Wen Mao!”

Awed yet entertained gapes spread out across the watchers as everyone realized what Wei Wuxian had done. Wen Chao flushed the shade of a squashed prune.

“And you dared to say your ancestor’s words were absurd and outrageous? Well said, very well said!” he continued through his laughter.

“Told you,” Jiang Cheng whispered, unable to hide his grin. “He never bothers to learn what he’s supposed to, but if he cares he’ll know it better than anyone.”

Nie Huaisang and Jin Zixuan gave a short applause, and Lan Wangji found his mouth starting to creep into a smile as well.

“What’s the punishment for insulting famous Wen Sect cultivators again?” Wei Wuxian asked, his cheerful expression darkening to a more malicious smirk. “It was execution, right? Yes, very well, you can go die now.”

Lan Qiren supposed the boy's annoying nature was much more tolerable when it was being used against an enemy.

Wen Chao couldn't hold back any longer, unsheathing his sword and lunging at Wei Wuxian. With that, he had jumped out of Wen Zhuliu's range of protection.

His guard dog ran after him, but in the half-second it took him to get over, Wei Wuxian had disarmed Wen Chao, grabbed his sword, and captured Wen Chao as his own hostage. Wen Chao's own blade would slide cleanly across his neck at the slightest provocation.

"Nobody move! If you're not careful, I might just decide to let some blood out of your Young Master Wen," he warned, causing even Wen Zhuliu to freeze.

What Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji had done was heroic, but more than likely to fail due to the odds stacked against them. What Wei Wuxian had done….

"How did he have time to plan all that out?" Nie Mingjue asked, shocked. They had practically been in a hopeless situation, and Wei Wuxian managed to turn it around in less than a minute.

Wen Zhuliu had been on the defense the entire time, while Wei Wuxian had expected Wen Chao to attack. Therefore, he had been able to deal with the situation faster than even The Core Melting Hand could react to.

Now, with Wen Chao between them and a sword to the heir's neck, there was nothing Wen Zhuliu could do. One by one, the Wen disciples stopped their fighting and turned to face them.

"Drop your swords!"

They did.

Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji took deep breaths, glancing around at their defeated foes.

"Good job, A-Xian," Jiang Fengmian muttered proudly.

Jiang Cheng flinched.

"Wei… Wei Wuxian, I'm telling you. If you dare to hurt me, none of you will get out of here alive!" Wen Chao warned through his stutters. "Take this sword away from me!"

Wei Wuxian didn't even blink.

Despite herself, Madam Yu found she approved. Her friend's son slash Yanli's newly-motivated fiance had been in danger (as well as the Lan boy who Jiang Cheng had started befriending), and Wei Wuxian had delt with it. The taunting had been immature, but, overall, the situation was resolved in a way that would improve the Jiang Sect's reputation.

Seeing this, Jiang Cheng shrank in on himself, disheartened.

However, just then, a rumble shook the ground and a shadow stretched out from behind Wei Wuxian. The island in the middle of the lake was moving!

“Wei Wuxian, watch out!”

Wei Wuxian’s eyes widened, and, behind him, a crimson eye as large as his head blinked open.

“What?”

The world faded to white.

”What?!”

“What-they-it-”

“They can’t end it there!” Huaisang shrieked, eyes wide. The crowd shared the sentiment.

“What was that?”

“An-an eye?” Jin Zixuan guessed, mouth agape. “Wait, wait, we have to fight that?!”

As cultivators, they had experience fighting giant monsters. However, that was big even for them, and they were almost all unarmed. In the earlier scenes, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had both been shown trying to deal with spirits while not having their swords. As expected, they had both elected to contact their sects to deal with them. They couldn't do that now. With Lan Wangji’s injuries on top of that-

“What did you bring them to?” Madam Yu demanded, as fiercely protective as a mother lion. With the knowledge that her son was there, any fear she might have had of Wen Ruohan vanished instantly.

“We’ll have to wait to find out,” Wen Ruohan responded as calmly as ever. His mind, however, was working at a rapid-fire pace. This was the second time he had seen Wei Wuxian and Wen Chao interact.

And it was becoming more and more clear which one he should invest into.

He already had Wen Xu as his heir. With the situation as it was, Wei Wuxian was clearly showing himself to be far more valuable than any other piece of the Sunshot Campaign.

Another thing to note was the changing behavior of the watchers. Before, they had hesitated to even imply that the Wens were being unethical. However, the simulation was slowly breaking down those walls.

When they got out, it seemed likely the Lans, Nie, and Jiang would be willing to fight.

Interesting.

As if proving his point, Lan Wangji turned to Wen Chao and asked, “Have you no shame?”

“What?”

“You were perfectly fine getting us all killed!” Jin Zixuan added on, growling in rage, but unable to actually do anything while in the simulation.

“I-and so what? It’s your own fault for not cooperating-”

“What had Luo-guniang done that was ‘uncooperative?’” Jiang Cheng demanded. “The only reason you chose her is because your servant was jealous that you couldn’t understand what ‘no’ meant!”

“Shut up! You didn’t even try to defend her!” Wen Chao pointed out. “In fact, you stopped Wei Wuxian from helping! How is that any better?”

Jiang Cheng flinched back slightly, but Lan Wangji stepped forward, “Inaction done out of fear for those under your protection and actions taken intending to hurt others are in no way the same thing.”

“And besides, even if he just hadn’t cared, it wouldn’t make what you tried to do okay!” Jin Zixuan shouted, and, for a moment, unwittingly glanced back at his father. “There is no excuse for trying to rape and murder an innocent woman.”

“There most certainly is not,” Madam Jin agreed, she and Madam Yu both moving to stand behind their sons. “Is this truly the kind of person the Wen Sect has as its heir?”

“It might be,” Wen Ruohan spoke, causing many people to flinch. “After all, if it weren’t for Wei Wuxian, that pair’s actions would have been futile. You would have all gotten killed for nothing.”

Shouting at Wen Chao was one thing, but arguing against Wen Ruohan was something else. Hesitantly, Lan Xichen stepped forward and saluted the Chief Cultivator.

“My apologies, but an action taken to prevent one-sided injustice should always be commended. I don’t believe they did anything wrong.”

“Except wake up whatever was in that cave,” Wen Ruohan pointed out, making most watchers tense yet again. There was silence as they looked between each other, no one knowing how to continue the conversation.

Then, quietly, Jiang Cheng moved towards Lan Wangji and Jin Zixuan.

Everything in him rebelled against doing this. He had just been trying to keep Wei Wuxian safe! Nothing he had done was technically wrong! He had no obligation to help MianMian, and no reason to not stand by and watch the two of them die. What he had done was fine!

But someone that sounded a lot like Wei Wuxian told him that if the peacock could apologise to Jiang Yanli for something his virtual self said, then he should be able to apologise to them for preventing Wei Wuxian from helping. He trembled, then bowed once.

“I… I’m sorry for not… not helping.”

‘But they weren’t heirs,’ Jiang Cheng thought. ‘I should have done something too.’

“We understand,” Lan Wangji added. “We know why you didn’t.”

“And besides, Jiang-xiong, I certainly didn’t do anything, fainting like I did,” Huaisang added. “Don’t worry so much about it.”

Watching the quiet conversation between the heirs left Jiang Fengmian thinking. When he had complimented Wei Wuxian’s actions against Wen Chao, Jiang Cheng had momentarily looked devastated. And more than just guilt, there had been an unhealthy layer of shame.

The Jiang Sect motto of “do what is right, even if it seems impossible,” had always fit Wei Wuxian like a glove. It was how he would act regardless, so there was no need for him to put a tremendous amount of effort into maintaining that state. It made Jiang Fengmian, who had also been close to Wei Wuxian’s parents due to their similar principles, bond with his head disciple. He had heard his wife’s complaints about favoritism before but….

He had never thought Jiang Cheng might believe it.

He prayed he was wrong.

(But the way Jiang Cheng had looked during Madam Yu’s shouting did not leave him very optimistic.)

Other private conversations broke out, with Wen Chao trembling beneath Wen Ruohan, Madam Jin and Jin Guangshan getting into another spat, and Lan Xichen pulling Wangji over to speak.

“Are you alright?” he asked. “With all the revelations that happened shortly after, I never got to check on you. You know Uncle’s opinion on Wei Wuxian doesn’t have to dictate your own feeling’s, right?”

Wangji remained silent for a moment, Lan Qiren’s insistence on the lack of affection between him and Wei Ying ringing in the back of his mind. If his Uncle was this worried, then Wangji knew his behavior must be reminding Qiren of his father’s. He had told himself for years that he wouldn’t follow that-

But he didn’t want to lose Wei Ying either.

So then what should he do?

“I am… fine.”

“Wangji, it’s okay if you’re not.”

“I’m fine,” he repeated. “I don’t want to talk about it right now.”

Lan Xichen frowned slightly at the declaration, but eventually nodded in acceptance.

“Alright. Tell me if you change your mind.”

In the mountains of Gusu, a cool fog swept over the ground.

Lan Wangji — Hanguang-jun — walked alone through the chilled forest, stepping over fields of frost-covered grass without making a sound. Since Wei Wuxian was working with Wen Qionglin on something to help his past self, Lan Wangji had found himself with some additional free time.

He came to a stop in front of a comfortable, self-imposed prison, and knocked twice.

“Xiongzhang, are you there?”

While people in seclusion were generally not supposed to have any visitors, Lan Xichen’s status as sect leader allowed his brother to occasionally visit under a guise of requiring his opinion on certain matters. On days when Xichen didn’t want to talk, he would not answer. On days when he was willing-

“I am. Come in, Wangji.”

Although he didn’t smile, Lan Zhan’s posture relaxed slightly at the words. The days on which Lan Xichen was willing to accept visitors were steadily increasing overtime. Wei Ying had repeatedly and excitedly declared that Lan Xichen’s recovery could be attributed to the persistent and overwhelming kindness of his own husband, but Lan Wangji thought Wei Wuxian was a significant factor too. It was only after Lan Wangji tried implementing Wei Ying's suggestions that Xichen had started to smile, after all.

With a slight creak, Wangji opened the door. Inside the room, Xichen closed A Book of Righteousness by Lan An and turned to face him. Although his face was paler than it used to be, the smile adorned on it was one of the most genuine Wangji had seen since Jin Guangyao’s betrayal came to light.

“You seem pleased,” his brother observed, smiling fondly. “Will you tell me what happened?”

“If that is what Xiongzhang wishes,” Wangji promised. “Wei Ying has been having fun, both in preparing for the wedding and in inventing.”

Although Xichen could see annoyance flash across his brother’s face for a moment, the emotion was soon covered up by fondness for Wei Wuxian.

“The misunderstanding was corrected.”

“Hm. What was the mysterious invention that caused the conflict? When Uncle came to visit me a few days ago, he seemed like he couldn’t decide whether to be proud or scandalized by Wei Wuxian's creation, and got into a long lecture about the implications of it without actually explaining what it was."

Lan Wangji's eyes softened momentarily, before he responded "Wei Ying has found a way to create and contact parallel universes. In essence, it's a way to send information to the past. Although nothing physical can be sent, it functions as time travel."

There were several seconds of silence as Lan Xichen blinked twice and tried to figure out if he was hearing things. All the while, Wangji made steady, honest eye contact.

"I… could you-"

"Time travel, yes."

More silence. Some part of him — the rational part which had been slowly worn away throughout his seclusion — knew such a fantastical concept was impossible. However the more insane part of him whispered 'If anyone could figure that out, wouldn't it be Wei Wuxian?'

"You're serious."

"I am. He's tested it. I… don't know if I can bring the proof in here."

"That's fine," Xichen shook his head. "But you, and he, genuinely believe it works."

"Yes."

Time travel. It couldn't be true. But if it was-

If he could send information to his past self, what would he change? If his younger self had known of the Wens attacking and Wei Wuxian's innocence and Jiang Yanli's killer and his Da-ge's fate and Nie Huaisang's schemes and Jin Guangshan's plans and Jin Guangyao-

What would he have done if he had known the truth about A-Yao?

What would everyone else do if they knew the truth about A-Yao?

A cold, sinking feeling flooded his body. Although Jin Guangyao's motivation and personality had been vastly different from what everyone thought, his goal wasn't to make others suffer. For every time he annihilated a clan on false charges, he had saved just as many people by supporting genuinely helpful policies. Creating watchtowers didn't erase the crimes he had committed, but it did prove that destruction had never been his final goal.

With everything Jin Guangyao had done, his death was not unearned. It was entirely possible that, by that point, there would be no saving what Meng Yao had turned into. But if it was time travel — if everyone got to see him before he became like that — then the situation was different.

Regardless of Jin Guangyao's own faults, it was undeniable that his goals and morals were, in part, a product of his upbringing. If everyone knew what Meng Yao might possibly become, would they simply take the chance for a better future away from him? Would they kill him before he had even done anything?

~~Or was he just being tricked again? What did he really know about A-Yao?~~

Several days ago, Lan Qiren had griped for hours about how Wei Wuxian was corrupting Sizhui. In that rant, he explained how Sizhui went and used one of Wei Wuxian's inventions without permission. Out of all of Wei Wuxian's inventions, what would be the most tempting option for the last remaining Wen?

"DId-did Sizhui send information on A-Y… Jin Guangyao to the past?" Xichen asked, hesitantly.

"...He did. Are you… okay?"

"Yes, yes, I'm fine," Xichen reassured, even as his mind raced. He didn't know exactly what information was sent, but if Nie Mingjue was made to believe the bare-bones of "Meng Yao betrayed Lan Xichen's trust and killed you," then there was almost no chance of anyone stopping him from enacting vengeance on an act that hadn't happened yet.

Xichen didn't want his Da-ge to die, but that didn't mean he thought Nie Mingjue's murder at ~~A-Yao~~ Jin Guangyao's hands was inevitable. He wasn't just a victim of circumstance, but Jin Guangyao's decision was based on the environment he grew up in, and Nie Mingjue's own actions.

Then again, for all his faults, Nie Mingjue did try to be righteous. Perhaps he wouldn't kill the version who was still Meng Yao. He might see reason.

But what if Jin Guangshan found out?

"Xiongzhang!"

Xichen startled.

"Are you alright?" Wangji asked him, lowering his voice once he had Xichen attention. "You stopped responding to me."

For a moment, Xichen didn't answer.

"...I apologise for bringing him up. Should I go?"

"No, no," Lan Xichen shook his head. "I… Sizhui and Jinyi created a parallel universe with the tool, right? How-how much do you know about how that world is doing?"

"I know that there was a minor panic when that dimension's sect leaders fell unconscious and that that world's Wei Ying is doing his best to support the Jiang Sect."

"Anything else?"

Wangji shook his head, "Wei Ying has tried to keep me updated, but I've been a little busy."

As Chief Cultivator and a soon-to-be official husband simultaneously running the cultivation world, the Lan sect, and planning a wedding, it was no surprise that Wangji didn't have time to intricately study the things happening in another dimension. However, that reminder only increased Xichen's slightly-paranoid but genuine concern.

He bit his lip, trying to will his heart rate back to normal.

"Would you be willing to allow Wei Ying to visit?" Wangji asked. "He could explain it to you far better than I could."

When Xichen hesitated, Wangji inwardly frowned. At the beginning, they had preferred to avoid all mention of Wangji's husband. Even though Wei Ying was not at fault, it was hard for Xichen to see Wei Wuxian as anything but the man who had caused his brother's forced seclusion and brought about the end of his former sworn brother. Xichen was mature enough to not take action over something that wasn't Wei Ying's fault, so Wangji had tried to recognize that Xichen didn't want to remember Wei Ying (for what he represented, if nothing else). Over time, Xichen had become more and more willing to discuss Wangji's husband.

It seemed Wangji had moved too fast then.

However, to his great surprise, Xichen followed the long period of silence with a quiet, "I would appreciate that."

Now, a noticeably present smile appeared on Lan Wangji's face.

"I'll ask him to visit you then."

Two knocks on the door.

“Zewu-jun? You wanted to see me?”

“Wei-gongzi, come in.”

The door slid open, and a black-robed figure slipped inside. Although he moved with the same grace as ever, there was now a notable awkwardness that didn’t suit him at all.

Then again, considering how their last conversation went, Xichen supposed he shouldn’t be surprised. Based on Wei Wuxian’s expression, he could still hear Lan Xichen’s voice shouting at him.

“In his whole life he had been honest and righteous and immaculate — you were the only mistake he ever made!”

But Wei Wuxian had still come to see him at his request.

“Thank you for your time,” Xichen said, directing him to sit down. He hadn’t spoken to anyone outside his immediate family in the last few month, but that was no excuse to be rude.

They sat across from each other as Xichen debated with himself on how to begin. Luckily, he didn’t have to; Wei Wuxian started for him.

“You… had some questions about time travel?”

“I did,” Xichen agreed. “...Hypothetically, what do you think the people in the past will do with the information they have now?”

After a moment of hesitation, Wei Ying finally responded, “I’m hoping they don’t believe it. I don’t see why they would, especially if it just consists of kids they’ve never seen before explaining something that hasn’t happened. Do you… think something else would happen?”

“I… think you’re being overly-optimistic.”

“Time travel is already unbelievable enough. Even if they were willing to listen, what do you think they’d do?”

“I’m worried they would adapt to a philosophy of ‘better safe than sorry.’”

“Against the Wens? Back then, Wen Ruohan continued to take action after action against the other Four Great Clans and minor sects, and yet the Sunshot Campaign didn’t start until the Massacre of Lotus Pier. Why would they act based on ‘future information’ they can’t confirm as true?”

“I wasn’t worried about the Wens. I was-”

“Jin Guangyao, then?”

Lan Xichen flinched slightly at the name, but forced himself to nod nonetheless. He knew what Wei Wuxian must think of the man who had kickstarted his downfall. However, if there was a way for Xichen to fix the mess his life had become, then he had to at least try.

Wei Wuxian sighed, “...I’m not sure I’m the best person to ask about him.”

“You’re the only person I can ask about him.”

“What?”

Taking a deep breath, Lan Xichen forced himself to utilize his widely-lauded communications skils, hoping they hadn’t gotten too rusty in the past few months.

“You never really got to know him,” he explained. “I will admit that he might have done more wrong to you than anyone else, but you, at least, will try to be objective. Anyone else I could ask is either too personally related to me, or too willing to believe what the majority says.”

“Jin Guangyao did… a lot,” Wei Wuxian reminded. “I admit I don’t completely agree with the complete switch in public opinion, but that doesn’t mean I find him innocent.”

“I wouldn’t expect anything else. So please, if the people in the past believe the message, how do you expect them to act with the information they’ll get?” Xichen continued, making Wei Wuxian frown even further.

However, he still answered: “The juniors said they sent it back to before the sunshot campaign. The Nie Mingjue of that time isn’t feeling the effects of his cultivation all that much yet. I think he might not allow Meng Yao into the Nie Clan, but I can’t imagine Chifeng-jun being so certain in the vision’s truth that he kills Meng Yao. He is, above all else, a righteous man. If Meng Yao is still a teenager at that time, I don’t believe he’ll kill him.”

“I agree. Da-ge has always tried to do what he thought was right. But what about Jin Guangshan?”

The name made Wei Wuxian flinch, his eyes darkening momentarily. Of all the Lan, Jin, Jiang, and Nie people stuck in the simulation, Jin Guangshan was the one Wei Wuxian was most worried about. If Jin Guangshan was made to believe the future, then-

“I suppose it’s entirely possible that Jin Guangshan will send an assassin after his bastard son. If this is before the Sunshot Campaign, then I doubt there’s anything Meng Yao will be able to do to escape.”

Lan Xichen paled. His trembling hands came to rest in his lap as he thought the words over. Little Meng Yao, from before the war and the torture and the Yiling Patriarch, would be killed.

"...Is there anything we can do to stop that?"

Wei Wuxian tilted his head consideringly, observing Lan Xichen as though the Lan Sect Leader was one of his more difficult talisman experiments. Then, he asked:

"Before I answer that, can I ask why you would want to?"

"I… I understand that he has done inexcusable things, but it's not impossible for him to make a different decision. If I had known about his true nature ahead of time, then I could have stopped it."

"How much are you willing to risk on that?"

"I… if you think keeping him alive will result in Da-ge's death, then…. then it's not worth it. Jin Guangyao murdered him. I know that, but… but we don't need to end this way-"

"We?"

"They-he doesn't need to end this way. I would never be able to forgive myself if I could stop Jin Guangshan from murdering an innocent and didn't. I don't trust Jin Guangshan to make a fair choice, and he's the one he's most likely to target is A-Y… Jin Guangyao. And, if we can change who Meng Yao becomes, then everything would be fixed. If he'd just had someone who believed in him, then-"

"You don't think you believed in him enough?"

Lan Xichen flinched at the silent accusation, but continued "My belief was blind. He would need someone like Wangji. He didn't make excuses for you, but he always tried to help."

For a moment, Wei Wuxian's gaze turned almost unbearably fond at the reminder of his husband. Then, however, he darkened again and looked back at Lan Xichen.

"Zewu-jun," Wei Wuxian began. "I hope you don't mind me saying so, but I can't shake the feeling that you think you were responsible for the tragedy between your sworn brothers."

"I don't think that," he refuted. "But, if I hadn't pushed them into being sworn brothers, they wouldn't have interacted so much. I wouldn't have given Jin Guangyao the means to kill Da-ge with, and he probably wouldn't have a reason to either. If I hadn't acted the way I did, then maybe we wouldn't have had to end up this way."

"So you think that if you had acted differently, then everything would have been fine?"

"Do you disagree?"

"...People tend to be much more complicated than that. Maybe you could have prevented it, but it wasn't your responsibility to parent them. They both made their own decisions, and Meng Yao's fate was based on his choices."

"But it would fix things for you too!"

"Probably not," Wei Wuxian shook his head. "Yes, Jin Guangshan and Jin Guangyao capitalized on the opportunity, but it's like he said: it's entirely possible it would've happened regardless."

"If you don't think killing him would stop it, then we have all the more reason to change Jin Guangyao's fate."

"Putting aside the matter of how much we can change about a place we can't go to, I think it's unquestionable that Jin Guangshan's work wouldn't have been nearly as effective as it was without Jin Guangyao's interference. So, I'll ask again, why do you want to go out of your way to make sure Meng Yao survives?"

Xichen was silent for a moment, unable to articulate his feelings.

"Is it wrong to want both Da-ge and Meng Yao to be given a chance at a different life?"

"But this isn't about them at all, is it?"

"What do you mean?"

After a moment, Wei Wuxian continued, "My apologies for my brashness, Zewu-jun, but I'll be perfectly honest; I think you're hoping this will be a way to lessen the guilt you feel."

Lan Xichen flinched back.

"I… I was-"

"You don't agree?"

"I… no-I… I suppose you might be right."

"Good. That said, I also kinda agree with you."

"I… beg your pardon?"

Wei Wuxian smirked playfully, explaining "I know better than anyone how much circumstances can affect your actions. I agree with you: Meng Yao is a product of his upbringing. There's definitely more than that, but he's not unsalvageable. That parallel dimension's future doesn't necessarily require him to die."

"Then-"

"That said, we need to be aware of why we're doing something, and what we hope to accomplish. If you don't mind me saying so, I don't think it would be especially healthy to invest all your time and energy into helping a parallel version of them who you'll never be able to go to."

"...But you've been thinking about this as well?"

"A little. I mean… it's entirely possible that they'll want to kill my younger-self too."

"I doubt anything the juniors sent over would convince them of that," Xichen commented, smiling fondly. Although they hadn't visited, juniors who passed by Lan Xichen's building were often discussing Wei Wuxian's most recent night hunt with overwhelming excitement. None loved Wei Wuxian more than the quartet who used the time-travel array.

But Wei Wuxian just shrugged, not bothering to comment.

"Then what do you think we can do to stop that?"

"I'm still trying to figure out if we should stop it-"

"Wei Wuxian, if they kill you before the Sunshot Campaign, we will lose," XIchen reminded. "If you really feel like that's a concern, then we should do something to prevent it."

"And help Meng Yao out on the way?"

"I… I don't know," Xichen admitted. "I can't tell how much of this is just because of guilt. I don't know if it's a genuine concern, or if I just want it to be. I don't even know if my judgement was ever right-"

"It was," Wei Wuxian assured him. "You tried to be objective, and gave me a chance, remember? Jin Guangyao tricked everyone, not just you."

The first one to figure it all out was Huaisang, but Xichen wasn't sure he wanted to bring this moral dilemma up with him. Then again, was he just blocking out perspectives he didn't agree with? Should he ask the person who saw through the lies? Would Huaisang know Meng Yao best-

"Zewu-jun," Wei Wuxian spoke hesitantly, breaking Xichen out of his thoughts. "Even after everything came to light, do you… still love Jin Guangyao?"

He flinched back.

"It's not love-"

"Remember fondly, then."

A pause, then Xichen answered, "I… I can't… I don't-"

"That's not wrong," Wei Wuxian assured, his eyes momentarily flashing coldly. "Sometimes, regardless of what's happened between you, the fond memories you've shared mean you can't help but love someone."

From his tone, Xichen got the feeling that he was speaking about his own relationship with Sect Leader Jiang.

“But,” Wei Wuxian continued, “that can sometimes lead you to make irrational decisions or sacrifice too much of yourself for something that won’t fix anything.”

“You think I might be try to live vicariously through them?” Xichen asked.

“I think you’re viewing Jin Guangyao as your mistake which you need to fix. I’m not saying you can’t help me try, I just need you to be aware of what you’re doing and why, because that perspective isn’t right.”

Now, finally, Xichen leaned back, going over the conversation in his head. He supposed Wei Wuxian would be able to recognize guilt better than anyone.

“I… may have been a little hasty,” he admitted.

“Just a little,” Wei Wuxian teased, pinching his index finger and thumb a centimeter apart. “Though, if you’re feeling up to it, we can talk about ways we could respond.”

Xichen perked up, and Wei Wuxian pulled out some paper.

“So, any suggestions?”

As impatient and tense as they were, the sudden return to the simulation caused nearly everyone to flinch.

The area they were in darkened instantaneously, returning them to the cave.

Directly behind the frozen Wei Wuxian, a head as large as a carriage blinked its crimson eyes open. A terrifying, low growl escaped the beast as it looked over the panicking cultivators.

It was a gargantuan tortoise.

Wen Chao trembled slightly, a short squeak escaping his lips. After all, his other-self might have brought the other disciples in to kill the beast in the cave, but….

How could he possibly kill that?

The enormous tortoise moved its head closer to the crowd, and aside from a handful — Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, Lan Wangji, and Wen Zhuliu — everyone kept staggering backwards.

Wei Wuxian, whose movement near it had most likely woken it up, didn’t dare move rashly. Although it was clear that Wen Chao wanted to run, Wei Wuxian kept his hand over the other’s mouth, keeping him still and silent. They remained where they were, and he waited patiently.

“Hm. Not bad,” Nie Mingjue remarked, raising an eyebrow. Even as the monster drew closer and closer, Wei Wuxian remained nearly perfectly still.

Calmly, Wei Wuxian's eyes met the pair of crimson geodes. The pupil was just a slit, its width shifting as though the eyes were switching in and out of focus. It seemed unable to determine what the figures before it were.

'Looks like its eyesight is about as good as a snake's too,' Wei Wuxian observed. 'As long as we don't move, maybe it won't be able to notice us.'

As long as they stayed still, they'd have a chance of escaping.

Then Wen Chao panicked.

"Wen Zhuliu, help me!" Wen Chao shouted, rushing away from Wei Wuxian.

"That idiot!" Jiang Cheng hissed.

Growling, the real Jiang Cheng nodded in agreement.

With a shove, Wen Chao was sent flying. Then, the tortoise attacked.

It slammed down where Wei Wuxian and Wen Chao had been only moments before, sending an enormous cloud of dust into the air. Wen Chao was only alive because Wei Wuxian had instinctively pushed him out of the way.

He landed face first on the ground, sliding from Wei Wuxian's powerful push.

"Chao-er," Wen Ruohan growled. "Next time, pay attention to what your betters have realized."

His son nodded frantically, sincerely wishing that he had allowed Wei Wuxian to deal with the situation. Now that he'd panicked and called for Wen Zhuliu, his life was at risk.

(If only Wei Wuxian had been loyal to them. If the Wen sect had just gotten him earlier and made sure everyone knew Wei Wuxian would keep Wen Chao safe, this wouldn't have happened! If that was his father's plan, then Wen Chao approved; having a Wei Wuxian sounded great.)

(Wen Qing glanced over, recognizing Wen Chao's thoughts immediately and frowning. He had truly been trained to simply conform to whatever Wen Ruohan felt about something, hadn't he?)

Trembling slightly, Wen Chao sat up and looked back the way he came, ignoring his bleeding nose. Just a few minutes ago, he would have whined and complained and sentenced them all to death for that.

Now, even he realized the severity of the situation.

Wen Qing was privately grateful for his silence. At least she wouldn't have to watch him embarrass her clan for much longer.

Having missed both its prey, the tortoise stood up fully to reach its head high and roar. The cave could barely fit the colossal being. If it were to crash onto the Lotus Pier training grounds, its shell alone would fill up the entirety of the martial arts field.

Its shout shook the walls of the cave.

As they weren't actually inside the cave, the watcher's couldn't feel the ground shake. That said, they could see it trembling from the monsters yell.

Nie Huaisang looked faint.

Collecting themselves, a half-dozen Wen archers then took aim and fired. Their arrows bounced off the tortoise's skin like raindrops off glass.

The beast opened its enormous jaws.

Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan turned to glance at each other nervously.

Wei Wuxian flicked his arm, making Wen Chao's sword fly with the speed of an arrow to where the beast's heart should be. It only bounced off.

"What the-"

"The scales," Jiang Fengmian answered, understanding his son's question immediately. The answer only made Jiang Cheng pale further. It was undeniable that Wei Wuxian was the strongest disciple in Lotus Pier; if a high-quality blade he threw couldn't even dent the tortoise's skin….

What hope did the gathered disciples have of surviving?

Wei Wuxian frowned, glancing analytically at the path the sword had tried to carve into the tortoise. Although there had been a trail of sparks left behind by the weapon's attack, there was no trace of damage on the monster's body.

Wei Wuxian sighed in frustration.

If the sword had belonged to anyone but Wen Chao, Wei Wuxian wouldn't have been able to use it at all. Cultivation swords were fiercely loyal to their masters, even when those masters were comparatively inadequate. He had been able to launch the attack, but, now that it had fallen into the water, there was no chance of Wei Wuxian being able to summon it back.

If anything, Wen Qing was surprised he had been able to do as much as he had. Even if it was Wen Chao's, using someone else's sword was no easy task.

Then again, Nie Huaisang was quite fond of saying "as expected of the to-be Yiling Patriarch," wasn't he? She supposed that was appropriate.

On the side, the Wen disciples continued trying to shoot arrows at the monster. As their attempts proved useless, the fear of the disciples grew.

Wei Wuxian turned, watching a Wen disciple struggle to shoot. Although he was clearly pulling with all his might, he just couldn't pull back far enough to draw his bow.

Wei Wuxian couldn't stand it anymore.

Jin Guangshan snorted.

Immediately, Wei Wuxian grabbed the bow and kicked the disciple to the side. Three arrows were left in the quiver. He set a three onto the bow, drew it back to its fullest, and aimed.

Then, a familiar scream rang out.

"MianMian?" Jiang Yanli realized instantly, turning to look at the girl.

Wang Lingjiao stood before the girl, as three Wen disciples secured her in place.

"Are you-"

"Seriously?"

"Now?!"

"Hold her down tightly," the mistress ordered. The red-hot seal of the Wen Sect's branding iron was deliberately lowered towards her.

She flinched away, closing her eyes.

Jiang Yanli felt her heart stop.

Without sparing the tortoise another thought, Wei Wuxian adjusted his aim to shoot down all three of the Wen disciples. They fell to the ground without even getting a chance to scream.

Wen Ruohan lifted his eyebrows in surprise. Even Wei Wuxian's performance at the archery competition hadn't been anywhere near as skillful as that.

It seemed Wei Wuxian only displayed his true worth once backed into a corner.

Interesting.

Even before the bow had finished vibrating, Wang Liangjiao was at it again.

"Stop it!" Jiang Yanli begged futily, making Jiang Cheng tense. He understood why his other-self had done so (he was the heir, looking out for the sect was his job), but he couldn't forget the way his simulation self had prevented Wei Wuxian from acting.

Lan Wangji and Jin Zixuan hadn't hesitated, and his A-Jie wouldn't have either.

Unable to hear both Jiang Yanli's cries and Jiang Cheng's thoughts, the simulated Wang Lingjiao continued, picking up the sizzling branding iron and moving to press it down on MianMian's face. With the grip she had on MianMian's hair, there was nothing the victim could do.

Wei Wuxian had no more arrows, and no more sword. Any logical person would have then moved to take down Wang Lingjiao, accepting Luo Qingyang's fate as inevitable.

So, of course, Wei Wuxian ran between them.

The iron made contact with skin, and Wei Wuxian's agonized scream shook the hall.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted, standing up and running over.

Wei Wuxian reacted almost immediately, landing a kick that sent Wang Lingjiao sliding across the ground several meters away. However, a moment later, he sank to his knees. The seal of the Wen Clan had burned straight through his clothes and seared itself onto his skin.

The watchers were, for once, all silent. They had seen his casual heroism before — it was hard to miss — but this was very, very different. When he had saved Su She, and rescued the bunnies, and threatened Wen Chao, it could almost have been mistaken as arrogance. Perhaps Wei Wuxian thought he'd be able to save whoever he wanted to save without any risk to himself. Maybe he didn't understand the consequences his actions could have.

But, this time, even Lan Qiren was forced to admit that was not the case. Nie Huaisang had explained the danger the branding iron posed, and yet Wei Wuxian had still put himself in front of it.

This wasn't someone who thought he'd be able to escape the consequences, this was just someone who looked at his options and decided the consequences were worth it.

It was humbling to see.

(Wen Ruohan, on the other hand, was highly amused. The seal burned onto Wei Wuxian could almost be mistaken for a mark of ownership branded onto an animal. How appropriate.)

"Wei Wuxian!" Jiang Cheng called out.

Lan Wangji glanced over in concern.

Enraged, the Jiang heir jumped forward to attack Wang Lingjiao, only to be kicked away by Wen Zhuliu. She was then picked up and brought back to Wen Chao.

Madam Yu fumed, silently promising to tear that girl's skin off with her bare hands.

A weakened gasp came from the side as Wang Lingjiao threw herself into Wen Chao's arms. The furious Wen heir's face was covered in dirt and dust, staining his white robes grey.

His face morphed into fury.

“Get him!” he shouted.

A number of people unconsciously tried blocking the Wen disciples off, the sight of the wounded Wei Wuxian making their protective instincts force them into action.

Their barricade proved useless.

The Wen disciples ran straight through Wei Wuxian’s guards, but, before they could reach him, were snatched up and swallowed whole by the tortoise.

Wen Chao shrieked at the sight, grateful that Wen Zhuliu had stayed behind with his simulated self. He wasn’t the only one to jump either.

(Somehow, the gathered crowd had forgotten about the giant, man eating tortoise that started it all.)

Wen Chao stared up in unhidden horror as the tortoise threw the Wen disciples into the air and snatched them as they fell. His trembles were understandable; against something like this, even an army would be useless.

Jiang Cheng shuddered slightly in fear. The goddess statue from the future had seemed dangerous, but Jin Ling had at least been able to damage it with arrows.

How were they supposed to fight this?

“They need to retreat,” Lan Xichen realized. “Fighting it would be suicide.”

Sharing the sentiment, Wen Chao turned and fled with a shouted, “Go! Quickly!”

Once again, Wen Ruohan looked between Wei Wuxian and Wen Chao with undisguised judgement.

“Get them!” Jin Zixuan shouted, noticing the Wens’ retreat. He and a handful of Jin disciples chased after, picking up the Wens’ discarded weapons as they went. His control of someone else’s sword would be non-existent, but Jin Zixuan figured any weapon was better than nothing.

However, before Jin Zixuan was able to close in on them, the path was cut off by an avalanche of dust and rock falling from above.

“A-Xuan!” Jiang Yanli gasped as Madam Jin clenched her fists.

Nie Mingjue stood up, “Did you just-”

“They blocked off the entrance!” someone shouted, confirming Nie Mingjue’s question.

Wen Ruohan only smiled slightly, amused by his son’s abject terror at the glares the other sects were giving the boy. It seemed as if they were directing all their anger at Wen Chao, forgetting the person who had ordered him to act that way.

How convenient.

When the cloud of dust cleared, the watchers were outside.

A Wen signal flew into the air, requesting help. Coughing heavily, the Wen disciples forced themselves to stand up, making way for the approaching Wen Chao.

“Wait, what happened?” Jiang Cheng asked.

A hacking Wen Chao was dragged to the surface by his collar. His savior, Wen Zhuliu, showed a shockingly mild expression despite the way he had to literally carry Wen Chao’s weight.

Wen Chao shouted, “Everyone rebelled against us! And disciples from the Yunmeng Jiang sect started it!”

“Once Yunmeng disciples started it?” Madam Yu repeated disbelievingly. “The Lans and Jins were the ones who-”

“And that isn’t a problem, is it?” Madam Jin asked, more frostily than she had ever spoken to her friend before. Although he didn’t say anything, Lan Xichen glanced over in clear agreement with Madam Jin.

After all, no one could deny the righteousness in Lan Wangji and Jin Zixuan’s actions. After a long pause, Madam Yu finally, begrudgingly, responded.

Panting heavily, Wen Chao caught his breath, then glared.

“Get more men!” he ordered. “Have them surround Muxi Mountain! If someone escapes, kill them at all cost!”

“Yes!”

“Excuse me?” Lan Qiren swivelled around to face the Wen’s second young master. “Are you intending to declare war on all the great sects?”

“They already have!” Nie Mingjue fired back. “From the second they attacked the Cloud Recesses and started this stupid camp, they wanted to go to war against us all.”

Wen Ruohan merely smirked at their outrage.

“You have nothing to say in response?” Jiang Fengmian asked.

Wen Ruohan tilted his head, explaining “This has been happening for a long, long time. It’s hardly my fault that you were too scared to fight back sooner.”

Everyone flinched.

Wen Ruohan wasn't sure why they were surprised. One of the first things they were told was that the Wen Sect tried to encompass them all, and, even before the simulation, they knew numerous minor clans had fallen to the Wen. What other possibilities were there?

(Then again, perhaps he should be grateful; if it hadn't been for their selfishness, he would never have gotten as far as he did.)

Back within the cave, the last of the falling rocks settled. Luckily, it seemed that Jin Zixuan had dodged the rubble despite how dark it was. However, that also meant they had no way out.

"The passageway has been completely blocked," he reported, then cursed. "I can't believe they did that!"

"At least you're okay," Jiang Yanli whispered, sitting down. "It would be even harder to escape if you had gotten trapped under there."

"Sorry for worrying you," Jin Zixuan responded. "Are you okay?"

"Yes, I… even if it won't happen in our world, I'm glad I get to see it."

Oblivious to the humans' plights, the giant tortoise displaced hundreds of gallons of water as it moved back into the lake. Seeing that, one disciple gave a fearful tremble.

"So we're stuck here with-with a man-eating monster?!"

"It your own fault!" Wen Chao declared. "If you hadn't fought back-"

"We would have all died then," Lan Wangji disagreed.

"That hellish couple really does all sorts of things, huh," Jin Zixuan muttered.

"Excuse me?"

"Quiet, Chao-er."

"It's alright if we can't get out…" one of the boys murmured. "My father and mother will come find me. If they hear about this, they'll definitely search for me."

Yanli relaxed slightly, reassured.

Someone else pointed out, "They think we're still undergoing indoctrination at Qishan, why would they search for us? Besides, the Wen disciples who ran away definitely won't tell the truth. They'll make up some excuse while we stay trapped down in here."

Jiang Yanli deflated again, and Madam Yu gave a protective growl.

"So we can only wait down here… without any food… along with a beast," the person finished.

Hearing the last bit, Wei Wuxian laughed, patting the burn mark on his skin and joking, "Jiang Cheng, there's a piece of cooked meat here. You want to eat it?"

"Get lost! You really haven't learned your lesson, have you? Just what kind of situation do you think we're in?! You don't know how much I want to sew your lips together!"

The bit of unexpected lightheartedness caused several people to glance over in shock, hesitant smiles forming on their faces. A few less-innocent smiles formed as well.

(Jin Guangshan, for example, was quite pleased by the boy's pain tolerance.)

As they spoke, Lan Wangji's light colored eyes landed on them, before glancing at MianMian. She followed behind the boys silently, at a loss for what to do. Tears stained her face as she continued to sob, hands clenching her robe.

The repeated "I'm sorry, I'm sorry"s crushed the disciples further.

When Jiang Yanli moved closer to the poor girl, she was surprised to find that Wen Qing had done so as well. The Wen girl hurriedly moved back, but her protective instinct had been obvious nonetheless.

Jiang Yanli almost reached out to her, but the ringing of Wen Chao's orders in her ears kept her silent. She might not have anything personal against Wen-guniang, but….

Who knew what the simulation would show next? Now wasn't really an appropriate time to make friends with a Wen.

The pitiful cries continued, until Wei Wuxian plugged his ears and complained, "Hey, stop crying, alright? I'm the one who was burned, not you. Don't tell me that you want me to cheer you up? Why can't you cheer me up?"

"You're plenty cheerful already, idiot," Jiang Cheng pointed out.

"Yes," Wen Ruohan agreed. "I suppose this must have seemed right at home for him, considering what life at Lotus Pier is like."

Madam Yu huffed.

"Alright, Jiang Cheng. Stop supporting me," Wei Wuxian requested, leaning against the cave wall instead. "It's not like I broke my leg."

The girls gathered around MianMian, and began to sniffle together.

"Come on, let's focus on getting out first," Wei Wuxian suggested.

When Jiang Cheng noticed his father smiling proudly at Wei Wuxian, he glared at the ground.

As they spoke, Lan Wangji turned a considering gaze at the pool of water, stepping closer to get a better look.

Worried, Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren followed their simulated family member. Even though Wangji wasn't moving much, Lan Xichen couldn't help but continuously glance down at the boy's broken leg.

"We can't get out!" someone complained. "The only way out is blocked!"

"It's not the only way," Lan Wangji objected.

Numerous curious gazes turned his way.

"What do you mean?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"There are leaves in the pool."

"What?"

Someone frowned, "Leaves in the pond? What do you mean?"

"I don't get it."

Jiang Cheng frowned at them.

Wei Wuxian understood at once.

"I see, the maple leaves."

Lan Wangji nodded, "Both within the cave and near the entrance, there are no maple trees, but the leaves in the water have recently fallen. Under the cliff, there are maple trees on both sides of the stream."

Recalling the trees surrounding the pair when Wei Wuxian offered to carry Lan Wangji, the gathered crowd relaxed. Lan Wangji was right!

(Wen Ruohan turned to the Lan boy, surprisingly impressed once again.)

Jiang Cheng understood, adding, "So maybe there's a hole in the bottom that connects to the water stream outside."

"But how do we know the hole is large enough to let people through?" someone timidly pointed out. "What if it's just a really small slit?"

"Plus, the monster is guarding the pond," Jin Zixuan added.

As the impossibility of the escape was continuously emphasized, Madam Yu turned to look at Wei Wuxian. She clenched her fists, hating her own powerlessness, and hissed at the simulation.

"Get A-Cheng out of there," she demanded. "Don't you dare value anything before A-Cheng's escape, Wei Wuxian. If you focus on glory or fun before my son, I'll never forgive you."

“A-Niang-”

“Be quiet, A-Li. He knows what he’s been trained to do!”

Wei Wuxian lifted the lapel of his robe to fan at the wound under his clothes and said, “If there’s hope, then let’s move. Even if the hole is too small, it’s better than waiting here and doing nothing. So what if it’s watching over the pool, we can just lure it out.”

This conversation made a large difference between Wei Wuxian and Wen Zhuliu obvious. The latter was an intimidating presence, useful when it came to forcing cooperation through fear.

But Wen Ruohan had never seen him inspire anyone.

Wei Wuxian, on the other hand, was a natural leader. One who would have far more uses than a mere obedient weapon, once his loyalty was earned.

The boys moved closer to the beast, hiding in a hole in the cave to watch it carefully. It had moved back into the water, so the boys couldn’t see much of its body, but the snake-like head was still visible.

Then, quick as lightning, the head shot out to snatch a corpse, before sinking back in to savor the treat.

Was it possible to throw up when inside a simulation? Huaisang was pretty sure it wasn’t, but since tears were possible, he wasn’t wiling to wait and finding out. Once he started to taste bile in his mouth, he caved in with all the pride and dignity the heir to a great sect should have, and went hide in his Da-ge.

Carefully, Wei Wuxian tossed a torch. It clattered in a corner of the cave.

“Please be careful, A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli whispered.

In the cave’s dead-silence, the sound of its impact against the ground was magnified considerably. The head of the beast slid out of its shell at once, its thin pupils reflecting the eagerly burning torch. Instinctively attracted to the light and heat, it slowly extended its neck out.

Behind it, Jiang Cheng noiselessly dove into the water.

The earlier lotus-picking scene had established Jiang Cheng’s swimming abilities, but Jin Zixuan found his breathing pick up in frantic worry for his friend/to-be brother in law. Luckily, Jiang Fengmian’s breath was doing the same, so Zixuan felt entitled to his reaction.

With Jiang Cheng’s exceptional swimming abilities, the water barely rippled as he swam. His audience — both real and simulated — glanced nervously between the tortoise and the place where Jiang Cheng had dived in.

Silently, Madam Yu cursed Wei Wuxian. Why would he allow the Jiang heir who he was supposed to be protecting to risk himself in such a manner? Best swimmer or not, Wei Wuxian should be prioritizing Jiang Cheng's safety! Why was her son needlessly risking himself for those other disciples? Was it the honor of contributing?

Honor was no where near as important as Jiang Cheng's life! Madam Yu was absolutely furious.

Suddenly, the tortoise's head, which had been investigating the torch, violently flinched back. It's large, black nose had been scorched by the searing flames.

Right then, however, Jiang Cheng was forced to come up for air. Seeing that its territory had been intruded, the giant tortoise turned toward the Jiang heir.

"A-Cheng, run!"

The tortoise plunged toward Jiang Cheng.

Madam Yu would curse Wei Wuxian's line for generations.

'Jiang Cheng!' Wei Wuxian realized. Jumping out of the cave, he bit his finger and drew something illegible on his palm. Then, he slammed it to the ground.

Directly before him, a fire as tall as a person sprouted from the ground!

"Not bad," Jin Guangshan complimented.

Madam Yu couldn't bring herself to outwardly agree, but stopped aggressively cursing the Wei line nonetheless.

His tactic worked perfectly, distracting the beast long enough for Jiang Cheng to escape the water and join the others in the small cave to the side. Wei Wuxian ran back right as Jiang Cheng began to report.

"There's a hole in the bottom. I think it'll be big enough."

"How big, specifically?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"About half a dozen people can pass at a time," Jiang Cheng reported.

The relief which spread throughout the watchers was nearly tangible in its intensity. There was a chance the tunnel would get too small later, but some chance of survival was better than none.

Wen Chao, meanwhile, grumbled to himself and cursed at the disciples' luck. If it hadn't been for the additional exit, Wei Wuxian would probably have died, and the Wen Sect would have won the war!

But then no one would have sent back this information, and the Wen sect would have lost its opportunity to take him for themselves. Considering that, Wen Chao supposed he could accept it.

Relieved, Wei Wuxian turned to the surviving disciples and shouted, "Everyone, listen up! Follow Jiang Cheng and swim through the underwater tunnel! Those who aren't injured watch out for those who are; those who can swim watch out for those who can't. Half a dozen can pass at a time, so nobody rush. Now go!"

It was interesting, Nie Mingjue mused, how in a cave with the heirs to four great sects, everyone unquestioningly followed Wei Wuxian's instructions. Then again, Nie Mingjue couldn't blame them. The boy's unwavering confidence and actions against Wen Chao were undoubtedly inspiring.

As soon as Wei Wuxian finished speaking, the flame he had created died down. After moving another ten or so steps to the right, Wei Wuxian hit the ground with his palm again, letting out another burst of fire.

The beast dragged its mountainous body towards the hypnotizing flame.

It was a little perplexing to be presented such clear proof of Wei Wuxian's unique excellence with talismans. The boy had clearly not paid attention to a single one of Lan Qiren's lessons, and yet he could only think of a handful of people who could pull off such a powerful fire talisman without resources. To be injured on top of that….

It was one thing for the simulation to say he would one day invent a whole new field, but it was another to witness the background needed to create the spirit attraction flags.

(Still not an acceptable partner for Wangji, but perhaps not as unteachable as he had once feared.)

Jiang Cheng turned to him, astounded, and raged, "What are you doing?"

"What are you doing? Get them out of here!" Wei Wuxian responded. By now, the tortoise had been lured completely onto shore.

"Wait, is he making himself bait?" Wen Qing asked disbelievingly.

"A-Xian! Stop! Stop that right now! Leave with them! Don't you dare stay behind!" Jiang Yanli begged, momentarily forgetting that the real Wei Wuxian wasn't there. Jiang Cheng stared at his simulated brother with undisguised shock.

The simulation's Jiang Cheng clenched his teeth, grunting out, "Everyone, come here. Those who can swim alone, stand of the left. Those who can't, stand on the right."

The disciples hesitantly followed that Jiang brothers' orders, but, at the end of a line, one Lan disciple glanced back. He looked between Wei Wuxian and the tortoise, a complicated expression on his face.

"Su She, follow their instructions," Lan Qiren commanded, despite knowing it wouldn't help. A ominous feeling of dread poured over Lan Wangji.

The simulation switched to allow the watchers a closer look at Wei Wuxian, who was now trembling from the energy maintaining the array took. He swayed slightly as exhaustion began to overtake him.

An arrow pierced his arm.

“Su She!” Lan Qiren shouted.

“A-Xian!”

“Wait, I can help!” Wen Qing offered, kneeling down beside Wei Wuxian, before flinching back and remembering that she really, honestly couldn't. Wen Chao glared down at her for associating with the ‘enemy’ and she glared back, nonchalantly returning to the Wen side of the field.

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji whispered worriedly.

Wei Wuxian gasped out in pain at the attack, then glared at the shooter.

“I-I’m sorry,” Su She said. “I was trying to shoot the monster.”

He threw down the Wen bow he had picked up, trying to distance himself from the disaster.

“You…” Lan Wangji forced himself to stop speaking, so overcome with rage that his voice had slipped into a growl.

While Lan Qiren supposed the boy’s intentions weren’t inherently unrightous, having an understanding of one’s own limits was common sense during dangerous situations.

“What a fool,” Nie Mingjue growled.

(Of course, that was assuming that Su She was telling the truth. Everyone knew escaping was much easier when you had some bait to leave behind.)

There was no time to pull the arrow out. Wei Wuxian instead hit the ground with his palm again. It was only after the flame reappeared that he was able to curse.

“Just leave! Don’t cause me any more trouble!”

‘Wei Ying!’ Lan Wangji thought, staring in awe as the crimson fire reflected in his golden eyes. ‘Be careful. Please, let me help.’

He had seen some of the head disciple’s heroism already, but nothing like this. Wei Wuxian wasn’t caving in under pressure, or prioritizing himself — he was embodying the Lan sect’s motto.

And doing it alone.

Jin Guangshan gazed across the crowd, taking note of the awe and protective instincts being ignited in the cultivation world’s leaders. It almost seemed like Jin Guangshan’s original judgement of the boy’s political worth was too small. Truly fascinating.

Concerned, Jiang Cheng turned to Wei Wuxian and shouted, "What are you waiting for? Get over here!"

"I will!" Wei Wuxian responded.

"Hurry up Wei-xiong," Nie Huaisang begged, peaking through Nie Mingjue's body.

Gathered around Jiang Cheng were three disciples who couldn't swim. This was the last batch of people to take, so Wei Wuxian needed to hurry over.

Wei Wuxian pulled out the arrow.

The tortoise's head instantly swiveled toward him, attracted by the smell of blood.

"No. No no no no-"

The tortoise's head shot out like an arrow. It's ferocious jaws opened to swallow Wei Wuxian whole, only for Lan Wangji to push him out of the way.

Instead, the tortoise bit down on Wangji's leg.

"Wangji!" Lan Xichen cried out in fear.

Biting down tightly on the leg, the tortoise swung its head up and dragged Wangji away.

The Lan, Jin, and Jiang heirs chased after the tortoise, but could only watch powerlessly as Lan Wangji was swung around. Meanwhile, the second young masters (Nie Huaisang, Wangji and Wen Chao), remained frozen in their seats from shock, forced indifference, or fear. It seemed hopeless.

Wangji tried to escape, but his efforts proved completely futile. The tortoise began dragging him closer so that it could savor its meal within the safety of its impenetrable shell. However, just as the head began to sink inside, Wei Wuxian threw himself over and grabbed hold.

"Thank god," Lan Qiren whispered, watching Wei Wuxian with more respect and gratitude than he had ever exhibited before. Lan Xichen nodded once to the Jiangs in thanks.

"No need," Jiang Yanli muttered back. "He saved A-Xian first."

Despite the light conversation, both older siblings were clenching their robes to the point where their fists looked bone-white.

Normally, even Wei Wuxian's strength wouldn't be able to stand against a monster's. However, the adrenaline given by the life-or-death situation caused strength to flow through his blood.

With one leg bracing against the tortoise's shell, he hugged the largest fang tightly and desperately pushed away. He turned his body into an unwavering obstacle which separated the tortoise's mouth and shell.

Hoping to sink in and enjoy the delicacy offered to it, the tortoise didn't want to eat Lan Wangji until it was all the way inside its shell. It continued fighting Wei Wuxian for dominance.

A meager sliver of hope began to spread throughout Lan Xichen.

Even upside down, Lan Wangji's shock at Wei Wuxian was so potent it was visible in his expression.

Similarly, the real Lan Wangji watched as Wei Ying went above and beyond to save his life. It didn't mean his feelings were reciprocated (he would be foolish to believe that), but a traitorous flutter occurred within him nonetheless.

Now, Wei Wuxian's right arm was wrapped around the tortoise's upper fang, while the left one wrapped around the lower one, pushing them in opposite directions to (hopefully) pry the beast's jaw open.

The exertion caused his face to turn red, and some of his veins looked as though they might pop from the strain. He pushed and pushed and pushed, and, eventually, the jaws which had embedded themselves into Lan Wangji's leg began to be forced back open.

"No way," Jin Zixuan mumbled.

With a crack, Wei Wuxian broke the jaws apart, and Lan Wangji fell into the water.

Nie Mingjue gave a long, impressed whistle.

Then, just as suddenly, the almost-divine strength in Wei Wuxian's body left him. His body had realized Lan Wangji was safe, and decided to shut down the extra power it had been giving him.

Wei Wuxian fell into the water.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted, jumping forward to catch the other boy, only for Wei Wuxian to phase through his body and crash into the water.

A loud smacking sound echoed, and Su She collapsed to the ground.

"Jiang Cheng, attacking him won't help!" a brave Yunmeng disciple pointed out.

"They escaped," Madam Jin realized with a sigh of relief. Madam Yu nodded once at Jiang Cheng, then frowned when she saw that her son was too worried about Wei Wuxian to notice.

"Right now we need to worry about getting out of here," someone else pointed out.

"I… I just wanted to help out!" Su She cried.

"Oh, shut up!" Jiang Cheng shouted. While he knew Wei Wuxian would survive this ~~only to die when Jiang Cheng led an army against him~~, his other-self had no idea what was going on inside. As the real Jiang Cheng had personally witnessed the near-death experience Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had just barely escaped, the real and fake Jiang Chengs' anger equalled each other.

Jin Zixuan huffed, “You know why you did it.”

Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli nodded in agreement, while Jin Zixuan clenched his fists. The simulated Jin Zixuan had no reason to personally care about Wei Wuxian, but the real one had many.

If the illusion of Jin Zixuan was annoyed, the real one was furious.

“What should we do now?” MianMian asked. “The entrance is blocked, and there’s even a monster in the cave!”

Forcing himself to calm down, Jiang Cheng answered, “Let’s call for help.”

The others nodded.

“Good choice,” Lan Xichen commented.

With a rush of bubbles, the watchers were brought back underwater. Wei Wuxian desperately swam towards the sinking Lan Wangji, wrapping an arm around his chest and swimming back up, being careful not to jostle the bleeding leg.

Lan Wangji forced himself to look away.

He quickly swam to shore, throwing Wangji onto his back (now that the other boy wasn’t conscious enough to pointlessly refuse him) and breaking into a run.

When Xichen laughed at the scene, Wangji decided his Xiongzhang was a traitor who would never be forgiven.

Coughing out the water in his lungs, Lan Wangji finally regained enough consciousness to realize what was going on. His eyes instantly widened in horror.

“You-”

“It’s me! Are you pleasantly surprised?”

Both Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang gave simultaneous snorts at the question, and most everyone else rolled their eyes fondly.

“How could this be pleasant? Let me down!” Wangji shouted, his voice becoming unusually unstable.

“Ah, Wangji-xiong,” Nie Huaisang sang. “Embarrassed? See something you like? Living out one of your-”

“Quiet.”

Wei Wuxian laughed delightedly, doing everything in his power to cover up his exhaustion and pain.

“If I let you down just because you said so, wouldn’t that make me lose face? Come on!”

“I’m sorry… for him being… him,” Madam Yu admitted through gritted teeth.

Through his laughter, Lan Xichen managed to respond, "No need, he saved Wangji's life."

Despite her desire to do otherwise, Yu Ziyuan had to admit that was true.

A tremendous roar shook the cave, vibrating in their bones. Wei Wuxian quickly shut his mouth so that he could focus on running away. Sticking to the thin tunnels that the tortoise wouldn’t be able to get to, Wei Wuxian ran as far as he could. The scenery instantly changed in a flash-forward, when Wei Wuxian had finally gotten so far the tortoise couldn’t be heard.

Jiang Fengmian breathed out slowly, trying to calm himself down. Now that Wei Wuxian was out of immediate danger, he found himself wondering how his son was doing.

He hoped Jiang Cheng had managed to escape the mountain.

As soon as Wei Wuxian’s speed decreased, he scrunched his brows and sniffed the air, smelling something that the watchers couldn’t. Then, he felt something wet.

His hand was now covered with crimson.

Lan Xichen felt his heart stop. He was never, ever sending Wangji to the Wen sect alone, regardless of what they threatened to do.

‘Lan Zhan’s injury is worsening again,’ Wei Wuxian realized, the forced cheerfulness in his expression falling at once. As soon as he let go, Lan Zhan fell to the ground, a cold sweat breaking out across his face.

When Lan Xichen moved to kneel down beside his collapsed brother, Nie Mingjue followed. Unable to help herself, Wen Qing sat down as well, and Jiang Yanli followed soon after. The former pointlessly tried to diagnose the patient, and the latter fretted worriedly. Shortly after, Jiang Cheng, Jin Zixuan, and Nie Huaisang gathered around the real Lan Wangji, who was watching his other-self with faked indifference.

Carefully, Wei Wuxian pulled Wangji closer so that the Lan boy’s head laid on Wei Wuxian’s lap. It made logical sense — it was important for patients to be comfortable — but it was also unbearably intimate.

“I… I feel like we shouldn’t be watching this,” Jin Zixuan muttered.

“I disagree. We’re never going to be able to help Wangji-xiong unless we know their relationship like the backs of our hands,” Nie Huaisang declared confidently. He laughed and hid behind his frowning Da-ge to avoid Wangji’s glare, but he did have to admit that Zixuan had a point.

This was looking more and more personal as time went on.

Wei Wuxian leaned over to reach a for few straight branches laying nearby. Wangji's breath hitched in pain.

"Wangji," Lan Xichen whispered. He was watching his brother closely, and could see every time his breath faltered from the pain. It filled him with incomparable degree of worry.

"Xiongzhang, I'm fine," the real Wangji reminded, allowing Xichen's frantic heartbeat to calm slightly.

The sound of something ripping startled the watchers.

"What are you doing?" Wangji demanded, opening his eyes to see Wei Wuxian ripping part of his shirt with his teeth. Smiling back at him, Wei Wuxian began rubbing the grim off the logs with the fabric.

Now was absolutely not the time to think about how Wei Wuxian's exposed arm looked, so Wangji didn't allow himself to look.

Once they were clean, Wei Wuxian glanced around once, then asked, "Do you know where I could get a rope or a ribbon?"

"Huh?"

"Oh, your forehead ribbon might do the trick."

"Wait-"

The second he ripped it off, Lan Wangji jerked upright and snatched the end.

"You-!"

"'You,' what? You shouldn't worry about that now, what with the mess we're in. You'll lose your leg if it isn't taken care of."

Wangji's eyes were wide and he snarled with the ferociousness of a terrifying beast. Any sane person would back off.

So Wei Wuxian obviously remained firm.

"What?" Wei Wuxian asked again, pulling it away. "Even if you like your ribbon, it can't be worth losing your leg, right?"

Seeing that his glare wasn't doing anything to the motivated Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji finally looked away. It was as close to pouting as Lan Wangji had gotten in years.

The Lan brothers turned their gazes toward their uncle, hoping that Wei Wuxian's excuse would be reasonable enough to keep him from spitting out blood. To there surprise, however, they didn't need to.

Lan Qiren was staring intently at the simulated Wangji and Wei Wuxian with a contemplative expression on his face. After a few seconds, he glanced at his younger nephew and spoke.

“There are… worse people.”

Wangji relaxed for a moment, then his eyes darkened to a degree of anger that was similar to his simulation-self’s.

“It didn’t… mean anything to him.”

“Here,” Wei Wuxian offered, pulling out a pouch. “MianMian said the inside was filled with medicinal plants, see if there’s anything you can use.”

“How do you remember that, but not….” Jiang Cheng was so angry he couldn’t shout anymore, and simply leaned back in his chair defeatedly.

“Wei-xiong’s brain just works in a special way~” Nie Huaisang sang back.

Wei Wuxian poured the herbs into his hand, then held them out for Lan Wangji to look. After a few moments, Lan Wangji pointed to two of them and explained.

“This one stops blood flow, and this one detoxifies blood.”

“Very impressive, Wangji-xiong,” Nie Huaisang said as he clapped.

Jiang Fengmian nodded once at Lan Qiren, whispering, “All your teachings are paying off, it seems. No wonder he is your best student.”

Lan Qiren bowed back in thanks, then added, “Wei Wuxian’s training has been quite helpful too.”

Hearing the admission without seeing an enormous struggle on Lan Qiren’s part made Jiang Fengmian’s smile turn even warmer than it was before.

(Then his smile faded, and he began fervently praying that Wei Ying would escape the cave without further damage.)

“Hm,” Wei Wuxian looked down. “Who would have thought the perfume sachet would be so helpful. I’ll have to thank her properly once I get out.”

“Don’t you mean harass her properly?” Wangji asked, his face now in an undeniable pout.

Nie Mingjue broke into open laughter, shocked to see the usually stoic boy behaving so much like Huaisang.

Wei Wuxian laughed as well, answering, “What are you talking about? When I do those things, it isn’t seen as harassment. It’s only called harassment when someone like Wen Chao does them!”

The aforementioned boy squawked in rage, but everyone else laughed slightly.

“Shameless,” Lan Wangji whispered, still somewhat upset.

Madam Jin wanted to disapprove, knowing full-well that her husband used many of the same excuses, but was also aware that Wei Wuxian’s version of flirting was vastly different from the lengths her husband would go to. After some contemplation, she decided to remain silent. If he truly just meant playful teasing, then she saw no reason to complain.

(Though she couldn’t help sending a pitying glance at Lan Wangji, whose emotions were undoubtedly becoming a convoluted mess.)

After calming down from his laugher, Wei Wuxian’s face gained a more serious tone as he ordered, “Okay, now strip.”

“What?” Lan Qiren squeaked. He might like the boy a little more, but that was not permission to go any father than that.

Similarly, Lan Wangji frowned and asked, “What?”

Not wasting another second, Wei Wuxian pushed Lan Wangji’s shoulders and slammed him to the ground.

“What do you think? Take off your clothes!”

“What?!”

And, just as he said, his hands grabbed and tugged off Wangji’s lapels, revealing a muscular chest.

“Wei Ying!” Lan Wangji screamed, face flushing.

Jiang Yanli squeaked and looked away.

“What is the meaning of this?!”

“What do you think?” Wei Wuxian responded teasingly, pulling Wangji’s robes off his shoulders. “Right now, it’s just the two of us in here~”

Despite Lan Wangji’s struggles, Wei Wuxian easily managed to tear his sleeves off. Straddling the other boy, he ripped the white cloth to shreds.

Then, he began peeling off his own robes.

There were loud exclamations and discussions occurring around Wangji, but all the noise seemed to be washed out. Instead, there was a strange buzzing his his head that prevented him from hearing any of the words being spoken.

His mind was entirely focused on the one who had climbed onto of his other-self. He gazed aghast as Wei Wuxian revealed the entirety of his toned chest.

With deep-set collarbones, the lines of his torso flowed smoothly. It seemed to flaunt its adolescence, full of youthful vigor and strength. Even the deep red sear of the Wen brand did nothing to dim his beauty.

No, instead, as a reminder of his heroic core and bravery, it enhanced it.

Lan Wangji forced himself to swallow.

Wei Wuxian leaned forward, resting his hands on either side of Lan Wangji's head as he towered over. All Wangji could do was watch, completely captivated by the tantalizing image on display before him.

Wangji's light-headedness was returning.

Smirking gleefully, Wei Wuxian leaned in.

"Now that our shirts are off," he whispered, "it's time to get rid of everything else."

"You-" Wangji began, only to be abruptly cut off as he began coughing violently. A moment later, a mouthful of blackish blood escaped his lungs and splattered across the floor.

"Alright, the bad blood's out. No need to thank me," Wei Wuxian assured, tapping a few acupuncture points on Lan Wangji's chest with a calm smile.

"...What?"

"..."

"...What?!"

No one was entirely sure who had spoken, as they all shared the same thoughts.

"Wait, so-"

"He was just-"

"The blood-"

"This whole time was just-"

"What is wrong with you?!" Jiang Cheng shouted at the simulated Wei Wuxian, his cheeks still flushed in a mix of second hand embarrassment and genuine excitement. He had never seen anyone act like that.

"That was… very masterfully done," Nie Huaisang admitted his face flushed. Luckily, he was far from alone in that department.

Madam Jin blinked twice, then turned to Yanli.

"You're… you're sure he's never been in a relationship?"

She, for once, didn't have an answer.

Then Jin Guangshan sighed in disappointment.

"What a tease," he murmured.

Glaring, the simulated Lan Wangji hurriedly puled his robes back on, trying to process what had just happened.

"Wangji, are you okay?" Xichen asked, knowing their uncle was seconds away from joining other-Wangji in coughing up blood. Luckily, it seemed the revelation of Wei Wuxian's true goal would allow Lan Qiren to recover soon enough.

On the other hand, the real Lan Wangji gave no reaction to his brother's question.

"Wangji?" Xichen asked again. "Are you alright?"

"..."

By now, everyone was looking at him, their faces finally starting to go from apple red to a more human shade. Despite the attention, Wangji remained stubbornly standing tall, staring forward.

"I'm… sorry about A-Xian," Jiang Fengmian coughed twice. "I'm sure that wasn't something you were expecting, even if it was done to help you."

Wangji remained silent.

"Wangji?" Lan Qiren asked, growing genuinely concerned. "What's wrong?"

The boy in question merely sat down and continued to ignore them.

Internally, Wangji's thoughts were filled with a single, continuous, high-pitched scream.

Seeing that his brother was entirely unresponsive, Lan Xichen moved closer, but didn't bother to repeat his question. While in the no-touch simulation, there was nothing he could physically do to help him.

A moment later, the simulated Lan Wangji spoke, "...Can you not make that kind of joke again?"

"Poor, poor Wangji-xiong," Nie Huaisang bemoaned. "I don't know if it's better or worse for it to have all been because of the blood."

"You looked worse than usual, so I figured you had some bad blood in your chest," Wei Wuxian explained. "It's unhealthy to hold it in like this, but a big fright is usually enough to get it out. And don't worry, I'm not into men like that! I wasn't planning on really taking advantage of you!"

"Ridiculous!"

Huaisang sighed and repeated, “Poor, poor-”

“Quiet,” Wangji ordered.

Wary of Lan Wangji’s unusually bad temper, Wei Wuxian held his hands up placatingly and said “Yeah, yeah, whatever you say. I’m the most ridiculous of them all.”

“You are,” Lan Qiren furiously agreed.

At the very least, Wen Chao was grateful; the incident between Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had temporarily distracted the other sects to the point where they had stopped glaring at him.

(For now, at least.)

Then, a cold draft swept through the cave and made contact with Wei Wuxian’s soaked skin, causing him to shiver. Without delay, he gathered up dead leaves and branches, and used the fire talisman on his palm again.

Once the fire was steady, Wei Wuxian grabbed the herbs which had been picked out earlier, and applied them to Lan Wangji’s leg.

The close proximity so soon after Wei Wuxian’s cruel joke make Lan Wangji shudder. Every time he closed his eyes, he could still see himself being pushed to the ground while Wei Wuxian climbed on top of him.

Except Wei Wuxian had quite clearly explained he wasn’t interested in men. Knowing that, did Wangji have a right to fantasize about him?

No, probably not. And that was fine; it was all for the best, really. He had no right to have any such expectations. Getting to know Wei Wuxian at all would be an honor — no, the other boy was nothing more than a troublemaker. They probably shouldn’t meet up at all. Once the simulation ended, it would be best for them to avoid each other.

(He was not going to become the version of himself that dragged Wei Wuxian back to the Cloud Recesses in the future.)

Lan Wangji watched silently as Wei Wuxian applied the herbs, his eyes trained on Wei Wuxian’s chest. Then, he raised his arm, abruptly cutting Wei Wuxian off.

“What is it?” the Yunmeng disciple asked.

Without speaking another word, Lan Wangji grabbed some of the herbs from the other’s palm and pressed them onto Wei Wuxian’s chest.

Wei Wuxian winced and hissed in pain.

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli whispered worriedly, before glancing at Lan Wangji and nodding once. “Thank you, Lan-er-gongzi.”

He nodded in response.

Once he got past the pain, Wei Wuxian looked quite confused. Somehow, it seemed like he had forgotten that Lan Wangji wasn't the only one whose serious wound was still bleeding and had been soaked in water.

However, the moment Lan Wangji's hand left, Wei Wuxian began to peel away the herbs on his chest and put them back on Lan Wangji's leg.

"What are you doing, idiot?" Jiang Cheng shouted.

"Ah, this isn't really a big deal. Don't worry about it. I get hurt like this all the time, but I'll end up playing around in the lakes of Lotus Pier anyway. There's not a lot of herbs left, and your wounds need them more than I do…. What's with that look? Really, I'm fine. I'm used to it."

"He's fine?!" Huaisang screeched disbelievingly. They had all heard his scream when Wang Lingjiao gave it to him. As well as the sound of cooking flesh.

"What is wrong with that kid?" Nie Mingjue couldn't help but mutter. Even the Jiangs had no response.

(Wen Ruohan, however, was fairly certain he knew the answer. It seemed obvious that the Jiangs had spent so many years increasing his pain tolerance, he now considered the Wens' torture device to be inconsequential. Combined with teaching him that the only one who would help him was himself, his response seemed obvious. His subconscious tendency to value other lives before his own was a natural result of the grooming they had done. Intentional or not, the Jiang Sect had created a perfect guard dog for the heir.)

(But then why had they had a falling out?)

"If you know that it hurts, don't be so rash next time," Lan Wangji advised with a dark frown. "You won't be able to get rid of that thing now, even if you spend a lifetime trying."

"You pushed Wei Wuxian out of the way and nearly got dragged into a monster's mouth by your broken leg!" Lan Qiren growled, enraged by his nephew's carelessness. "You have no room to talk!"

Shrugging slightly, Wei Wuxian easily dismissed the concern with a "It's not like I had a choice, right? Who could've guessed Wang Lingjiao would be so heartless. MianMian's a girl, and quite a pretty girl at that. She'd be devastated if that thing had left her scarred or blind. Besides, I'm a man. I don't mind having a scar."

"You should still be careful, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered. While she was proud of her brother for saving that girl, she wished he wouldn't be so cavalier about himself.

Wei Wuxian tossed a few more branches into the fire to increase its brightness, before adding on, "And, if you think about it from another perspective, it could even be a good thing. The scar will never come off, but it proves I once protected a maiden from harm. MianMian will definitely remember me after this."

Lan Wangji forced himself to remain calm.

“Uh, Wei-xiong, you maybe you should-”

“And I'll remember this for the rest of my life too!”

Lan Wangji glared down.

“Oh no,” Jiang Cheng whispered.

Wei Wuxian laughed, “If you think about it, it’s actually kind of-”

Not wasting another second, Lan Wangji forcefully shoved him down.

“So you do know she’ll remember you for the rest of your life?!” he raged rhetorically.

“I’m sorry, Uncle,” Lan Wangji apologized.

“No, no, it’s… he….”

“The other you isn’t in the Cloud Recesses right now,” Lan Xichen answered, finding a barely-there compromise. Nie Mingjue snorted at the weak defense.

Collapsed on the ground, Wei Wuxian broke into a cold sweat from the pain. He sat up delicately.

Stuck in a cave while injured with no food or backup; Jiang Cheng really, really wished Wei Wuxian had managed to escape with the rest of them. Stupid Su She.

Glaring back at Lan Wangji, Wei Wuxian asked, “Lan Zhan, you…. Have I done something to you?”

“You shouldn’t tease people like that if you don’t mean what you say.”

“It’s not like you were the one I was flirting with!” Wei Wuxian protested.

“That’s really not the problem,” Lan Xichen sighed.

“Why are you so angry that I was flirting with someone else? Unless…”

The audience perked up.

“Unless what?”

“Unless, Lan Zhan, you like MianMian.”

A loud smack echoed in the simulation as a dozen people facepalmed simultaneously. Wei Wuxian was so close yet so painfully far.

And Lan Wangji certainly wasn’t helping matters by continuously acting like he hated Wei Wuxian. Difficult situation or not, this was exhausting to watch.

The watchers had no right to push them together before they were ready, but it was just so infuriating.

"...I'm sorry?" Lan Wangji tried, not entirely sure how to read the expression in his brother's face.

"No, it's-it's not your fault. Or even Wei Wuxian's fault. It's just… hard to watch."

"I really don't feel like we should be seeing this," Jin Zixuan pointed out again, cheeks flushed. Yanli giggled and scooted closer to him.

Finally collecting himself, Lan Wangji answered, "Please don't speak nonsense."

"Alright, then, I'll speak some-sense."

"Is it amusing to trifle with words?"

"Very amusing. But believe me, my words are as inconsequential as my actions are. Which is to say, not at all!"

"..."

Before she consciously realized it, Wen Qing had already rolled her eyes and huffed fondly.

Lan Wangji sighed and muttered to himself, "Why am I sitting here having such a useless conversation with you?"

Wei Wuxian sat down beside him without a care for the consequences, responding "Because there's no other choice. We're the only two unfortunate souls here, aren't we? If you don't have useless conversations with me, then who will you have them with?"

At the reminder of their desolate circumstances, Jiang Cheng frowned. He was sure escaping the mountain while Wen troops were in the area wouldn't be easy, but it would still be easier than being stuck in a cave with no food and a giant tortoise. For all he knew, Wei Wuxian might end up starving to death in there!

He really, really wished Wei Wuxian had escaped with him.

Wei Wuxian truly seemed to be someone who forgot all past pain as soon as the wounds healed. His relentless positivity was undeniably perplexing.

Wei Wuxian causally rested his arm on Lan Wangji's closest shoulder, and opened his mouth to speak. However, all that came out was an exclamation of pain.

"Ow, ow, ow! Stop doing that!"

Lan Wangji had bitten him!

"Ha! Now he has one mark from MianMian, and one mark from you!"

Lan Wangji glared, then forcefully calmed himself down and repeated, “I’m sorry, Uncle.”

“Well, we… we agreed to not punish for things that haven’t happened yet.”

As Wei Wuxian’s exclamations continued, Lan Wangji only sank his teeth in deeper.

“Alright, stop! I’ll kick you if you don’t! Do you think that I won’t kick you away just because you’re injured? Stop biting! Stop biting! Alright, I’ll go away!! I’ll go away!! I’ll go away!!! Lan Zhan, you’re really mad today! You’re a dog! You’re a dog! Stop biting me!!!”

Jiang Cheng snorted.

Face flushed with embarrassment, Lan Wangji glanced up from the ground he had been relentlessly staring at to see what had caused Jiang Cheng’s reaction.

“Oh, it’s just the dog comment,” Jiang Cheng explained. “He hates them. He can’t stand even little tiny puppies.”

“What, really?! But they’re-they’re so cute!” Jin Zixuan protested, offended by the mere idea that someone wouldn’t like dogs.

Jiang Cheng nodded in agreement, “Glad to have found a comrade.”

They smirked at each other with newfound companionship.

When Lan Wangji finally finished his fit and felt satisfied, Wei Wuxian scrambled to the other end of the cave. He raised out his other hand to keep Lan Wangji away, backing up nervously.

“Don’t come any closer!” he ordered frantically

“I’m not going in!” the future Wei Wuxian shouted.

“Let him cry. When he becomes tired, drag him in,” the future Lan Wangji ordered.

Lan Wangji felt his embarrassment crumble at the memory. Knowing what their relationship would one day become, how could he be so stupid as to fall in love with Wei Wuxian?

(And yet, despite his best efforts, it was still happening.)

Thankfully, the other Lan Wangji responded to Wei Wuxian’s request by sitting up and straightening his robes. As he silently tidied his appearance, many people couldn’t help but wonder if it had been someone else who had just bit and tugged and shoved Wei Wuxian.

“It’s a little creepy how he can just turn it off like that,” Nie Mingjue mumbled. While Jiang Yanli giggled a little, Lan Xichen’s smile took on a far more bitter taste. He loved his uncle, but he also knew the Lan Sect rules and expectations as one of the jades had stifled his brother's ability to express himself. Outside of direct family, Wangji had no one he would consider a friend.

Until Wei Wuxian, at least.

(If you asked Lan Wangji, he would say he wasn't the only jade who had been stifled by those expectations.)

As Lan Wangji continued to straighten everything, Wei Wuxian glanced at the bite mark on his arm and scooted away further, still shaken. His thoughts cried out in agony.

'How could Lan Zhan do this to me?! He might have saved me, but you could say I saved him as well, didn't I? It's not that I want him to thank me or anything, but why is it that we still can't be friends, even after so much has happened? Don't tell me that… that I'm really as annoying as Jiang Cheng makes me out to be.'

Jiang Cheng flinched, and the other teenagers shook their heads furiously. In the party at the Cloud Recesses, they received plenty of evidence that Wei Wuxian had a huge number of friends, all varying in rank and position. Lan Wangji was the only complicated one.

Both Lan Xichen and Madam Jin sighed at the misunderstandings occurring between their favorite maybe-one-day couple. And they couldn't even blame Wei Wuxian for that! What was he supposed to think about being constantly pushed away and even bitten?

Lan Wangji stubbornly gazed forward, not showing even a hint of regret in his eyes. He knew full-well how dangerous Lan romance was, and consorting with a demonic cultivator would be the end of the line. He was sure uncle, at least, would agree with him on this.

Unbeknown to Wangji, seeing Wei Wuxian's persistent attempts and friendship and proof of heroism were starting to cause Lan Qiren to doubt his earlier claims.

Right as Wei Wuxian's confusion reached its peak, Lan Wangji spoke.

"Thank you," he said.

Wei Wuxian blinked and glanced over.

"Thank you," Lan Wangji repeated. With his clothes soaked and his body still trembling, Lan Wangji appeared more human than most of the watchers had ever seen him. It was only fitting, then, that the first genuine "thank you" between the pair happened now.

(Nie Huaisang nearly squealed in excitement.)

Wei Wuxian frowned.

Seeing how he was kneeling already, Wei Wuxian got worried that Lan Wangji might try to kowtow and quickly made another stopping motion.

“No need to thank me,” he rushed to say. “I really can’t stand when others thank me, especially not when they do it so seriously. It gives me goosebumps. And kowtowing is even more unnecessary.”

Silently, Wen Ruohan crossed “lure him away with praise and flattering” from his mental list of ideas.

Lan Wangji indifferently replied, “You’re thinking too much. Even if I wanted to worship you, I wouldn’t be able to move.”

Wei Wuxian laughed, “No need! I got plenty of worship from the other students in the Cloud Recesses!”

While the watchers frowned in confusion, Lan Wangji gave Wei Wuxian a deadly glare.

“That wasn’t a good thing.”

“Hey, I didn’t force them to do anything!”

Lan Qiren got the feeling that his newfound appreciation for Wei Wuxian was going to be tested very soon.

The watchers returned to a faded memory of the Cloud Recesses. As Lan Wangji and Lan Qiren walked down a path of steps, Jiang Cheng passed by. Even though the clothes were the same as always, it took the watchers a minute to recognize him.

This Jiang Cheng was much, much wider.

“Wait, is that me?!” Jiang Cheng demanded, cheeks flushing.

Jiang Yanli laughed, “A-Cheng, you look just like you did when you were six!”

Noticing Lan Qiren and Lan Wangji, Jiang Cheng turned to bow to them. Unfortunately, with his uniform the same size as usual, trying to bend over proved to be quite a struggle. He stretched and stretched and stretched.

And his belt ripped.

“Jiang Cheng!” Madam Yu shouted as the simulated version panicked. “What do you think you’re doing?!”

“Calm down, San-niang,” Jiang Fengmian recommended with a smile. “This is back in the Cloud Recesses. He obviously returned to normal without a problem.”

“Is that even possible?” Wen Qing asked. “It’s harder for a cultivator’s body to change than a normal person’s, so I don’t think such dramatic alterations would be possible in this much time.”

“Well, it is a story Wei Wuxian is recounting to Lan Wangji,” Nie Huaisang reminded everyone. “Maybe, because of that, some of the details we’re seeing were… embellished slightly by the spirits."

Nie Mingjue nodded proudly at his brother.

Their view changed to the Cloud Recesses at night.

As Lan Qiren and Lan Wangji approached, a round Nie Huaisang relaxed against a tree, observing a shimmering pond. In his hands was a snack he was gleefully devouring.

Nie Mingjue raised an eyebrow, causing Nie Huaisang to hide behind Jin Zixuan with a shouted, "I haven't technically done any of that yet!"

Upon noticing Lan Qiren, Nie Huaisang immediately stood up, hiding his snack behind his round body and giving the man an unconvincing attempt at an innocent smile.

"That will never work," Lan Wangji informed him crossly.

Nie Huaisang smiled back and said, "Gotcha! I'll do my best to get better at lying!"

Lan Wangji glared.

Chuckling nervously, Nie Huaisang looked left and right for an escape. He leaned over the water, then suddenly began flailing his arms back and forth! He tipped over and rolled down!

The water splashed as he fell in.

"Huaisang!" Nie Mingjue exclaimed in concern amidst the deafening laughter of the crowd (and Huaisang himself).

The two Lans flinched back in shock. Shortly after, Huaisang's body began to float on the water like a corpse. Luckily, he had valiantly lifted his snack in the air, saving it at the cost of his own life.

As the simulated Huaisang waved the snack triumphantly, the real Huaisang was forced to sit down due to the laughter which shook his body. Both Jin Zixuan and Jiang Cheng were starting to turn red.

Lan Qiren sighed heavily.

In the early morning, Lan Qiren and Wangji begin travelling back up the steps. At the top, they found three equally round disciples from the Lan Clan.

"Even them?!" Lan Qiren bemoaned.

The first disciple to notice the main branch members stopped immediately, moving to bow. The second one followed.

The third one, distracted by something behind him, didn't stop.

“Oh, no.”

Upon collision, the force passed through the trio like a newton’s cradle, and the one at the front came tumbling down, accidentally dragging the middle one with him.

As their round bodies bounced and rolled down the hill, they quickly spoke.

“Hello, Master!”

“Goodbye, Master!”

Just like his simulated-self, Lan Qiren’s expression could be described as nothing short of dumfounded. Meanwhile, Lan Xichen couldn’t help but laugh a little (a meager showing compared to the hysteria in most of the other watchers, but far more than the other Lan Clan members).

“He certainly brings life to the Cloud Recesses.”

“He brings trouble,” Wangji stubbornly corrected. Lan Xichen’s amused smile told Lan Wangji exactly what Xichen thought of his paltry rebuke.

Walking back and forth in his office, Lan Qiren tugged at his beard in contemplation. Lan Wangji stood before him, listening intently to his words.

“The pupils are behaving outrageously and slacking these days,” Lan Qiren explained. “Wei Wuxian must be up to something again. Go and investigate it.”

“Understood,” Lan Wangji agreed with a bow.

“This’ll be good,” Jin Zixuan whispered to Jiang Cheng. The latter, who had long-since decided nothing the simulation showed about Wei Wuxian could make Yunmeng Jiang’s reputation worse than it already had, suddenly became nervous.

Lan Wangji walked into Wei Wuxian’s dorm room. The watchers could only see his back, but even from here it was obvious he was eating rice at a near-inhuman rate.

(Though, unlike everyone else they had seen, Wei Wuxian’s body was the same as it always was.)

“No more than three bowls of rice in the Cloud Recesses,” Lan Qiren reminded tiredly.

“Do not eat more than three bowls of rice in the Cloud Recesses,” Lan Wangji reminded calmly.

Snickers at the parallel reactions erupted throughout the crowd. Neither Lan Qiren nor Lan Wangji acknowledged them.

Chewing unabashedly, Wei Wuxian glanced back at Lan Wangji without a trace of guilt on his face. Seeing that, Lan Wangji frowned and continued.

"...You got too much rice," Lan Wangji explained, presumably thinking Wei Wuxian must not have realized he was breaking a rule.

The real Lan Wangji, who had watched Wei Wuxian in private and even gotten to hear his thoughts, sighed at his simulation-self's naivety.

As if proving Lan Wangji's point, Wei Wuxian smirked. Then, he looked back, bringing the spoon to his mouth like a child and turning the world's most adorable eyes on the Second Jade.

"I didn't Lan Zhan. This is still my first bowl of rice."

Glaring at the blatant lie, Lan QIren stormed forward, intending to count the number of bowls before Wei Wuxian could hide them. It would be important to know if he wanted to ~~feel better about his argument~~ analyze the simulation.

He looked down at the bowl, and his mouth dropped open.

Rice covered by an intense, flaming red sat in a bowl half a meter in diameter.

"...Oh." Jin Zixuan blinked.

"Well, I mean…."

"I guess technically, but…."

Nie Huaisang beamed, "You are truly unmatched in your brilliance, Wei-xiong!"

Later, Wei Wuxian stood in the Gusu mountains, holding a dead pheasant. Just as he moved to tie it to a stick, a voice berated him.

"Do not kill animals in the Cloud Recesses."

This time, the real Lan Qiren and Lan Wangj did not join the virtual one in listing off rules.

(Huaisang was thrilled. We-xiong was training even the Lans to hesitate before disciplining!)

Once again, Wei Wuxian remained calm. Yes, it was undeniable that he had killed the animal. However, he then tapped his stick against a nearby sign.

A large line drawn by the spirits appeared half way between the boys.

Inside the Cloud Recesses | Outside the Cloud Recesses.

Smirking, Wei Wuxian left behind a glaring Lan Wangji, saunting off to cook the meat.

"That-that doesn't-"

"Uncle, you won't be able to speak to him," Lan Xichen reminded.

"But he-that's against the sprit of the rules! If he bends these one-"

“I think it’s already been proven that, no matter how many of these he breaks, he’ll still be one of the most righteous people out there,” Nie Mingjue observed. “I have no idea whether that’ll still be true in the future, but for now, at least, it’s true.”

Lan Xichen mentally prepared to defend his friend, but, to his great surprise, Lan Qiren paused, then nodded in acceptance and posed no further argument. Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue exchanged a glance, confused.

(Unbeknownst to them, Lan Qiren was recalling his observations of the Jiang family. Most especially, the realization that Wei Wuxian didn’t care about other people’s rules, but would follow his own sense of morality regardless of the danger it posed to himself.)

In the middle of the night, amid pouring rain, Wei Wuxian ran to the wall of the Cloud Recesses. With a leap, he easily jumped on top of the barrier which separated the sect from the rest of the world.

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji called out, glancing up at him. The other boy glanced back and tilted his head in confusion.

“You two are so cute!” Nie Huaisang squealed.

Still frowning, Lan Wangji recited, “Don’t go out by climbing over the wall in the Cloud Recesses.”

“But I didn’t climb over the wall,” Wei Wuxian responded with faked innocence. “I climbed over the door.”

“That explains the 4000 rules,” Lan Qiren acknowledged helplessly.

Jiang Fengmian smiled sadly and nodded, “Yes. The demonic cultivation is only a small piece of who A-Xian is.”

Jin Guangshan didn’t entirely agree, but decided not to comment on the matter.

As Wei Wuxian laughed and sprinted away, Lan Wangji sighed tiredly.

Making his way through his patrol, Lan Wangji passed by a pair of round disciples who spoke to each other in appreciative but hushed tones.

“How to Survive in the Cloud Recesses is indeed useful,” one said.

“Yes, Wei Wuxian is really something.”

Although Lan Qiren gave a tired growl, he did not jump into another tirade.

Watching them leave, Lan Wangji narrowed his eyes, repeating ‘How to Survive in the Cloud Recesses?’

“Yeah, that sounds like something he’d do,” Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes, secretly pleased at the reminder of this version of his childish, idiotic brother.

~~It was much nicer to see this one than the one fighting for his life against an unstoppable monster.~~

The next morning, Lan Qiren trembled with rage as he read through a book. When the watchers got close enough to read the turning pages, they immediately realized the content: Wei Wuxian had made an entire book of exploitable loopholes found in the Lan Sects rules.

"Ah, I wish I had that last year!" Nie Huaisang declared, easily ignoring his Da-ge's disapproving-yet-affectionate gaze.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Qiren furiously shouted, slamming the book on a table.

"What an irresponsible…." the real one began, then finished with a sigh. Unlike what many had expected, he showed nowhere near the level of rage his simulation self had.

If anything, his anger seemed almost… fond.

Whitening out as if shrouded by a thick fog, the simulation transitioned to emptiness before darkening again and returning the watchers to the cave.

Wei Wuxian tended the fire, giggling happily.

"Remember that, Lan Zhan?" he asked.

"I do," the grumpy boy responded as calmly as he could. "And I remember having to confiscate those books for weeks after until we modified the rules."

"Oh yeah, that was hilarious!"

"It was not."

"Sure it was! I'm sure even you enjoyed some of the things the other disciples did to try to hide the books!"

Not a single person present believed that.

(When Lan Xichen saw the hidden sorrow in his brother's face, he was again reminded of the burning of the Cloud Recesses. The reminder might have seemed cruel from someone else, but, from Wei Wuxian, it was clearly just an attempt to remember happier times while in a bleak situation.)

Ignoring Wangji's deadpan expression, Wei Wuxian began to shake with laughter.

"How does he stay so obnoxiously chipper all the time?" Wen Chao asked, only to receive glares from all sides.

They had to admit that he had a point, however. How dire would a situation have to be for Wei Wuxian to stop joking and laughing? At this rate, he would keep teasing even if he died!

(And then they remembered the first two segments, and how cheerful Wei Wuxian was despite his gruesome death.)

“Ah, the disciple exchange was so exciting.”

“You hated going to class.”

“Yeah, yeah, but Jiang Cheng was there, so that was fun,” he argued, and his smile became a touch more forced. “Now that Jiang Cheng and the others have escaped, it’ll take them a day or two to get down the mountain. After they get down, they’ll definitely head home instead of reporting to the Wen sect, but, since their swords were taken, I don’t know how long it’ll take them to find help. We’ll probably be here for quite a while. We’ll need to search for ways to solve a few issues.”

While the adults nodded along with Wei Wuxian’s analysis, impressed by how realistic he managed to be despite the desperate situation, Jiang Cheng grew even more concerned.

‘Stupid Su She!’ he cursed. ‘If it hadn’t been for him, Wei Wuxian would be safe with the rest of us instead of stuck in a hopeless situation!’

Supposedly, Wei Wuxian wouldn’t die for another few years; that didn’t change the fact that Jiang Cheng wished more than anything that Wei Wuxian hadn’t been stuck down there.

After a pause, Wei Wuxian continued, “It’s a good thing that monster stays in the pool and doesn’t chase after us. The bad thing is that it also doesn’t come out. So long as it’s guarding the hole under the pool, we won’t be able to get out.”

“...It might not be a monster,” Lan Zhan disagreed.

Several people perked up at that, having made their own theories. The real Lan Wangji was especially curious to see if his theory was the same as his other-self’s.

“What does it look like to you?” he continued.

“A tortoise.”

“There is one divine creature that takes on that form.”

“The divine beast Xuanwu?”

With every word, the Jiang siblings’ worry multiplied.

When Lan Wangji nodded, Wei Wuxian frowned, “How can a divine beast look like this? It’s got a mouthful of fangs and eats human flesh. Isn’t that too different from the legends?”

“It’s not a proper Divine Xuanwu. Rather, it’s a semi-completed result of failing to rise to divinity and being transformed into a yao. In other words, it’s a deformed Divine Xuanwu.”

“Guess all that reading is paying off,” Jin Zixuan said, hoping desperately that his new-friend and eventually-going-to-be brother in law would manage to escape. Maybe they’d be able to lure the beast out somehow?

“How sure are you of this?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“...Four hundred years ago, a ‘fake Xuanwu’ rampaged through Qishan. The divine beast known as the Xuanwu is meant to resemble both a snake and a tortoise. However, having failed to complete its transformation, this one became a Yao and grew addicted to human flesh. Thus, it came to be called the ‘Tortoise of Slaughter.’”

“That’s what you sent them to fight?!” Lan Qiren demanded, recognizing the title instantly.

Wen Ruohan merely lifted an unimpressed eyebrow and responded, “If my other-self had known what it was, why would he send Chao-er after it? Especially with such comparatively insignificant backup.”

The reminder that Wen Chao’s forces — which had kept the unarmed other disciples in line for days on end — wouldn’t be enough to take down this monster filled the watchers with even more dread.

“So the prey Wen Chao was after was this four hundred year old tortoise of slaughter all along?” Wei Wuxian asked after thinking it over for a moment.

“It seems larger than the one depicted in the text, but it should be.”

“It’s been four hundred years already, so of course it’s grown. Wasn’t the Xuanwu of slaughter killed back then?”

“No. A few cultivators made an alliance and prepared to kill it, but they failed. One winter day that year there was a heavy snowfall. The Xuanwu of Slaughter disappeared and was never seen again.”

“It was hibernating,” Wei Wuxian realized. “But even if it was hibernating, it didn’t need to sleep for four hundred years, did it? You said the Xuanwu of Slaughter eats live humans — just how many do you think it’s eaten?”

Nie Huaisang clasped his hands together in worry. How many could such a big monster have eaten? Fifty? Dozens more? Hundreds more?

“The record states that back then, whenever it appeared, the number of humans consumed ranged from hundreds to entire villages and cities. From the handful of times it rampaged, it consumed at least 5,000 people alive.”

“Oh, so it overate.”

To the people who hadn’t known the number, it instantly crushed any hope they might have had. Jiang Yanli squeezed her hands together, praying desperately.

“Speaking of eating, have you practiced inedia?” Wei Wuxian asked. “That’ll let us go for days without eating or drinking anything. Though, after that, our strength, vitality, and spiritual energy will drop.”

“He’s quite good at adapting to circumstances,” Jin Guangshan observed, making Wen Ruohan hum in agreement. Three days would normally be a generous estimate; the fact that he was thinking about what would happen after meant he was assuming Wen Chao would interfere.

Picking up a branch, Wei Wuxian sketched out a mountain.

“Dusk creek is relatively close to Gusu, so your sect will probably reach here first. We can just wait it out and-”

“What?!” Lan Qiren demanded.

“What do you mean?”

“The Cloud Recesses has been burnt down.”

Despite already knowing that, the reminder disheartened the crowd further.

“Did… everyone survive?”

There was a soft thumping sound, and Wei Wuxian’s eyes widened in horror.

The glow of the firelight reflected off Lan Wangji’s face as though he was made of warm jade. It illuminated, with the upmost clarity, the tears that ran down Wangji’s cheeks.

“My father is dying,” Lan Wangji whispered. “My brother is missing.”

With every word, horror careened into the watcher’s minds. They had already known the Cloud Recesses had been burnt down, but-

Xichen had questioned why Wangji had been sent despite his broken leg. He had wondered if it was political (as much as he abhorred that thought). Perhaps Xichen looked worse, so Wangji volunteered in order to present a stronger front before the Wen to show they had recovered. That theory made sense to him.

But that wasn’t it at all; he was missing.

And Wangji had kept all his grief bottled up inside. It was no wonder that it was starting to spill over.

After panicking for a moment, Wei Wuxian spoke, “Um, Lan Zhan-”

“Shut up.”

Where before Xichen would have teased his brother's poor flirting skills, he now sat, disheartened. Silently, Nie Mingjue moved closer to show support.

(And, all the while, Wen Ruohan's arctic eyes swept across the other watchers, gauging their reactions.)

Wei Wuxian quieted himself and shifted farther away as the tears continued to fall down Lan Wangji's face. Where most people would turn red-faced and sniffly as they sobbed, Lan Wangji cried silent streams of clear liquid.

Silently, Nie Huaisang, Jin ZIxuan, Jiang Cheng, Jiang Yanli, and even Wen Qing moved protectively around the real Lan Wangji.

"Wei Ying, you really are… the kind of person I hate most."

"Oh…."

'Why is he here?' the future Wei Wuxian thought.

Then, later, Hanguang-jun had saved Wei Wuxian from Jiang Cheng, and nodded once in respect. The future Wei Wuxian had been confused.

'Back then he was strongly against my cultivation method. He was desperate to catch me. Why is he so polite now?'

Slowly, the reasons for the future Wei Wuxian's thoughts were becoming clear.

Turning to look at the ground, Wei Wuxian thought, 'I see. With everything that's happened, it's no wonder Lan Zhan's this mad. He didn't have the energy to hit me because of his leg, so he had to resort to biting me.'

With that perspective added on, the formerly-lighthearted scene gained a tone of helpless frustration. Trapped in a cave with a monster and no way to know whether his family was alive, Lan Wangji had reacted.

Trembling, the real Wangji moved to the ground, trying to understand how the situation described was possible. They had seen the Cloud Recesses in the future. It was still beautiful, but-

But all the buildings were different. And the plants. And the grounds.

Then everything he had ever known as home was just gone.

"Three days."

"Hm?" Wei Wuxian glanced over.

Taking a deep breath, Lan Wangji wiped his tears and continued, "Rest for three days. If no one comes to help us…."

Wei Wuxian nodded in agreement.

The world faded to black; the simulation had frozen. Just like it had during Jin Zixuan's confession, it was giving them time to come to terms with everything they had seen.

Unnecessary; no amount of time would make this seem any more feasible. After all, hadn't they just seen the Cloud Recesses? Not ten minutes ago, Wei Wuxian had been gleefully recounting his escapades and misadventures during the disciple exchange. And now they were supposed to believe that it was so gone that, even a month later, no one would be sent after their second young master?

(No, if Xichen had disappeared, then he was their heir, wasn't he?)

(And if Qingheng-jun was dying, then he would soon be the Sect Leader.)

The only thing Wangji could use to reassure himself in light of those terrifying possibilities was the glimpse of the future. He hadn't been "Sect Leader Lan," just Hanguang-jun. Xichen was fine. Everything would be fine.

They would win the Sunshot Campaign with Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation.

Just then, a snicker came from the side.

Afraid of his father's rage, Wen Chao was trying to hide his amusement. He wasn't doing a very good job.

"How dare you?!" Nie Mingjue shouted, standing in front of Xichen. "You attack the Lan Sect unprovoked, cause the death of their Sect Leader and the disappearance of their heir, and then drag all the sects into your camp for 'reeducation!' Are we a joke to you? Or is the Wen Sect made entirely of amoral monsters?"

"Wha-" Wen Chao stood up. "My brother did that! And the arrogance of the twin jades was their own fault-"

"Their own fault?" Madam Yu repeated, standing up as well. "The only one to blame for the attack on the Cloud Recesses is you. If you were incompetent compared to them, that's your own fault!"

"Then, if they weren't able to fight back against us, isn't that their own fault?" Wen Ruohan asked, curious as to whether the others would back off once he spoke.

To his surprise, they didn't.

"You attacked a sect for no reason!"

"How can you excuse this on those grounds?"

"Even demons wouldn't be so callous! How many people need to die to satisfy your greed?"

“What? So because Wei Wuxian called you out for cheating, you went home and asked your brother to bring an army instead?” Jiang Cheng asked, glaring at Wen Chao. Now, every negative emotion the watchers had spent the last few hours bottling up began boiling over.

“W-well, it’s not like any of you really tried to fight back! If Wei Wuxian hadn’t been in the Xuanwu cave, you would all be dead by now! Some great heirs you are!”

“Compared to you, yes! At least we stood up against injustice!” Jin Zixuan shouted. “You were going to string up a girl because you caved into your maid’s jealousy!”

“You were going to kill them all!” Jiang Yanli clenched her fists.

“Evil Wen-dogs!” Jiang Cheng agreed.

“Why are you so surprised? We knew from the beginning that war was inevitable.”

Growling, Nie Mingjue turned to Wen Ruohan and shouted, “That doesn’t make what you did right!”

“You didn’t fight back when we did it to other sects.”

“And when we do fight back, you lose. You lose the Sunshot Campaign; you’ll lose the war you started. We’ll wipe out every last Wen from existence just like you tried to do to us!”

Wen Qing frowned.

“You won because of Wei Wuxian’s demonic cultivation,” Wen Ruohan reminded them. He wasn’t completely sure that was true, but based on the way people in the future talked about his power, it seemed likely.

“What’s your point?”

“If you’re truly as righteous as you claim to be, I would have thought that you’d accept anything before that.”

After hesitating a moment, Lan Qiren responded, “We now know beyond a shadow of a doubt that the Wei Wuxian we see now is righteous. If he thought he had to use demonic cultivation to defeat you, then it doesn’t matter how corrupted he ends up — he was more righteous than the Wen Clan.”

Such a statement coming from Lan Qiren of all people left many watchers stunned. But, upon reflection, it made a certain amount of sense. The Cloud Recesses getting burned down was one thing; Lan Qiren’s brother dying and Lan Xichen getting who knows how hurt was another. And now Wangji was in a cave with a deformed Xuanwu and no way out.

The Wens had come very close to wiping out the entirety of Lan Qiren’s family; his patience had run out.

None of this was to say that Lan Qiren wouldn’t stop Wei Wuxian from developing demonic cultivation. It was still wrong for someone to abandon spiritual cultivation when the additional power they got corrupted them. He swore to himself that he would put an end to it before it began.

However, between Wei Wuxian and the Wens, it was now obvious who he respected more.

Wen Qing clenched her fists, slowly starting to see why Wei Wuxian decided to kill Wen Ning. It didn't matter that they hadn't done anything, they would be persecuted regardless.

"What? You don't regret it at all?"

Wen Ruohan merely tilted his head in a half-shrug, "Even if I did, what can I do about it? Unless we're willing to give up access to this information, we can't leave. If there's nothing that can be done, shouting empty threats is pointless."

When Nie Mingjue bristled at the implied insult, Nie Huaisang and the other Lan and Jiang leaders shook their heads. Reluctantly, everyone sat back down.

Nearly four minutes later, the simulation resumed.

Across a dark chasm, Jiang Cheng and a dozen other Jiang disciples traveled desperately. Most of them were leaning on each other for support, and Jiang Wanyin was forced to use a walking stick, having traveled continuously for hours.

Both Jiang Fengmian and Yu Ziyuan jerked back at the scene. While Jiang Fengmian went to stand closer to the real Jiang Cheng — quickly and illogically scanning him for injuries — Madam Yu turned to fiercely glare and a now trembling Wen Chao.

(He knew she couldn't hurt him, but some animal instinct within him identified her as a dangerous predator. Oh well, he was sure his simulation-self would knock her down a peg.)

'Wei Wuxian, you must hold out,' Jiang Cheng thought.

"Worry about yourself first!" Yu Ziyuan hissed.

Then the watchers returned to the cave, and, as if time was speeding up, witnessed Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji moving around in a pieced-together montage.

"The two waited for an entire three days," Lan Sizhui explained.

'And I still wasn't back?' Jiang Cheng wondered helplessly. Similarly, and although his other self had no reason to return, Jin Zixuan found himself angry. Lanling Jin had the resources to help out, and those two had stayed behind so that everyone else could escape!

(But, unlike the real Jin Zixuan, the simulated Jin heir had no reason to care about them.)

Lan Sizhui continued by explaining, "There was no trace of the sun or moon in the cave. They only knew it had been three days because of the consistent sleep patterns of Lan Wangji."

“Huh. Who would have thought that could be useful?” Nie Mingjue muttered, finally starting to cool his temper.

Their view changed to show Lan Wangji seated in a lotus position, meditating expertly while being careful not to put any strain on his leg.

“As they had spent the past few days conserving energy, the injury on Lan Wangji’s leg was slowly healing.”

“Hanguang-jun is so cool!”

“Be quiet, Jingyi! Sizhui’s recording!”

“Oh, shut up, Young Mistress-”

“Guys,” Sizhui warned.

The reminder of Jin Ling’s existence made Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan glanced at each other warmly, causing Madams Yu and Jin to lift their heads proudly despite the future boys’ immature antics.

After clearing his throat, Sizhui finished with, “This was already the fourth day.”

Jiang Yanli clasped her hands together nervously.

“Did you go to explore the pool again?” Lan Wangji asked, breaking out of his meditation.

“Yeah, but I still haven’t found the tunnel Jiang Cheng was talking about,” Wei Wuxian answered, carrying arrows in one hand and using the other to sling a quiver over his bare shoulder. “That thing’s still asleep, so I bet it’s covering the entrance.”

“Mn. We’ll need to think of another way,” Wangji agreed. He picked up one of the bows Wei Wuxian had brought over, testing the strength of the string.

Wei Wuxian nodded, “We can’t get out of here without killing it.”

As much as Jiang Fengmian wanted to protest the recklessness of the goal, he couldn’t disagree. They wouldn’t be able to get past the Xuanwu without killing it — with only the two of them there, distracting it would be far too dangerous — and they were running out of time. Sooner or later, they would starve to death.

When in danger of starvation, people could be convinced to do all sorts of things.

“I might have a solution,” Lan Wangji said, breaking off the bow strings and trying them together into a long cord.

Lan Xichen’s brows furrowed in confusion, before his eyes widened in realization.

Wei Wuxian brightened, “An old wound? Great! Then let’s aim for that area!”

“That will be extremely difficult. This monster is extraordinary.”

Right as he finished speaking, Lan Wangji whipped the energy-infused strings to the side, completely demolishing a larger stalagmite.

“The chord assassination technique?” Wei Wuxian realized.

“Oh? You trained him in that?” Wen Ruohan asked, making a question that would have sounded innocent from anyone else come across as a threat. Lan Yi’s technique was famous, even outside the Lan Sect.

“Is that a problem?” Lan Qiren responded.

“Not at all. Those two truly do make a perfect pair.”

Jin Guangshan agreed; even their first meeting proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that the two were prodigies born once in a thousand years. With the added guarantee of their accomplishments as adults, quite an enticing picture was formed.

Despite having originally been used to assassinate defectors, the chord assassination technique was one of the most powerful and vercitile fighting techniques of the Gusulan Sect. Wei Wuxian’s shock was warranted.

“We’ll breach through from within the shell.”

Yes, Xichen could acknowledge that it was possible to reach the aforementioned softer bit by piercing through from there. However, given Wangji’s current condition-

“I agree,” Wei Wuxian nodded. “But the inside of the shell is too cramped for you to use the technique properly, and your leg injury hasn’t fully healed yet.”

After a moment of hesitation, Lan Wangji nodded, understanding that if they weren’t careful, both of them could easily become liabilities.

The stress of the situation was aging Lan Qiren by decades at a time.

Wei Wuxian smirked and leaned closer, exclaiming “Hey, I got it!”

The watchers were then shrouded by darkness, flashing forward in time and cutting off Wei Wuxian’s next words.

“Oh, come on! Seriously?” Nie Huaisang cried, practically vibrating from the stress.

Jin Zixuan sighed, “Well, let’s hope this plan doesn’t involve self-sacrifice.”

“I wouldn’t bet on it,” Jiang Cheng responded, making his sister’s clasped hands clench tighter.

Wen Chao grinned, about to add on (mock), only to shriek when a thin silver chord suddenly pierced through him. Of course, the thread had (unfortunately) only phased through, and he wasn’t injured whatsoever.

A moment later, three more threads branched out, going from wall to wall of the cave like a man-made spider web. Every time one appeared, muted thumps resounded as if an arrow had made contact with the cave wall.

Then he aimed at the area above the tortoise.

Strings five, six, and seven weaved a maze on top.

Filled with intrigue, Wen Ruohan began walking towards the tortoise; he was eager to see the boys’ plan in action.

“Lan Zhan,” Wei Wuxian whispered from behind a stalagmite. “The chord formation is ready.”

“Mn.” Lan Wangji responded, standing atop another stalagmite slightly farther away.

Nie Huaisang, who hadn’t been able to see anything in the darkness, jumped when he suddenly heard Lan Wangji’s voice from behind him.

The crowd’s tension grew.

“Okay,” Wei Wuxian agreed. “I’ll go lure the creature out of the water.”

“Be careful.”

Jiang Fengmian sighed, ‘He does this often enough that even Jin Zixuan noticed.’

Barely making a ripple in the water, Wei Wuxian dived in. He deftly swam through, unhesitant even when he approached the mouth which had devoured thousands.

“Why does Wei-xiong always have to be doing dangerous stuff?” Huaisang cried. Nie Mingjue nodded in agreement; it seemed that even before demonic cultivation, he was often risking himself.

And always for causes that he believed in.

(So what did that say about his demonic cultivation?)

As Wei Wuxian swam closer and closer, he observed the beast to the best of his ability.

‘Are those… bones covered in slits?' he wondered. And, moving closer, he found that he was right. Between the tortoise’s head and shell were hundreds of skulls and other bones left behind by past victims. He even saw a rotted half-leg with a boot from just a few days ago.

It was quite a messy eater.

"It's too bad he's not already the Yiling Patriarch," Jin Zixuan mumbled. "With all these dead corpses around, I bet it would be child's play for him to deal with this monster."

Several people nodded before they could stop themselves, then flinched back in shock.

"We won't let him develop demonic cultivation," Lan Qiren hissed. Wen Ruohan rolled his eyes at the comment.

As he continued to look, Wei Wuxian's hair flowed freely in the water. In fact, it almost seemed as if the current was pushing him away from something.

He moved closer to the current's source, and saw a faint red glow from a spot between the bones.

The watchers couldn't do anything to the simulation. Usually, they couldn't feel anything in it either.

But they could feel resentful energy.

And what they felt now brought half of them to their knees.

'What is that?' Wei Wuxian wondered.

"Please don't investigate it, Wei-xiong." Nie Huaisang pleaded, gasping under the energy's strain.

As if deliberately ignoring the request, the simulation simply brought the watchers through the skeletons to allow them to see first-hand. Behind the meters and meters of various bones, was a rusty sword glowing with resentful energy.

Although he hadn't done anything to it, it recognized Wei Wuxian's presence.

And exploded.

"What the-"

Gallons of water sprayed into the air, and Lan Wangji was nearly thrown back by the resulting wind.

"Wei Ying!" he shouted.

Back underwater, the resentful energy sent his hair flying back, to the point where his ribbon came undone. It was swiftly pulled away by the current, allowing Wei Wuxian's hair to flow freely.

It was-

“The Yiling Patriarch,” Lan Wangji recognized, his eyes narrowing in concern. Wei Wuxian hadn't fully changed — not yet — but he was now a step closer than before.

The red energy rushed past him, nearly pushing him away. Nevertheless, he held on tightly to the rusty sword buried deep within, trying to control the chaotic energy as best as he could. If he could get an actual sword for a weapon (resentful energy-filled or not), he would be much more effective.

Shrill screams resounded in his ears.

Even with his obvious struggling, it was clear that Wei Wuxian’s resistance to resentful energy was much higher than a normal cultivation’s.

However-

Surrounded by so much commotion, it was no surprise when the tortoise’s enormous eye cracked open.

“Oh, no.”

Wei Wuxian was then assaulted by more resentful energy than most people — most cultivators, even — would witness in their entire lives. It surged into him, and began attacking his core.

When his unusually bright golden core started to be invaded by reddish-black spirits, Nie Mingjue felt his heart stop. He knew, given his unavoidable future, that his eventual qi deviation would likely look similar to that.

“Why would he give up spiritual cultivation for demonic?” he wondered, running a frustrated hand through his hair. Lan Xichen shook his head in equal confusion.

Over the course of the simulation, they had both begun to like Wei Wuxian; they truly wished he would stop messing with things he didn’t understand.

Proving them right, Wei Wuxian soon began to feel the effects of the corruption seeping in. He gasped out, losing his last bit of air as he continued to battle with the sword underwater. Then, a shadow began to cover him.

“No. No. No. No-”

The Xuanwu opened its gargantuan jaws and dived in.

With a snap, they closed down around Wei Wuxian.

“Wei Ying!” Lan Wangji was frozen.

“No, no, nononononononono-”

The internal organs of a beast as old as this one could usually melt someone to smoke in an instant.

"No. No!" Jiang Cheng shouted. "No, I quit. I don't believe-why didn't he just come with me! Why is he always the bait and why-"

A spurt of resentful energy seeped out from the Xuanwu's mouth.

Then it exploded.

The Xuanwu reared its head back in pain, jumping out of the water.

'It's coming,' Lan Wangji realized.

The watchers spun towards the commotion, staring in shock.

The tortoise spun its head around, battling the concentrated energy. Finally, its jaw could no longer contain the pressure, breaking open and releasing a blazing stream of resentful energy. It was so powerful, many were sure that in that instant it was the most intense source outside of the Burial Mounds.

'Did he-' Lan Wangji realized, then immediately bookmarked his thoughts and pulled an end of the string. It immediately wrapped around and tugged the struggling Xuanwu back.

Lan Wangji swung around on another string to reach the Xuanwu's back, improvising to make up for the lack of Bichen. Once he landed on it, he knocked his hand against the shell and shouted.

"Wei Ying! Can you hear me?"

"Please, please, please-" Jiang Yanli prayed.

Unwillingly, the watchers were then dragged inside the Xuanwu's mouth. They traveled through, moving down its throat until they found Wei Wuxian.

Using the sword, Wei Wuxian had kept himself from falling down by spearing into the Xuanwu's throat.

"Brilliant, brilliant boy," Wen Ruohan whispered, his eyes fixated on the soon-to-be Yiling Patriarch.

Right as Wen Ruohan finished speaking, Wei Wuxian's eyes cracked open. The determined fire in his silver orbs was enough to make anyone hesitate.

'Relatively soft scales under its neck,' Lan Wangji had said.

Nie Mingjue laughed, "Well I suppose that's one way to get to them."

The sword stabbed straight through the Xuanwu from the inside.

“Unbelievable,” Madam Jin gasped out.

As the head he was crouching on roared in pain, Lan Wangji was sent swaying back and forth. Despite that, he focused his mind, and activated their trap.

The net of strings which had been nearly invisible up till now abruptly lit up, cutting into the Xuanwu’s body and making its pained cries grow even louder. Pieces of its shell and the bones in its crevices began to fall to the ground.

Then, the strings contracted.

Dozens of flaming, unbreakable chords wrapped themselves around the Xuanwu’s neck just above where Wei Wuxian had stabbed through. Lan Wangji swung around the neck and added to the number of strings, before grabbing onto them all and pulling as tight as he could.

“No way.”

“They might actually….”

The threads glowed red-hot, then a blinding light flashed as the energy reached its peak.

The Xuanwu’s decapitated head fell to the water.

“They just….”

“They actually did it.”

Wen Ruohan’s eyes reflected the bright light with unhidden fascination.

Then, Huaisang cheered.

“Go Wangji-xiong! Go Wei-xiong!”

“They did it!” Jiang Cheng repeated, his mouth stretching into a wide but genuine smile. “They actually did it!”

“Attempt the impossible, huh?” Jin Zixuan asked, laughing.

“Wangji, good work,” Xichen whispered, hating the fact that he couldn’t hug his brother.

“...I didn’t actually-”

“Don’t ruin the moment! This is amazing, Wangji-xiong!”

Wen Chao scowled in a corner of the room.

Rocks everywhere were sent flying by the force of the attack, and the Xuanwu’s head crashed into the water below. Unlike the watchers, the simulated Wangji wasn’t interested in celebrating.

“Wei Ying,” he whispered.

“He’ll be just fine,” Jiang Cheng promised, still giddy about his brother surviving such impossible odds. “He always is!”

The Xuanwu’s head sank down into the water, and Wei Wuxian fell with it. Next to him, the resentful-energy filled sword sank down as well.

Even with their excitement, the state of Wei Wuxian’s undone hair served as a sharp reminder.

The Yiling Patriarch was still to come.

“If this wasn’t enough to make him turn, what could be?” Madam Yu couldn’t resist asking.

“Maybe, next time, I won’t be there,” Lan Wangji suggested grimly.

The world faded back to white.

Now that the simulation was over, the watchers were left time to talk with each other.

Awkward didn’t even begin to describe it.

The Wen sect had all but declared war when they revealed that the purpose of the camp was to kill all the disciples. They weren’t even hostages! They were meant to die to weaken the other sects.

Even Jin Zixuan was almost killed. Jin Guangshan had been nothing but cooperative with Wen Ruohan, and did care for his son more than one might expect. If the Wens were willing to kill even him, then there were no doubts as to what the Wens’ final goal was.

They wanted a war.

And now the watchers were stuck in a room with each other.

(Nie Mingjue almost wished they could fight.)

“Quite an impressive showing,” Wen Ruohan complimented, speaking to Lan Qiren and Jiang Fengmian. “You’ve trained your disciples well.”

Then, he sent Lan Wangji a look that seemed to stare directly into his soul. Xichen moved between them.

“Thank you,” he spoke coldly. “I wish I could say the same.”

Wen Chao bristled at the insult, but Wen Ruohan remained unphased. Unlike his simulation-self after the archery competition, the real Wen Ruohan had no reason to feel offended. After all, from what he had seen of the Jiangs, Wei Wuxian was an exception, not the norm. As for the Lans?

“I’m sure Su She would agree with you,” Wen Ruohan said, smirking deeper when Lan Xichen’s eyes narrowed at the reminder. They may have agreed not to punish, but their resolve would surely be tested in the coming segments.

“Well, at least the boy got A-Cheng to safety,” Madam Yu acknowledged. Her family turned to her with startled expressions, not have expected such a (relatively) positive response from her.

Jiang Cheng scowled, “I could have helped!”

“Helped against that?” Wen Chao mocked. “You kept telling Wei Wuxian to not interfere against us! Wouldn’t you have just sat on the sidelines against the Xuanwu too?”

“You-”

“The important thing is that you managed to get out,” Lan Qiren interrupted, hoping to present an unnecessary argument. “The sects will be alerted to the….”

He didn’t finish, unsure of how to phrase it. They had known from the beginning that the Wen Sect would cause them to start the Sunshot Campaign.

Knowing and understanding those words made all the difference.

Uncomfortable with the pause, Jin Zixuan turned to Yanli and muttered, “I can’t believe 90% of his plans amount to making himself the bait.”

She laughed and added, “And the other 10% are undressing to scare Lan-er-gongzi.”

“Either way, he likes attracting attention!”

Lan Wangji’s ears flushed pink as the engaged couple began to snicker at his expense.

“Yes, that was quite well-done,” Madam Jin admitted with a roll of her eyes, then look at Wangji. “You’ll probably enjoy yourselves quite a bit when you’re older.”

The pink turned to red.

“He doesn’t… feel the same.”

Jin Guangshan laughed, “I might have believed that if he hadn’t been mentioning you nearly 24/7 during the lotus picking segment. In my experience, anyone who thinks that much about a person while also getting distracted by their appearance is far from uninterested.”

His words made Wangji flush deeper in embarrassment, and Madam Jin flush in rage.

“Oh, of course you’d know that-”

“Dear, I was just saying-”

“Don’t you dare try to excuse this, Guangshan!”

As the pair got into their latest shouting match, Jiang Yanli moved closer to Lan Wangji and whispered, “Please take good care of my brother.”

“Uh, yeah!” Jin Zixuan added, eager to join in. “Please take care of my soon-to-be brother-in-law.”

It was obvious he had mostly interjected to be able to say “brother in law,” but no one commented on that.

“Wait, are you planning to take Wei Wuxian away?” Jiang Cheng asked. Despite the Jins’ loud argument going on in the background, Jiang Cheng had been close enough to hear the conversation.

“Don’t worry, A-Cheng,” Jiang Yanli laughed. “Our A-Xian hasn’t even met Lan Wangji yet. It’ll be a long time before you need to worry about him leaving.”

“But why would he leave? He’s supposed to…. You can’t just… just sell him off!”

“I would never take Wei Ying against his will,” Lan Wangji objected.

“But future you did.”

Abruptly remembering the encounter, Lan Wangji flinched back. Although he had hesitated to get involved in another family’s interactions, when Nie Huaisang saw the horror and realization flashing across Lan Wangji’s face, he decided to interject.

“I mean, to be fair, there weren’t many other options,” he said. “Wei-xiong had already done his little flirting-bit, and if Wangj-xiong had let him go… well, that world doesn’t seem to be especially kind to demonic cultivators.

’Haven’t I told you? When dealing with those without honor, just kill them and feed them to your dog!’

Now, Jiang Cheng was the one to flinch back in horror, remembering clearly just who had caused the situation. And had the future Wei Wuxian even had a plan beyond anger-everyone-and-run-away?

(Attract a certain kind of attention, same as all his other plans.)

To Lan Xichen, there was even more at play.

There were still several years they hadn’t learned about yet. Who knew what happened between them? Perhaps the future Lan Wangji had information they didn’t know. No one else had been able to tell, but the future Lan Wangji’s reaction to Wei Wuxian’s flirting was more than a little odd.

In addition to the shock, there had been a half-second of genuine hurt. As if Wei Wuxian should have known this wouldn’t disgust him. Dragging him back to the Cloud Recesses had also slightly seemed like revenge for the words.

But what could have caused a misunderstanding like that?

A dimension away, Wei Wuxian sat across from another Lan Xichen, deep in discussion.

There were two knocks on a door.

“Come in,” Lan Xichen said.

Hanguang-jun stepped through, quickly scanning the two of them for any traces of injury or distress. He hadn’t heard of a fight, but it couldn’t hurt to be careful. He had been rather busy negotiating with clans who wanted to destroy Jin Guangyao’s watchtowers on the basis of the man’s involvement, so he had been a little distracted.

Luckily, it seemed his husband and brother were getting along just fine.

“Did it go well?”

“Great!” Wei Wuxian answered. “Your brother and I are starting a coup!”

Xichen balked at the deliberately incorrect phrasing.

Relaxing at the teasing, Lan Wangji sat down next to him and said, “I left you alone for less than a day.”

“I know, right? Shame on you!”

Wei Wuxian’s smile had grown nearly three times as large as it was before. Lan Xichen was faced with the uncomfortable realization that Wei Wuxian’s happiness while with him had been at least partially faked.

Well, Xichen supposed he ‘at least partially’ deserved it.

“Who are you planning a coup for?”

“We were a little worried about the actions the people in that parallel world might take, so we thought we could try to get a bit of political power there. Not a ton — it’s not like we can physically go there — but just enough to lessen the effects. What do you think? Would I make a good emperor of a parallel universe?”

“Of course you would.”

Wei Wuxian laughed in delight.

Wangji turned his gaze on Xichen and asked, “Do you feel better now?”

“Yes, I do,” he nodded. “It was a very… insightful conversation.”

“Do you want to help more?” Wei Wuxian asked.

Befuddled, Xichen asked, “Help with what?”

“Interfering with the parallel world. So long as you keep what I said in mind, it could be fun. Besides, it might be… good for you to get another goal.”

Hearing that, Lan Wangji turned a disturbingly pleading gaze on his brother.

“If… if you’ll have me, I would be honored.”

Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji shared a smile.

Chapter End Notes

When I first started this series, I was only planning on including the archery MDZS Q episode. Then, I rewatched some of them, and cursed myself for not including this one! And besides, it was important. I wanted to make sure that Lan Qiren didn’t seem like he had forgotten the kind of person Wei Wuxian was. Hope you enjoyed! :)

Wei Wuxian is Proven Right (Again!)

"Welcome back, Wei-gongzi, Hanguang-jun," the Ghost General greeted with a formal bow. Huffing fondly, Wei Wuxian rolled his eyes and moved Wen Ning upright again, then walked back to his lab.

"Did anything go wrong while I was gone?"

"No, everything's stable. Did your talk with Zewu-jun go okay?"

"Yeah, it actually ended up being pretty helpful," Wei Wuxian explained, pulling out the notes he had taken. "I think we might try to gain political power in the other-dimension to influence its behavior."

"We will?" Wen Ning asked, tilting his head (as much as a corpse was able to).

"That's the plan!" the Yiling Patriarch answered cheerily. "Still not sure how we're going to interfere with Meng Yao and my other self — or if we're going to interfere at all — but, for now, gaining political power sounds smart."

"But-but how will we do that?"

At that moment, Wei Wuxian's expression turned terrifyingly devilish, and Wen Ning felt a chill run up his undead spine.

"We'll use you, of course!"

"..." Wen Ning stared silently, certain he'd misheard.

"Wei Ying, explain properly," Hanguang-jun corrected.

Wei Wuxian laughed, sitting across from Wen Ning and elaborating, "We can only send across information, but that's more than enough. Because we, by virtue of being a future with me in it, know a lot of stuff they don't! I can give information on talismans and different versions of the Compass of Evil in exchange for their cooperation. For example, if the Jiang Sect strikes a deal with us to help keep little-me alive, then we can give them instructions on how to make Spirit Attraction Flags. If the Jin sect breaks a deal with us, then we can give every other clan instructions on a new and improved compass for free. The secret will probably be leaked soon enough, but those months where only one clan has an advantage will be important to them."

As Wei Wuxian had spoken, Wen Ning's eyes lit up in understanding like an excited lamb. Once Wei Wuxian finished, however, he turned confused.

"What does that have to do with me?"

"Ah, well, I sent over instructions on how to add… emergency precautions, I guess? But little-me wants something a bit more complicated. Apparently, some of the things being shown are things not everyone wants to see — they probably only care about what the juniors tell them about their own sects. So, we need something that can think to figure out when that's happening, but doesn't have opinions that will complicate matters. And that is where you come in!"

"It is?"

"Yup. When you go into battle-mode, you know how to fight and adapt to your surroundings and/or opponents, but your critical thinking is cut into about a fiftieth of what it normally would be. If we send something like that over, not only will it take less memory than a full consciousness would, but it might help us connect to the array later. Anyways, the privacy-thing will sneak inside the time-travel array like a parasite, and both keep track of the watchers' heart rates — an emergency safe guard little-me is working on — and read intentions to see when they don't want to watch. Then, the consciousness will need to find similar moments in the memory package sent over, and make them go asleep during those moments too. If we can just figure out the-"

"Wei Ying, you're rambling," Lan Wangji informed him calmly, his lips twitching up in amusement. When Wei Wuxian was teaching juniors, he was the best possible option; when he was working through his thoughts while inventing, he tended to get about a kilometer off topic.

Wei Wuxian laughed, "Sorry, sorry. Anyways, if we send that over, then the people on that side will know we're capable of inventing things they need. Then, we'll have a lot of political weight amongst the sects, as whoever we support will probably do the best in night hunts and such. Therefore, we'll get power."

"That's amazing, Young Master Wei!" Wen Ning cheered.

"I know! And the best part is that even with our influence, we won't need to go to any boring conferences! They literally can't make us go!"

"...That's the best part?"

"Absolutely! I'll be an emperor with all the power, and none of the boring posturing!"

"Good job, Wei Ying."

“The only downside is how hard it'll be to apply something like that when no one who actually knows how to use resentful energy is there,” Wei Wuxian added, continuing his thoughts aloud. “Maybe it would be easier if that past's Wen Ning was there? Oh, well. I’ll just have to mention that to little-me next time!”

“Will you need any additional texts for your work?” Lan Wangji asked, ever the doting husband.

“The only ones I might want are the ones on empathy, but I won those back for Lotus Pier during the Sunshot Campaign, so Jiang Cheng has them now. We probably shouldn’t ask.”

Lan Wangji and Wen Ning both frowned at the bitter expression on Wei Wuxian’s face, but didn’t press the matter. A moment later, Wei Wuxian brightened again and hopped over to his workspace, gesturing for the other two to follow.

“Come along, come along. Lan Zhan, while Wen Ning and I are setting this up, will you tell me about your day? I feel like I haven’t heard enough of you today.”

“Alright,” Lan Wangji agreed easily, sitting across from his husband. “Would you rather hear about the discussion on the watchtowers, or a nighthunt I brought some juniors on?”

“The night hunt! The night hunt!” Wei Wuxian begged. “As much as I love hearing your voice, even it can’t make Sect Leader Yao’s complaints sound any less obnoxious!”

Wen Ning wanted to blush at the casual affection and teasing smirk Wei Wuxian sent Lan Wangji.

Contrarily, Lan Wangji only nodded once and began, “I took a class of thirteen-year-olds just outside Caiyi town, and we saw….”

Wei Wuxian sank deeper and deeper into the water.

Seeing his still-closed eyes, Lan Wangji felt a beat of concern pass through him.

Wei Wuxian wasn’t swimming up.

Luckily, he didn’t need to.

There was a splash, and the watchers could see Lan Wangji’s legs sticking into the water. From the way his body was moving around, he was obviously searching for Wei Wuxian.

“Wei Ying!” he called.

“Down here, idiot!” Jiang Cheng shouted, trying to direct the simulated Wangji towards his simulated brother. Yes, he knew that was pointless and embarrassing to do in front of the other heirs and clan leaders. No, he didn’t care.

(It was hard to mind too much when they had already seen the Jiang family at some of their worst.)

Fortunately for the kids' sanities, the simulated Lan Wangji checked underwater next. As soon as he saw the sinking Wei Wuxian, he swam forward and grabbed him, pulling him to the surface by wrapping an arm around his waist. It was a near-perfect recreation of how Wei Wuxian had saved him three days ago.

"What was it you said again?' Nie Huaisang asked, sneaking closer to Lan Wangji with a conniving grin on his face. "That you, 'don't touch strangers,' right?"

"I suppose Wei Wuxian can't count as a stranger after he climbed on top of you like that," Jin Zixuan muttered, causing a light pink glow to spread across Lan Wangji's ears.

Even though Lan Wangji had pulled him out of the water, Wei Wuxian hadn't moved.

Growing concerned, Lan Wangji repeated, "Wei Ying!"

Wei Wuxian merely continued to lean against Lan Wangji's chest, his long, untied hair fanning out in the water around him. The scene gained an almost intimate tone from how closely Wangji was holding Wei Ying's waist.

Madam Jin thought it would have been romantic, if not for the enormous Xuanwu corpse right next to them.

The affectionate atmosphere doubled when Lan Wangji moved slowly and tenderly to brush some hair off of Wei Wuxian's cheek. The sensation made Wei Wuxian twitch.

Then, he woke up.

"What happened?! What's going on?!" he asked frantically, instantly breaking the romantic aura they had previously had. "Has it died?! Is it dead?!"

"How can he be so hyper after nearly drowning?" Lan Qiren grumbled, making Jiang Fengmian chuckle. Wei Wuxian's eyes were wide and bloodshot, but his energy made him look as healthy as a pampered prince.

"It's dead," Wangji answered.

Unfortunately, Wei Wuxian's constant flopping started causing both their bodies to sink deeper into the water. It forced Lan Wangji to tighten his arm around Wei Wuxian's waist.

Now, Lan Wangji knew it would be foolish and illogical to be jealous of his other-self. Future Wangji had just fought a Xuanwu with a broken leg, and nearly died multiple times.

But it was getting hard to remember that when he could clearly see other-Wangji's tight hold on Wei Wuxian's waist.

(During the cold spring scene, Wangji had seen how small it was. Now, various undesirable fantasies were creeping into his mind.)

After several-second pause, Wei Wuxian's blank eyes returned to focus and he replied, "Dead? It's dead… Good, it's dead!"

"A-Xian, you should take a break and rest."

Everyone knew Jiang Yanli's words couldn't change the simulation, but they all understood why she had said them. Their complete and total powerlessness was getting exhausting.

"Ah, right, the hole!" Wei Wuxian added, scanning the water. "Quickly, let's go. We can escape through it!"

"Is something wrong?" Lan Wangji asked, seeing his strange behavior.

"...It's nothing. Let's hurry, there's no time to lose!"

If it hadn't been for the pause which had transpired before his answer, no one would have been able to tell Wei Wuxian was bothered by something. His ability to sound completely natural while lying was fascinating.

After another pause, Lan Wangji decided, "I'll carry you."

"Oh, my, Wangji-xiong. You're so-"

"Not. Another. Word."

"I… there's no need…."

But Lan Wangji had already taken in a massive inhale, puffing up his cheeks into an adorable expression. Wei Wuxian stared for several seconds, then sighed and also took a deep breath.

A moment later, they were underwater.

Huaisang stared in awe.

The simulation had adjusted to the change in brightness, giving the watchers a full view of the dark pool. The purplish-blue background contrasted nicely with the dimmed colors of Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji's clothes. Amid a torrent of bubbles, the pair moved deeper and deeper into the cave. As they went, their hair flowed freely around them, making them resemble the underwater yao which lured sailors into jumping off their ships. Mystical yet attainable all at once.

"Da-ge, why can't I have my paints?!" Huaisang complained as Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji searched. "It's not fair to have to watch this without being allowed to copy it down!"

"You'll survive," Nie Mingjue heartlessly responded. Even Huaisang's best pout didn't earn him any extra sympathy.

Finally, the pair resurfaced again.

Wei Wuxian spat out a mouthful of bloody water, coughing as Lan Wangji began bringing them both back to shore. Blinking open tired eyes, Wei Wuxian scowled.

“What’s going on?” he asked. “Why is there no hole?”

“The Xuanwu,” Lan Wangji responded. Although he didn’t like it, Wei Wuxian was forced to agree: the Xuanwu must have dislodged some rocks while thrashing around and filled up the entrance.

“You should have just escaped with me!” Jiang Cheng shouted pointlessly, frowning. Seeing first hand the level of danger and desperation Wei Wuxian was in made him sincerely wish Wei Wuxian had gotten out with the rest of them.

“Let’s get out first,” Lan Wangji decided, aiding Wei Wuxian in climbing out of the water.

Trembling heavily, Wei Wuxian took off his clothes and began wringing them dry. The more he thought about everything, the angrier he got. He whipped the end of his robe against a rock.

“Are we being toyed with or what? I didn’t think we’d be able to kill it at all. And now that we did, that bastard made the hole collapse. Fuck!”

All the teenagers (and some of the adults) stepped back in shock.

Wei Wuxian was relentlessly positive. He had nearly drowned recusing Su She from the abyss, and joked with Lan Wangji immediately after. He had accidentally used resentful energy to save the bunnies, and cheerfully brought them to Lan Wangji regardless. He had been kicked out of the Cloud Recesses, but played around with ants right after. He had heard the Jiangs’ argument and apologized to Jiang Yanli, but gleefully made fun of Jin Zixuan during the conversation. No matter what he experienced, he remained unflinchingly positive.

Genuine, uncontrolled anger directed at nothing couldn't be further from who he was.

That, more than anything else, proved how serious the situation was. If Wei Wuxian was throwing a temper tantrum, then anyone else would be bawling on the floor, begging God for salvation.

Luckily, both Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji were highly adaptable to even the most bleak of circumstances.

So long as Wei Wuxian got out of there without further harm, Jiang Cheng was willing to not make fun of him for an entire day — no, an entire week! He reverently prayed for Wei Wuxian’s safety.

Wei Wuxian flung his clothes away as he cursed, not noticing the twitch Lan Wangji made every time he did. Suddenly, his legs gave out.

In an instant, Lan Wangji had lunged forward and caught him.

"It's fine, it's fine. Used up all my energy," he muttered. "Oh, right, Lan Zhan, did you see the sword I was holding? Where did the sword go?"

"I think it sank underwater. Is it important?"

"If it sank, then nevermind."

For a brief moment, however, the watchers were pulled into Wei Wuxian's memories. As he had speared through the Xuanwu's neck, he had heard unending screams of agony from within the sword.

"Don't be so curious about something so dangerous," Wen Qing muttered, glaring when Wen Chao sent her a skeptical look. On the other hand, Wen Ruohan was pleased; having his best medic personally invested in keeping Wei Wuxian alive could be nothing but an advantage.

Wei Wuxian had wanted to examine the iron properly, but now it had sunk and he and Lan Wangji were trapped. It seemed appropriate to let the matter drop.

Sighing in disappointment, Wei Wuxian stood up again and resumed the walk, Lan Wangji following behind him. A few steps later, Wei Wuxian's legs gave out again.

"A-Xian!" Jiang Yanli screamed, even as Lan Wangji caught him. It was becoming more and more clear that Wei Wuxian had hit his limit. If he didn't rest soon, there was no telling what would happen.

The sight was incomparably strange for Jiang Cheng. Yunmeng Jiang's head disciple was Wei Wuxian. Regardless of the complicated feelings Wei Wuxian's position left him with, Jiang Cheng could acknowledge that no one fit their motto better than him. As the simulation had shown, he always did what was right, even if it initially seemed impossible. And, over and over, he had succeeded. Wei Wuxian never struggled; Wei Wuxian never quit; Wei Wuxian never got hungover or sick or tired or hurt or bullied or attacked.

Someone like Wei Wuxian wasn't supposed to have limits.

But there he was, arm bleeding from Su She's arrow, lungs full of water mixed with Xuanwu blood, and legs so tired he couldn't make himself stand, much less walk.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji whispered, resting a hand against Wei Wuxian's forehead. "You're burning up!"

Wei Wuxian grinned and rested a hand on Lan Wangji's forehead too, responding, "You're really hot too."

The revelation of how much damage Wei Wuxian had sustained kept Nie Huaisang from making any inappropriate remarks.

"That's because your hands are cold," Lan Wangji explained. "You have a fever."

“I do feel a bit dizzy,” Wei Wuxian admitted. Clear droplets of water dripped from his hair.

Outwardly, Wen Qing was indifferent; inwardly, she was more worried than Jiang Fengmian and Jiang Yanli looked combined. Why would that stupid, stupid boy think it was a good idea to constantly risk himself for everyone else?

They better be grateful for what he did.

“How did I get a fever? I haven’t gotten one in years.”

“Lie down,” Lan Wangji commanded again, but his words were muted. The world became fuzzy and started swaying back and forth, then tipped up as if they’d fallen.

The watchers were inside a recreation of what Wei Wuxian was seeing.

Then the fuzziness cleared, and the watchers could see Lan Wangji dutifully forcing his spiritual power into Wei Wuxian. Soft blue light surrounded them.

“Thank you,” Jiang Yanli repeated, finally unclenching the folds of her robes. Nodding once, Lan Wangji turned back to the scene, concern starting to be visible on his face.

Before, he had continuously gotten flustered by Wei Wuxian’s shirtlessness; now, all it did was remind him of the Wen brand Wei Wuxian had gotten burned into his skin.

‘Stupid, reckless, selfless, brilliant idiot,’ he thought, unusually spiteful.

A moment later, Wei Wuxian pulled his arm away.

Jin Zixuan glared, “What is he-”

“You don’t need to give me any. You don’t have much left yourself.”

Although his nephews frowned at the explanation, Lan Qiren was grateful. It was wonderful to know that his nephew’s friend would show the same level concern for him as he did for them.

But Lan Wangji shook his head and ordered, “Lie down properly.”

Despite his dizziness and cold sweat of exhaustion, Wei Wuxian then threw a tantrum:

“It’s too hard, it’s too hard!” he complained, banging the ground with his fist. Although such rambunctious movement would usually indicate a patient’s returning health, the level of dizziness shown earlier proved that was not the case.

Having grown used to Wei Wuxian’s carelessness with himself, Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen, Jiang Yanli, and Wen Qing all gave simultaneous sighs at the boy.

After a few seconds of Wei Wuxian’s tantrum, Lan Wangji caved in and asked, “What do you want?”

“I want to lie somewhere else!”

“Where else can you lie in here?”

“Let me borrow your lap for a while, will you?”

Suddenly recalling when his own head had lain in Wei Wuxian’s lap just a few hours before, Lan Wangji’s ears gained a healthy pink glow. His ungrateful other-self disagreed.

“Stop fooling around.”

Ungrateful, ungrateful, ungrateful.

“I’m serious! My head is so dizzy! It’s not like you’re a girl, why can’t I borrow it?”

“Digging your own grave, Wei-xiong,” Nie Huaisang warned.

“I’m not fooling around, you’re the one who should stop fooling around,” Wei Wuxian protested, energetic despite the way he was probably becoming delirious. “I refuse to accept this. Lan Zhan, tell me, why?”

“Why what?”

“Amongst all other people, there isn’t anyone who doesn’t secretly like me despite saying I’m annoying.”

Madam Yu scoffed, about to refute that with herself, only to hesitate. After all, Wei Wuxian had made sure Jiang Cheng got out safely, even at great cost to himself. She still didn’t like Wei Wuxian, but….

Perhaps he wasn’t quite as bad as she always made him out to be.

Wei Wuxian continued, “Why is it that you won’t give me even a second glance? We’ve lived through a life-or-death situation together, haven’t we? You won’t lend me your lap and you’re lecturing me again. Are you an old man or what?”

“You’re delirious.”

“And very, very wrong,” Nie Huaisang laughed, glancing teasingly towards Lan Wangji. “Lucky you, Wangji-xiong! It seems he feels the same way as you do!”

“What?”

“They don’t like each other!” Jiang Cheng protested.

Laughing, Jiang Yanli disagreed, “I think they might. Sorry, A-Cheng.”

While Lan Wangji glanced down, flustered by the implication, Jiang Cheng scowled. It seemed like everyone was convinced that as soon as they got out, Lan Wangji could simply swoop down and snatch Wei Wuxian away! He was the Yunmeng Jiang Sect's head disciple! Second Jade or not, Lan Wangji couldn't have him!

Distressingly, it appeared Wei Wuxian really was delirious, as he didn't respond. Instead, he turned over, allowing his eyes to flutter shut as an unhealthy heat rose in his cheeks.

Once he was too incapacitated to really pay attention to what was happening around him, Lan Wangji crept closer and pulled Wei Wuxian's sleeping head onto his lap.

The grins being sent Wangji's way by the other heirs were resolutely ignored.

"Two days later," Sizhui explained.

Hearing that, Jiang Cheng scowled; how long would it take his other-self to get back?

"Ah, it's so boring," Wei Wuxian complained. "Really, so boring. Way too quiet too! Lan Zhan you're so boring"

Two days ago, he had a terrible fever. That he had recovered enough to move was a testament to the unusual power of his golden core. That did not mean he should be rolling around on a cave floor!

The moment they got out of the simulation, Wen Qing was going to tie Wei Wuxain to the ground and give him a full check-up to make sure that he hadn't accidentally killed himself while unsupervised.

Sighing lightly, Lan Wangji responded, "Wei Ying, be quiet. You're still burning up. Conserve your strength."

"You won't talk to me or even look at me! You just sit there and meditate!" Wei Wuxian complained. As Lan Wangji had said, his cheeks were still red from the fever and exhaustion. That didn't stop him from pouting dramatically and collapsing into a heap on the ground

Nie Mingjue snorted, finding the behavior strangely parallel to Huaisang. Then again, if Huaisang was injured and exhausted and "still burning up" it would be almost impossible to get him out of bed, so maybe not.

Wei Wuxian's ability to act positive even in the most desolate of circumstances was still as stunning as it ever was. Though Nie Mingjue was fairly certain Wei Wuxian wasn't anywhere near as recovered as he was pretending to be.

(His still-flushed cheeks all but confirmed that theory.)

"Lan Zhan-"

"Rest."

Wei Wuxian curled up into a shrimp again, facing him and demanding, "Are you serious?! I just woke up and you're telling me to rest? Do you hate seeing the awake version of me that much?"

'No,' Lan Wangji thought.

"You're overthinking it," the real one responded.

'Maybe he'd be thinking more clearly if he weren't already half-dead,' Wen Qing thought angrily. 'If he just woke up and already needs to sleep again, then he shouldn't be moving around so much.'

"I'm sick! I'm feverish! Lan-er-gege, can't you say something nice to make poor old me feel better?" Wei Wuxian asked, then, in response to Lan Wangji's silence continued, "You won't say anything? Well, I figured. Alright then, how about you sing me a song?"

It was clearly an offhanded, joking remark. Wei Wuxian hadn't said it thinking Lan Wangji would actually agree. And, for a moment, it seemed like he was right. Then, Lan Wangji cleared his throat once.

As everyone else stared in shock, Jin Guangshan perked up. He usually preferred female singers, but the Twin Jades of Lan were well-known to be musical prodigies. This would be a treat.

Pulling out three chords left over from the chord assassination strings they'd assembled, Lan Wangji played a few openning notes.

A moment later, he began to sing.

As Lan Wangji flushed red, nearly every other mouth gaped open in shock.

The Second Jade continued to hum, transmitting a wave of tranquility through his audience. Unlike his guqin skills, Lan Wangji's voice was not especially famous.

(It should be. It was one of the most beautiful things Jin Guangshan had ever heard.)

It flowed smoothly from note to note, wrapping warmly around the listeners. It kissed their foreheads, wiped their past tears, and carried so much affection that, for a moment, Huaisang felt like he was choking on it.

Comforting, peaceful, caring — longing.

It channeled the raw emotion of love.

The listeners all basked in its beauty.

Then, Lan Qiren frowned.

“I recognize this,” he declared, trying to rack his memories for where.

Broken out of the haze caused by the song, Lan Xichen thought over what his Uncle said. Yes, it did seem a little familiar, and yet Lan Xichen couldn’t recall its name. He knew the name of every song he had ever learned, so why-

“Wei Wuxian,” Lan Wangji answered.

Everyone turned to him, but his eyes were completely trained on the simulated Wei Wuxian.

As Wangji's song continued, Wei Wuxian finally relaxed enough to stop hiding his exhaustion. Hunger, cold, and fatigue caused him to tremble slightly, but the song eventually lured his fevered mind into a deep sleep.

A genuine smile formed on his face.

“Wangji?”

“In the future. It’s the song he used to calm Wen Qionglin,” Lan Wangji explained, allowing the watchers to remember.

’I need a calmer, quieter tune,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘Calmer, quieter.’

Blurry, as though from a long-ago memory, their surroundings shifted to a dark cave. It was only lit by a small fire, so the two figures present were difficult to make out.

“And that’s how you recognized him,” Wen Qing assumed. “Do you know what this song is?”

Lan Wangji shook his head, and the two other Lans looked equally uncertain.

“Maybe you wrote it,” Nie Huaisang suggested, causing everyone to look at him in confusion. “Well, if he knew it was Wei-xiong, then it must be something no one else knows. If no one else could recognize it, then only one person could be its author.”

The melancholy melody drew to a close, and everyone turned their eyes on Lan Wangji. If Nie Huaisang was right, then the emotions conveyed by the song had a very different meaning.

‘Love,' Lan Wangji realized, his eyes widening in horror. ‘My simulation-self knows he’s in love with Wei Ying.’

“That’s nice,” Wei Wuxian whispered. “What’s it called?”

Lan Wangji seemed to murmur something, but Wei Wuxian couldn’t focus enough to hear what he said. The firelight dimmed until nothing could be seen.

Concern flooded through Xichen, and he prayed once again for his brother and Wei Wuxian’s safety.

The light returned, and Wei Wuxian blinked tired eyes open from where he rested on a bed. Following his searching gaze, the watchers were allowed to see a few scrolls, then a poster, and finally a person they could recognize.

"A-Li!" Jin Zixuan declared happily, more for the joy of getting to use her name than anything else. The adorableness of the action made Jiang Yanli laugh delightedly.

The simulated Yanli lit up as well, noticing Wei Wuxian returning to consciousness.

"A-Xian, you're awake!" she observed, leaning closer.

"Shijie?" Wei Wuxian asked disbelievingly.

Now that they were in the light, it was easy for the watchers to make out the dark circles under Wei Wuxian's eyes. Although his golden core had allowed him to recover from the fever, it was now exhausted. He would need several days of rest.

But it had kept him alive.

For once, Jiang Cheng felt nothing but gratitude for the powerful core his brother possessed.

As Wei Wuxian looked around, recognition filled his mind.

"I'm… home?"

"You are," Jiang Yanli agreed, smiling happily. Their family had been brought back together again; nothing would separate them now.

Once the unchanging walls proved to Wei Wuxian that he wasn't hallucinating, panic instantly sank in.

"Where's Lan Zhan?!" he demanded, immediately sitting up. A second later, he curled in on himself, wincing in pain and clutching the place where Wang Lingjiao had sealed the Wen brand onto his skin.

As Jiang Yanli sat close, Wei Wuxian forced himself to look up.

"Where's Jiang Cheng?" he added frantically.

Privately, Jiang Cheng tried to not read too deeply into the fact that Lan Wangji was the one Wei Wuxian had asked about first.

"Still have the strength to yell?" Jiang Cheng's voice asked from behind the door. "Guess you're not hurt all that badly. I shouldn't have bothered to come back for you."

"He is hurt," Wen Qing immediately disagreed. She knew Jiang Cheng was joking and that she couldn't interfere with the simulation, but found the statement too infuriating to ignore. Wei Wuxian was careless enough already; he didn't need any encouragement. Wen Qing was definitely going to examine him no matter what once they got out.

(Then again, after they escaped the simulation, it seemed likely none of the other sects would be willing to work with a Wen.)

"You… come here!" Wei Wuxian ordered angrily.

"What for? You gonna kneel down and thank me?"

"Alright, alright, let's stop arguing," Jiang Yanli interrupted, halting them in their tracks.

No matter how many times he saw it, it amazed Jin Zixuan how easily his fiancée was able to control her brothers.

Jiang Yanli gave Wei Wuxian a bowl of lotus and pork rib soup, making him beam brighter than the sun.

"Thank you, Shijie!"

Seeing Jin Zixuan's inquiring gaze, Jiang Yanli blushed and told him, "It's my own recipe. Would you… like to try some when we get out?"

Her voice was scared and hesitant, still recalling the scornful mocking Wen Chao had directed at her earlier. She knew it wasn't exactly proper for a young mistress to work in the kitchens like a servant, but-

"Yes please," Jin Zixuan nodded furiously. "I would love to try it!"

But it allowed her to help the people she loved in a way no one else could.

After several seconds of Jiang Yanli helping him eat, Jiang Cheng glared and snapped out, "Do you need her to feed you?!"

Wei Wuxian paused for a moment, then stuck his tongue out childishly.

"Behave," Yanli laughed, then left the room to put everything away.

"He's right, A-Li," Madam Yu lectured. "You really shouldn't do things like that for him."

For once, neither Jiang Fengmian nor Jiang Yanli frowned at the statement. In fact, they thought they might have been hearing things for a moment.

Because, despite the harsh words, Madam Yu's voice had been perfectly even. There was no trace of anger to be found.

(In Madam Yu's eyes, Wei Wuxian had gotten hurt allowing Jiang Cheng to escape. She wasn't forgiving him or accepting him, but hate might be a little strong.)

Wei Wuxian then sobered up and his expression grew grave.

"Where's Lan Zhan? He was rescued too, right?"

Some small part of Lan Qiren did have to admit that he had always wanted Lan Wangji's eventual partner to put him first. But Wei Wuxian was different from what he wanted. Very different.

(By this point, the only excuse he had to not approve of Wei Wuxian was the demonic cultivation. Friendship was one thing, but when it came to the possibilities of romance Lan Qiren clutched the "demonic cultivator" reminder like a lifeline.)

"Is Lan Zhan here?"

"Don't be ridiculous," Jiang Cheng told him. "Lan Wangji isn't part of our clan, why would he be here? He went back to Gusu of course!"

"...Ah…."

The circumstances were very, very different, but Wei Wuxian's dejected pout reminded Nie Mingjue slightly of Huaisang. His mind was making these comparisons more and more often lately.

Before anything else could be said, the scenery altered.

Qiong Qi drums were beaten furiously, and the Nightless City faded into view. Directly in the center of the courtyard, the gargantuan Xuanwu shell towered over everything else.

Wen Chao began to grin.

"Master Wen killed the beast!" the disciples cheered unanimously. "His heroic deed will go down in history!"

The action was so disgusting — so shameless — that it took Nie Mingjue a moment to realize what was being implied. The second he did-

"How dare you?!" he shouted, making Wen Chao jump back.

"Father, you should know this," the simulated Wen Chao began. "On Muxi Mountain, the Lans, Jiangs, Jins, and Nies disobeyed my orders. They were led by the Jiangs into rebellion!"

"If everyone revolted, maybe that says something about you instead," Madam Jin hissed.

Nie Mingjue stood up fully, "You try to use live bait, order the deaths of everyone in the Lan and Jin groups, run away from the monster, seal off one of the only exits, and then claim you were the one to kill it 'despite rebellion?' You're not just taking credit, you're-"

He cut himself off, so full of fury that he was shaking. He couldn't hurt Wen Chao while they were in the simulation, but right now he wanted nothing more than to abandon the promise they had made to not punish for things that had yet to occur.

While this was happening, Wen Chao explained the way he valiantly managed to regain control of the situation despite the insurrection. For extra credit, he even made sure to explain to his father how he had slain the beast in his name. The look he got in return was more than a little skeptical.

“Oh, really?” Wen Ruohan asked.

But it didn’t matter whether he believed it; Wen Ruohan would still use it as an excuse to attack. Furious, Madam Yu gave a low growl that made Wen Chao look away.

“What? Wen Chao said he killed it?” Wei Wuxian demanded.

The abrupt return to Lotus Pier left quite a few people startled, but the rest agreed with Wei Wuxian’s exclamation wholeheartedly. It seemed absurd that the Wen Clan would try to get away with lying so shamelessly.

But, if they were willing to destroy the other clans, then perhaps they didn’t need to cater to them any longer.

“He did. A-Die hasn’t even been able to get back our swords. They’re celebrating Wen Chao’s victory in the Nevernight,” Jiang Cheng added, explaining the last scene.

“That shameless liar,” Wei Wuxian scoffed. “Lan Zhan’s the one who killed it!”

“What?” more than one person asked.

Lan Wangji frowned, “But Wei Ying’s the one who killed it.”

“What?” those same people asked again, this time looking at Lan Wangji in disbelief.

“Really?” the amused voice of Jiang Fengmian asked. “Coincidentally, Young Master Lan told me you were the one to kill it.”

Several disbelieving gazes were turned his way, and Lan Wangji looked back in confusion. All he had been able to do was suffocate it from the outside due to his broken leg. Wei Ying was the one who had lured it out and speared through the old wound from the inside. Wei Wuxian's contributions were both more dangerous and more effective.

Obviously Wei Ying was the one who killed it.

(Wen Ruohan glanced towards his son. Both Wen Chao and Wei Wuxian had lied to their Sect Leader about who killed the Xuanwu, but their reasons couldn’t be more different.)

“A-Die,” Jiang Cheng greeted with a salute.

“Jiang-Shushu!” Wei Wuxian beamed, moving to sit up only to stop when Jiang Fengmian raised his hand.

“Sitting is fine,” he assured. The words made Wei Wuxian’s smile even brighter, while Jiang Cheng seemed to frown slightly.

Sect Leader Jiang had never taken the time to really notice before, but there was a distinct difference in the level of comfort Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng felt around him. For the longest time, he had put that up to the difference in their personalities. Wei Wuxian was bright, cheerful, and had the same values as his parents — the kind of person Jiang Fengmian got along with most easily. Jiang Cheng, on the other hand, had a personality and values more similar to that of his mother's.

Until the simulation, Jiang Fengmian had never thought to read too deeply about what that difference might mean.

As Jiang Cheng moved to get some tea for his father, Jiang Fengmian sat down next to Wei Wuxian and asked, "So? Which was it?"

"I guess both of us played a part, but he did most of it. I only went inside the beast's shell and chased it out, he dealt the final blow."

"Those two idiots are perfect for each other," Nie Mingjue grumbled, burying his face in his hands out of frustration. Both Lan Xichen and Jiang Yanli laughed at his comment, while Wen Qing rolled her eyes fondly.

Lan Wangji flushed warmly, finally understanding what they were talking about.

Sighing as if in agreement with them, Jiang Cheng responded, "What's yours is yours. Since you two killed it together, why did you give him all the credit?"

The real Jiang Cheng nodded resolutely. Why would both of them have said the other did it? They both put in a ton of work, why would they want someone else to take the credit?

"I just think when compared to him, I didn't do all that much," Wei Wuxian answered as Jiang Fengmian took a cup of tea from his son.

For a moment, Yu Ziyuan was furious. With the way things were laid out, it almost seemed like Jiang Cheng was the servant, and Wei Wuxian the son! Why was Wei Wuxian just sitting down and allowing Yungmengjian's heir to do all the work?!

Then, she remembered the fact that he had woken up from a burning fever less than 10 minutes ago, and that he had gotten that fever helping Jiang Cheng escape.

Jiang Fengmian hummed once, then looked warmly at Wei Wuxian and said, "Well done."

Jiang Cheng froze.

"Wow you… don't really give full compliments, do you?" Jin Zixuan asked. Normally, he would know better than to speak so casually to the leader of the Jiang Sect, but the simulation made it hard to remember those social niceties.

"...I suppose?" Jiang Fengmian answered. Everyone else was in complete agreement with Jin Zixuan.

Killing the Xuanwu of slaughter without their swords seemed to deserve just a little more than a simple "well done." Having seen the struggle it took first hand, most were astounded by the understatement.

On the other hand, Jiang Cheng looked away. The expression on his other-self had been off when Jiang Fengmian congratulated Wei Wuxian. He hoped no one would read too deeply into that.

Frowning further, Jiang Cheng added "You killed the a four hundred year old beast at the mere age of seventeen. Congratulations."

Unlike his other self, the real Jiang Fengmian stood at an angle that allowed him to see his son's expression. The downcast frustration there was as clear as day.

Seeing Jiang Cheng's folded hands and raised brows, Wei Wuxian instantly knew what Jiang Cheng was thinking.

Madam Yu knew as well.

Jiang Cheng was making a fuss in silence, defiantly asking why he wasn't the one who had stayed in the cave to kill the beast. If it had stayed, he could have definitely done the same.

So Wei Wuxian laughed off the congratulations with a, "Too bad you weren't there! You could have gotten some of the credit! Plus, you know how to talk. Spending all that time with Lan Zhan nearly bored me to death!"

Jiang Cheng glared. Being read so easily made him feel like a child who had to be coddled.

And he had seen what Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had to do to survive. Unlike his other-self, he wasn't sure he would have been able to manage that.

Huffing once, Jiang Cheng added, "It serves you right to be bored to death! You shouldn't have played hero, and you shouldn't have cared for such a hell of a thing! If in the beginning you didn't-"

"Jiang Cheng," Jiang Fengmian interrupted sternly.

"And what is that supposed to mean?!" Madam Yu hissed.

This time, however, her friend wasn't willing to support her.

From what Madam Jin had just heard, it almost seemed like Jiang Cheng thought Wei Wuxian shouldn't have saved her son from the Wens. Glancing back at the sudden awkwardness between Jiang Cheng, Lan Wangji, and Jin Zixuan, she knew they had all realized the same.

Also knowing he had said too much, the simulated Jiang Cheng fell silent.

Jiang Fengmian didn't look like he was blaming him for anything, but his expression had turned from calm to more solem, "Do you understand why what you just said was not appropriate?"

"...Yes."

"He's just angry and speaking without care," Wei Wuxian interjected.

The more she saw, the more Madam Yu got the feeling that Wei Wuxian wasn't at all interested in upstaging Jiang Cheng. Luckily, she knew that wasn't right.

(It couldn't be right.)

Ignoring Wei Wuxian's words, Jiang Fengmian observed his son. Seeing that his mouth and heart were still at odds with each other — how he still felt defiant —Jiang Fengmian shook his head.

"A-Cheng, there are some things that should never be said even if you're angry."

Lan Qiren nodded. Even beyond his own anger due to Lan Wangji's involvement, he knew that when Jiang Cheng became Sect Leader, he would need full control of his emotions.

Though, from the red rapidly spreading across her face, Madam Yu disagreed.

Jiang Fengmian continued, "If you say those things, it shows that you still don't understand the principles of the Jiang Sect. That you still don't-"

"Yes, he doesn't understand. But what does that matter, so long as Wei Ying understands?"

Like a purple bolt of lightning, Madam Yu swept inside.

With her years and years of experience with these sort of things, Jiang Yanli instantly knew what was about to happen. It was bad enough for her parents to argue while the boys were in the room, but….

Now, every sect leader would witness the worst of their relationship first hand.

Madam Yu stormed forward to stand directly before Wei Wuxian's bed, brows raised, and shouted, "To uphold justice at all costs is exactly how he is, isn't it? Fooling around even though he knew it would bring trouble to the sect!"

Astounded by the phrasing, Nie Mingjue turned to her and repeated "Fooling around-"

"Sect Leader Nie," Jiang Fengmian interrupted. "As we are all aware that this is private, I would rather you don't think too deeply about-"

"What, you don't think I mean it?" Madam Yu demanded.

"That's not what I meant."

Without pause, the simulated Madam Yu continued, "Wei Wuxian knew it'd put our family in danger, but he still did it! One day, he'll bring about the end of our Clan!"

Wei Wuxian flinched slightly and stared intently at the ground.

Lan Wangji subconsciously stepped closer.

"San-niang, what are you doing here?"

"What am I doing here? Ridiculous!"

"What did you mean then?"

"San-niang, we should listen for now," Jiang Fengmian requested, stopping their argument so they could pay attention to the simulated one. As per usual, it was an attempt to halt the symptoms, rather than deal with the source.

Wen Ruohan gazed over judgmentally.

Jiang Yanli and Jiang Cheng looked down, refusing to look at either version of their parents.

Infuriated my Jiang Fengmian's silence, Madam Yu continued, "Do I need to remind you that I'm also a master of Lotus Pier?! Do you still remember that every inch on the earth here is my territory?! Do you still remember, between the one lying there and the one standing here, which one is your son?!"

"San-niang, that isn't-"

"What? Am I wrong?"

"Of course I do," Jiang Fengmian answered, having been asked that question countless times over the past few years.

Madam Yu laughed bitterly, "So you do remember. But what's the use if you simply remember? Wei Ying, he really can't go a day without stirring up some trouble, can he?"

Amused by the conflict, Wen Chao slowly began to snicker.

"If I had known Wei Ying would do something like this, I would have made him stay in Lotus Pier no matter what! Would Wen Chao really have dared to do anything to the two Young Masters of the Gusulan and LanlingJin sects?"

"He was actively trying to," Jin Guangshan calmly reminded.

"Even if he did, that'd just mean they ran out of luck! Since when was it his turn to play hero?!"

"Ran out of luck?!" Madam Jin repeated disbelievingly, turning to her friend with shock clearly written across her face. "You think my son should have laid down and died for the sin of trying to do the right thing?!"

Infuriated at the accusation, Madam Yu responded, "If he brings down the Wens on your sect, that's his fault, but if Wei Wuxian directs their attention on us-"

"Are you really so terrified of us that you'd rather blame a child for our actions than your own incompetence?" Wen Ruohan wondered, making Yu Ziyuan turn her fury onto him.

The other teenagers, who had been slightly angry at Jiang Cheng for suggesting that Wei Wuxian's actions were wrong, slowly began to see where his mindset came from.

Unwilling to anger, Wei Wuxian stayed silent, not protesting for the sake of Madam Yu's face. Internally, however….

'He wouldn't have dared do anything to them? That's far from certain.' he thought.

"Cheeky brat," Madam Yu hissed, now spinning away from Wen Ruohan to glare at Wei Wuxian. Feeling attacked on all sides, Madam Yu's talons sharpened into needle-point arrows.

"Just wait and see!" Madam Yu continued. "One day he'll land our clan in some serious trouble!"

Not wanting to have this conversation before their kids, Jiang Fengmian stood up, "Let's talk after we go back."

"Talk about what? Go back where? I'll be talking about it right here! I have nothing to be ashamed of, anyways! Jiang Cheng, come over here!" she ordered as she dragged her son closer.

Jiang Cheng buried his face in his arms, praying desperately that the gods would grant him mercy and allow him to sink into the floor, never to return.

"Sect Leader Jiang, take a good look at your biological son! Jiang Cheng is your flesh and blood!" she shouted, and Jiang Cheng turned away from his parents to stare at the floor with a wince.

Wei Wuxian's eyes widened in concern.

"Stay quiet, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli advised, hoping to simply weather the storm like usual.

"Even if you don't like him because I'm his mother, he's still your son!"

The anger which had been building up in Madam Jin and Lan Qiren's bodies did an odd tumble at those words. They were still furious, but it did put things into perspective.

Madam Yu was using Wei Wuxian as a vehicle to project her feelings onto. No matter what Wei Wuxian had done in the cave, she would have found fault with it. That wasn't better, but it required a different response.

And affected the children differently.

Lan Qiren sighed, "Don't put things like that into their heads."

“I’m sure you know about the rumors. They say that even after all these years, you still can’t get over a certain someone and even treat her son as your own. Some people even think Wei Ying is your-”

“Yu Ziyuan!” Jiang Fengmian shouted, outraged.

"Jiang Fengmian! Do you think anything will change just because you've raised your voice?"

The real Jiang Fengmian looked away. What had he done to make his wife question his honor? He had been nothing but faithful to her.

(And literally nothing else, a little voice inside him said.)

As the spat between his parents continued, Jiang Cheng glanced back. Vulnerability was etched clearly across his face.

‘No one here should be seeing this,’ Lan Xichen thought again.

"Do you think I don’t know you? That I don’t know what you think?”

Jiang Fengmian’s expression became even more disapproving.

And yet, some small part of Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but wonder if his mother was onto something.

Unwilling to speak anymore, Jiang Fengmian stood up and walked out of the room. A moment later, Yu Ziyuan followed after, and the pair continued their argument outside.

“Jiang Fengmian, why are you leaving?!” she demanded. “You feel guilty? It’s a shame that the woman you loved chose another man! Whether you admit it or not, it’s true!”

Aside from Wen Chao’s continuing laughter, there was an unbreakable silence that transpired as the argument between the Jiangs passed through the wall. Based on what the others already knew (and what they had seen so far in the simulation), it was clear a confrontation like this had been building up for a while.

Such a serious matter deserved their respect.

Then, Wen Ruohan smirked.

“If he’s really so much trouble, why not lend Wei Wuxian off to someone else for a bit?” he suggested, knowing full-well that removing Wei Wuxian would not solve the problem. “Unlike the Lans, I can personally assure you that we won’t send Wei Wuxian back before the agreed upon time."

Or at all, went unsaid.

“That won’t be necessary,” Jiang Fengmian forced out, knowing his wife was too filled with rage to respond properly.

Outside, Madam Yu’s angered voice became louder and louder, and Jiang Fengmian argued back while trying to suppress his rage. Jiang Cheng stood still, blankly staring at the wall.

Then, he glanced at Wei Wuxian, and turned to leave.

Seeing the expression on his son's face, Jiang Fengmian took a step back. He had known for years that his relationship with Yu Ziyuan made a difficult environment for their kids to grow up in. A-Li became too much of a mother too young, and A-Cheng didn’t know how to deal with his emotions. But every time he tried to help Jiang Cheng grow into the Jiang Sect Leader, his wife and son took it only as disapproval and criticism.

‘But that was fine,’ he had told himself. He should just focus on getting through each day.

And yet, when he saw the expression on his son’s face, he couldn’t shake the feeling that he had made the wrong decision.

Wei Wuxian frowned, “Jiang Cheng!”

Jiang Cheng gave no answer, continuing to walk towards the door.

The real Jiang Cheng breathed a sigh of relief, grateful that the scene was almost over.

“Jiang Cheng!” Wei Wuxian continued, leaning forward as far as he could to grab Jiang Cheng’s sleeve. “Jiang Cheng!”

Wei Wuxian’s body trembled from the exertion.

Just like in the Xuanwu cave, Wei Wuxian was prioritizing Yu Ziyuan’s son over himself. When she made that realization, a burning hot anger even more frightening than the previous one surged through her body.

Every time Wei Wuxian did something like this, Madam Yu’s brain lied to her and whispered that she might have been wrong about him. She knew she wasn’t wrong and knew she wasn’t guilty, but Wei Wuxian was hurt because he distracted the Xuanwu so Jiang Cheng could escape and now she was ~~hurting her son~~ making him realize he needed to be stronger and Wei Wuxian was trying to help him and she couldn’t have been wrong and she knew she was right because if she was wrong then everything she was had done was for nothing and if it was all for nothing then what was she-

But she knew she wasn’t wrong; Wei Wuxian had done everything she said, and, as she predicted, would bring destruction to the Clan. It had been confirmed by the gossipers during the first segment.

Once the watchers saw what had caused the tavern guests to say those words, they would surely agree.

Coughing sporadically, Wei Wuxian glared, "Answer me if you've heard me! Are you looking for a fight?"

"Lie down properly!"

'Listen to him,' Wen Qing mentally hissed. She was absolutely certain that Wei Wuxian was going to be one of her most infuriating patients ever.

Proving her point completely, Wei Wuxian responded, "I can't do that! We need to set things straight!"

Jiang Cheng sighed, "Wei Wuxian-"

"Don't believe those stupid rumors!" he shouted.

"What rumors?" Jiang Cheng asked in faked-ignorance.

"Those things will dirty your mouth if you say them! Both of my parents are real people! I won't let anyone assign me to other Clans!"

Hearing that, Madam Yu and the two Jiang Chengs both froze.

Seeing that he had Jiang Cheng's attention, Wei Wuxian let go of his brother's sleeve.

"Let's be honest with each other. Uncle Jiang is always strict with you, but that's because you're his son, the future leader of the Jiang Clan! But I'm different. I'm someone else's son, so-"

"He's not strict with me," Jiang Cheng whispered. "He just doesn't like me."

"...What?" Jiang Fengmian whispered in shock, making Jiang Cheng flush and look away. His father's rapidly paling face went completely unnoticed.

(Jiang Fengmian had had suspicions for a while, but here was undeniable proof that his son thought he was unloved.

For a moment, Jiang Fengmian mind shut down.)

"What kind of person can't stand his own son? Of course he likes you!" Wei Wuxian insisted.

"It's true," Jiang Cheng shouted back. "He can't stand my mom, so he can't stand me either."

That was hard to refute. The entire cultivation world knew about their opposite personalities — one gentle, one harsh — and few interactions. The Meishan Yu sect had pressured the then-young Jiang Fengmian into the alliance, even after multiple refusals.

A little while after, Cangse Sanren got married to Wei Changze, and Jiang Fengmian finally gave up.

It was true that Jiang Cheng's looks and personality were far closer to his mother's, and Jiang Fengmian's continuous attempts to imbue the Jiang Sect values in him had proved fruitless.

'Because of that, Jiang Fengmian has always seemed like he doesn't favor Jiang Cheng,' Wei Wuxian thought.

"Seemed like he didn't?" Jiang Cheng repeated, too quietly for anyone else to hear. 'Why would you say it like that?!'

As the silence between the pair stretched longer and longer, the tension began to spill over.

"I know," Jiang Cheng whispered, gradually raising his voice. "I know that I don't have a personality he likes. I know I'm not the heir he wanted! He thinks I'm a coward, not good enough to be a leader, that I don't understand the principles of the Jiang Sect. He thinks I'm not worthy of my name!"

'At least he realized it,' Madam Yu thought. 'Maybe he'll finally become like his future-self, and stop allowing Wei Wuxian to hold him down.'

For some reason, that thought filled her with a whisper of something she had never experienced before.

(Something that felt a lot like guilt.)

"Yeah," Jiang Cheng laughed, then began to shout. "You and Lan Wangji killed the Xuanwu of Slaughter and bathed in its blood! How great is that? You fought bravely! You're heroes! But what about me? I've been running around for days, completely exhausted. Without a moment of rest!"

He punched the wall.

"Is this the beginning of the rift between those two?" Xichen asked, glancing between the brothers solemnly. The question made every Jiang flinch slightly and turn away.

No longer interested in continuing the conversation, Jiang Cheng began walking out, trying and failing to reign in his insecurities.

Jiang Yanli was sad to see her brother hurting so much, but knew this was a wound they couldn't heal. She could offer to help comfort Jiang Cheng, but the scab would just be torn open again the next day.

Nothing would actually fix this.

Then, a loud thump crashed down.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted in alarm, rushing over.

Jiang Cheng turned around, and saw Wei Wuxian trying to pull his sore body off the ground.

"What is he doing?!" Wen Qing couldn't resist screeching.

"Not good enough to be a leader?" Wei Wuxian repeated, straining as he pushed himself up. "Who says a leader must follow traditions? Among all the past leaders of the Jiang Clan, how many actually followed the motto?"

Jiang Cheng did a double take towards Wei Wuxian and froze, just as confused as his alternate-self.

"Just look at the Gusu Lan Clan! They have three-thousand rules, but they managed to produce outliers like Lan Yi! Who could deny her ability or position? When talking about famous Lan Clan leaders, who would dare to skip over her chord assassination technique?"

Finally, Wei Wuxian managed to get close enough to grab onto Jiang Cheng's shoulder.

"Jiang Cheng, listen up. When you become the leader, I'll be your subordinate. I'll follow your lead, just like my father followed your father," he declared, then smirked. "The Lan Clan has the Twin Jades of Lan; our Jiang Clan will have it's Two Prides of Yunmeng!"

Having recovered his breath, Wei Wuxian made his shaky smile turn cocky.

"If anyone dares to say you're not good enough, I'll beat them up myself!" he declared, then winced when he moved too quickly. All the while, Jiang Cheng's glistening eyes remained directed at Wei Wuxian, unable to look away.

Similarly, the real Jiang Cheng stood frozen, watching Wei Wuxian with eyes as wide as the moon.

Then, he laughed once.

"Look at the shape you're in. You'll be the one who gets beaten up."

Wei Wuxian grinned back. A pair of leaves floated by the windowsill, and then everything froze. They were getting another break to speak.

"...Wow. I didn't expect that."

There was another minute of silence.

Then, a nearly-deafening cheer from the Nie side.

"Yes, Wei-xiong! That was exactly what you needed to say!" Huaisang screeched. "Perfect! Ten-out-of-ten! Full stars! You did it! You almost couldn't have done better than that!"

Jin Zixuan laughed, “He’s quite good at improvised speeches, isn’t he?”

“A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli gasped out, her mouth slightly open in shock. Tears filled her eyes, but the smile on her face was equal parts disbelieving and ecstatic.

“That… he…” Jiang Cheng couldn’t finish his sentence — didn’t even know what he was trying to say. He turned and walked towards the frozen simulation of Wei Wuxian, staring into its eyes as if that would help him understand.

“What an exceptional brother,” Madam Jin observed.

But then….

“What could Wei Wuxian have done to destroy their friendship?” Jin Guangshan wondered aloud. Those words made Lan Wangji and Jiang Yanli want to snap back denials, but they couldn’t deny the flash-forward.

Wei Wuxian would do demonic cultivation; Wei Wuxian would betray the Jiang Sect; Wei Wuxian would kill Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan. Wei Wuxian would become something so awful that Jiang Cheng spent the 13 years after his death trying to hunt him down.

What on Earth had turned Wei Wuxian into such a despicable monster?

On the other hand, some watchers felt the answer was obvious.

‘Of course their relationship fell apart,’ Wen Ruohan thought. ‘That promise was the culmination of years and years of conditioning at the hands of the Jiangs. I may expect the same of Wen Zhuliu, but I also treat him with enough respect to ensure his promise is kept. Wei Wuxian has far more options than Wen Zhuliu does, and is constantly blamed for things that aren’t his fault. With the way things are now, it’s inevitable that Wei Wuxian will eventually break under the pressure. He’ll kill Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan, and he’ll betray Lotus Pier in a way that ends their friendship forever.’

He couldn’t wait to see it.

“I’m sure we’ll see the cause,” he decided.

Disliking the flippant tone Wen Ruohan used, Jiang Cheng was about to respond, when his father spoke up instead.

“A-Cheng, A-Li, can we talk?” he asked.

As soon as the words registered, Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen ushered the members of their Sects out of the way. A moment later, Jin Zixuan and Madam Jin glared Jin Guangshan into submission, and they left as well.

Finally, deciding that this wasn’t worth starting an argument over, Wen Ruohan directed the Wens away. In such a small space, leaving would only serve to create the illusion of privacy.

But if that was what the Jiangs wanted, then he had no reason to object.

The two children joined their waiting parents.

“What is it, A-Die?”

“I’d like to… speak with all of you about something.”

“What?” Madam Yu demanded. “You want to brag?”

Startled, Jiang Fengmian didn’t know how to respond to that.

“San-niang-”

“If you care so much about getting me to admit I was wrong, then fine. You win,” she glared. “That doesn’t excuse anything you’ve done to the two of them. If anything, it makes it worse, so don’t expect any apologies from me!”

No one in her family had any idea what she was talking about.

“I think you’re misunderstanding-”

“Like I always am?”

“San-niang!”

“Fine! Wei Wuxian’s isn’t your son!” she snapped. “I subconsciously knew that all along! Are you happy now? You win; we all know you were right! I was an idiot for believing it, and I’m the main reason so many people know about those rumors. What else do you want me to say? I have-”

“San-nian, I never betrayed you-”

“I know! Did you listen to a word I just said?”

“I did, I just…” he took a deep breath. “I… that isn’t what I wanted to talk about.”

“What?” Madam Yu hissed. “I’m not interested in hearing you weave together a poetic appreciation of that son of a… of that boy’s actions. God knows the simulation does more than enough of that-”

“I’m not trying to say that. If you would just listen-”

“Oh, of course, so it’s my fault again.”

“A-Niang!” Jiang Yanli yelled, her voice surprising even herself. When her parents and brother turned their eyes on her, she almost shrank back and apologized for speaking.

Jiang Yanli had long-since learned that the easiest way to live in Lotus Pier was to maintain the status quo. She had become an expert at redirecting her family’s attention somewhere else or dealing with the aftermath. Trying to argue back would just make the situation worse for everyone.

And yet, in the back of her mind, she heard a certain, well-placed attack on repeat.

Wen Ruohan looked down at the brand marring Wei Wuxian's chest and smirked, 'I'm sure this must have seemed right at home for him, considering what life at lotus pier is like.'

Some part of her understood that the Chief Cultivator had his own reasons for saying so, but the other parts of her wondered if he was right regardless. She often tried to calm her mother down or alert her Father so that he could help Wei Wuxian, but that was dealing with the symptom — she never tried to tackle the cause.

And for years that had been fine.

If she didn't say something now, then everything would probably revert to normal when they got out. For years, that had been fine (anything that wasn't worse was good). But now?

"A-Jie?" Jiang Cheng asked.

Straightening herself up, Jiang Yanli looked them all in the eyes and said, "Please, can we… can we talk about this? We… have a lot of things we need to say, I think."

Madam Yu glared and reached forward to pinch her cheek, but her hand phased through and her efforts were meaningless. In a way, the no-touch feature of the simulation was exactly what they needed to have this conversation.

Stuck in a place with no way to hurt each other and nowhere to run; if they didn't speak now, when would they? After thinking it over for a moment, Jiang Fengmian began.

"San-niang, I never betrayed you, but… I see why you might have thought that."

He coughed once, then turned to his children.

"I was… neglectful. I hurt you, and I always-I never intervened. Never corrected your assumption."

"A-Die, I wasn't trying to-"

"I know, but… if I've genuinely allowed you two to think that I don't love you, then I've failed in my role as a parent. A-Xian is… similar to Cangse Sanren and Wei Changze. We value the same things, and operate under similar mindsets. I've always found it easy to speak to him. But if I've allowed you to doubt yourselves because of that, then I've failed you as your father."

"A-Die," Jiang Yanli smiled, then shook her head. "You've done fine. We just-"

"A-Li," Jiang Fengmian paused, taking a moment to gather himself and turning towards her with gentle eyes. "The reason the other-me undid your engagement was because I was worried about what the future would hold for you if you and Young Master Jin were forced into a relationship. I could have asked you first, but I made the decision on my own. You've had to accept things like this and grow up… faster than you should have because of me. For that, I'm sorry."

Jiang Yanli stepped back, shock clear on her face.

“I never did any of that because I didn’t love you,” Jiang Fengmian declared.

She nodded, a warm smile spread across her face. She had already known all that — her mother had made the engagement without asking her as well, so her father breaking it was hardly uncalled for — but hearing hearing his reasons spoken aloud filled her with so much warmth that, for a second, she couldn’t breathe.

“...A-Cheng,” Jiang Fengmian began, swallowing again before turing to face his son completely. “You are my heir, and you are my only heir. I have never wanted anyone but you. I’ve tried to guide you towards what I felt were the principles of the Jiang Sect, but I have never once thought that you didn’t deserve to be the Jiang Sect’s Leader. Wei Wuxian was right: there have been many leaders, with many specialties. I was… wrong to make you doubt yourself, and not fix it when you started to. I wanted to help teach you, but I never wanted my heir to be anyone but you.”

Jiang Cheng looked away, unable to face such genuine words from his father.

“I love you both,” Jiang Fengmian concluded.

Jiang Cheng’s eyes widened at the proclamation, then closed as he felt the words begin to sink in. Before he could stop them, tears started rolling down his cheeks. He flushed further and hurriedly wiped them, but no matter how hard he tried, new ones kept forming.

A weight he hadn’t even known was there suddenly lifted off his shoulders.

“But… but Wei Wuxian-”

“I do love A-Xian. But my love for him has never been more than my love for the two of you.”

Rather than acceptance, Madam Yu’s response to this was a spiteful laugh.

“Are you truly so desperate to win against me?”

“San-niang?”

“I know, alright!” she shouted. “I know half the things I said about him were wrong! The simulation couldn’t have made that any more clear! Fine!”

“That isn’t what-”

“I get it! Your precious, perfect head disciple was right once again. He knew you loved A-Cheng, and he knew he was right to step up against the Wens because he always knows everything, doesn’t he?”

Concerned Jiang Fengmian stepped forward, and began, “San-Niang, I was only trying to say-”

“That Wei Wuxian is perfect beyond compare?” she demanded, raising her voice until she drowned out JIang Fengmian’s. “Just like his oh-so-perfect mother, isn’t he? Ah, yes, I can see why you get along with him! You must have found my shouting amusing! How many times did you laugh behind my back at the hysterical cries of the delusional Madam of Lotus Pier?!”

“Never. I wasn’t trying to imply anything.”

“But you thought it, didn’t you?” she laughed. “Ah, yes. Poor, poor Wei Wuxian; stuck in a household with me as if he’s just a victim and I’m wrong about him. Don’t pretend I’m not right! Regardless of this, he’s still a reckless, insubordinate, arrogant-”

“A-Xian has nothing to do with this,” Jiang Fengmian countered sternly.

His comment only infuriated Madam Yu further.

(The traces of doubt creeping into her mind had doubled her defensiveness. She wouldn’t admit to being in the wrong no matter what. Not to Jiang Fengmian, and certainly not before the audience gathered around them.)

Then, Jiang Fengmian continued, “San-niang, I… if you’re angry at me, then be angry at me. It’s not A-Xian’s fault-”

“Will that excuse still work when he becomes the Yiling Patriarch? I’m sure you’ll still pity him when he abandons the Jiang Sect and causes its near-destruction! How many excuses will you make for A-Li’s murderer?”

There was nothing Jiang Fengmian could say to that.

Similarly, Jiang Cheng was struck silent by the reminder. With everything that had been going on, he had almost forgotten about the Yiling Patriarch. It seemed like everything was starting to go well in the simulation! Wei Wuxian had even promised to stay with him forever!

...No, he had promised to follow him, “just like” Wei Changze had followed Jiang Fengmian.

But didn’t that mean that he would help the Jiang Sect in the beginning, and then leave? It seemed like it would end up being for power instead of love, but that didn’t make the abandonment any less true.

“We’ll-we’ll just need to convince him!” Jiang Cheng declared, cutting his mother’s next rant off. “We just have to show him that we want him to stay, and he will! I’m sure of it!”

(Despite having moved farther away, the enclosed space of the simulation didn’t offer much privacy. When Jiang Cheng shouted his suggestion, several people frowned at it, and became lost in their own thoughts.)

When every member of her family sent her an uneasy glance, Yu Ziyuan nearly hissed at them. Normally, she would be furious at the suggestion Jiang Cheng had made. Why would they try to convince Wei Wuxian to stay? They were better off without him! Why were they looking at her like she was wrong about that?

And yet, over the course of the simulation, that belief had been tested time and time again. Were her children really worse-off because of his presence?

(Should she say something about that?)

But she couldn't. Yu Ziyuan was the Madam of the Jiang Sect; she didn't apologize to anyone. Such weakness and regret was against everything she had ever known.

So why was she still feeling this way? Some small, insignificant, easily-locked-away part of her wanted to apologize. She wasn't entirely sure to who or about what, but the feeling was there and she hated it.

"We don't need him" she declared.

"But-"

In the hallways of Lotus Pier, Wei Wuxian danced in and out of distance, play-fighting with Jiang Cheng as they walked down the hallway.

"W-wait, but we weren't done!" Jiang Cheng protested. Unfortunately, the watchers were helpless when it came to interfering with the simulation. They had no choice but to return to their seats and save the conversation for the next break.

Despite the energy he put into it, it was clear that Wei Wuxian was moving much slower than usual. Even without the bandages wrapped around his chest, his heavy injuries would be obvious.

As his children slid next to their new friends, Jiang Fengmian reluctantly moved back to his seat. When he got there, Lan Qiren gave him a single, respectful nod.

Jiang Fengmian was certainly a much, much better father than Qingheng-jun.

When Jiang Cheng landed a hit to Wei Wuxian's chest, the head disciple laughed and shouted, "Jiang Cheng! Come to your death!"

"He's much slower than usual," Nie Mingjue observed.

"Even that much movement is idiotic to do!" Wen Qing fiercely reprimanded. "He just woke up after a two-day coma! I don't care how strong his core is, he should stay in bed!"

Rolling his eyes, Jiang Cheng ducked a strike a shouted, "If that hurts you so much, why did you play the hero back then? Serves you right. This'll teach you better!"

At the reminder of Jiang Fengmian's earlier comment, the jealousy on Madam Jin's face flickered into rage.

Yes, Yu Ziyuan and Jiang Fengmian had personalities that clashed with each other. However, there was a big difference between that and her own married life. Jin Guangshan cared for Jin Zixuan somewhat (for his own legacy, if nothing else), but he most certainly didn't care enough to remain loyal.

And, on top of all that, Madam Jin hadn't forgotten the way her friend and Jiang Cheng continued to imply that saving her son's life was a bad thing.

Humming once at Jiang Cheng's complaint, Wei Wuxian asked, "Was I playing the hero? It's not like it was a conscious choice — I was moving faster than I could think! Stop running, I'll let you off this once. I need to ask you something! I had a perfume sachet somewhere around my waist. It was empty, did you see it?"

"The one MianMian gave you? I didn't."

Here, Huaisang hummed in consideration. Considering the previously-established trends, it seemed highly likely that the missing perfume sachet would become relevant later.

But how could an empty sack be important?

Wei Wuxian sighed regretfully, "I'll find another one later."

"You're at it again," Jiang Cheng observed, frowning. "You don't really like her, do you?"

'Please say no. Please say no. Please say no.' Lan Wangji thought.

"That girl does look fine, but it's obvious she doesn't have much background," Jiang Cheng continued. "She might not even be a disciple. She seems like the daughter of a servant."

Jin Zixuan frowned slightly and glanced at Jiang Yanli. If she also thought he was wrong to step in due to Luo Qingyang's low status, things might become a little awkward between them.

Luckily, when she noticed his gaze, Yanli instead smiled encouragingly at him, showing her full support.

"I guess, but what's wrong with servants?" Wei Wuxian asked. "I'm also the son of a servant, aren't I?"

And now Wen Ruohan had to cross "tempt him by offering to raise his status to an official member of the Wen Clan like Wen Zhuliu" off his list of ideas.

"How can you compare to her? What kind of servant is like you, having your master peel lotus seeds for you and boil your soup? I didn't even get to have some!"

"If you want some, just ask Shijie to cook you more! Right, we were talking about Lan Zhan! Did Lan Zhan leave a message for me? Has his brother been found?"

“Lan Xichen went into hiding with the ancient books and music sheets they’d rescued.”

“What about his father?”

“...He’s passed away.”

Like they’d been slapped, every member of the four (surviving) great sects flinched back.

“Passed away?” Wei Wuxian asked, his eyes going wide. To his right, a memory of Lan Wangji faded into existence — his expression as they discussed his father’s fate.

Wei Wuxian glanced down solemnly.

This was even more drastic than what had happened to the former Sect Leader Nie. That had been a quiet murder with plausible deniability; this was an open attack that no one could deny.

The Sunshot Campaign was imminent.

Looking at it from the outside made Jiang Fengmian briefly wonder why there was no word of him doing anything to prepare. Then, he understood.

It was easy to ask that from the outside when a glimpse at the future had already proven his coming death and the Sunshot Campaign’s beginning. To the him inside the simulation, trying to avoid Wen Ruohan’s attention probably seemed like the smartest thing to do.

That was what every clan had been doing for years, after all.

He sighed, an icy-cold dread washing over him.

“How’s Lan Zhan doing?!” Wei Wuxian demanded. “You said he went back?”

Lan Xichen smiled, finding the consistent concern sweet.

Jiang Cheng nodded once, “A-Die originally wanted to ask people to take him back to Gusu, but he refused. Judging by how he acted, he knows he should’ve known since long ago that this day would come. After all, with the situation at hand, no sect is any better than any other.”

Indeed; it was quite likely that another sect would be attacked soon. The Nie and Lans had already been targeted, so the Jiangs were probably next.

(Especially given Jin Guangshan’s continued friendship with Wen Ruohan.)

“How disgusting,” Wei Wuxian cursed.

“Yes, the Wen Sect is really too disgusting.”

Wen Qing clenched her fists, forcing herself to stay as still as possible.

“For how long are we going to jump around like this?! We’ve got so many sects, can’t we join together and-”

“Da-shixiong!” a voice yelled, and a series of footsteps approached. A group of boys wearing training clothes leapt across the hallways like monkeys, shouting at him.

‘Do not think about raising children with Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji reminded himself. ‘Do not think about raising children with Wei Ying. Do not think about raising children with Wei Ying. Do not think about raising children with Wei Ying.’

“Shixiong! You’re alive now!”

“What do you mean, ‘I’m alive now?’ I never died to begin with!”

“Not yet,” Jin Guangshan reminded with a chuckle, finding the dark irony of the statement amusing.

“Shixiong, I heard that you killed a beast over four hundred years old! Is that true? You really killed it?”

“Compared to that, what I really want to know is, Shixiong, did you really go without food for seven days?!”

“Have you secretly practiced inedia behind our backs?”

“Just how big was the Xuanwu of Slaughter? Would it really fit inside Lotus Lake?”

“The Xuanwu of slaughter was just a tortoise, right?”

“Shixiong, you spent an entire seven days with Lan Wangji from Gusu, right? How did you avoid getting beaten to death by him?!”

Hearing the unending stream of question, Nie Mingjue started laughing out loud.

“They love him!” he saw, feeling a flash of nostalgia. Thanks to Huaisang, nearly every younger member of his clan had called him “Da-ge” at some point or another; it seemed Wei Wuxian had a similar relationship with his shidis.

“Do they always do this?” Xichen asked.

Jiang Yanli nodded, “Some days, he has dozens of hero-worshiping ducklings trailing behind him. A pair of siblings named A-Lu and A-Yue are usually at the front of the pack, but they all adore him.”

Lan Xichen laughed at the description, and even Wen Qing gained a small smile.

The scene then faded away, and the Nightless City took its place.

Wen Chao fell to his knees, bowing lowly.

“Chao-er, do you realize what mistake you made back on Muxi Mountain?”

“Was the mistake letting us survive?” Jin Zixuan grumbled. The heirs were not yet angry enough to shout at the Chief Cultivator directly.

Clearly, that wouldn’t last long.

“I… don’t know,” Wen Chao responded, keeping his gaze lowered. “Please enlighten me.”

“You should’ve killed them all.”

Simultaneous growels escaped Madam Yu and Madam Jin at those words.

“No need to worry,” Wen Ruohan laughed. “It was foolish of my other-self to not consider the value some of those disciples had. I won’t make the same mistake.”

‘In other words,’ Wen Qing thought, ‘he’ll make sure Wei Wuxian is on our side before making any moves against them.’

“All clans have to obey us, and not dare to challenge our authority. If we go easy on them, people with ulterior motives will initiate attacks against us.”

“F-father, what should I do now?”

“To ensure a long-term reign, your subjects must respect your power. They must worship you, and be monitored by you. It’s not easy to scare people into obedience, but they’ll feel pressure when they’re put under watch.”

“Are you saying… we should spy on them?”

“Exactly.”

The mere suggestion made Lan Wangji frown in disapproval.

“Those who comply can be used by us.”

“And those who don’t?”

“Kill them all.”

Nie Mingjue gave a short, huffed laugh at the order, and no one else moved. They all could only mock their own foolishness. Given the orders, they could assume that — even after the Xuanwu cave — the other sects weren’t planning on fight back. Their enemy was preparing to kill them, while they sat like limp pheasants waiting to be hunted down. The only one who might be preparing was Nie Mingjue, and he had hated the Wen Sect even before all of this.

Jin Guangshan tilted his head thoughtfully. Given Wen Ruohan’s order, it seemed almost inevitable that the Jiang Clan would be the next one attacked.

Jiang Fengmian clenched his fists, realizing the same.

The world brightened again, returning to Lotus Pier.

Lan Sizhui's voice narrated, "Once medicine was applied to the brand mark and his other injuries, Wei Wuxian's fever began to die down. Thanks to his powerful golden core, he was lively again after just a few days of rest. Due to the excitement and chaos caused by the Xuanwu of Slaughter, all the disciples — including Nie Huaisang — returned to their sects."

Nie Mingjue breathed out a sigh of relief.

(Though part of him knew the only reason Huaisang had been returned was because the Wens knew the other sects wouldn't fight back quite yet.)

"...Say, what 'brand mark' do you think that's referring to?" Jin Ling whispered as quietly as he could.

Still far from quietly enough.

"Ooh, ooh, maybe Senior Wei got injured while saving Hanguang-jun!" Ouyang Zizhen excitedly suggested, raising his voice above a whisper.

The watchers' view changed to show a group of Yunmeng disciples practicing shooting kites. The sky was getting darker, and it was clear that the sun would be setting soon.

"Don't be silly, how could anything possibly hurt Hanguang-jun! I bet Senior Wei was just being careless and got himself hurt during one of his experiments," Jingyi declared.

Once he recalled who 'Hanguang-jun' was, Lan Wangji wasn't sure whether to be more concerned over the hero worship or the fact that they were sure Wei Ying would get hurt protecting him.

"Well, this is right before the Sunshot Campaign, right? Maybe something happened," Sizhui suggested.

"The Sunshot Campaign hasn't started yet, right?" Jin Ling objected. "How bad could it be?"

Sighing, Lan Qiren grumbled, "How old are they to still be so ignorant about war?"

"Perhaps that's a good thing," Lan XIchen responded. "It means our older-selves aren't worried about a coming conflict, and can allow the children to stay ignorant."

"I just don't get it," Zizhen decided. "If the spirits want us to put the proper amount of emotion into what we read, shouldn't they tell us what the lines refer to?"

"We learned about the Xuanwu in class a few years ago."

“I bet their class was nowhere near as fun as the 'lesson' we got,” Nie Huaisang giggled, remembering Lan Qiren’s classes. The light-hearted comment momentarily helped distract the watchers from the imminent conflict.

“I mean, we vaguely learned about it, but I still feel like I’m listening to a story while only hearing every other word! I didn’t realize narration was such a boring job!”

“...Would you like to read the next line?”

“Yes please!” Zizhen shouted, and there was the sound of rustling papers as Sizhui passed off a scroll with lines given to them by the spirits through inquiry. “Okay, so ‘All the disciples returned to their sects-’”

“Sizhui already said that, idiot!” Jin Ling hissed.

Jiang Yanli couldn’t resist laughing at the interjection, and Jin Zixuan rolled his eyes.

“All the disciples returned to their sects,” Zizhen repeated pettily. “And Wen Chao didn’t immediately follow up on what happened in the cave either.”

Jiang Fengmian frowned, worried that the pause in aggression would cause his other-self to become careless.

“Taking the opportunity, Madam Yu gave Wei Wuxian a harsh talking-to and ordered him to not take one step out of the gates of Lotus Pier, not even to play in the lake.”

The strange feeling buried deep inside Madam Yu was not guilt. She wouldn’t allow it to be.

“Thus, he could only shoot kites with the Jiang disciples, day after day after day.”

‘A true waste of his talents,’ Wen Ruohan frowned. ‘If he was part of the Wen Sect, he would be utilized properly.’

“No matter how much fun a game was, playing it every day would eventually become tedious. And so, about half a month later, the boys’ interest dwindled. Wei Wuxian wasn’t motivated either; he shot carelessly, and even let Jiang Cheng win a couple of times.”

The implications of “let” sent its usual sting through Jiang Cheng’s body, but, to his surprise, it was far less potent than he expected. He glanced at his father, and saw the man looking back at him without judgement. Instead, there was just concern.

He was checking to be sure Jiang Cheng knew he was still his son, regardless of whether Wei Wuxian was a better archer.

A warm, comforting feeling coated the stinging jealousy like a soothing balm.

“One day, after the last round had been shot down, Wei Wuxian wanted to be done.”

As Zizhen had explained, the simulation showed Wei Wuxian using his right hand to shade his eyes. He looked into the sunset silently. After a moment of thought, he sighed.

"Let's wrap things up and stop playing this. Food's waiting at home."

"So early today?"

Wei Wuxian tossed his bow to the side, disappointed.

"It's boring, let's stop. Who was the second-last in the round we just did? Go get the flags with sixth shidi."

At the bored defeat in Wei Wuxian's eyes, even the casual reminder of sixth shidi's archery skills couldn't bring a smile to their faces. Things were clearly reaching the very edge of what could be tolerated.

And, given Wen Ruohan's orders, a lack of conflict was far from peace.

"Shixiong, you're so tricky. You make others get them every time! That's shameless!"

"It's not like I have a choice. Madam Yu doesn't let me go outside."

'I would take you wherever you wanted to go,' Lan Wangji thought before he could stop himself.

"She's at home right now, but Jinzhu and Yinzhu might be watching from some corner, ready to turn me around wherever necessary," Wei Wuxian continued. "If I go out, Madam Yu's going to whip a whole layer of skin off me."

The judgmental looks sent Yu Ziyuan's way only made the feeling in her chest that much harder to ignore.

As his shidi began to tease each other, Wei Wuxian leaned back and asked, "Uncle Jiang went out so early in the morning — why hasn't he come back yet? Will he make it in time for dinner?"

"Why am I not there?" the tense Jiang Fengmian couldn't resist asking.

Wei Wuxian mentally explained, 'This morning, Uncle Jiang and Madam Yu had an argument again.'

The pair flinched, remembering the one they had just had.

Footsteps quickly transversed the pier as Jiang Fengmian left.

"Jiang Fengmian? Where are you going?" Madam Yu demanded. "Stop right there!"

When her children looked down at the ground, ashamed, Madam Yu felt the hole in her chest suck all her other thoughts into it until it couldn't be ignored.

(But she didn't regret anything. She didn't feel guilty.)

'No, it wasn't even an argument,' Wei Wuxian's thoughts amended. 'Madam Yu lost her temper, while some of Uncle Jiang's remained throughout the exchange.'

A flush began to creep its way onto Madam Yu's face, but she pushed it down through sheer force of will.

"You can't run from me forever," Madam Yu continued. "Fine, then. Don't come back once you leave."

Jiang Fengmian breathed out through his nose and forcefully calmed himself down before answering, "San-niang, I'm going to the Wen Sect again. I'd like to ask them to return the boys' swords."

"And you really think that will lead to anything?!" Madam Yu demanded.

Jiang Fengmian didn't answer, walking off.

With the apology they had just seen take place, it was clear to the watchers that the source of Madam Yu's insecurities — her belief that Jiang Fengmian didn't care about Jiang Cheng — was unfounded. A Sect Leader had apologized to his teenage heir, so they knew that to be true.

With that knowledge, the fact that the pair continued to argue couldn't be seen as anything but tragic.

The viewers were moved back, until they were able to see Wei Wuxian, Jiang Cheng and a few other disciples watching the argument from behind a large pillar.

Seeing the expressions on the pair's faces, the adults looked away. Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian had abstractly known that their constant disagreements impacted their children, but it was another thing to have the evidence of that thrown in their faces.

Sighing slightly, Wei Wuxian asked, "Why are they fighting again?"

"Not sure," another disciple answered. "But I heard someone say that one of Jiang-furen's hairpins was broken. She's really angry this time. Do you think she'll take it out on us?"

One of the other disciples flinched at the question.

'Based on what we've seen, it seems more likely that she'll take it out on Wei Wuxian,' Lan Xichen thought, struggling to keep a neutral face. Over the course of the simulation (and seeing the many reactions Wangji had), Lan Xichen had grown fond of Yunmeng Jiang's head disciple.

Perhaps, when they got out, he and Wangji could try to get to know him.

The sun's position changed, and the watchers were moved to several hours later.

On a boat, accompanied by many of his older disciples, Jiang Fengmian frowned and looked down at the hairpin in his hand. It was the broken one mentioned earlier, which he had given to Madam Yu shortly after dissolving Jiang Yanli's engagement.

Once again, Madam Jin couldn't stop the bright flare of jealousy that occurred within her. It was true that Jiang Fengmian probably didn't love Yu Ziyuan as much as she wished he did, but it was also undeniable that he respected her. She wasn't forced to manage Lotus Pier as most Madams would be — instead spending her time night hunting — and he never slept with other women, regardless of what happened between them.

How was that fair?

After several long seconds of gazing solemnly at it, Jiang Fengmian put the pin away and ordered, "Let's go."

"Yes, Sect Leader," the disciple behind him agreed with a low bow.

The boat began to move.

Back on the archery hill, Jiang Cheng shook those memories out of his head and explained "He's at the Wen Sect for our swords again, isn't he? Whenever I think of my Sandu being held in the hands of a Wen-dog, I…."

He sighed, unable to ignore the depressing reality of the situation. Around them, the sky turned a bloody red — lit on fire by the setting sun.

These past few segments, Wen Qing had often been given support by Jiang Yanli, one overprotective older sister to another. Now, glanced over, wondering if she should return the favor.

But Jiang Yanli refused to make eye contact with her, always making her gaze skirt around Wen Qing whenever her eyes drifted over.

('Of course she won't look,' Wen Qing thought, laughing at her own foolishness. 'That's why A-Ning gets killed; it doesn't matter what I've personally done so long as I'm a Wen.')

After a moment, Wei Wuxian added, "It's a shame that our swords don't have much spiritual energy yet. If they could sheath themselves, then nobody would be able to use them."

"If you cultivate for another eighty years, then maybe it'd be possible," Jiang Cheng teased.

"Even then it'd be unlikely," Lan Qiren reminded. There was no point in focusing any attention on something that was that improbable; the kind of loyalty that would require was astronomical.

Just as Wei Wuxian was about to respond, he noticed a boy rushing towards them frantically.

“Something’s happened!” he shouted, making Wei Wuxian frown and jump up. “Da-shixiong, Da-shixiong! Something’s happened!”

Wei Wuxian stood up and hurried over to them. He was the shidi Wei Wuxian had sent off to find the kites.

Jiang Yanli swallowed nervously.

“What’s wrong?”

“Where’s the youngest one?” Jiang Cheng asked. “Why is there one missing?”

“He was taken away!”

“Taken away?!”

“Who dares?” Madam Yu hissed, protective instincts rising up. Although she was still somewhat angry at her friend, Madam Jin decided to stand by her for this.

Wei Wuxian picked up his bow and kneeled next to them to ask, “Who took him? Why was he taken away?!”

“We don’t know! We don’t know why they took him!”

Jiang Cheng stood up instantly.

Nie Huaisang began biting his lip nervously, but, this time, refused to hide inside his Da-ge. The Wens may be terrifying, but he knew this was something that he needed to see.

Jiang Cheng frantically demanded, “What do you mean you don’t know?!”

“Calm down,” Wei Wuxian ordered. “Tell us clearly.”

Despite his best efforts, Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but notice how his reaction paralleled his mom’s, while Wei Wuxian’s paralleled his dad’s. However, even louder than that observation, something else rang in his mind.

’Who says a leader must follow traditions? Among all the past leaders of the Jiang Clan, how many actually followed the motto?’

His father didn’t mind that he was different. His mother wasn’t bothering to raise a complaint about it either.

With that in mind, it seemed a little silly to get jealous over something neither he nor Wei Wuxian could control.

Once Wei Wuxian managed to calm the boy down enough for him to be understandable, the kid explained, “When-when we were getting the kites, the kite went all the way over there, really far away! When we went over, we saw a few dozen people, all from the Wen Sect — wearing their uniform.”

Jiang Fengmian's blood turned to ice.

"What are you planning?" Lan Qiren demanded, causing Wen Ruohan to raise an eyebrow in amusement.

"It isn't my plan; I have no way of knowing."

But Jiang Fengmian hadn't even heard the exchange. All he could hear was his own thoughts.

His simulation-self wasn't there. Shortly after he went to visit the Wens, they had sent a group to Yunmeng and even captured his youngest disciple. The chances of this being a mere coincidence seemed obsolete.

He sat down, dreading the coming events.

Finally, the disciple recovered enough to wipe away his tears and continue, "There were disciples and servants. The one leading them was a young woman. She was holding a kite in her hand and there was an arrow on the kite. She asked whose kite it was when she saw us."

Another boy continued, "The kite was our youngest shidi's, so we said it was. The woman suddenly got angry and shouted 'how dare you!' and then told her people to take him away!"

"Just like that?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Madam Yu growled at the unknown woman's audacity, still tense from the argument she'd just had with her husband.

The boy nodded, "We asked her why they were taking him away, and the woman kept saying that he committed treason and had hidden motives, and she ordered her people to detain him!"

How many times had the great sects looked the other way when the Wen Sect wiped out a minor one after flinging empty accusations of treason. Even Nie MIngjue, the one who objected to them most often, was usually talked down from truly fighting against the Wen Sect.

Karma was coming their way.

"We-we couldn't do anything to stop them, so we ran back," the boys finished.

Jiang Cheng cursed, "They don't even have a reason for taking him away! Just what does the Wen Sect want to do?!"

"Yeah, there's just no reason!" another person shouted, Jiang Cheng's anger spreading through them.

"Be quiet," Wei Wuxian ordered, silencing his shidi instantly. "The Wen Sect's people could be knocking at our doors any second from now. Don't let them hear us say anything that could be used against us."

"Hm. So he knows when he really needs to keep quiet," Lan Qiren muttered to himself. The tone, however, was accepting rather than surprised. He had long since figured out that the perceived level of disobedience Wei Wuxian had was far more carefully calculated than it appeared.

(Breaks rules in the Cloud Recesses and speaks casually to Jiang Fengmian, but accepts almost all of Madam Yu's insults without complaint. There was far more to him than just a troublemaker.)

After a moment of intense thought, Wei Wuxian ordered, "Let me ask you, the woman, was she not wearing a sword? Does she look kind of pretty, with a mole above her lips?"

"Yes, that's her!"

"Oh, no-"

"JiaoJiao!" Wen Chao exclaimed with unhidden delight, ecstatic at the mention of his mistress.

"Wang Lingjiao!" Jiang Cheng spoke. "That-"

"What's this noise?" Madam Yu's voice called out. "Can't I have just one day of peace and quiet?"

She marched forward, her flowing violet robes streaming around her.

Seeing her, Jiang Cheng relaxed and explained, "A-Niang, people from the Wen Sect are here. Our youngest shidi was taken by them!"

Wen Chao smirked at the exclamation.

(Every time Madam Yu appeared, the Wen Sect getting Wei Wuxian seemed more and more likely.)

"You were all shouting so loudly that I heard everything even when I was indoors," Madam Yu responded. "And so what? He was taken away, not killed. There's no reason for you to be so worked up. Will you behave this way when you're a sect leader? Calm down!"

Blushing slightly, Jiang Cheng acknowledged his mother's point. Regardless of Wen Ruohan's order, it would be best for him to keep his cool.

Nevertheless, sweat began to gather in his clenched fists.

Then, Madam Yu glanced toward the hall, and her glare deepened.

'Be careful, San-niang,' Jiang Fengmian mentally requested, knowing that actually saying it would just spark another argument. Although Jiang Yanli understood why he couldn't say anything, she was a little sad that even after pouring his heart out to his children, Jiang Fengmian couldn't talk to his wife.

(Unfortunately, it takes more than a day to change something like that.)

When the world began to change, the first thing they heard were the rhythmic, impatient taps of a fingernail against a table. Its source was soon revealed: Wang Lingjiao had been invited inside.

Hissing, Madam Yu glared down at the woman. If Wang Lingjiao truly thought she could simply waltz inside like she was the Master of Lotus Pier, she would be disappointed.

An annoyed expression plastered itself onto the mistress' face as she glanced left and right, expectant. FInally, she slapped her hand against the table.

"The tea?" she demanded.

Wen Chao took great delight in the expressions painting the Jiangs' faces at his mistress' audacity.

"No tea. Get it yourself," Jinzhu responded indifferently.

Madam Yu nodded once in approval, while Jiang Yanli glanced nervously from side to side. There was a rapidly building tension in the simulated room that could be felt even by the watchers.

"What use are the YunmengJiang servants then?" Wang Lingjiao asked.

"The servants here have more important things to do. Things as simple as serving tea are not our job."

Nie Huaisang snorted at the comment, making Wen Chao snarl at him.

Scowling at the disrespect, Wang Lingjiao humphed, "This is outrageous!"

Eager to widen the gap between Wei Wuxian and the Jiangs, Wen Chao looked around and laughed, "Well, i suppose the servants don't need to do something like that if the Mistress of the house does it for them!"

"How dare you-"

"I'd rather be a loving sister than a cowardly son," Jin Zixuan shouted back.

"I'm here under the order of Wen-er-gongzi! Do you know who you're dealing with right now?"

But no one paid any attention to Wang Lingjiao's threats. Instead, everyone's relieved eyes turned toward the door. They bowed as Madam Yu entered.

Even then, Wang Lingjiao offered only the slightest acknowledgement.

Standing next to her friend again, Madam Jin also glared down. She might be mad at Yu Ziyuan, but if that mistress thought she could hold herself higher than them, she would have another thing coming.

“Madam Yu, I’m back.”

Madam Yu remained expressionless, as though she felt showing any emotion to Wang Lingjiao would dirty her. Shortly after she entered the room, Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian followed behind her.

The boys entered simultaneously, their purple and black robes flowing elegantly around them. They were a unit; a team.

A single thought — completely unrelated to the current situation — struck Jiang Cheng. He had stepped through first, and Wei Wuxian had followed behind him. Now, they stared down at Wang Lingjiao in unison, presenting a united front.

Was this what they could have looked like? Was this who they would have been, if Wei Wuxian hadn’t fallen to demonic cultivation and betrayed the Jiang Sect? Was this what they’d look like if it all went well?

Clenching his fists tighter, he swore to himself that he wouldn’t let this future be taken from them.

Seeing that her disrespectful greeting had been ignored, Wang Lingjiao began.

“Madam Yu, your Jiang Sect is outrageous! Even maids dare speak back to guests. Servants like this would get slapped in the Wen Sect.”

Hearing that, Wei Wuxian lifted an eyebrow, ‘You say that, but you’re a servant as well, aren’t you?’

Most of the teenagers snorted, and even Lan Wangji couldn’t resist rolling his eyes slightly. Wei Wuxian’s speech towards Jiang Cheng proved he wasn’t ashamed of his Father’s former position, but the comment was still ridiculously appropriate.

“Jinzhu and Yinzhu aren’t common servants. They’ve been staying with me since I was young,” Madam Yu responded without hesitation. “They have never served anyone but me, and no one has the authority to slap them. They wouldn’t dare to.”

‘And yet you constantly whip a favored ‘son of a servant’ without hesitation?’ Jin Guangshan couldn’t help but think. ‘Really, Wei Wuxian doesn’t belong with the Jiangs.’

“Madam Yu, what are you talking about?” Wang Lingjiao asked. “In a prominent sect, there has to be a clear distinction between superior and inferior or there will be chaos. Servants should be what servants ought to be.”

Instead of becoming angry, Madam Yu seemed to agree with the last comment.

Glancing at Wei Wuxian, she nodded, “That’s right.”

“San-niang!”

“Be silent, there's nothing I can do!” she hissed back. Although her son and daughter had frowned at her words, Madam Yu didn’t think she was wrong. She couldn’t be wrong. She wouldn't accept that. And yet there was a thickening fog of guilt in her brain that was starting to block off her other thoughts.

Now, the whispers were nearly impossible to ignore.

From there, Madam Yu asked, “Why have you captured one of my disciples?”

“Madam Yu, it would be best for you to draw a clear line between yourself and that brat. He had hidden intentions, was impudent, and disrespected the Wen Clan,” she revealed. “No need to worry, though. I caught him red-handed. I’ll handle the punishment.”

“What are you talking about?” Jiang Cheng demanded.

“I have evidence,” she declared. “See for yourself.”

One of the Wen disciples behind her set down a kite.

“...What?”

“That’s just an ordinary one-eyed monster kite,” Wei Wuxian responded, stating the obvious.

Everyone used those kinds of kites for kite shooting. Even Jin Zixuan, who had never done kite shooting before, had no idea what Wang Lingjiao meant.

“Do you think I’m blind? Look carefully!”

“What are you trying to say?”

“Hm,” she scoffed. “There are so many kinds of kites. Why did he choose a round, one-eyed monster? Why choose one with a gold eye? He was trying to imply something, right?”

Even Wen Ruohan could only tilt his head, having no idea where she was going with this.

“Implying what?” Madam Yu finally asked.

Laughing as though she had caught them in a trap, Wang Lingjiao responded, “Yu-furen, you still don’t understand? The drawing on this kite stands for the sun — the symbol of our Qishan Wen sect. Shooting down this kite was actually implying that he wanted to ‘shoot down the sun!’”

She stood tall, lifting her nose high as if she had unravelled a legendary mystery, and everyone else could only stare in disbelief.

“That… doesn’t even count as a conspiracy theory,” Nie Mingjue muttered, running a hand through his hair. It was as if she was trying to find the weakest excuse possible.

“Did she… decide on a reason for coming after she arrived?” Lan Xichen asked. No matter how you looked at it, it seemed clear that her and her group had arrived at Yunmeng first, and tried to find a reason for their presence second.

“This is unbelievable,” Jin Zixuan muttered, shaking his head.

Finally gathering his bearings, Jiang Cheng responded, “The eye might be golden and round, but it’s as different from the sun as can be! How on earth are they similar?!”

Wei Wuxian glared, “Then, according to you, we can’t eat tangerines either, because they’re also golden and round? But I’ve seen you eating them many times before, haven’t I?”

Wang Lingjiao glared at him.

An argument put together with Jiang Cheng’s anger (sharpened by his rank) and Wei Wuxian’s quick mind (supporting his heir) would prove to be a devastating combination if allowed to mature.

Jin Guangshan felt it would be smartest to teat them apart sooner, rather than later.

Impatiently, Madam Yu continued past the illogical argument to get to the point, “So, you came here for a kite?”

“Not at all,” she responded. “Today, I’m representing Wen-er-gongzi, and am here to punish someone.”

Her eyes turned gleeful and landed on Wei Wuxian.

“That disgusting bitch!” Nie Mingjue cursed, realizing what she was planning. Although Wei Wuxian had controlled his expression to the best of his abilities, it was clear that his heart had skipped a beat.

“Just riding on someone else’s power,” Madam Jin glared.

Jiang Cheng did a double take, “Wait, what is she-”

“On Dusk Creek Mountain, this brat make rude remarks while Wen-er-gongzi was fighting the Xuanwu! Those many disturbances tired Wen-er-gongzi, nearly making him lose the fight with the beast! He even lost his sword.”

Jiang Cheng laughed at the ridiculous story.

“She’s here to punish Wei Wuxian several months later for something he did after Lan Wangji and Jin Zixuan had already rebelled against them,” Nie Huaisang explained. “Though, considering how she’s the one who was sent and the kite statement earlier….”

As Huaisang paused, lost in thought, everyone turned to look at him. Whether consciously or not, the crowd of watchers had come to realize that when Huaisang said something seriously, he was often correct.

'I see,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'They intentionally chose to come now, or, rather, they purposefully led Uncle Jiang out of here.'

"Good point, Wei-xiong," Nie Huaisang mumbled.

"Huaisang?" Nie Mingjue asked.

Instead of responding to his brother, Huaisang's eyes widened and he turned to look at Wen Ruohan, "You're trying to provoke them into attacking first, aren't you?"

If Wen Ruohan actually wanted the Jiang's cooperation, then Wang Lingjiao was the last person he would send. But Jiang Fengmian was gone, and Madam Yu was the one left in charge; almost nothing would infuriate her more than being required to pander to Wang Lingjiao.

"How lucky!" the harpy shrieked. "The heavens blessed Wen-er-gongzi! Even though he lost his sword, he was able to take down the Xuanwu of slaughter! But this brat — we really can't tolerate him any longer! Today, I'm here under orders from Wen-er-gongzi. Madam Yu, please punish him harshly as an example to the rest of the YunmengJiang Sect!"

"A-Niang-"

"Shut your mouth!"

"Who does she think she is, to give me orders," Madam Yu hissed.

Silently, Lan Qiren and Lan Xichen frowned. When Wangji had gotten hurt disrespecting the Wens and trying to save the library, the part his Clan had been concerned about was his injuries. Even beyond their personal feelings, keeping the Sect's leading forces alive was their highest priority. No clan could exist without members, after all.

They were getting very, very close to crossing the point where retaliation from the Wens would be better than further compliance.

(But, unlike Wangji, Wei Wuxian had no family willing to defend him.)

Seeing Madam Yu's reaction, Wang Lingjiao was quite pleased, "Wei Ying, if I'm remembering correctly, is a servant of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect, isn't he?"

"He isn't," Jiang Fengmian quietly refuted. Technically, as Jiang Fengmian had released Wei Changze from service, Wei Wuxian wasn't even the son of a servant; he was the son of two rogue cultivators.

"Right now, Sect Leader Jiang isn't present. I'm sure Madam Yu knows what to do. If someone in the Jiang Clan defends him, I'm worried some people will believe that…

certain rumors… are really true."

Still giggling to herself, Wang Lingjiao turned around and sat down in Jiang Fengmian's seat.

Lan Qiren breathed out through his nose in disgust, and nearly everyone else growled at her audacity. .

"What rumors?!" Jiang Cheng shouted.

"What rumors? Why, the old romantic ties of Sect Leader Jiang, of course!"

"You-" just as Wei Wuxian moved to retaliate, pain shot through his back and his knees buckled.

He crashed to the floor.

"A-Niang!" the Jiang siblings shouted in synch with the simulated Jiang Cheng. Nearly everyone else flinched back at the scene.

(The pit of guilt growing in Yu Ziyuan's chest fluctuated at the scene.)

But the simulated Madam Yu gave no indication that she had heard her children. Instead, she proudly walked forward one step at a time. Her head was held high as she approached, Zidian trailing after and sparking with purple electricity.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji whispered, moving to kneel beside the boy. Out of all whips in existence, the only one with a chance of hurting more than Zidian would be the discipline whip.

"A… A-Niang, don't-"

"Jiang Cheng, leave it!" Wei Wuxian shouted.

(Wen Ruohan smirked. Whether it was intentional or not, injuring one of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect's strongest fighters before the conflict would make whatever the Wen Sect was planning that much easier.)

Ignoring her son entirely, Madam Yu stepped before Wei Wuxian, gazing down with frigid eyes.

"I've always said you… you unruly thing!" she lifted the whip, "I knew your impudence and recklessness would get us in trouble sooner or later!"

"Don't!"

The whip cracked down, and Wei Wuxian's blood sprayed in the air.

"San-niang, stop!"

Over and over and over again, before her children's horrified eyes, the simulated Madam Yu whipped Zidian against Wei Wuxian's back. Just as Wei Wuxian had predicted, she tore off a layer of flesh.

Every time the electric whip made a smacking sound against Wei Wuxian's back, Jiang Yanli flinched in her seat. She couldn't even bring herself to look.

"A-Niang!"

"Jiang Cheng, move out of the way, or you'll be kneeling too!"

'Will he?' Jin Guangshan wondered. 'We already know Yunmeng will fight back. If not for your heir's safety, than what would you consider worth fighting back for?'

It went without saying that, while Madam Yu whipped Wei Wuxian at the slightest opportunity, she did love for her actual children. It was an empty threat.

(For her blood children.)

Pushing against the ground with trembling hands, Wei Wuxian waved Jiang Cheng off, "Jiang Cheng, move over! Don't worry about me!"

Madam Yu's next strike forced him back onto the ground.

"Wei-xiong!" Nie Huaisang cried out, wishing desperately he could hide inside his brother. The sheer level of pain Wei Wuxian must be going through was difficult to imagine.

(Perhaps this was one of the causes of the Yiling Patriarch.)

Enraged, the watchers turned deadly glares on Wang Lingjiao, the woman making this all happen.

Once Yinzhu and Jinzhu grabbed hold of Jiang Cheng, Madam Yu returned to whipping Wei Wuxian. The stinging purple light danced through the air, landing on Wei Wuxian's back every time without fail. He clenched his teeth as he suffered, unspeaking and unmoving despite the obvious pain.

An irrelevant memory floated into Lan Wangji's subconscious: the time he and Wei Wuxian both received punishment. Wei Wuxian had cried so loudly then; now, he didn't make a sound.

He only willingly mentioned his pain when it was inconsequential.

(Which made the slight gasps of agony that escaped all the more significant.)

Usually, the most Wei Wuxian would get from Madam Yu would be two or three strikes. That was bad enough on its own, but it was nothing compared to this.

Wang Lingjiao forced him to endure dozens of heavy blows. His back burned, and his entire body was numb with pain. The experience was unbearable.

But he had to bear it.

All the while, the real Madam Yu watched on. Judgemental and scornful gazes were sent her way by the people who, over the course of the simulation, had come to love Wei Wuxian, but she easily ignored them.

Her thoughts, on the other hand, were much harder to forget.

'I always do this,' she assured herself. 'He'll be fine.'

Unfortunately, those words only served to make the pit of guilt growing in her chest turn ravenous.

Wei Wuxian collapsed onto the ground, and the beatings continued. The only sounds in the room were the rhythmic smacking of electricity cutting through his back, and the few cries of anguish Wei Wuxian wasn't able to completely suppress.

For minutes on end, Wei Wuxian endured hit, after hit, after hit, after hit.

'It's fine,' Madam Yu repeated. 'He's fine. He always makes out his injuries to be more severe than they actually are. I'm saving Lotus Pier, it's well within my rights to do this.'

Except she knew that wasn't entirely true. When Wei Wuxian saved her son from the Xuanwu, he had utilized a flawless mask of health to convince the others to leave. When he wanted to hide his pain, he was more than capable of that.

But Wei Wuxian was her husband's favorite — she wasn't stupid enough to believe the "equality" nonsense he had just told her kids — and no one embodied "to attempt the impossible" better than him! He would be fine, just like always.

Just like he was fine while listening to her and Jiang Fengmian argue about how his actions had hurt A-Li? Just like he was fine when he collapsed with a fever after saving Jiang Cheng? Just like he was fine when he forced himself to stand to help her son after what she had said?

'He'll be fine,' she repeated, her hands trembling from how tightly she clutched them. 'He's Jiang Fengmian's favorite; he'll do the impossible.'

She wouldn't accept another outcome.

Finally — finally — her virtual self finished.

Wei Wuxian lay trembling on the floor, spasms occasionally wrecking his body.

The punishment was over.

With the sudden relief that poured through them, every heir collapsed to the floor. Jiang Cheng stared in disbelief; Jiang Yanli couldn't bring herself to look; Jin Zixuan was speechless from shock; Nie Huaisang was nauseous from the scene; Lan Wangji remained frozen, kneeling next to Wei Wuxian as he tried to process what had just happened.

“Wei Wuxian!” Jiang Cheng called out, but Jinzhu and Yinzhu still held him back.

“Hm?” Wang Lingjiao tilted her head. “Oh, is that all?”

“How dare you?!” Nie Mingjue shouted, standing up completely. “That bitch doesn’t deserve to look at him, much less-!”

“If she so much as touches a hair on his head I’ll tear her to pieces!” Madam Jin added.

Growling, Lan Qiren agreed, “No matter how much demonic cultivation he does, Wei Wuxian will never be worth less than her.”

Taking a deep, shaky breath, Jiang Fengmian turned to Wen Ruohan and explained, “I don’t care that this hasn’t happened yet; she will never be allowed at Lotus Pier.”

Wen Qing glanced down, shame for her clan rushing through her blood.

Finally getting over her shock at Wang Lingjiao’s implied demand, Madam Yu responded, “What else do you want? Do you have even the slightest idea what level of spiritual weapon Zidian is? After this, he’ll still be hurt even a month later!”

“Right, right, but he’ll heal eventually, won’t he?”

"Oh my god," Lan Xichen rubbed his temples, despair starting to sink in. What more could she possibly ask for?

Their powerlessness was incomparably frustrating. Regardless of how illogical it would have been to stay, Lan Wangji couldn’t help but curse his other-self for leaving Wei Wuxian alone.

“What more do you want?!” Jiang Cheng demanded.

Wang Lingjiao smirked.

“I’ll spray her guts along the steps of Nightless City!” Jiang Cheng growled.

“Madam Yu,” Wang Lingjiao trilled out. “Since it’s a punishment, you must make sure he remembers it for the rest of his life. We wouldn’t want him to make such a terrible mistake again, would we? If all he gets is a few whips, he’ll be jumping around again after a few months of rest. What sort of punishment would that be? Boys his age always forget the pain once their wounds heal. Then it would all be pointless, right?”

Jin Zixuan looked over, and saw the boy who had defended A-Li from him slumped on the ground.

Nie Huaisang looked over, and saw his friend who had never once judged him for his interests laying on the ground.

Jiang Cheng looked over, and saw his brother who just turned his whole world-view upside down half-dead on the ground.

Lan Wangji looked over, and saw his soulmate collapsed on the ground.

Simultaneously, one thought flew through their heads: nothing is worth letting him get hurt any further.

Their siblings, uncles, and parents felt the same.

“What do you want me to do then?” Madam Yu asked. “Chop off his legs so he can’t jump around anymore?”

Jiang Yanli’s pitiful whimper of dismay made the hole in Yu Ziyuan’s chest triple in size.

“Young Master Wen is kind. He wouldn’t ask for something like that.”

Nie Mingjue snorted at the statement, but his eyes held no humor.

“All he wants is for Wei Wuxian’s right hand to be chopped off. We’ll drop the matter then.”

Half the people present reeled back in shock, while the other half gaped openly.

“...I hope she and her clan rot for a thousand years,” Lan Wangji quietly cursed, clenching his fists tightly enough to draw blood. Despite hearing it, Lan Qiren didn’t bother to reprimand his nephew.

How could he, when he felt exactly the same?

“You vicious woman!” Jiang Cheng shouted, escaping Jinzhu and Yinzhu’s hold. “You just want revenge-”

“Stand back,” Madam Yu ordered.

“A-Niang,” Jiang Cheng whispered from where he sat on the floor. “No-no, please don’t-”

“I can’t change anything!” Madam Yu shouted back, glaring her son down. “Stop asking me to act differently when there’s nothing that can be done!”

Now, the hole in her chest was threatening to swallow her whole.

Slowly, the simulated Madam Yu began stepping towards Wei Wuxian. As she did, her son followed her orders and remained still, frozen in his conflicting loyalties.

“Mom,” he begged. “Please don’t. Things aren’t like she said at all.”

“Young Master Jiang, are you accusing me of lying?”

He flinched back, looking down.

Filial piety and respect for his mother were integrated into Jiang Cheng's soul. However, all he could think right now was an endless stream of curses and threats for what he would do if his other self just let Madam Yu cut off Wei Wuxian's hand.

(Similarly, Wen Qing felt her heart rate double in speed.)

"Madam Yu, think this through," Wang Lingjiao requested, her voice calm and sympathetic. "The Wen Clan will definitely get to the bottom of this incident. If his hand is chopped off for me to bring back, we'll have a good enough result. If we don't, Wen Clan might not be so kind to Yunmeng Jiang next time."

"Kind?!" Jiang Cheng spit out through a crazed laugh, then turned to Wen Chao. "You Wen-dogs don't deserve to breathe the same air as us!"

Wen Chao huffed once and responded, "Why are you looking at me? I'm not the one about to chop off Wei Wuxian's hand."

A cold light flashed through Madam Yu's eyes, and her voice was eerie.

"Jinzhu, Yinzhu, go close the door. Don't let others see the blood."

Those words struck Wei Wuxian. As JinZhu and YinZhu moved towards the door, he thought, 'Is she really going to chop off one of my hands?'

Lan Wangji felt his heart stop.

Slowly, the door creaked closed, and the light in the room dimmed accordingly.

The color of Jiang Yanli's skin turned as pale as a ghost, and a single word rang on repeat in her head.

'No,' she thought. 'No, no, no, no, no, no, no-'

When Madam Yu stepped directly in front of Wei Wuxian, he forced himself to look up. Contrasting against her resentful expression, his large, silver eyes projected a terror and innocence they had never seen from him before.

Somehow, it was that single expression was the tipping point.

Jiang Yanli felt warm tears fall down her cheeks.

A moment later, the fear was replaced by determination.

'...So what? If it's in exchange for the safety of the sect… a hand is just a hand! Big deal. If worst comes to worst, I'll just practice my sword left-handed from now on!"

"Don't just accept it!" Wen Qing cried out, finally reaching her breaking point. Her words had been hissed as quietly as possible, but Wen Ruohan still glanced over.

“Madam Yu, I knew you’d be the most obedient supporter of the Qishan Wen Sect,” Wang Lingjiao praised.

Yu Ziyuan felt disgust rising in her at the comment.

“Somebody, hold this brat down!” Lingjiao ordered.

“No need,” Madam Yu responded as Jinzhu and Yinzhu approached.

“Oh? You’re having your maids hold him down. That’ll work too.”

The very first thing they had seen was the Yiling Patriarch, Nie Huaisang reminded himself. The Yiling Patriarch had both hands — he needed them to play the flute.

But Madam Yu was actually going to-“Wei-gongzi, don’t!” Lan Xichen whispered.

“A-Niang, no!” Jiang Cheng begged, getting to his knees. “Please!”

“Just take him and run!” Jiang Cheng hissed at his other self. Jiang Fengmian was forced to sit down, his body shaking in horror at what was about to come.

He continued, “If A-Die hears about this-”

“Shut up!” she shouted. “What could he do even if he knows? Kill me?”

Laughing, Wang Lingjiao began a slow, almost-patronizing applause and sang, “Yu-furen, I admire you so much! We’ll definitely get along well after they set up the Supervisory Office.”

A pause.

“...Supervisory Office?” Madam Yu repeated.

Seeing their mother’s expression, a bit of hope began to return to Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli’s minds.

“That’s right, the Supervisory Office. This is the second matter I came to Yunmeng Jiang for.”

‘No, it‘s the main matter,’ Wen Ruohan realized. Why would his other-self care about a maid’s pride? The only reason she was there at all (months after the Xuanwu cave, at that), was under orders to set the office up.

That explained it.

(That would be much easier to do now that the head disciple was heavily injured.)

Wang Lingjiao explained, “According to the Supervisory Order issued by us, we’ll be setting up Supervisory offices in each and every city starting today. All of them will be under our command."

These words made Jiang, Lan, and Nie Sect Leaders look down. Even Nie MIngjue, who had been the most willing to fight against the Wen Clan, had done nothing while they conquered smaller sects under the thinnest of excuses. And now, it had come to this.

This is what their hesitation led to. It was their fault.

(On the other hand, Jin Guangshan couldn't help cracking a smile in amusement.)

Finally gathering his bearings, Jiang Cheng snapped, "What Supervision Office? This is my sect!"

"Madam Yu, you must discipline your son properly. Since hundreds of years ago, all Sects have been under the Wen Sect."

Wen Chao scowled as a countless number of snorts and eye rolls spread throughout the room.

"In front of the Wen Sect's envoy, how can he say things like 'your sect' and 'my sect?'" Wang Lingjiao continued, twirling with a dramatic flourish. "No need to worry though, Madam Yu. What you just did proves that you'll be the Wen Clan's most loyal subordinate. I hereby announce that from now on, Lotus Cove will be our Supervisory Office in Yunmeng-"

A slap brought her to the floor.

"A-Niang?" Jiang Cheng asked.

The slap had been shocking in both volume and force, and the scream Wang Lingjiao let out rang through the halls. Blood gushed from her nose, and she widened her eyes.

"She's fighting back," Jin Zixuan realized, then grinned. "She's fighting back!"

The Wen Disciples still present unsheathed their swords, but in the next second Madam Yu had already taken them down, Zidian crackling from the power used.

"Yes. Yes. Yesyesyes*yes!*"

Now, Madam Yu's distaste was directed entirely at Wang Lingjiao.

"How dare you!" she hissed out, grabbing the other woman's hair and tugging her up to give another slap of wrath. "Mind the master behind the dog you're trying to mess with! You barge into my sect, and you want to punish my disciple before my eyes? What a thing you are. How dare you be so undisciplined."

"How dare you-"

"""""""Be quiet!!!""""""" five people shouted at once, silencing Wen Chao.

Madam Yu threw Wang Lingjiao's head to the side, and, as if she considered it dirt, wiped her hand with a handkerchief. The sight made the Wen maid growl under tear-stained cheeks.

"You… how dare you do something like this?" she asked. "Neither the Qishan Wen Sect nor the YingChuan Wang Sect will let you go!"

"Shut up! You scum of a maid — my Meishan Yu sect has roamed the cultivation world for hundreds of years! I've never even heard of a YinChuan Wang Sect! Out of which gutter did that menial sect crawl out? Is it full of things like you?"

Wang Lingjiao was forced to face her.

"Let me teach you who the lady of this house is," she growled, making Wang Lingjiao tremble in fear. "It's me. Not you. I am superior. You are inferior."

The world faded to white.

What just happened began to sink in.

First, there was a slight laugh. Then-

"Yes!" Jiang Cheng screamed. "A-Niang, you-"

"Slapped that maid to hell and back again! Thank god!"

"That was the most satisfying thing I've ever seen," Lan Qiren quietly agreed, too emotionally exhausted to mind the breach of decorum.

Madam Jin nodded once, pleasure radiating off her as she hissed, "Teach that maid her place."

Laughing, Nie Huaisang began cheering, and was followed by Jin Zixuan shortly after. Soon, Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue began clapping as well. Applause resounded around the room, and the watchers' grins shone brightly. Even a dark (embarrassed) glare from Madam Yu did nothing to curb their enthusiasm.

She sighed and looked away.

(And, all the while, the pit of guilt which had encompassed her body screamed at her like a murder of crows.)

"That was so cool, A-Niang," Jiang Yanli whispered, so grateful that Wei Wuxian would keep his hand that she couldn't process anything else.

Wen Qing sunk deeper into her mind, trying to block out the rest of the watchers. She understood, now, why Wei Wuxian would want to kill Wen Ning.

"Very impressive," Wen Ruohan admitted, causing everyone else to do a double-take.

“What?” Nie Mingjue asked, turning to Wen Ruohan. “That’s all you have to say?”

“For now,” Wen Ruohan answered. “I don’t see any point in commenting until we see how this turns out. We all know the real reason that maid was sent over was to build the office. I highly doubt my other-self would send her to do that without sufficient backup.”

Glares were sent his way, but Jiang Fengmian nodded once at Yu Ziyuan.

“No matter what happens, it was long past the time of cooperation,” he declared. “She made the right decision.”

“I don’t need you approval,” Madam Yu hissed back, but her anger was surprisingly subdued compared to previous times. Similarly, Jiang Fengmian didn’t respond or even try to walk off.

(Both were distracted by their lingering guilt.)

The Wen Sect had arrived, and he wasn’t even there.

The Wen Sect had arrived, and she cooperated so long as it was Wei Wuxian being inconvenienced by the demands.

Neither of them knew how to feel about that.

Wen Ruohan’s words made nervousness rise up in Jiang Cheng. Just a short while ago, the Lan Sect was attacked, leading to the death of Qingheng-jun. Now, Jiang Cheng wasn’t sure whether to be grateful or even more worried that Jiang Fengmian wasn’t there.

But everyone said Wei Wuxian had caused the near destruction of the Jiang Sect. Surely, that meant the sect would escape this event unharmed so that Wei Wuxian could betray them some later day?

Surely.

He was so lost in thought that when two words were spoken quietly, Jiang Cheng thought he had misheard.

“What?”

As blank-faced as ever, Lan Wangji calmly repeated, “I’m sorry.”

“...For what?”

“You wouldn’t have let this be shown if you had a choice. That was more personal than anything else we’ve seen so far. I’m sorry your family’s private life is being displayed. You seemed bothered by it.”

Flushing slightly, Jiang Cheng glared Lan Wangji down, praying desperately that he wasn’t that obvious. Yes, his feelings on his Dad were private, and yes, Wei Wuxian’s promise had been emotional, and yes, he was conflicted over the things his mom did, but he wasn't Wei Wuxian — he didn't want people to know how he was feeling.

Though he did find it somewhat amusing that both he and Lan Wangji had an emotional breakdown in front of Wei Wuxian. The parallels between their relationships with him were becoming more and more obvious.

"Uh, I know it doesn't really mean anything, but...." Jin Zixuan hesitated. "Um, I'm sorry too."

"...It's fine," Jian Yanli shook her head, smiling hesitantly at Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji. "We all agreed to stay, so we don't really have any right to be angry over this. I'm sure we won't be the only ones this happens to."

"Still, sorry," Jin Zixuan mumbled. "If you need someone to talk to, I'd… be okay with that."

Jiang Cheng hesitantly nodded, but Nie Huaisang didn't even react.

Now that he'd gotten some time to calm down from the high of Wang Lingjiao getting slapped, some of Nie Huaisang's earlier concerns were nudging at his mind again.

Wei Wuxian had been willing to let Madam Yu chop off his hand. He had been cheerful, in fact. Positively declaring that he would just practice left handed swordsmanship instead. It was one thing for a disciple to be loyal to a sect, but the head disciple — Jiang Fengmian's ward — had acted like his life meant nothing. Everyone approved of Madam Yu's decision to fight back, but, if Wang Lingjiao had mentioned the Supervisory office even a second later, wouldn't Wei Wuxian's hand be gone by now?

During war, soldiers could be expected to face injury or death; it was a little different when the side they were on was the one willing to chop off their limbs.

Wen Ruohan's earlier comments on the Jiang Sect's ward were becoming more and more relevant as time went on.

The same thing occurred to Madam Jin.

Over the course of the simulation, Madam Jin had grown fond of Wei Wuxian. He had been the cause of his son's affection for A-Li, had helped save her son ~~even when her best friend's child told him to stop~~, and had continued to show his righteousness at every turn.

In a situation like this, she felt like she had a duty to say something.

But before she could-

"A-Niang?" Jiang Yanli spoke. "Can we continue our conversation from earlier?"

"What else is there to say?"

The biting tone made Jiang Yanli want to back down immediately, but Jiang Fengmian continued to look at her. In the simulation, his passiveness when it came to dealing with the Wen Sect had allowed this to happen. Stepping forward and speaking to his children had helped immensely.

Maybe it was time to do that again.

“San-niang,” he spoke. “Please come talk with us.”

After a moment of contemplation, Madam Yu complied. The quick acceptance shocked Jiang Yanli slightly, and she had to force her brain to focus on what she wanted to talk about. What things should be discussed now, and what things could be mentioned later? Where did Wei Wuxian fit on that range?

(For years, she had told herself that Wei Wuxian’s position in her family was fine. It could be better — the comfort she was able to offer was appreciated — but it was fine.

The more she saw, the harder it was to believe that.)

“Well?” Madam Yu challenged. “What do you want me to say?”

“A-Niang, about A-Xian, is-” Jiang Yanli cut off, noticing the defensive wall Madam Yu built up at her words. “I-I mean, we should talk about A-Xian later. We were cut off earlier. You seemed like you wanted to say something?”

Before, Madam Yu had been valiantly fighting off the pit of guilt in her chest whispering at her to apologize to Wei Wuxian. Now, those whispers had become deafening shrieks.

“Nothing,” she stubbornly bit out.

’Mind the master behind the dog you’re trying to mess with,’ she had said.

She knew what Wei Wuxian felt about dogs, and yet she hadn’t hesitated to say that.

(And that was the least of her sins.)

After they left the simulation, how was she supposed to look Wei Wuxian in his eyes — the boy who had prioritized and defended her children over and over again — and know she had nearly taken off his hand? How was she supposed to treat him the way she had before, knowing what she knew now?

“San-niang… do you actually think I had an affair with Cangse Sanren?” Jiang Fengmian asked, hesitantly. For years, he had thought she was just using it as a tool to hurt him with. He had never considered that she might genuinely believe it.

“...No,” she finally answered.

Madam Yu didn’t believe what Jiang Fengmian said about not loving Wei Wuxian more than their kids, but now she could at least admit that he wasn’t a bastard child.

Still….

“Jiang Fengmian!” she called out, making her family do a slight double take.

“San-niang?”

“Do you swear to me right now that what you said is true? I want your word that you’ll never stop loving A-Cheng and A-Li, no matter what Wei Wuxian accomplishes.”

“I promise,” he answered without hesitation.

Huffing slightly (still completely against apologizing, regardless of what that hole in her chest was blaring out), Madam Yu said the only thing she could.

“I’ll withhold my comments related to that, then.”

The Jiangs nearly collapsed in relief, astounded by the change occurring within Madam Yu at a shockingly fast pace.

‘Not good enough,’ their many eavesdroppers thought. ‘Wei Wuxian deserves more than a concession like that. Not yelling at him for something that wasn’t true to begin with isn’t even close acceptable — it’s just better.’

If there was one thing this simulation had confirmed for Wen Ruohan, it was that he needed to acquire Wei Wuxian. As far as he was concerned, everyone would be happier then.

(Besides, if he left the boy with the Jiangs, they might break him beyond repair.)

But a significant portion of their time had already been taken up by these conversations. It wouldn’t be wise to bring up such a controversial topic now; maybe next time.

“Though, come to think of it, Wei-xiong is really smart, isn’t he?” Nie Huaisang asked, thinking absentmindedly.

“I’m pretty sure that was clear in the first segment,” Nie Mingjue responded. “Remember? Spirit attraction flags and the compass and all that?”

“Right, right, but there’s a difference between being a good inventor and being politically observant. As far as I can tell, Wei-xiong’s so-so at hiding his involvement, but he’s really, really good at figuring out the political situation. Which I guess makes sense given the deduction skills we saw him use in the second segment.”

“Wait, what?” Jiang Cheng asked. “What are you talking about.”

“Hm?”

Seemingly snapping out of a thoughtful zen, Nie Huaisang blinked rapidly and began to panic.

“Ah, sorry! Just thinking out loud, Jiang-xiong! Please ignore me, I’m not really sure what I’m-”

“Nonsense, Huaisang,” Lan Xichen smiled warmly. “Your contributions have been greatly appreciated thus far. Please, do go on.”

‘Take a hint, Xichen-ge! I forgot who we were with and was about to say something that I shouldn’t!’

Unfortunately, it seemed Nie Huaisang’s little hint was enough for Wen Ruohan to realize what he was talking about. Smirking coldly, he answered Xichen’s question.

“I believe Nie-gongzi is referring to what Wei Wuxian said when he learned my sect sent over the abyss. If I’m remembering correctly, it was ‘but if we keep letting them get away with things, there’ll be a disaster sooner or later,’ right?”

“...Right, Your Excellency,” Nie Huaisang agreed with a shy ~~and disgustingly fake~~ smile.

In hindsight, those words certainly did seem ironic.

“I guess Wei Wuxian was right.”

Gaining a slightly bitter smile, Lan Wangji murmured, “He always is.”

“It seems you’re right, Wei Ying.”

“I always am!” the future’s Yiling Patriarch trilled, then glanced over. “What am I right about this time?”

Gesturing for him to come closer, Lan Wangji pointed towards the results of the experiment he was helping Wei Wuxian run. Within the orb was a memory of Wei Wuxian working with Wen Ning. The image had been stored.

“What is that, Lan-er-gongzi?” Wen Ning asked.

“It’s one of my inventions!” Wei Wuxian answered instead. “It’s a little inconvenient for the people on either side to have to watch the messages immediately. I figured it would have been much easier if I hadn’t had to get information on my other-self’s first message from Jiang Cheng! If it works, this will allow the messages-slash-memories to be stored.”

“It will,” Wangji confirmed. Once he had run out of stories to tell — never one to unnecessarily elaborate on the details — Wei Wuxian had asked him to help modify the orb. As with all of Wei Ying’s inventions, the record-keeping abilities this offered had the potential to change the world.

“This is great! Now we just have to run a few more tests!” Wei Wuxian declared, his lips curling into a tempting grin. “So Lan Zhan, what do you say we start by recording ourselves tonight? I’ve always wanted to see how I look, and the more angles I can see you from the better!”

Wen Ning squeaked at the suggestion, and quickly turned away from the couple.

Sighing slightly in amusement, Lan Wangji responded with a firm “No.”

“Eh? Why not?”

“No one else gets to see you.”

“No one else will! It’s just going to be us-”

“Someone else might find it and see you. I’m the only one who gets to see you like that.”

“Lan Zhan!” Wei Wuxian squeaked, flushing red as Lan Wangji pulled his fiance onto his lap. Once Wei Wuxian was properly straddling him, Wangji moved his hands to Wei Wuxian’s cheeks and cupped them delicately.

“Mine,” he declared.

Laughing, Wei Wuxian rested his forehead against Lan Wangji’s and responded, “Mmhm. All yours.”

“...”

Even Wen Ning’s undead skin was starting to feel a little flushed. That really, honestly shouldn’t be possible, but….

Not even the dead could remain unembarrassed before this!

Still smiling, Wei Wuxian mumbled, “Though we do still need some way to test it.”

“Now?”

“Yeah, Wen Ning and I are about ready to send over the last bit of information little-me needs to set up the privacy thing. Remember? I based the structure of the intelligence on Wen Ning’s combat form to reduce the necessary memory space and simplify the commands, so it’ll be easier if he has one of Wen Ning's relatives to help him activate it. That’s really important, so I’d like to make sure little-me can replay those instructions.”

“Do you think that will be possible?”

“I hope so. Though who knows what that-universe’s Wen Ruohan will allow. With the other four great sect leaders unconscious, he’s probably expanding his influence as far as he can.”

“You’ll figure it out,” Lan Wangji assured.

Despite remaining facing away, Wen Ning nodded at that and added, “You’ll definitely make right choice, Wei-gongzi.”

“Of course I will, I’m always right!”

Chapter End Notes

Okay, it’s getting really annoying to have to write “privacy-thing” and “red-orb” and “time-travel talisman” every time, but all the possible names I've come up with have been absolutely abysmal. Any suggestions?

Slapping, Choking, and Infinite Regrets

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Arrogance dripping from his robes, Wen Xu flew into Lotus Pier. He was uninvited and unexpected, but, as the only high ranking Wen awake, no one would dare oppose him.

Terrified, the civilians surrounding lotus cove all bowed their heads, too scared to make eye contact with him. Seeing the thriving pier Wei Wuxian had maintained, Wen Xu smirked in amusement.

Then-

BOOM!

An earth shattering explosion shook the pier. Shockwaves spread out, bringing half the civilians to their knees and making the other half fly off the ground.

Mad laughter rang out across the pier.

“An enemy attack?” a Wen soldier shouted, frantically drawing his weapon.

“No!” one of the civilians shouted back, trying to keep their hat from being swept away by the brewing tornado of spiritual and resentful energy. “It’s just Wei-gongzi!”

That explanation just made the Wen soldiers even more confused. The only exception was Wen Xu, who hummed in amused understanding.

Finally, the storm of both energy disappeared, and the maniacal laughter increased in volume.

Shaking in her boots, Wen Xu’s second in command asked, “G-gongzi, should we… should we attack?”

“No need,” he answered, then glanced at the civilian who had spoken. “This happens a lot?”

The ones who had fallen stood up, dusting themselves off and not looking at all surprised by the event. One of the women carrying a crate of buns answered him.

“Every once in a while. He always tells us before-hand so that we can leave if we have to, and the laughter means something has gone well. Wei-gongzi is working on what Sect Leader Jiang asked him to do, so he’s asked for our patience. Apologies for the disturbance, Wen-gongzi.”

That had been an enormous explosion of energy, but 100% of the fear she had was directed at the Wens. It seemed the citizens of Yunmeng had the upmost faith in Wei Wuxian.

As expected of the to-be Yiling Patriarch, he supposed.

Turning to his second in command, Wen Xu ordered “Go inside and find Wen Ning. We’ll speak with him until Wei Wuxian is ready.”

Nodding once, she saluted formally and left to follow his orders.

“G-gongzi,” a Wen disciple bowed lowly. “There was… resentful energy there, wasn’t there? Doesn’t that mean there’s a yao? Shouldn’t we send back up?”

It took Wen Xu a moment to remember that none of the people with him had even considered the possibility of demonic cultivation. Which made sense. No one had ever figured it out.

The simulation had completely warped Wen Xu’s sense of normalcy.

“No need,” Wen Xu decided. “We’ll wait in the main hall.”

Even among his own men, Wen Xu preferred to keep pivotal information secret. For now, he was the only one in the whole world who knew what Wei Wuxian was capable of.

He’d rather keep it that way.

Several minutes passed as he sat within the Lotus Pier’s main hall, patiently sipping tea while his men got progressively tenser and tenser. Every time a fluctuation of resentful or spiritual energy shook the pier, they jumped and reached for their swords. It was rather amusing.

Wen Xu calmly took another sip.

Finally, just as Wen Xu was starting to wonder if he could send his men into panic attacks by whispering “boo,” the weak, powerless, cowardly Wen Ning walked in.

(Really, Wen Xu had no idea what Wei Wuxian was thinking in making Wen Ning his second in command, fierce corpse or not.)

“W-welcome, Wen-gongzi,” Wen Ning greeted with a deep bow. “I apologize for the wait.”

“What were you and Wei Wuxian working on?”

The accurate question made Wen Ning flinch heavily, but he quickly responded, “Mo Xuanyu — uh, the person who knows the most about the simulation — send us instructions on how to make a… or, what he called a ‘concealment zone.’ So long as the person being affected is already in the simulation, it’ll slow down their perception of time until whatever they don’t want to see is over. Um, like — for example, Wei-gongzi said that if we were inside the simulation right now and you didn’t want to listen to me, you would see me come in and then see me leave. It would-it would feel like an instant for you, but I could have done all sorts of thing and explained all this to you without you having heard it.”

Humming in understanding at the explanation, Wen Xu continued “And what about the power you were broadcasting from the pier?”

"It-it’ll take a lot of energy to attach it to everyone since-since we can’t see everyone’s bodies. The Lan and Jin won’t let Wei-gongzi meet the clan heirs, so we-we need to remotely attach it. That'll… take a lot of power?"

His voice had grown progressively higher-pitched as time went on, unused to speaking for so long to the Wen heir. It made Wen Xu pleased to know the person he sent over was someone who could be bullied into betraying Wei Wuxian, should that become necessary.

"And where is Wei Wuxian?"

"O-on his way! The experiment made a bit of a mess, so he needs to clean up first."

Given the way Wen Xu's second in command looked traumatized from whatever she had seen, Wen Xu assumed "a bit of a mess" was "a bit of" an understatement.

(Her mutters of "not possible — can't be — how did they make resentful energy do that?" only added to that feeling.)

Half a minute later, Wen Xu heard a rush of footsteps approaching. Unnerved by the recent events, his entourage prepared for combat as the sound approached.

Finally, the door opened, and Wen Xu laid his eyes on Wei Wuxian.

"Hello, Wen-gongzi," Wei Wuxian greeted, acceptably polite but unable to keep a breathless smile off his face. "Is there something I can help you with?"

The childishly happy grin he had caused Wen Xu's guards to make eye contact with each other, all wondering how the fifteen year old before them could be the cause of the energy they had felt.

Smirking back at the boy, Wen Xu answered, "I was hoping I could get a more thorough update of what, exactly you're going to be doing to my family."

"Of course," the boy happily responded.

In the following two hours, the visiting Wen Clan members would learn more about talisman theory than even the Clan's best experts knew.

A shriek resounded, and Wang Lingjiao was thrown down.

"Back where she belongs," Nie Mingjue muttered angrily.

Now that he had gotten some time to calm down, however, the elation he had previously felt turned sour. Yes, Madam Yu was retaliating, but…

Blood was soaking through the robes on Wei Wuxian's back, and Nie Mingjue wished she had resisted sooner.

Terrified, Wang Lingjiao began crawling away, trying to silence her whimpers so as to not attract Madam Yu's attention again. As she did, the Wen disciples lying on the ground began to force themselves up.

Madam Yu nodded once at Jinzhu and Yinzhu, and they swiftly slit the disciples' throats. Within seconds, Wang Lingjiao's position had switched from a commander to a prisoner.

Although many would consider it uncharacteristic of him, Jiang Fengmian couldn't help the deep, layered satisfaction that poured through him at the scene.

He could only hope it stayed that way.

Trembling, Wang Lingjiao reminded, "I… I am Wen-er-gongzi's woman. If-if you dare to hurt me, he'll make you all-"

"He'll do what?!" Madam Yu shouted, whipping Zidian forward to wrap around the screeching Wang Lingjiao's neck. As she gasped and fought it, Zidian retracted, dragging the maid to Madam Yu's feet.

Jin Zixuan stepped out of the way as she passed, too disgusted to be willing to let her phase through him.

Laughing once, Yu Ziyuan lifted her foot, then crushed the woman's wrist.

"What will he do? Will he cut our hands and legs off? Or burn down Lotus Pier? Build a Supervisory Office?"

The mocking words caused smiles to form on many watchers' faces, but Jiang Yanli couldn't bring herself to agree. Just a little while ago, it had been Wei Wuxian Zidian was being used against, his wide silver eyes staring up at Madam Yu in terror.

And then she considered chopping off his hand, and he had just accepted it.

"A-Niang," Jiang Cheng said, supporting Wei Wuxian so that they could both begin to approach.

Before they had taken more than two steps, the door behind them was smashed down.

Wen Zhuliu stepped through.

"Ha!" Wen Chao shrieked, grateful that his mistress would be saved. He agreed with his Father — of course he did — that Wei Wuxian belonged in the Wen Sect. He wouldn't dare to question that.

That said, nothing stopped him from enjoying the suffering that would befall the prideful woman who had beaten down his lovely Jiaojiao!

Madam Yu glared, "Core Melting Hand?"

"Violet Spider?" the man responded coldly.

This was very, very different than a fight against Wang Lingjiao. Jiang Cheng felt his heart skip a beat at the scene. In the future, he had been sect leader. It had been gratifying to see — proof that he could do it; that he was strong. Only now did Jiang Cheng consider the fact that, for him to be Sect Leader, his parents couldn't be alive.

'You call that being allies? The Jiangs raised him like their own, but almost all of them were killed because of him.'

Right, the four sects won the war against the Wens. For Wei Wuxian — one of the campaign's biggest contributors — to be known for the destruction must mean it was undeniable that it was his fault.

It was fine; his clan would make it out of this alive.

Finally catching her breath, Wang Lingjiao turned in the momentary silence to shout, "Wen Zhuliu! Wen Zhuliu! Help me! Help me now!"

"Hurry up!" Wen Chao ordered.

"Silence, Chao-er," Wen Ruohan responded, not even glancing at his son. This was getting important; he had no interest in Wen Chao's petty remarks.

Madam Yu snorted, "Wen Zhuliu? Core Melting Hand, wasn't your original name Zhao Zhuliu? Your surname clearly wasn't Wen, but you insisted on changing it. Is the surname of those Wen-dogs really so precious? Turning your back on your ancestors — how laughable!"

Nie Huaisang couldn't help but wonder if their magnanimous Chief Cultivator planned for Wen Wuxian to be known across the cultivation world instead of "Wei." He hoped not; his Wei-xiong didn't deserve such a fate.

Seeing that she had been ignored, Wang Lingjiao screeched, "Wen Zhuliu! Don't you see what's happening? Why are you talking instead of killing her? Is this how Young Master Wen ordered you to protect me? Watch out or I'll denounce you!"

Madam Yu grinded her foot into the other girl's wrist.

Restraining a sigh, Wen Qing looked away, unwilling to watch her clan embarrass her any longer.

From the way he hesitated, it was clear that Wen Zhuliu despised Wang Lingjiao. He was protecting her under Wen Chao's orders, but he didn't like Wen Chao either.

He didn't want to protect them.

With a scoff, Madam Yu hissed, "Why on earth does he offer such loyalty to those Wen-dogs?"

Wen Ruohan wanted to ask the same about Yunmeng Jiang and Wei Wuxian.

Finally, knowing that the matter would get back to Wen Ruohan if he let her die, Wen Zhuliu sighed, then attacked.

The Core Melting Hand batted Zidian away like it was nothing!

Everyone's eyes widened.

The battle began in earnest. Wang Lingjiao ran away as soon as Madam Yu's attention was off her, but everyone else remained mesmerized by the fight.

The Violet Spider was well-known for her fierceness and prowess with Zidian. Her skills were made even more apparent every time she slipped out of Wen Zhuliu's core-melting range. Zidian was a constant and powerful force, shattering the nearby furniture into splinters whenever it made contact.

But she wasn't able to get him either. Despite the spiritual energy running through being at full power, it barely slowed him down. In all its years of use, Zidian had never met such an opponent. Whether by dodging it or simply knocking it aside, Zidian was continuously rendered useless before Wen Ruohan's strongest weapon.

Lan Qiren frowned deeply. It was one thing for them all to rally together against the Wen Clan like they had during the previous segments, it was another to actually hope to beat them.

Wen Ruohan tilted his head, wondering how on earth the Core Melting Hand had been defeated. In the Wen Sect, the only person stronger than Wen Zhuliu was Wen Ruohan himself. How did the Sunshot Campaign take both of them out?

Unfortunately, while everyone had been distracted by the fight, Wang Lingjiao had moved. Running through the door, she took out a cylinder and opened it mid-step.

It was a signal flare.

"Stop her!" Wei Wuxian shouted, pushing Jiang Cheng forward through his pain. "She's sending a signal!"

'That's what you get for playing with her, Madam Yu,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'You should have just set your pride aside and killed her as soon as you could.'

Realizing the same, Yu Ziyuang cursed.

Jiang Cheng let go of Wei Wuxian and lunged in the direction of Wang Lingjiao. However, at the same time, Wen Zhuliu was closing in on Madam Yu. Scared he would knock her down, Jiang Cheng turned and shouted.

"A-Niang!"

He immediately gave up on Wang Lingjiao and threw himself over, but Wen Zhuliu didn't even turn his head as he defended himself. He struck Jiang Cheng's shoulder, and blood burst from his mouth. Seeing that, Madam Yu roared.

Wen Zhuliu was blasted through the wall by a sudden eruption from Zidian, and Jiang Cheng fell to the ground.

“A-Cheng!” Jiang Fengmian shouted.

“Stupid, stupid boy! You should have stopped the signal, I was fine!” Madam Yu added. The hole in the wall left many watchers gaping in shock.

Their view then switched to an outside hallway of Lotus Pier as Wang Lingjiao finished opening up the signal flare, launching it into the night sky.

Dread washed over Jiang Fengmian.

(Jin Guangshan withheld a laugh, knowing that this wouldn’t have been possible if Wei Wuxian wasn’t already injured. Wen Ruohan had planned this very well, hadn’t he?)

The watchers were brought to a distant section of Lotus Cove. The pier could easily be seen, but darkness covered their own forms. When the signal flare burst into the sky, dozens of ships faded into existence.

The army was already here.

“No,” Jiang Yanli whispered in horror. All four Jiangs looked faint.

‘You’re trying to provoke them into attacking first,’ Huaisang had realized.

Sighing, Huaisang tried to ignore the fear which crept through him. If he was in Wen Ruohan’s position, he would have set an army nearby Yunmeng Jiang, waiting for the chance to attack.

It seemed His Excellency had done the same.

Although his sigh had been soft and quiet, Wen Ruohan glanced over thoughtfully. It had not escaped his notice that Nie Huaisang was quite crafty when it came to altering the crowd’s perception of events without making it obvious that he had done anything. Although he was known as a terrible student, that was only in terms of cultivation; Nie Huaisang’s art and poetry were both praise-worthy.

And, apparently, his mind for politics.

For a brief moment, Wen Ruohan considered winning him over. Much like Wei Wuxian, there was a chance Nie Huaisang could be turned into a useful weapon for the Wens.

Unfortunately, there was a glaring problem with that.

There were minor issues like Nie Huaisang’s lacking cultivation and the hate Nie Mingjue felt for Wens, but Wen Ruohan was sure he would be able to find ways around that. No, the problem was in how Nie Huaisang operated.

Both Wei Wuxian and Nie Huaisang could read other people well; both could understand political situations; both frequently made comments that proved to be undeniably correct. But Wei Wuxian never hid that he was the one saying these things. He was always attracting attention in some form or another, whether it be annoyance as attraction. It worked wonders for most things he wanted to do, but he very much did not know how to be subtle.

Nie Huaisang did. And would be able to operate behind Wen Ruohan's back.

That tipped him on the scale from "useful" to "dangerous." Rather than recruitment, it would be much smarter to simply remove the threat as soon as possible.

Just as Wen Ruohan came to that conclusion, his view of Nie Huaisang was cut off.

Nie Mingjue stood between them, glaring at Wen Ruohan with the force of the million suns. He had seen the look in Wen Ruohan's eyes once before.

(It had been there when the Wen Sect Leader returned his father's saber. When Wen Ruohan had decided to murder the former Sect Leader Nie and committed to that stance.)

He would not let that happen to Huaisang.

"...Sect Leader Jiang," Nie Mingjue began, momentarily pulling the man's attention away from the navel fleet that had come to invade his home.

"Sect Leader Nie?"

"...Know that, when we get out, Yunmeng Jiang will have Qinghe Nie's full support in this. If this happens in our world, there will be more than one sect for Qishan to fight."

Lan Qiren nodded in agreement.

Once the boats were just outside of the pier, Wen Chao stepped forward on the leading ship.

Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, and Nie Mingjue all growled at the sight of him.

Smirking once, Wen Chao then thrust his hand forward and shouted, "Kill everyone in Lotus Cove! All of them!"

Jiang Fengmian turned his head, scanning the lake full of ships, and suddenly was faced with the realization that the Wens might succeed.

(But Wei Wuxian hadn't betrayed them yet. Surely that meant they were going to be fine?)

Back at Lotus Pier, Jiang disciples rushed around, grabbing their swords. Madam Yu stood on a center bridge of the Pier, overlooking the lakes where the army was.

In the distance, Wen Zhuliu covered for Wang Lingjiao's retreat.

"She better not survive this," Jiang Cheng grumbled. Not a single one of the Lans frowned at him despite his vengeful comment; they all felt the same.

Seeing Wen cultivators approaching in the sky, Madam Yu turned to Jinzhu and shouted, "Turn on the barrier!"

Sucking in a deep breath, Lan Xichen forced himself to concentrate. They hadn't seen the entirety of the burning of the Cloud Recesses, so this would be his best chance at getting an idea of what had happened there.

In the skies of Lotus Pier, the watchers saw nine areas light up with energy, before converging in the center and creating a gorgeous barrier in the shape of a purple Lotus.

Jiang Cheng had never seen the barrier in action before. For some reason, that was the thing that made him mind realize how genuinely serious this was.

This future Lotus Pier was under attack.

The Wens were trying to wipe them out.

Just as the energy shield made contact with the ground, the first brigade of Wen Disciples arrived. They paused, unable to pass through the barrier, and hovered just outside.

Then, under the orders of their leader, began to attack.

Golden arrays appeared in the air, slamming down against the purple barrier.

Already, the Jiang, Nie, and Lan leaders were analyzing the battle, trying to figure out how to respond ~~when~~ if the real Wens attacked them.

Back on the bridge, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng had joined Madam Yu in looking over at the barrier, the latter helping support the former's weight.

Seeing how injured Wei Wuxian was, another quick rush of emotion swept through Madam Yu. She knew Wei Wuxian was powerful — so powerful that even she couldn't question his position as head disciple — but Zidian was far from child's play to deal with.

If he now had to fight-

('At least you didn't cut off his hand yet,' some small part of her said.)

The golden arrays continued to smash into the Jiang Sect's barrier.

"A-Niang, what…" Jiang Cheng began, eyes wide and fearful.

"Don't panic," Madam Yu responded. "The barrier of our Jiang Clan can't be easily broken by the Wen Clan."

And, indeed, she was right: the golden arrays weren't making a dent in the Jiang Clan's shield.

But Jiang Fengmian couldn't shake the feeling that this wouldn't be so easy.

“Hm,” Wen Chao huffed from his boat, seeing the repeated failures. “Like a mantis trying to stop a chariot.”

The glare Lan Qiren sent the real Wen Chao crushed any elation he might have felt. Yes, the Wens might be succeeding now, but they all know that, eventually, the Wens would lose.

“Pass my order,” Wen Chao commanded. “Continue the onslaught! We must conquer Lotus Cove today!”

“Yes.”

“Don’t worry,” Jin Zixuan whispered to the slightly-panicking Yanli. “I’m sure it’ll be fine. We already know both your brothers survive, right?”

She nodded hesitantly.

Far away, in the calm of the star-lit lake, Jiang Fengmian looked down at the hairpin in his hands again. Upon closer inspection, it became obvious that the part which had broken earlier was repaired.

Seeing Jiang Fengmian made Lan Xichen’s breath pick up, and his Father’s fate rang in his ears. Honestly speaking, he barely knew the man. He and Wangji had seen their mother more often.

And yet the idea that he was dead in this other-future sent a wave of confliction and grief though him. Based on his brother’s expression, Xichen knew Wangji felt the same way.

“Master,” a senior nodded once. “The hairpin looks much better after being repaired. Yu-furen will definitely like it.”

Jiang Fengmian smiled slightly.

Another vicious sting of jealousy swept through Madam Jin.

“Sect leader! Something happened!” someone shouted behind him.

“What is it?”

‘Please let me make it back in time,’ Jiang Fengmian prayed. Even Qingheng-jun, who barely counted as a sect leader, had been there when the Cloud Recess was attacked.

How much of a failure would he be if he only returned after all was said and done?

“The purple flame surrounds the sky around Lotus Cove! I think the barrier’s been opened!”

Jiang Fengmian instantly stood up. Without wasting a second, he grabbed his sword and motioned for his disciples to come with him.

“All disciples of Yunmeng Jiang, follow me!” he commanded.

They sped through the air as fast as they could.

Scoffing lightly, Madam Yu insistently told herself that she didn't need her husband to be there; she would do just fine.

(The guilt she felt over how the other-her had just treated Wei Wuxian was irrelevant.)

Still leaning on Jiang Cheng's shoulder for support, Wei Wuxian frowned, "The barrier won't last much longer."

He was right to say so, as the Wens' continuous assault was wearing on the barrier. It would hold for a little while longer, but was far from a permanent solution.

Silently, Jiang Fengmian, Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren pondered how they could improve their defense and evacuation strategies once they got out. Especially since the Wens, who were, unfortunately, also watching, might change their plan of attack.

After thinking that over for a moment, Wei Wuxian glanced back at Jiang Cheng and asked, "When will Uncle Jiang be back?"

"Late tonight," Jiang Cheng answered. "They really picked the perfect time to attack."

Guilt once again flooded Jiang Fengmian and he thought, 'I should never have left. Why did I think the Wens would actually give back the swords just because I asked?'

His naivety would have disastrous consequences.

In the center of the pier, nine Jiang seniors circled around each other focused their energy in the center, powering the barrier. It was relatively stable.

Then, the watchers saw a flash of red behind them.

"No-"

"Wen Zhuliu!"

Dancing through them, Wen Zhuliu shattered their cores in less than an instant.

Jiang Yanli looked away.

"The barrier!" Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian realized. However, they were too late; they could only watch in horror as the now unpowered barrier dissipated before their eyes.

Madam Yu tsked, "Should never have let him inside."

"It might not have been as much of a problem if you hadn't injured Wei Wuxian beforehand," Wen Ruohan responded easily. The ferocious glares sent his way did nothing to deter him.

After all, everyone knew he wasn't wrong. Wei Wuxian's core was healing his injuries as fast as it could, but he clearly had no where near the reaction speed or power he normally would.

Truly, the perfect time to attack.

Back on the boats, Wen Chao watched the collapsing barrier with unhidden glee. When the Wen elder next to him announced that the barrier had been broken, he lifted his hand and gestured toward the pier.

"Shoot," he ordered.

A million flaming arrows rained down from the sky.

"Sect Leader Jiang?" Lan Qiren asked, glancing at the man after hearing a shaky breath. Although the Wens had also burned the Cloud Recesses down (killing his brother in the process), Lan Qiren hadn't been forced to watch his sect's destruction in its entirety.

That wasn't true for Jiang Fengmian.

However, breathing deeply, Jiang Fengmian simply shook his head to show that he was fine. They needed to keep watching.

A hurricane of fire fell towards Lotus Pier, the thousands of arrow painting the sky red. Screams resounded as they landed, instantly killing any Jiang Disciples unlucky enough to have been in the line of fire.

Jiang Yanli turned away. This wasn't just a massacre of strangers — she knew these people. She had talked to them just a few days ago, before being brought into the simulation.

People she had spent years living with were now dying on the ground.

"A-Li," Jin Zixuan began, but Jiang Yanli shook her head. The screams of her friends rang all too loudly in her ears.

Although he couldn't touch her, Jin Zixuan did the best he could. Copying what he had seen from Nie Mingjue and Nie Huaisang, he moved close enough that his fiance could curl up in his chest, divided from the scene before them.

But regardless of who was watching, the carnage continued. Lotus Pier's wooden halls were lit on fire by the attack, and soon the formerly tranquil land was blazing a brighter red than even The Nightless City. Buildings collapsed as the fire spread, and the proud flags of Yunmeng Jiang burned to ashes.

Trembling in his seat, Jiang Cheng couldn't make himself look away. Before his horrified gaze, his home — the legacy he was meant to inherent — burned to ash.

Even when Lan Wangji and Nie Huaisang moved closer to him in a show of support, Jiang Cheng couldn't do anything. All he could see was the massacre taking place.

"Damn Wen dogs!" he cursed, ignoring the amused smirk Wen Ruohan sent him.

The Wen army landed, easily cutting through the unprepared Jiang disciples. Despite the valiant effort they put forward, it seemed like the Jiangs were outnumbered nearly one hundred to one. Disciple after disciple was cut down.

Blood sprayed on the burning ground.

Revulsion moved up Wen Qing's throat until she could taste it, but she forced herself to keep watching. If nothing else, she had a duty to learn what her clan would do.

The strings of companionship which had been forming between her and Jiang Yanli snapped with every disciple that was killed.

Watching the massacre from the main hall of Lotus Pier, Yu Ziyuan's gaze turned venomous.

"Wen Chao, how dare you!"

Purple lightning shrouded her as she marched down the steps of the Pier towards the battle. Stepping through the fire, she walked with her head held high, glowing with power. Two silhouettes appeared behind her.

Madam Yu, Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian were ready to fight.

Hope began rising in the chests of the watchers.

The trio marched towards the Wen disciples, who attacked at once. Zidian threw them into the air and they slammed against the hard ground. When the next wave came, the boys moved.

Unsheathing their swords, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng cut through the attacking disciples like butter. No one could lay a hand on them, and no one had any chance of standing against them. The two stolen Wen swords slit the throats of dozens of Wen disciples in a second.

Although Madam Yu had often been away from the Pier on night hunts, the trio fought as though they'd been working together for years. One by one, the Wens fell. Yu Ziyuan was a fierce tiger; Jiang Cheng was a brutal storm; Wei Wuxian was a shooting star, only visible as the quick gleam of a blade due to how his and hair clothes blended into the night.

But, compared to what he should be, he was-

'Slow,' Jin Guangshan thought. Jiang Cheng's backup helped Wei Wuxian immensely, but it was extremely obvious how much the whipping impeded his movement. It was only due to his ridiculously superior skill that Wei Wuxian was managing to beat back the attacks.

And yet, every time he stepped a little too fast, or dodged a little to quickly, pain flashed across Wei Wuxian's face and he winced in agony. His breaths were speeding up unhealthily quickly, and stress clouded his eyes.

As Wei Wuxian slashed the chest of a Wen, he convulsed as if acid was spreading across his back. Clenching his teeth, Wei Wuxian sank to his knees and tried to power through the agony he felt. The fresh wounds from Zidian screamed at him in anguish. He had moved too fast, too soon, and now his injuries were biting through his flesh and cutting into his bone. He let out a shaky breath, trying to force his trembling body to continue fighting. Despite his attempts, he couldn't move.

Behind him, a Wen raised his blade.

Lan Wangji's heart stopped.

Wei Wuxian jumped left, dodging by a hair's breadth. The Wen's blade cut a thin sliver into his robes as he moved, missing his skin by less than an inch.

But it had missed nonetheless.

A second later, Wei Wuxian decapitated the Wen and rejoined the fight.

Relief poured through Lan Wangji, and he sank to his knees. Wide eyed, he felt his heartbeat slowly returning, pouding so loudly in his ears that it echoed.

"Why is he still fighting?" Wangji whispered. "He can't. He's too injured, he — he won't last like this."

Perhaps the worst thing was that no one even tried to disagree with him.

Even as his body screamed in protest, Wei Wuxian continued to fight. More and more Wen Disciples fell to his blade, painting the ground as crimson as the fire they had spread. Jiang Cheng did the same.

Then, Wen Zhuliu appeared.

"No!" Madam Yu stood.

"Watch out, Jiang Cheng!" Wei Wuxian shouted, shoving his brother out of the way. Thanks to that, Wen Zhuliu's hand landed on a shoulder instead of a chest, rendering it incapable of destroying the core.

Not* incapable of slamming into a whip mark, however.

As Wei Wuxian gasped in pain, Lan Wangji felt his heart skip a beat in fear.

(Wen Qing no longer cared if the Jiangs didn't trust her; she would give Wei Wuxian an examination whether he liked it or not.)

"Wei Ying!" Madam Yu shouted, which was his only warning to dodge before Zidian slammed down where he had been a moment ago.

Zidian and Wen Zhuliu made contact, sending a shockwave of dust into the air. The watchers were temporarily blinded by the covering, and when their vision returned

Madam Yu was locked into deadly combat with Wen Zhuliu.

"Go A-Niang," Jiang Cheng whispered. "You can do it."

As had been made evident in the meeting hall, Yu Ziyuan was not well-equipped to handle someone of Wen Zhuliu's caliber. Her best efforts were thrown off or ducked under, causing her to be driven back.

However, that was far from saying her resistance was pointless. As Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng worked to take down the Wen army, she managed to keep Wen Zhuliu occupied and unable to stop them.

For a moment, it looked like they might have a chance.

If Jiang Fengmian got back now, they might be able to survive. Hope began to consume them again.

A piece of a building fell down and momentarily separated the fighters, giving Wen Zhuliu time to grab a Wen corpse off the ground. He threw it towards Madam Yu.

When Zidian attacked, a stray bit of blood fell into her eyes.

"A-Niang!"

In the current situation, no one cared about the corpse desecration Wen Zhuliu had done. Their culture frowned upon it, but, compared to everything else the Wens had done, it seemed so meaningless now. They were starting to see why the adult Wei Wuxian didn't mind.

Temporarily blinded, Madam Yu was caught off guard by Wen Zhuliu's next attack. Instead of defending, she rushed to the side and grabbed both Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng by the backs of their collars.

"Let's go!" she shouted, jumping over the wall.

"Running away?" Wen Chao cackled.

"You're not even fighting you miserable little-"

"Chao-er, stay silent," Wen Ruohan ordered, interrupting Madam Yu. Despite speaking to his son, his eyes were fully centered on the simulated Wei Wuxian. Throughout the entire fight, Wei Wuxian had proved his capabilities again and again. Even with heavy injuries impeeding him, Wei Wuxian had managed to take down an astonishing number of Wens.

He might be getting dragged away now, but the fact that he was able to last so long spoke wonders of his core's strength and his mental discipline.

Of course, that also meant his injuries were even worse now.

Wei Wuxian winced as Madam Yu pulled him along, but simply gritted his teeth and allowed it to happen. Finally, the trio landed next to the river on the opposite side of the Wens' approach.

Wei Wuxian was thrown into the boat, gasping when his back made contact with the wood.

"Wei-xiong!"

"Wei Ying, you wretched boy!"

"What?"

"I…" Madam Yu breathed out, unable to contain her anger. "You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look at what our sect has turned into because of you!"

Absolute silence followed that statement.

Chest heaving, Wei Wuxian glanced away, unable to say anything in response.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji whispered. "It's not your-"

"A-Niang, what can we do now?" Jiang Cheng asked hesitantly.

"What do you mean 'what do we do?' Can't you see it? They came here prepared! Today's fight couldn't have been avoided! Soon afterwards there'll be herds of Wen-dogs arriving!"

Lan Qiren turned, "Yes, they came for a fight, but it was for the office. Wen Ruohan wouldn't care about Wei-"

"Oh, be silent!" Madam Yu hissed, causing the Lans' Acting Sect Leader to raise a brow in disapproval.

"Today's battle was inevitable," Madam Yu decided, twisting Zidian a few times. Then, in an act that surprised everyone involved, she pulled Zidian off.

"No," Jiang Cheng whispered, remembering who had used Zidian in the 13-years later segments. "No, no, you can't-"

"...A-Niang, why are you giving me Zidian?"

Uncharacteristically, Madam Yu hesitated. Then, carefully, she straightened her son's collar and responded "I've given it to you, so it'll be yours from now on. Zidian has already recognized you as its master!"

"No," Jiang Cheng repeated. "Please, please-"

Patting her son's head, Madam Yu ordered, "Go find your sister in Meishan. Go, and never return."

The weight of the situation settled over the crowd.

To Jiang Cheng, the rest of the world seemed to be drowned out. All he could see was his mother leaving him Zidian and not going with him and yes, he had seen what happened to the other Jiang disciples during this but this was his mom and she was so strong and brave and now-

"A-Niang?" he asked again, eyes as wide as an innocent child's. "Aren't you coming with us?"

Jiang Cheng was pulled into her embrace.

Madam Yu hugged him so tightly that it seemed like she wanted to turn Jiang Cheng into a baby again and stuff him in her stomach, where nobody could hurt him, and nobody could tear them apart. Jiang Cheng had never been hugged by his mother like this, much less kissed. And yet, here he was, being held tightly as she kissed his hair a few times.

Tears began to fall down Jiang Cheng's face.

"Good boy," she whispered as a silver tear fell down her own face.

No one knew what to say.

Then, Madam Yu shoved Jiang Cheng towards the boat as well. Wei Wuxian caught him, but Jiang Cheng's mind was entirely focused on his mother.

"A-Niang?! What are you doing?"

Purple lightning flared, wrapping around both Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian in an instant, binding them in place so they couldn't chase after her.

"When you get to safety, Zidian will untie," she explained. "Wei Ying!"

He looked up.

"Wei Ying, listen to me. Protect A-Cheng. You have to protect him even if you die, understand?"

"Madam Yu-"

"Got it? Don't tell me any nonsense! I'm asking if you understand!"

Wei Wuxian lowered his head in submission.

For some reason, Madam Yu's stomach turned at the scene. For years, she had insisted that Wei Wuxian was not a member of their family, no matter how much he wanted to be. For years, she had used his father's status to drive a wedge between him and Jiang Cheng. For years, she had accused his mother and her husband of disloyalty, driving a different kind of wedge between him and her children.

And, in less than a week, the simulation had changed all that.

Now she stared at her other-self, a woman who truly and genuinely believed Wei Wuxian was nothing more than a servant, and felt something within her break.

“A-Niang!” Jiang Cheng shouted. “A-Die’s still on the way! Can’t we face this together?”

“And so what if he’s not back yet?!” Madam Yu shouted. “Can I not live on without him?”

With that, she turned on her heel — robes fluttering in the wind — and walked back towards the burning pier.

“San-niang,” Jiang Fengmian whispered. There was no judgement in his voice, and no mocking either; just a deep, unquestionable sorrow.

The boat began to drift away, and Jiang Cheng cried out in desperation.

“A-Niang!” he shouted, unable to get any closer. “A-Niang!”

Jiang Yanli felt tears fall.

“A-Niang!”

As Jiang Cheng’s voice echoed through the night, the world faded to black.

‘I wasn’t there,’ Jiang Fengmian thought. ‘I didn’t make it back in time.’

“...How?”

The Jiangs looked over.

“How could you blame Wei Ying for this?” Lan Wangji asked, staring brokenly at where the simulated Wei Wuxian had been. “The Cloud Recesses had already been attacked and it was a month after the Xuanwu cave! They were only there for the Supervisory Office.”

“You think I don’t know that?” Madam Yu hissed, glaring at the Second Jade. “But if he hadn’t-”

“If he hadn’t saved my son’s life?” Madam Jin demanded.

None of the Jiangs had a response.

The boat Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng were on drifted across the water. Shaking, Jiang Cheng knelt down and tried to understand how this could have happened.

Lotus Pier burned in the distance.

Wiping his tears, Jiang Cheng defended his mother with a shaky, “W-well, Lotus Cove is gone now. It’s just… if he had just kept his head down maybe we’d have had more-”

“A-Cheng,” Jiang Fengmian whispered. Jiang Cheng flinched and looked down, knowing that what he had said was the opposite of his sect’s motto.

“The Cloud Recesses were attacked before the cave.”

Madam Yu scoffed in faked confidence, “Well, that only happened because of the archery competition. If Wei Wuxian just knew how to avoid attracting attention-”

“Excuse me?” Lan Qiren demanded, cutting Madam Yu off. “Are you saying my nephews should have held themselves back and not shown their true abilities to avoid offending the Wens?”

“I’m saying-”

“If you really hate him so much,” Wen Ruohan growled. “Then hand him over to someone who will value him.”

For once, there was no smile on his face. Wen Ruohan genuinely and honestly couldn’t understand why the Jiang Sect would look at Wei Wuxian’s bravery, loyalty, and talent, and decide to do everything in their power to squash his potential. They gained nothing from blaming him.

“Do you really think we’ll just hand him over to you?” Jiang Fengmian asked.

“Give him to anyone,” Wen Ruohan responded, glaring at Jiang Fengmian. “Your wife blamed him for your sect’s destruction even though we all know it wasn’t his fault. Between how she talks to Jiang Cheng and how she speaks to Wei Wuxian, it’s obvious that she sees him as nothing more than a servant-”

“I know!” Madam Yu shouted. “I know it wasn’t his fault.”

No one could believe what they were hearing.

“Then why do you-”

“Well, Jiang Fengmian loves him!” Madam Yu declared. “Shouldn’t that be enough?”

Just then, Wei Wuxian saw a gleam to his right.

“A-Die!” Yanli shouted, her teary eyes gleaming with hope.

Brightening, Jiang Cheng began to shout, “A-Die! A-Die!”

Jiang Fengmian wanted to be happy — wanted to feel relieved — but felt doubts creeping in.

”You call that being allies? The Jiangs raised him like their own, but almost all of them were killed because of him!”

“I…” Madam Yu breathed out, unable to contain her anger. “You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look at what our sect has turned into because of you!”

Was this what they had been talking about? Then, didn’t that mean he failed? Didn’t it mean that Jiang Fengmian’s presence couldn’t save his sect? Didn’t that mean it was going to be destroyed now?

Didn’t that mean it was never Wei Wuxian’s fault to begin with?

Seeing the pair, Jiang Fengmian gestured for his men to move forward without him, and went down to his son.

“A-Cheng, A-Xian? What happened?”

He had only seen the barrier rise. This Jiang Fengmian didn’t know the Wens were attacking.

“A-Die! A-Die, let us go!”

Hesitantly, Jiang Fengmian reached a hand out, responding, “This is your mother’s Zidian. Zidian knows its masters, I don’t think it would let me-”

The second he touched Zidian, it acknowledged the area as safe and retracted, turning back into a ring and wrapping around one of Jiang Fengmian’s fingers.

He froze.

“...San-Niang?” he asked, shocked. She refused to make eye contact.

Madam Yu had let Zidian recognize Jiang Fengmian as a master.

Looking at it like this, Madam Jin couldn’t help feeling like the arguments Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian always had were completely unnecessary.

And now, her friend was going to die without ever having realized that.

Having been released from the electric net, Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian both collapsed to the sides, panting heavily.

“What’s going on?” Jiang Fengmian asked. “Why were you two trapped with Zidian?”

Jiang Cheng instantly clutched Jiang Fengmian’s legs and explained, “The Wen Sect’s people came here! A-Niang had an argument with them and started fighting with the core-melting hand! A-Die, let’s go back and help her! Let’s go!”

“The Core Melting Hand?”

“Yes, A-Die, we-”

Before he could finish speaking, Zidian had wrapped around him and Wei Wuxian again, tying them up.

“Good,” Madam Yu said. Now, her son would be safe.

And Jiang Fengmian had ensured Wei Wuxian would be safe too.

She had expected that thought to fill her with dread or annoyance, but there was nothing there. She had defended Wei Wuxian’s flute playing in the second segment, and since then he had defended her daughter’s honor, her son’s life, her best friend’s son, and her son’s happiness.

And Jiang Fengmian did love her kids.

If he happened to love Wei Wuxian a little more, then she wasn’t happy, but she supposed, for now, she could accept that.

“...A-Die?” Jiang Cheng asked.

“I’m going back, you two leave. Don’t return to Lotus Pier. After you reach the shore, try to get to the Meishan Yu sect to find your sister and grandmother.”

“Uncle Jiang!”

“A-Die! Let me go! Let me go!”

“I will go back to find San-niang,” he explained.

Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian made eye contact, a strange rush of emotion twisting through them. In all honestly, they had failed; they were going to die.

But they were going to die together.

(Yes, regardless of who Jiang Fengmian loved more, Madam Yu supposed she could accept Wei Wuxian.)

“We-we can go back and find her together, can’t we?” Jiang Cheng asked desperately.

Yanli moved closer to him, hoping to provide comfort.

Jiang Fengmian stared into his eyes, then reached out. Only after pausing in the air for a moment did he finally touch Jiang Cheng’s head.

“A-Cheng, be well.”

Jiang Cheng felt his eyes watering again.

“Uncle Jiang, if anything happens to you, he won’t be well,” Wei Wuxian pointed out.

Jiang Fengmian turned his eyes on him.

Despite what she had thought, Madam Yu would be somewhat annoyed if Jiang Fengmian told Wei Wuxian something like “I love you” without having told their son that.

“A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him.”

“...What?”

Nearly everyone thought they had misheard.

But Wei Wuxian seemed wholly unsurprised by the order. All along, he had known that Jiang Fengmian loved Jiang Cheng more than he loved him.

“What?!” Madam Yu repeated, disbelievingly.

From there, Jiang Fengmian mounted his sword and sped towards the burning pier, ignoring his son’s frantic cries of “A-Die!” and Wei Wuxian’s sorrowful gaze.

The pair’s boat drifted down the current.

Madam Yu sat down, still frozen, and tried to process what she had just seen.

After a flash-forward that brought them a great distance from the pier, Zidian finally loosened its hold and allowed them to escape, becoming a single silver ring around Jiang Cheng’s finger.

During the glimpse at the 13 years later future, Jiang Cheng had felt so triumphant seeing himself control Zidian. Now, all he felt was grief for everything they had lost.

Curling up into a ball, Jiang Cheng trembled.

(In the back of his mind, this thoughts raced. Wei Wuxian hadn’t been surprised at Jiang Fengmian’s instructions. When he said he was sure Jiang Fengmian loved Jiang Cheng more, he had meant it. Whenever he or his mother had complained about Wei Wuxian being favored, Wei Wuxian had known that wasn’t true.)

(Jiang Cheng wasn’t sure he was ready to dig too deeply into that yet.)

Now that they were free, the boys silently began paddling back to Lotus Pier.

“What did we tell you?!” Madam Yu demanded. “Do not come back. What part of that was hard to understand?”

Jiang Cheng shrank down under his parent’s disapproving gazes. Although Jiang Yanli had moved closer to in an attempt to provide comfort, it was clear to Jin Zixuan that she was too emotionally distressed to help her brother right now.

Silently, he moved between them, smiling reassuringly when they glanced over.

The watchers were then yanked forward in time and brought back to Lotus Pier. The fire covering the pier made the water reflect orange and red, a far cry from the purples it was meant to have.

The Yunmeng Jiang Sect was gone now.

A mournful silence passed over the Lans and Nies, and social niceties kept the Wens and Jins from making any comments quite yet. The Jiangs stared at the ruined mess of their home, grief quickly filling their hearts.

A torn up piece of cloth from a Jiang disciple's uniform drifted across the water lightly. Reaching a shaky hand forward, Jiang Cheng pulled it up.

Denial was painted across his face, but the harsh reality was clearly laid out before him. No matter how much he didn't want to, Jiang Cheng knew what he was seeing was true.

Lan Wangji glanced over, realizing that this was probably even worse than the state the Cloud Recesses had been left in. Silently, he and Nie Huaisang joined Jin Zixuan in sitting next to the Jiang siblings.

The creams and light browns of Lotus Pier were now an ugly, black charcoal, falling to pieces as the still-raging fire broke down the manor's pillars. A charred flag in front of the pier tilted, then fell over.

Proudly, a Wen disciple sauntered past the corpses of Jiang disciples and stepped on top of the fallen flag.

Any sense of victory Wen Chao might have felt was instantly crushed by the dark hate sent his way on all sides.

"Damn Wen-dogs," Jiang Cheng repeated. The gazes of everyone else conveyed the same.

The Pier was overflowing with Wens, dozens of disciples walking around every corner. The Wen Sect was about as big as the four other great sects combined; they had brought a force nearly double the size of Lotus Pier's for the extermination. The countless bodies on the ground proved the state of things.

It had been a massacre.

"You monsters," Jiang Cheng hissed, glaring at Wen Chao. "How could you?"

"Wha-I wasn't the only one!"

"You really think that makes this better?!" Nie Mingjue bellowed. "Rest assured, we'll repay this act two-fold! Not a single Wen will be left alive!"

"I look forward to seeing you try," Wen Ruohan responded.

Shuddering slightly, Wen Qing closed her eyes.

(Of course Wei Wuxian would kill Wen Ning. After this, why would he hesitate? It wouldn't matter to him that A-Ning hasn't done anything.)

Simultaneously, Wen Qing and Jiang Yanli froze; they were both now uncomfortably aware of the fact that the real Wei Wuxian and Wen Ning were together outside the simulation.

‘Please, please, don’t let him kill my brother,’ they both thought.

The dozens of Wen ships approached the Pier, their sun flags standing proudly before the carnage. Zooming out, the watchers were able to see Jiang Cheng, staring in horror at the conquered pier.

Wei Wuxian immediately pushed him underwater, keeping him out of sight as a ship passed by.

‘Good,’ Madam Yu thought. ‘Keep him safe.’

She wasn’t ready to think about her husband’s last words to the boys quite yet.

Once the ship was out of range, Wei Wuxian hesitantly allowed Jiang Cheng to come up. As the Jiang heir — Sect Leader, now? — stared in despair at the discarded sliver of fabric, Wei Wuxian’s attention remained entirely focused on him. He had been told to protect Jiang Cheng.

Now, that seemed to be the only thing he could think about.

Lan Wangji frowned, praying desperately that Wei Wuxian wouldn’t sacrifice too much of himself in an effort to follow his leaders’ last orders.

Forcing a smile, Wei Wuxian reminded “Yu-furen is so skilful, and Uncle Jiang… Uncle Jiang is also back. It’s going to be okay. There’s a waterway leading to the Drill Ground. Let’s go in first.”

Madam Yu was still annoyed at Wei Wuxian for returning, but the level of care he was putting into keeping Jiang Cheng safe reassured her somewhat.

(“A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him,” Jiang Fengmian had said.

No matter how many times it repeated in her head, Madam Yu still couldn’t figure out — couldn’t understand — couldn’t accept — those words. What did they mean?)

Shocked and scared, Jiang Cheng seemed to have no sense of direction. As they moved, Wei Wuxian kept one hand on Jiang Cheng’s sleeve, tugging him this way and that through the pier.

At the Drill Ground, corpse after corpse was dragged along. The Wens were moving the Jiang disciples’ bodies in lines for easier disposal.

Once the Wens had left to get another corpse, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng rose out of the water. Sneaking close to the wall, the pair remained behind cover as they approached the foreground. Silently, Jiang Cheng sneaked towards an opening to peak inside.

He instantly faltered.

Piles and piles and piles of dead Yunmeng Jiang disciples covered every square inch of the ground like grass. There were hills of corpses that towered as tall as a person, and rivers of blood flowed down them.

Fourth shidi was added to the closest pile.

Nausea stuck Huaisang, and he was forced to look away. Similarly, Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji felt bile creeping up in their throats from the actions of the Wen Clan. Even Wen Qing felt her heart skip a beat when she saw just how many corpses there were.

On the other hand, neither of the Jiang siblings would be able to look away even if they wanted to. How could they, when a scene straight out of their darkest nightmares was on display before them?

"You…" Nie Mingjue took a deep breath, then turned to stare at Wen Ruohan. "You will not get away with this."

Simultaneously, Lan Qiren, Lan Xichen, Madam Yu, Jiang Fengmian, and Madam Jin all nodded in agreement; an alliance had been created. The tension was overflowing.

Wide-eyed and horrified, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng could do nothing but stare in shock at the bodies of their martial siblings piled on the ground.

"A-Niang," Jiang Cheng whispered, glancing around. "A-Die."

When he saw them, he almost wished he hadn't. After all, what attracted his attention in that direction was Wen Chao's voice, comforting the simpering Wang Lingjiao with empty words.

"Stop crying. You'll look ugly if you cry."

"Will you not like me anymore if I look ugly?" she whined.

"Of course not, I'll like my Jiaojiao no matter what she looks like."

Behind the wall, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng were gritting their teeth tightly enough to crush diamond.

As Madam Yu looked at Wen Chao, she mentally contemplated whether she could sever his spine and force him to swallow it whole.

Eyes glistening with emotion, Wang Lingjiao continued, "I was so, so scared, Wen-er-gongzi! That bitch hit me so hard-"

Jiang Cheng leapt forward, only to be pulled back by Wei Wuxian.

"Good, keep him safe," Madam Yu hissed, gratitude for Wei Wuxian sinking back into her.

On the side, however, Lan Qiren, Madam Jin, and many of the other adults felt disgusted. The last things Madam Yu had said to Wei Wuxian was how much she hated him, right before ordering him to defend her son.

That meant she knew beyond a shadow of a doubt that Wei Wuxian would protect Jiang Cheng regardless of what she did to him. It meant she could abuse him all she wanted without receiving any retaliation.

It meant the chains binding Wei Wuxian to the Jiangs were just as strong as the ones binding Wen Zhuliu to the Wens.

Wang Lingjiao continued, "Today I really… I was so close to believing I'd be killed and wouldn't ever get to see you again!"

"I wish," Jin Zixuan hissed.

"Wen-er-gongzi, I-"

Wen Chao embraced her, comforting, "Stop talking, Jiaojiao. It's alright now. It's a good thing Wen Zhuliu protected you."

"You're still mentioning him? Wen Zhuliu, I hate him. If he hadn't arrived so late today, I wouldn't have had to suffer so much! Even now my face still hurts."

"Wasn't she the one who ordered him to stay farther away?"

"I'm sorry it hurts. Here, let me touch it…. I know you don't like how slow Wen Zhuliu was, but don't challenge his limit. His level of cultivation is really high. My father still wants to use him for a few more years."

"Use him to murder innocents?" Lan Xichen demanded. Some part of him wanted to pity Wen Zhuliu for having to put up with Wen Chao, but that was greatly outweighed by his disgust at the man. Anyone who completely abandoned their moral code for the sake of past debts and loyalty deserved to be kicked down.

"So what… so what if he's a talent?" she complained, obviously wanting him to be punished. However, no matter how much he liked Wang Lingjiao, Wen Chao wasn't going to punish his personal guard just because she said so.

Seeing her continued whining and pettiness, Madam Jin scoffed, "Does she have no pride?"

"I guess not," Madam Yu agreed.

"No need to worry, Jiaojiao. I punished the one who hurt your face."

Hearing that, Wang Lingjiao smirked and wiped away her fake tears.

"That old witch deserved it," she said, glancing back.

The simulation went into focus, and the surroundings which had been blurred out suddenly became visible.

"A-Niang!" Jiang Cheng shouted, his voice breaking into a million pieces.

Jiang Yanli froze, then went numb. The hand she had been using to wipe her eyes fell to her side, limb and motionless, and all the blood drained from her face.

Laughing once, she continued, "Madam Yu used her family's power to force Jiang Fengmian to marry her. But, despite all that effort, her husband never liked her. Everyone mocked her, yet she's still so prideful."

Madam Yu's body knelt before them, kept upright only by her grip on her sword. Grinning maliciously, Wang Lingjiao grabbed Madam Yu's hair and forced her head up.

"San-niang," Jiang Fengmian gasped in despair.

Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian tensed.

"It's retribution for her to end up like this," Wang Lingjiao decided.

The gathered crowd couldn't wait to see what retribution she would encounter.

The Wen Sect would lose, they reminded themselves. It wasn't over yet.

"Bitch, weren't you going to break my hand?" Wang Lingjiao asked, smirking mockingly. "Do it!"

After she commanded the corpse, she threw Madam Yu against the wall. The Jiang matriarch's body slumped dead against the cold ground.

Jiang Fengmian, who had unconsciously reached out to try and catch her, felt himself break as she phased through his body. Lotus Pier was lost; there was nothing they could do.

Wang Lingjiao raised her hand to slap Madam Yu, only for Wen Zhuliu to reach out and stop her.

"Yu Ziyuan comes from a well-known family," he reminded. "You can kill her, but don't insult."

Wang Lingjiao felt her earlier anger returning anew.

"If you feel any respect for them, then why follow Wen Ruohan's orders?!" Nie Mingjue growled.

"Because I know how to keep people loyal," Wen Ruohan answered, then glanced at the Jiangs. "Now that you've wrongly blamed him for your sect's destruction, is it really a surprise that he ends up leaving the Jiang Sect and falling to demonic cultivation?"

"You say that like you have nothing to do with this!" Jiang Cheng shouted. Any fear he might have felt towards the Chief Cultivator had long-since been overwhelmed by rage.

“I’m not denying my role in it, but I think it’s far more interesting to think about how you have contributed to his fall.”

No one could deny that.

After a pause, Wen Chao humphed and said, “Look at her now. She’s quite beautiful. Why didn’t Jiang Fengmian like her?”

“Yu Ziyuan was too fierce,” Wang Lingjiao answered. “She often went around slapping and whipping people. She has no manners whatsoever. Jiang Fengmian has been so burdened since he married her. He’s really the unluckiest man ever.”

Instantly, Wei Wuxian’s expression collapsed into horror.

“Uncle Jiang.”

Jiang Fengmian knelt nearby, a sword pierced through his chest.

Wen Chao laughed, “And in the end, he and Yu Ziyuan got their cores crushed!”

Madam Yu was going to flay Wen Zhuliu alive.

Wen Chao continued, “Women should be like my Jiaojiao! Obedient and gentle, caring for nobody but me.”

Madam Jin gagged.

“Of course I care for nobody but you. Who else would I care for?”

Even Jiang Yanli cringed in disgust at Wang Lingjiao’s words.

Suddenly, another voice barged in, “Young Master Wen! All the houses have been searched already! Over two thousand four hundred treasures have been counted! They’re being categorized at the moment.”

‘Those belong to Lotus Pier!’ Wei Wuxian screamed mentally. ‘Those belong to the Jiang Sect!’

The Jiangs, Nies, Lans, and Jin Zixuan nodded furiously.

Madam Yu, for once, felt completely in agreement with her husband’s favorite child.

(No, she supposed she couldn’t call him the “favorite” now.)

“Well done! Well done!” Wen Chao laughed. “We should have a grand celebration! Tonight, we’ll have a banquet here! Make use of everything!”

“Around the bodies of dead Jiang disciples?” Nie Huaisang realized, disturbed by how gleeful Wen Chao looked at the prospect.

“Young Master Wen, congratulations on moving into Lotus Pier,” Wang Lingjiao sang.

“What Lotus Pier? Change the name! Bring down any door covered with the nine-petal lotus crest and replace them with the Qishan Wen Sect’s sun crest!”

“This is what you want to do?” Jiang Fengmian demanded, turning to Wen Ruohan. When faced with such a scene, not even Jin Guangshan would be shameless enough to claim to be righteous.

But the man just shrugged in response, his attention entirely focused on the simulated Wei Wuxian.

Still laughing, Wen Chao concluded, “The Yunmeng Jiang Sect is finished.”

He walked toward Jiang Fengmian and pulled out the sword embedded in his chest, causing the hairpin which had been hidden in his robes to fall out, landing between them.

It was the one he had fixed for Madam Yu.

Wei Wuxian was fine — kind, heroic — and not at all interested in taking the position of heir from Jiang Cheng. Jiang Cheng was loved — fiercely, deeply — and was always going to be heir. Jiang Fengmian was impartial — loved Wei Wuxian less, in fact. Madam Yu was cared for — her hairpin had been fixed.

And now the other-her was dead, with her last words to Wei Wuxian blaming him for something that would have happened regardless.

Had the other-her really wasted the entirety of her life hating him?

(Yes. The answer was yes.)

Laughing, Wen Chao walked off. A lone Jiang flag broke off a pole, fluttering down to land on Jiang Fengmian’s shoulder. As he watched the destruction, Jiang Cheng’s eyes grew as large as the Xuanwu’s.

“The bodies have also been counted. Over 1,500 were Yunmeng disciples,” someone reported.

Wei Wuxian glanced over nervously, but Jiang Cheng wasn’t listening to them anymore. Instead, his attention was completely focused on his parents’ bodies. Not taking his eyes off them, Jiang Cheng slowly began sinking to his knees.

The despair was starting to consume him.

The real Jiang Cheng just felt numb.

Right as he got to the ground, Jiang Cheng’s hand accidentally snapped off a piece of burnt wood.

Wen Zhuliu glanced over.

“A-Cheng!”

A Wen disciple who was coincidentally in the way flinched under Wen Zhuliu’s gaze. After a moment of thought, the Core Melting Hand turned back around.

Everyone breathed out a sigh of relief.

Behind the wall, Wei Wuxian listened carefully for any sign that they were caught, keeping a hand tightly wrapped around Jiang Cheng’s mouth to keep him silent.

Jiang Cheng fought to escape.

“A-Cheng!” Jiang Fengmian hissed.

“No, no — do not try to escape,” Madam Yu ordered. “Are you trying to die?!”

Unfortunately, the answer to that might be ‘yes.’

As Wang Lingjiao continued congratulating Wen Chao, Jiang Cheng fought viciously against Wei Wuxian’s hold. He squirmed and pulled and hit, but Wei Wuxian kept a tight grip on his heir.

The charge he had been tasked with protecting.

Flushing, Jiang Cheng looked away. Seeing such a direct comparison between his and Wei Wuxian’s reactions, he couldn’t help but feel like an out of control child. Why did Wei Wuxian have to take care of him?

(Why hadn’t his father told them to take care of each other?)

An enormous Wen Flag was dropped from the center-hall’s roof. Hundreds of voices then spoke at once, the victors of the war they had started:

“Congratulations on becoming the owner of Yunmeng, Wen-er-gongzi!”

“It. Won’t. Happen.”

Even when Wen Chao squeaked under Madam Yu’s threat, Wen Ruohan and Wen Qing offered no assistance.

(Wen Chao was so annoyed! If Jiang Cheng had been scared, Wei Wuxian would do whatever it took to help him. Wen Chao now completely understood why his father wanted the boy.)

“Wen-er-gongzi,” someone said. “Jiang Cheng, the son of Jiang Fengmian and Yu Ziyuan, and Wei Wuxian have escaped.”

Those words only made Jiang Cheng fight back harder, causing Wei Wuxian to grit his teeth from the exertion of keeping his brother restrained.

“Idiot boy!’ Madam Yu shouted. “What do you hope to accomplish by getting found now?”

“I can’t just stand there and listen to them!”

“You can and you will,” Jiang Fengmian objected.

Jiang Cheng fought harder.

“Wei Wuxian should never have brought you back here-”

“I don’t need to be babysat by him!”

“Obviously, you do,” Jin Guangshan responded, causing both Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian to glare. The Jin Sect Leader didn’t mind however; he only cared about Wen Ruohan’s reaction.

The man nodded, understanding the implication.

(Even with what Jin Guangshan had seen, he was still willing to support the Wens.)

Madam Jin growled.

“Pass my order,” Wen Chao decided. “Hunt all disciples of the Jiang Clan down.”

At those words, Jiang Cheng’s tolerance snapped.

He bit through Wei Wuxian’s hand, drawing blood. When his head disciple winced back in pain, they shuffled. The movement made a sound.

“Who’s there?” Wen Chao shouted.

“Run!” Yanli begged.

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji whispered.

Wen Chao made a motion with his head, and, a second later, Wen Zhuliu moved. He ran towards the wall the boys were hiding behind, crossing the distance in an instant.

Jiang Fengmian stood up, terror sinking in.

But, when Wen Zhuliu got to the other side of the wall, there was no one there.

“Thank god for Wei Wuxian,” Madam Yu sighed. A part of her couldn’t believe she would ever admit that.

The rest of her was too grateful to care.

(She swore she wouldn’t rest until every Wen was a corpse in the ground.)

At first, it was silent; they were shown an ominous grove of trees at twilight. Then, they heard the sounds of tumbling, grunting, and exertion — a struggle.

The fighting and resistance became louder and louder as time went on. Heavy breathing and pained grunts echoed through the otherwise-silent clearing as two people fought each other. One began snarling ferociously.

If anything, it sounded like a fight with an animal.

"Jiang Cheng, what are you doing?" Wei Wuxian shouted, his voice raw and breaking. "Don't go back there!"

Wei Wuxian had his arms wrapped around Jiang Cheng's chest, desperately trying to keep him from running forward. The pair went back and forth, struggling for dominance.

"You better keep a tight hold on him, Wei Wuxian," Madam Yu hissed, and Jiang Fengmian nodded once in agreement.

However, there was an unmistakable wildness to the fight. It wasn't martial arts or sword fighting or spoken manipulation, it was two grief-filled boys battling each other with raw physical strength.

As Jiang Cheng pushed forward, Wei Wuxian pulled back. As Jiang Cheng clawed, Wei Wuxian held strong. As the Jiang heir fought, the to-be Yiling Patriarch stayed calm. Jiang Cheng became angrier and angrier and fiercer and fiercer and wilder and wilder and soon he was trying to power through with his hate and grief and vengeance and resentment-

"Wen Chao is still there! If you go back, you'll be killed!"

Wei Wuxian's words only made Jiang Cheng angrier. He growled, grunted, fought and struggled and yanked and hissed and Wei Wuxian pulled — got in his way — was trying to stop him-

"I know you want revenge! But not now!"

Jiang Cheng fought more.

"Did you forget what your mother said?!"

Now, finally, his words seemed to get through to Jiang Cheng. The other boy's resistance paused.

Seeing that Jiang Cheng had transitioned from animalistic growling to a calmer heavy breathing, relief filled Wei Wuxian's eyes and he let go.

"Just run," Jiang Yanli begged.

"Jiang Cheng," he whispered. "It's never too late to take revenge. We can-"

Jiang Cheng turned and backhanded him.

“Wei Ying!” Lan Wangji shouted, instantly running to his side.

The two moved apart; a bruise rapidly formed on Wei Wuxian’s face.

“Jiang-”

“Why? Why?! Just why?” Jiang Cheng shouted, staggering towards Wei Wuxian. “Are you happy now? Are you satisfied?!”

Jiang Cheng looked down.

Unlike his other-self, the real Jiang Cheng’s mind wasn’t clouded by grief. His parents were watching next to him, alive, and in fact closer than they had ever been before.

But he understood his other-self. He saw the trauma and grief “he” had gone through, and knew he would do the same. The simulation was still painfully accurate.

“Why did you have to save Lan Wangji?!” he shouted.

His lightning-fast punch knocked Wei Wuxian off his feet. The only reason he didn’t fall was the grip Jiang Cheng had on his collar, pulling the lapels apart and leaving Wei Wuxian with no defense.

“Why did you do that?!” he shouted, shaking Wei Wuxian back and forth, madness seemingly creeping in.

Lan Wangji frowned, “Stop-”

“I don’t care if Lan Wangji or Jin Zixuan dies! Just let them die! What’s their deaths got to do with us?! With our sect?! Why did this have to happen?!”

Lan Wangji's mouth snapped shut.

The next punch brought Wei Wuxian to the ground. The whip-wounds on his back screamed on impact, and the bruises on his face were becoming darker and darker.

Then, Jiang Cheng reached his hands forward, and wrapped them around Wei Wuxian’s neck.

“No,” Lan Wangji whispered, kneeling down and trying to push off the vision’s Jiang Cheng, but phasing through with every attempt. “Get off. Get off. Get off!”

“Why?!” Jiang Cheng repeated, slowly adding tension to his hand until Wei Wuxian was gagging.

“Wei Ying!”

“A-Xian!”

“Why?! Why?! Why?!” Jiang Cheng shouted, his eyes going feral as he squeezed Wei Wuxian’s neck with all his might. “Why did you save Lan Wangji? Why did you have to speak up?! How many times have I told you not to stir up trouble?! Not to strike? Did you really want to play the hero that badly? Well, have you seen the result of you playing hero? Are you happy now?!”

Stunned, Jiang Cheng stepped closer-

“Don’t touch him!” Lan Wangji shouted, turning to growl at the real Jiang Cheng. Logically, he knew the simulated-Jiang Cheng was grieving. Logically, he knew the real one couldn’t change the simulation even if he wanted to. Logically, he knew the real Jiang Cheng wasn’t trying to do that.

But behind him was a Jiang Cheng choking Wei Ying.

Trembling, Jiang Cheng stumbled backwards, unable to argue.

“Go to hell!” Jiang Cheng shouted squeezing even tighter. “They should all just go to hell!”

Wei Wuxian’s face had become red under the strain. Slowly, he brought his hand to touch Jiang Cheng’s arm, whispering “Jiang Cheng.”

But Jiang Cheng seemed like he couldn’t hear him, still squeezing and choking with all his might. Soon, his face split into a deranged smile, and he began to laugh.

He laughed and laughed and laughed, and all the while kept choking Wei Wuxian.

And all the while, Wei Wuxian simply laid there and took it.

‘This is wrong,’ Jiang Cheng thought. Beyond the morality of it — beyond the fact that the burning of the Cloud Recesses proved it would have happened regardless — there was something wrong.

He had never, ever been able to beat Wei Wuxian. Grief or not — whipping or not — Jiang Cheng wasn’t more powerful. And yet Wei Wuxian was being slammed to the ground and choked.

Not once had he put up even the slightest bit of resistance.

Now, finally, Jiang Cheng couldn’t take it anymore. He sank to his knees, tears streaming down his cheeks.

“Fight back, idiot!” he screamed, voice shattering like glass.

The laughter was not a happy one, and it continued and continued and continued as Jiang Cheng’s hands squeezed around Wei Wuxian’s open and pliant neck.

The laughter shook the grotto they were in, and soon became a sob of agony. The hands around his neck suddenly loosened, and tears fell onto Wei Wuxian’s bruised face.

Trembling, Jiang Cheng shook with genuine sobs, and his cries made his voice crack in his misery.

"I want my parents back."

Slowly, one by one, drops of rain began to fall from the sky. In it, Jiang Cheng's anguished cries sounded even more painful, and the world's darkness seemed overwhelming.

The simulation focused on Wei Wuxian, as he lifted one hand to shield his eyes from the rain.

"I want my parents back!" Jiang Cheng repeated, screaming out in unparalleled grief.

'The Wens would have come regardless of what Wei Wuxian did,' Jiang Cheng knew. 'But-but maybe they'd have come a little later — maybe we would have had a little more time. Maybe we could have turned things around.'

It was a foolish thought, but one he couldn't help thinking.

'Why? Why? Why? Why?'

Trembling, Wei Wuxian struggled to breathe. He had pink bruises on his face, deep purple on his neck, whip scars on his back, and orders from both his guardians to worry about Jiang Cheng's safety before his own.

A tear finally fell down his face.

The simulation faded to black, then returned them to the usual white void.

Even after the simulation had faded away, Jiang Cheng couldn't move. He kneeled next to his family, staring in horror at the place where his simulated-self had been just moments ago.

His eyes burned, and warm streams of liquid fell down his face.

He could feel his heart shattering.

"Hello everyone!!!" someone shouted at full volume.

The tone was so wrong — indescribably out of place — that the watchers thought the simulation had started again.

"Uncle Jiang? Shijie? Sect Leaders? Jiang Cheng? Madam Yu? Hellooo? Anyone there?"

Nothing.

"Everyone?"

Finally, Jiang Cheng blinked twice, realizing that the voice wasn't from the simulation.

"...Wei… Wei Ying?" he asked, voice breaking as he spoke.

"Eh? Jiang Cheng? What's wrong with your voice?"

"I… you… it's you?" he breathed out, gasping for air. Tears continued to pour down his face.

"...It's me," Wei Wuxian confirmed. "Uncle Jiang said I should check in every once in a while, so… here I am. Is everything alright? You sound sorta… off."

'I just saw my other-self try to kill you,' Jiang Cheng thought, approaching hysteria. 'How am I supposed to feel?!'

"What are…" he tried and failed to speak. "What are you… why are you…"

"W-we're fine, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli reassured, shaking in her seat. She wanted to sound confident, convincing, and clear, but couldn't stop the tremble in her voice as she recalled how her mother was going to cut off his hand and then blamed the sect's destruction on him and then her dad abandoned him and Jiang Cheng choked him and now-

"Shijie? What's wrong? You sound…" he paused, unwilling to throw her weakness out in the open when it was clear she was trying to hide it. "Did someone say something? Who was it?!"

"No one… no one said anything, A-Xian."

Wei Wuxian made a dissatisfied noise like he wanted to protest, but couldn't given who was listening to their conversation. Lan Qiren really, really hoped the privacy-thing would be done soon.

"Do you have an update for us?" Madam Yu asked. Unlike her usual snark and hisses when speaking to him, Madam Yu's question was completely toneless. There wasn't blame nor apology; Yu Ziyuan had gotten so overwhelmed in the past few minutes that she had simply shut her emotions down.

She was completely blank.

That, more than even Jiang Yanli's tearful words, unsettled the Jiang Sect's head disciple.

"I…" his initial cheer had completely vanished. "Uh, it's going well. It's been about four days since you were all trapped inside. We got the rest of the instructions for the privacy thing — oh, uh, Mo Xuanyu called it a "Concealment Zone" — and now we just need to synch it up to Wen Ning. Apparently someone from his bloodline will have an easier time manipulating the structure. Um, I sent a thank-you video back to Mo Xuanyu. The-the other sects are doing well too. Should I… should I do anything for you?"

Although he had transitioned to a more serious tone, Jiang Cheng couldn't shake the feeling that there was now an uncrossable divide between him and Wei Wuxian. Wei Wuxian sounded more solemn now, but he didn't understand. He had no idea what Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian and even Jiang Cheng had done to him. He was worried for them and not because of them and he shouldn't be worried about that because they were brothers but his other-self had still attacked and what was he supposed to do now that he knew-

"Wei Wuxian."

"Hm?"

"If… if I got really angry and started genuinely choking you for something that wasn't your fault, you would fight back, right?"

"I… I mean yeah, of course. Why wouldn't I?"

He sounded like he genuinely believed that.

But they all knew that wasn't true. They knew he would simply lie there and take it and not fight back and not resist and he sounded so confused because he didn't understand that he wouldn't fight back and they knew and he didn't and Jiang Cheng couldn't talk to him anymore.

"...Leave," Jiang Cheng requested, shaking.

"I… Jiang Cheng-"

"Please, just leave!" he shouted, curling in on himself and covering his ears with his hands.

"I… what? I can't just-"

"A-Xian-"

"Is something wrong? Why do you want me to-"

"A-Xian," Jiang Fengmian sternly interrupted. "Please leave."

"But, I-"

"Please go, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered. "We… we can talk later, okay?"

"I… okay?" he deflated, giving up the fight. "Um, just remember, you can leave at any time if it becomes too much."

"Thank you, but we… we can't leave now," Jiang Fengmian answered.

"...Alright, tell me if you need anything," Wei Wuxian requested softly, sounding almost as vulnerable as when he had first realized Madam Yu was going to cut off his hand.

(But still falling so, so short of that level of nervousness. Because he didn't understand.)

Considering what had just happened, was it any wonder he became the Yiling Patriarch? The Jiangs might as well have led him down the path themselves.

With that realization, none of them were willing to talk to the boy in question.

Wei Wuxian disconnected from the simulation.

For a while, silence reigned again.

Aside from the muffled sobbing of Jiang Yanli, the rest of the crowd was too stunned to say anything. What could be said after something like that? Half the watchers felt their eyes glistening, and the other half were forced to tremble in shock. Everyone was frozen.

Well, almost everyone.

"What is wrong with you?" Wen Ruohan asked looking at Madam Yu.

His audacity left most of the watchers gaping in disbelief.

"Wha-wrong with me?"

"You attack my sect, and then question us?" Jiang Fengmian added on, standing up. "How dare you?"

Hearing Wei Wuxian's voice had clearly shaken him, but he was still the least affected of all the Jiangs. Growling, Nie Mingjue looked over from where he knelt, protectively wrapped around Huaisang.

"Sect Leader Wen, do you really think you have any right to ask them that?" he demanded. "I feel like I need to ask whether you've already planned on putting up Supervisory Offices!"

"Ha! If you all weren't so cowardly, maybe it wouldn't have gotten to this point!" Wen Chao shouted, parroting things he'd heard his father say earlier.

"Yes, we should have taken action to stop you," Lan Qiren admitted. "That doesn't make you any less deplorable."

"For trying to set up an office that would ensure Yunmeng's citizens are well cared for? We only attacked after Madam Yu tried to kill our messenger."

"Yeah!" Wen Chao copied his father. "You deserve it for slapping Jiaojiao! What were you expecting after harming my woman unprovoked?!"

"Unprovoked? You'd brought an army!" Madam Yu reminded.

"It was long past time to respond," Jiang Fengmian agreed.

"And that was worth the annihilation of your sect?"

Hissing, Madam Yu responded, "You expected us to fight back because death was a better fate then surrendering to you! What, was it 'their own fault' when the Lans refused to burn down their library? We all know your attack was inevitable! Stop pretending like it happened because of us!"

“Oh? That’s not what the other-you said,” Wen Ruohan laughed, then settled into a malicious smirk.

“You disgusting Wen-dogs! This is what you were planning, and you dare to question people who just laid down their lives to stop you?”

“You raise no fuss as long as it’s smaller sects, but as soon as your own are in danger I can’t be tolerated?” he asked, making the crowd flinch back. Their hesitance before had been more than understandable; thousands would surely die in the war, and there was the risk of annihilation. Only an idiot would upset the Wen Sect for nothing.

“All these years, and the Lan Sect still hasn’t changed. Why bother being so polite? Hilarious!”

“But if we keep letting them get away with things, there’ll be a disaster sooner or later!”

“In this situation, it’s impossible to only worry about yourself and hope that no blood will be lost.”

But Wei Wuxian was truly the biggest idiot alive.

Laughing slightly, Wen Ruohan continued, “We all agreed to not punish for things that have yet to happen, right?”

“That… that’s different-”

“I see. Well, if you insist on being hypocritical, I suppose I can’t stop you.”

Silence reigned. Even with the knowledge that they would be attacked in a few years, people were hesitant to argue against sect leader Wen. He had a renowned position, grand lineage, and the world’s strongest army at his beck and call.

And what he was saying was just right enough to render them speechless.

“...S-still, what makes you think that you have any right to question us?”

“Because of Wei Wuxian,” Wen Ruohan responded, his smirk disappearing and being replaced by a cold disapproval. “Based on what we’ve seen, several things are undeniable. The boy is smart and courageous and innovative and talented and confident and loyal and you seem to be doing everything in your power to squash those traits in him! I must admit, no matter what I’ve done to other sects, even I’ve never blamed my most loyal disciple for a disaster that would have happened regardless.”

The Jiangs flinched.

Everyone wanted to object. The simulated-Jiang Fengmian had just lost everything, and that-Madam Yu had been brave and self-sacrificing and motherly and skillful and had died, but-

But.

No one could excuse the way she had treated Wei Wuxian.

Not even herself.

“A-Niang and everyone knows that it wasn’t really his fault, he was just an excuse,” Jiang Cheng admitted. “It-it’s fine though. Wei Wuxian is strong, he’ll be — he can take-”

“He can take Madam Yu whipping him half to death right before you choke him and nearly bring him to rest of the way?” Wen Qing asked. “I admit Madam Yu held back enough to not kill him, but that is not an acceptable limit.”

Wen Qing didn’t want to support Wen Ruohan too much in this — disagreed with everything their sect had just done, in fact — but she couldn’t let this go.

“I… I-”

“Yeah!” Wen Chao added. “I may not like Wen Zhuliu, but even I wouldn’t try to kill him for something that wasn’t his fault.”

“I wasn’t trying to kill him-”

Wen Ruohan openly laughed at that, but didn’t say another word.

“If we’re not going to punish you for things that haven’t happened, you can’t raise objections over this,” Jiang Fengmian argued, standing in front of Jiang Cheng protectively.

“I’ll admit we can’t punish him for something that hasn’t happened,” Wen Ruohan allowed, “But there are other concerns. I’m sure you noticed, but Wei Wuxian didn’t even fight back.”

Jaws snapped shut.

Wen Ruohan stared at the Jiangs, and thought.

He expected Wen Zhuliu to be willing to lay down his life to follow orders. Wen Ruohan was his benefactor. Had secured his loyalty and even adopted him into the clan. He had saved Wen Zhuliu when no one else would, as the rest of the world was far too scared of the Core Melting Hand to offer assistance.

Wei Wuxian was different.

From what Wen Ruohan remembered, Wei Wuxian had spent four years living on the streets. While Jiang Fengmian’s help was greatly appreciated, Wei Wuxian likely would have survived regardless. Taking him in was several degrees less than what Wen Ruohan had done for Wen Zhuliu, and meant Wei Wuxian had more options. The Jiangs had instead earned his loyalty by treating him as family. They didn’t respect his power or leadership or talent, but their interpersonal relationships maintained their bond. Although that was different from Wen Ruohan’s usual strategy, he found it acceptable nonetheless.

And yet, Wei Wuxian hadn’t been surprised when both Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian prioritized Jiang Cheng’s safety over his. They had proven once and for all that he wasn’t really part of the family. Anyone else would have felt their loyalty shatter at those words.

But Wei Wuxian had never thought of himself as part of the family. Madam Yu had shouted to the whole world that she hated and blamed him, but could still expect him to defend her son with his life and be right about that. Jiang Cheng had choked him, but Madam Yu had known that even with that the boy would never hurt Jiang Cheng. Wei Wuxian, one of the main reasons the Wen Sect lost the war, was held on the four great sects' side by a string that looked paper thin but was actually denser than titanium.

Wen Ruohan didn't understand.

If Wei Wuxian hadn't fought back even here, then why did he kill Jiang Yanli?

How had the Jiang boy regained Wei Wuxian's allegiance?

What would it take to change Wei Wuxian's loyalty?

Wen Ruohan didn't know.

And he hated that.

"He…" Jiang Cheng trailed off. "I shouldn't have done that. I was… I wasn't thinking clearly, but-but neither was he! He didn't fight back, but he normally would. He always wins when we fight with each other. It doesn't mean-"

"Doesn't it?"

"Your Excellency," Jiang Yanli stood. "Please, that's not true."

"A-Xian is like a member of our family," Jiang Fengmian agreed.

Jin Guangshan glanced over, and saw his son nervously glancing back and forth. It was clear that he wanted to support his fiancee, but hesitated. Considering what Jiang Cheng had said, the hesitation was no surprise.

Madam Jin, on the other hand, barreled forward.

"Yes," she hissed, turning to her (former?) friend. "Certainly, part of your family. So close to you all, that it took the crime of saving A-Xuan's life for you to abandon him."

Yanli flinched.

"That's not what we're doing!" Jiang Cheng shouted.

"Really? Because I'm pretty sure I just heard you say that what happens to the Jin isn't your problem. Then I suppose you shouldn't expect any help from us now that your precious Lotus Pier has been burned down!"

Madam Yu growled, "Enough-"

“And you too Ziyuan!” Madam Jin interrupted. “I thought you cared. But I guess my son’s life means nothing to you. I wonder, did my A-Xuan have Jin Ling without ever knowing what his brother in law thought? Did he ever learn that Jiang Cheng choked Wei Wuxian over this?”

”I don’t care if Lan Wangji or Jin Zixuan dies! Just let them die!” Jiang Cheng had shouted, digging his fingers into the soft flesh of Wei Wuxian’s neck.

Jiang Yanli’s eyes drifted to her fiancee and then immediately darted away. Jin Zixuan refused to make eye contact with her or her brother, trying to sift through his own feelings on the matter.

(Their friendship had nearly ended when the simulated Jin Zixuan made a few rude remarks. This was very, very different.)

“I… I was just angry,” Jiang Cheng protested. “I wouldn’t actually-”

“You tried to kill Wei Ying," Lan Wangji snapped. "Whether you meant it or not, there would have been no coming back from that." Neither Lan Qiren nor Lan Xichen blamed him for the interruption. After all, Jiang Cheng had made it quite clear that he wished Lan Wangji had died.

(They knew it was said in grief. They knew that. But-)

“I wouldn’t have.”

“Then what were you trying to do?”

Jiang Cheng looked away.

“So, what do you want for him?” Wen Ruohan asked, making the crowd’s angry eyes turn back to him.

“...Excuse me?”

“We’ve established that he shouldn’t stay with you. Not only do you put him at a physical risk, but you don’t even seem to want him. However, as you seem hesitant now, I’m willing to make a trade for Wei Wuxian. So, name your price.”

Horror rose in Jiang Cheng’s chest.

“You… you — he’s not an animal up for sale!”

“Just a target for you and your mother to project your anger onto?” Wen Chao laughed.

“So, what?” Madam Yu hissed. “Just because he lives at my house, I have a responsibility to be a mother to him?”

“You don’t have to treat him like a son, but he deserves to be treated like your head disciple.”

“He is!”

“When they were picking lotus seeds, you specifically targeted Wei Wuxian when whipping. No one thought it was unusual, and none of you were all that surprised when it was shown,” Lan Xichen pointed out, glancing at the Jiangs. Before, Lan Wangji, Jin Zixuan, or Nie Huaisang might have stepped in to defend them.

Now, they were silent.

(They knew it was only done in anger. They knew it was from grief. They knew Jiang Cheng would never do that normally… but that was hard to remember.)

Madam Yu huffed, “Is enacting punishment not within my power as the mistress of the house?”

“‘Within your power’ doesn’t mean you should do it.”

“The bare minimum would probably include not wrongfully blaming the massacre of his friends and family on him! The least you can do is admit that was wrong.”

“Fine! It's not true. Happy?”

“And the other stuff? Do you not regret that at all?”

Normally, Madam Yu would have shouted at them — sect leaders or not — for having the arrogance to try and command her. However, to everyone’s surprise, she instead fell silent.

(The disease known as guilt was spreading through every one of her cells.)

“...A-Niang?”

“...Fine,” she decided. “Fine. I was… wrong.”

For a moment, no one knew what to say.

“...Well, I’m not sure about forcing Wei Wuxian away from the pier,” Lan Qiren explained. “But if he’s willing, the Lan Sect would be happy to watch over him for a while.”

“As would the Nie,” Nie Mingjue added. He hated seemingly agreeing with Wen Ruohan, but his brother loved spending time with Wei Wuxian; if he could help the kid, he would.

Then, smiling politely, Jin Guangshan added, “The Jin would gladly accept him as well.”

Wen Ruohan smirked, “I’m sure we can make it worth your time."

“I would rather you don’t try and buy my brother as though he’s a slave,” Jiang Yanli disagreed.

“Only your family gets to treat him like one?”

“We don’t!”

“The bruises seemed to disagree.”

“Shut up!” Jiang Cheng shouted.

“If you have problems with how we’ve treated Wei Wuxian, then speak to us,” Madam Yu ordered. “Or has the Wen Sect really fallen so low as to care about how children behave.”

“Won’t be children forever,” Jin Guangshan sang. “Everyone in the future thought Wei Wuxian had caused this. We know that’s not true, and everyone else who heard Madam Yu say it is dead. It seems to me that there’s only one person who could have spread that rumor wide enough for it to be accepted as true.”

Jiang Cheng flinched.

“If you want to wait, that’s fine with me, but don’t forget that ‘he’s just a child’ won’t work for much longer.”

Jiang Cheng wanted to protest — to say the simulation was wrong and that he would never choke his brother or say something like that — but he had seen every step of the way. He knew his other-self couldn’t help but blame Wei Wuxian.

(But surely someone else had spread the rumor. His other-self knew it wasn’t true. It must have been someone else.)

(Just an hour ago, he would never have considered questioning that.)

“We… we’ve already seen how little those rumors can be trusted,” Jiang Yanli objected. “They even said A-Cheng could have been the one to kill A-Xian!”

“You don’t think he did?”

“I don’t.”

Jiang Cheng looked over disbelievingly.

“Even when the adult A-Cheng tried killing ‘Mo Xuanyu,’ A-Xian never thought he was trying to ‘kill him again.’ Yes, A-Cheng acted in grief, but that is no indication of what will happen in the future.”

“...Alright then,” Nie Huaisang decided. “Let’s just get everything out of the way.”

He stood up and began walking towards the Jiangs. Most everyone turned to him in confusion, but Wen Ruohan glanced over speculatively.

(Should he assassinate the boy and frame it on bandits? Poison him? Or was there no point in hiding and he should attack as soon as they got out?)

Nie Mingjue growled, realizing what Wen Ruohan was thinking about.

Ignoring them, Nie Huaisang moved to stand directly in front of Jiang Cheng, making him step back slightly in fear. They maintained eye contact, one apprehensive, and one determined.

"You… don't agree, right?" Nie Huaisang asked, voice wobbling in nervousness.

"...What?"

Clearing his throat, Huaisang spoke clearly, "Do you agree with your other-self about what Wei Wuxian should have done in the Xuanwu cave?"

Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji both immediately glanced over. Although they had seemed judgemental earlier, Huaisang knew they were too terrified of the answer to ask. So, as the person who hadn't even been in the cave, he figured it was his job to ask for them. He waited patiently for Jiang Cheng to answer.

"I… no. No, of course not. I… even my other-self knew the Wens would have come eventually, and there was a month between the cave and just now. I… I mean I was…" Jiang Cheng's voice trailed off, growing quieter and quieter. "I was just upset. And-and I know I said he shouldn't have saved you even before this happened, but I was just-I was…"

"Scared, then grieving?" Nie Huaisang suggested, referring first to what the simulation's Jiang Cheng said by Wei Wuxian's hospital bed, and second to what he said while choking Wei Wuxian. "...I guess that's fair."

Both Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji thought it over. Yes, they were seeing versions of themselves that were older, but they were still just seventeen. How much could they really blame him?

'But he choked Wei Ying,' Lan Wangji thought.

'But he thought I was wrong to save Luo Qingyang,' Jin Zixuan remembered.

But then….

Madam Yu stormed forward to stand directly before Wei Wuxian's bed, brows raised, and shouted, 'To uphold justice at all costs is exactly how he is, isn't it? Fooling around even though he knew it would bring trouble to our sect?'

And more.

'Would Wen Chao have dared to do anything to the two Young Masters of the Gusulan and Lanlingjin sects? And even if he did, that'd just mean they ran out of luck! Since when was it his turn to play hero?'

And more.

'Wei Ying, you wretched boy! I... You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!'

Looking at it like this, was it really Jiang Cheng's fault he felt that way? How much could they blame a teenager for lashing out in pain?

(But why did it have to be Wei Ying who suffered for that?)

Then again, this Jiang Cheng hadn't done anything to the real Wei Wuxian. Could they really hold a grudge over this?

As the silence stretched on, Jiang Cheng became more and more uncomfortable. After looking back at his sister for help, she faltered slightly, then motioned to her fiancee.

She wanted him to act.

"I…" Jiang Cheng turned to Jin Zixuan, shaking in embarrassment, and said "If-if you had died to the Wens… Jin Ling would never have been born. And-and aside from that, you… you did the right thing. I mean… I'm sorry."

The last word was a barely-audible squeak, but Jin Zixuan understood nonetheless. He shrugged elegantly, then nodded once in forgiveness. It hadn't technically been Jiang Cheng who said it, but they both felt the apology and forgiveness were needed. Then, the harder one.

Right as Jiang Cheng looked towards Lan Wangji, he saw an icy storm approaching and jumped back. Lan Wangji wanted to speak first, it seemed.

After looking down at Jiang Cheng for several long, agonizing seconds, Wangji spoke.

"Never do that to Wei Ying."

A bright flush crept onto Jiang Cheng's cheeks, but he forced himself to nod and answer, "I-I won't. I promise. I… I'll never hurt him like that. If… If I do then you can… beat me down, I guess."

"I will," Lan Wangji promised.

Unlike the boys, Madam Jin and Madam Yu stood divided. What was said would not be forgiven so easily.

"Nothing to add?" Madam Jin coldly asked.

"You say that as though I've done something unforgivable," Madam Yu turned to Wen Ruohan. "I'll admit I was wrong, but what I did was nothing compared to burning down his home."

"I think it's pretty clear that, if Wang Lingjiao hadn't mentioned the Supervisory Office, Wei Wuxian would be down one limb," Wen Ruohan reminded, delighted by the way everyone flinched back at the image.

"...I know," Madam Yu admitted. "I'm not excusing that. I know he didn't deserve it. I…"

She trailed off, not know what else to say.

The simulation started again.

“Wei-gongzi,” the ghost general greeted. “I think there’s something you should look at.”

Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji looked at each other, then the former shrugged and stood up to follow Wen Ning. Lan Wangji set down several documents he was sorting through, then joined the two.

(Hanguang-jun really hated having the position of Chief Cultivator. When he and Wei Wuxian had returned from their honeymoon, the cultivation world had been in pandemonium. No one knew who to trust, and everyone was accusing each other of helping Jin Guangyao out behind closed doors. Evidence for that had mysteriously popped up everywhere, and it seemed like Jin Guangyao and Jin Guangshan had sunk their teeth into every sect at some point or another.

So the Sect Leaders had begged Lan Wangji to take the position. He was the only one they all felt certain would not follow in the three previous Chief Cultivators’ footsteps.

That didn’t mean he liked it.)

Just now, he and Wei Wuxian had in fact been discussing possible candidates who could take over Lan Wangji’s position. He would be the first Chief Cultivator in the past century to not die with the role. Wei Wuxian had called him an inspiration. And more.

(“Chief cultivator for only a few months? You know, it’s supposed to be a position held until death. Should I be worried about our ‘till death do us part vows?’” “Never,” Wangji growled, pulling the laughing Wei Wuxian close.)

Lan Wangji just wanted to get back to night hunting with his husband.

If that took helping Nie Huaisang move his reputation away from the “Headshaker,” then he would gladly do so.

He and Wei Wuxian come to a stop before a glowing red orb (the “Píngxíng Gateway” Wei Wuxian had decided, to the juniors’ resounding applause). Now, it was glowing in a strange blackish-red color Lan Wangji has never seen it have before.

“Is it alright?” he asked.

“I think so,” Wei Wuxian sang, slipping closer to inspect it. “It seems like the message-storage system works. Little-me must have sent something back while no one was around.”

Smiling fondly, he played the message. An illusionary projection of the younger Wei Wuxian — happy, innocent, unburdened — appeared above the Píngxíng Gateway.

“Hello!” the young Wei Wuxian called out, waving frantically. “I’m almost done with putting together the privacy-th — er, I mean, the Concealment Zone add-on. Thank you for your help!”

As he said that, there was an explosion of lotus petals from behind him.

Wen Ning jumped back in surprise.

“We decided to hold a party to celebrate almost being done, and we thought we’d include you in it! Can't send anything physical over, so A-Yue, one of my helpers, suggested this! Thanks for the help!” he said, as a young Wen Ning moved closer to pick some of the petals out of the young Wei Wuxian’s hair.

The adult Wei Wuxian squealed, “Lan Zhan, Lan Zhan, look! It’s a baby Wen Ning!”

“Young Master Wei,” Wen Ning protested.

“Mn. The little Wei Ying is cuter.”

“Lan Zhan, how dare you? That is factually incorrect!”

“Oh, and one last thing!” the younger Wei Wuxian declared. “You mentioned you thought it would be easier if someone from the Wen Qing's branch of the Wen Clan was there. Well, as you can see, I already have one!”

He gestured dramatically to the baby Wen Ning, who was continuing to pick flower petals out of his hair.

“H-hello,” the baby Wen Ning squeaked.

Adult Wei Wuxian began shaking the Ghost General, gleefully exclaiming, “Wen Ning! Wen Ning! Look, look! You’re so cute!”

“T-thank you, Wei-gongzi.”

Wei Wuxian was pleased; the Concealment Zone was based off The Ghost General's battle-mode, so no one could possibly manipulate it better than the baby Wen Ning could!

The younger Wei Wuxian continued, “Wen Xu gave us the go-ahead, so Wen Ning has full clearance to help me with this.”

“Hm?” Lan Wangji frowned. “Why would Wen Xu be the one to give clearance?”

“Though I guess that shouldn’t be a surprise,” Wei Wuxian laughed. “I mean, considering how his Excellency, Sect Leader Wen is inside the simulation, he’s probably just as eager as we are to finish this.”

The three adults froze.

“Anyways, bye!” young Wei Wuxian declared, and the message ended.

The three remained frozen.

Then, slowly, Wei Wuxian turned to look at Lan Wangji.

“...What did he just say?”

Chapter End Notes

Hi, everyone! Thank you for all your comments. I think I’ve made a decision! Concealment Zone = Privacy-thing. Píngxíng (parallel) Gateway = Time Travel Talisman (because it’s technically an orb and it makes a path to a parallel dimension and the pinyin of parallel sounds really cool). The “red orb” is technically the same thing, so that name will apply to both. Hope you like it!

The Ghost General, Hanguang-jun, and the Yiling Patriarch all stood, frozen in shock.

“What did he just say?” Wei Wuxian repeated, desperately hoping that one of the other two would reveal he had merely misheard. In Lan Wangji’s unusually expressive eyes, Wei Wuxian could see his own fear reflected back at him.

“I…” Wen Ning’s unblinking gaze seemed to flutter in disbelief. “I think he said… ‘Sect Leader Wen.’”

After a moment, Lan Wangji nodded, “The younger version of you said that ‘Sect Leader Wen’ is inside the simulation… getting information on the Sunshot Campaign.”

Holding one hand up in a stopping motion, Wei Wuxian took a few deep breaths as he tried to process that. Then, he spun on his heel, and left the room without another word.

“Eh? Wei-gongzi?” Wen Ning asked as both he and Lan Wangji hurried to follow behind him. “Wei-gongzi, where are we going? Are you… are you going to see Zewu-jun?”

“I wish,” Wei Wuxian huffed, speeding towards the library where he knew four mischievous radishes were working on the punishment he had given them (his punishment — what was the world coming to?). Rounding a corner, he stepped inside the library and laid eyes on his prey.

The first to notice them was Lan Jingyi. In addition to the fanboy-ish adoration he felt every time he laid eyes on Hanguang-jun, he felt a strange sense of deja vu. Right now, Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, and Wen Ning were approaching.

Hadn’t this happened just a few days ago, but with Sect Leader Jiang instead of The Ghost General?

“This doesn’t bode well,” he whispered to Sizhui, getting a reproachful flick in response.

Although their Senior Wei smiled slightly at the interaction, his lips were pursed together nervously.

“So,” he began abruptly, making Zizhen jump. “Maybe you could go over who, exactly, you sent our information to. You said you had the Píngxíng Gateway transmit everything back to

‘a young Hanguang-jun, a young Zewu-jun, a young Sect Leader Nie, a young Sect Leader Jiang, etcetera,’ right?”

Lan Sizhui nodded, “That’s exactly what we said.”

“What you said to me,” Wei Wuxian confirmed. “What intentions did you use to instruct the Píngxíng Gateway?”

Several long seconds of silence passed as the boys all looked at each other, waiting for one of the others to respond. Wei Wuxian impatiently tapped his fingernail against the table, making the boys even more nervous.

Sighing once, Lan Wangji ordered, “Sizhui, explain.”

“U-uh, well, I guess our original plan was to send it to you three, Jin Ling’s parents, Sect Leader Jiang’s parents, Sect Leader Jiang, Zewu-jun, Lan Qiren-xiansheng, Sect Leader Nie, and the former Sect Leader Nie. I suppose we just focused the Píngxíng Gateway on who people in that time considered the main branches of the Great Clans.”

“I see… and did it occur to you that, at the time you sent it to, there were five Great Sects?”

The quartet blinked in confusion for a moment.

Then went as pale as ghosts.

“I… that…”

“Um, but,” Jin Ling shook his head. “Wait, you mean the Wen Sect, right? I… we-of course we wouldn’t send it to them. We’re not stupid!”

Lan Wangji looked like he wanted to contest that.

“I… we didn’t,” Lan Jingyi declared.

“...Right?” Zizhen asked, uncertain.

Jingyi and Jin Ling both glared at him, but his eyes were focused on the pensive Wei Wuxian.

After a pause, Wei Wuxian decided, “I’m not entirely sure. We have some evidence that indicates you might have, but I’m still not sure how much to trust it.”

Wen Ning frowned, “But Wei-gongzi-”

“I’ve messed up plenty already,” Wei Wuxian interrupted, shaking his head at Wen Ning. “I shouldn’t have let this be used to begin with. The least I can do is complete a thorough investigation before doing anything else.”

“How are you going to do that?” Lan Wangji asked, frowning at the thought of his soulmate adding more work to his already packed schedule. Wei Wuxian just shrugged.

“The end goal with this device was to create simple communication between dimensions. Being able to check in on the people stuck inside the memory-packages was part of it. I’ve got most of that feature done already. It won’t be all that much extra work to speed up the completion time.”

Both Wen Ning and Lan Wangji looked absurdly sceptical.

“...I think,” Wei Wuxian added.

The scepticism turned into annoyed glares. In response, Wei Wuxian just gave a casual shrug, regaining his usual smile and standing up.

“So, I feel a sudden need to ask if you actually know what information you sent over. You said you explained the Sunshot Campaign to them? In how much detail? Who did you focus on?”

More silence.

“...Zizhen, answer,” Hanguang-jun instructed.

“Uh, well, I mean… we understand what we sent over… theoretically?”

“What does that mean?”

“W-well we used inquiry to talk to the spirits putting the memory-package together, and they wanted us to narrate some things. So we… know it covers the Xuanwu cave? And Jin Guangyao, and-”

“So you just narrated over lessons?”

“We narrated over their memories of the events!” Lan Jingyi declared. “Either there would be a spirit who had been there, or, like in the Cloud Recesses, there was a trace of spiritual energy we could get an impression off. The spirits wanted to include one or two scenes which took place in the Jingshi, for example. No spirits or other people were there, but there was a spiritual imprint we could use.”

“And who taught you how to do that?” Wei Wuxian asked. Even he had only realized the existence of spiritual imprints a few months ago. Who on earth could have taught the juniors about it?

The boys paused and looked at each other.

“...Senior Wei, you taught us,” Sizhui explained. “You were… pretty tired that time too. You and Hanguang-jun had just finished planning the seating arrangement for your wedding, and you were a little drained so you… might have rambled a bit about what you were working on.”

“I… did?” Wei Wuxian asked, staring blankly. Everyone else sighed, despairing at Wei Wuxian’s selective memory.

Standing up, Jin Ling nodded and declared, “W-well, your own carelessness was the cause, so I don’t think you can blame us all that much for what happened!”

A squeak resounded as Wei Wuxian pinched Jin Ling’s ear.

“Hey! Hey! Stop!”

The other three attempted a tactical retreat. However, a moment later, Wei Wuxian had gotten hold of Zizhen’s ear as well, and Lan Wangji and Wen Ning were keeping Jingyi and Sizhui still, respectively.

“Ow! What’s this for!”

“A reminder that you couldn’t have messed up more!”

With one final tug, Wei Wuxian finally let go.

Jin Ling scampered away, only to be caught by Wen Ning when he tried to escape.

Lan Jingyi whimpered, “Are we going to get a more serious punishment now?”

The three adults made eye contact. Due to their personal experiences — Lan Wangji with the discipline whip, Wen Ning at the Jin’s camp, and Wei Wuxian with Madam Yu — none of them enjoyed assigning corporal punishments. Besides, in a case like this, where the children couldn't see the consequences of their actions, it wouldn't change much.

Regardless of how many whips they were given, the juniors wouldn't register how dangerous their actions were.

“No,” Wei Wuxian decided. “Instead, you’re going to help me figure out whether the Wens are actually there. By doing that, maybe you’ll start to understand why I don’t want you to mess with my inventions.”

“Oh,” Zizhen blinked. “That actually sounds kinda fun-”

“And an additional twenty five copies to what you’ve already been assigned,” Lan Wangji added.

“...What?"

“Hey-”

“You-”

“Senior Wei, have mercy!” Lan Jingyi cried out, hoping an appeal to their punisher's husband would result in a lighter sentence. “Weren’t you constantly punished by Hanguang-jun back when you were a student here? How can you be so cruel? My hand is starting to fall off!”

Pitying his friends, Sizhui spoke up, “Technically, there’s no rule against sending information to the past and starting a parallel universe. I… that’s because your invention is new, but if it’s not on the wall of rules, I don't think we've technically broken any."

"Do not act impulsively," Lan Wangji recited. "Be careful with your words. Be of one mind. Be strict with yourself. Do not cause damage. Steer away from bad men. Do not be over-the-top. Speak meagerly, for too many words only bring harm. Do not-"

"Lan Zhan, I think they get it," Wei Wuxian laughed.

"Senior Wei breaks some of those every day!" Jin Ling protested.

When Lan Wangji didn't even blink, Jin Ling quickly backed down.

Sizhui turned hopeful eyes on his uncle, but Wen Ning simply shook his head, and Sizhui resigned himself to his fate. He hadn't minded too much, but the others were devastated.

Ignoring the way the other three turned boneless and tried sinking into the floor, Sizhui picked up his brush, and returned to his lines.

In the dim light of a cloudy day, a gust of wind swept through a grassy clearing.

"When the daylight began to arrive, Sect Leader Jiang-"

"Call him 'Jiang Wanyin,'" Sizhui reminded, cutting Jingyi off. "He's not Sect Leader yet."

"But isn't this after the Lotus Pier Massacre?"

The Jiangs flinched at the casual description.

"I'm not," Jiang Cheng mumbled, exhausted after his earlier crying. "Not sect leader."

All his life, he had trained to be a great Sect Leader.

Now, his chance was here, and there was nothing he wanted less.

Sizhui and Jingyi hadn't seemed to come to an agreement, so Jin Ling shouted, "Whatever! When daylight began to arrive, my jiujiu had become numb!"

"Whatever that means," Jingyi mumbled, then cleared his throat. "Throughout the night, he had managed to sleep a couple of times. This was partly due to passing out after exhausting himself… crying?"

"...My Jiujiu doesn't cry."

"Don't look at me! That's what the spirits told us to say!"

When Wei Wuxian had called at the end of the last segment, there had been a divide in understanding. Wei Wuxian didn't have any idea what Madam Yu, Sect Leader Jiang, and even Jiang Cheng were willing to do to him, so having a conversation was more than a little awkward.

With these children it went even further. At least Wei Wuxian understood war, violence, and sacrifice. These kids seemed unbelievably sheltered.

'But that's what we're fighting for, isn't it?' Xichen wondered.

Once again, Sizhui continued as his friends began to bicker, "The second reason was that he had a faint hope that everything had just been a nightmare. He hoped he would be able to wake up after resting for a while and find himself in his room in Lotus Pier. His father would be wiping his sword in the main hall. His mother would be angry again and complaining, scolding Wei Wuxian for winking in a funny way. His sister would be in the kitchen, thinking about what she could make today. His shidi would be refusing to do their morning lessons properly and jumping around."

"They'll never jump around again," Jin Zixuan whispered, then winced when his words made Jiang Yanli flinch. He wanted to apologize, but he had a feeling that would just make everything worse. After all, they both knew what he'd said was true.

How could everything the Jiangs had be lost in a single night?

"Instead, Jiang Wanyin woke up in a bush full of weeds with his head almost bursting apart. He was still curled up on the barren hill."

Madam Yu breathed out sharply through her nose in frustration.

"The first to move was Wei Wuxian."

"Of course it was," Jiang Cheng couldn't help but bitterly whisper. Although the words did make Jiang Yanli smile slightly, she was also worried; if their narrators felt they needed to specify this, then what was the simulation's Jiang Cheng doing?

Hands on his legs, the simulated Wei Wuxian managed to push himself up and suggested, "Let's go."

There was no response. In fact, Jiang Cheng hadn't moved at all, simply lying there and observing the heavy clouds floating above. Wei Wuxian frowned.

"Let's go," he repeated, pulling at his shidi.

While Jiang Cheng flushed at his other-self's behavior, no one could blame him. After what they had just seen, hopelessness wasn't a surprise. In fact, the strange reaction was probably Wei Wuxian's. Considering how much closer he seemed to all the JIang shidi, Wei Wuxian had arguably lost more. And yet here he was, working on finding a solution and keeping everyone alive — exactly what the Jiangs ordered him to do.

They had created a perfect guard dog, hadn't they?

"...Go where?" Jiang Cheng finally asked. His throat was dry and cracking.

“Just do as Wei Wuxian says,” Jiang Cheng begged his other-self, sighing slightly.

“We’ll go to the MeishanYu Sect. To find Shijie.”

“Should have just done that from the beginning!” Madam Yu hissed.

After a few moments of thought, Jiang Cheng got up on his own. The pair began walking to Meishan.

“Go Jiang-xiong. Go Wei-xiong,” Huaisang cheered. “Go Jiang-xiong. Go Wei-xiong. Go Jiang-xiong. Go-”

“Huaisang, stop,” Nie Mingjue sighed. His brother’s attempt to encourage and lift the dreary atmosphere was appreciated, but not especially desired right at that time.

In a town some distance from Yunmeng, the civilians talked.

“The Jiang Sect of Yunmeng? Isn’t it the largest sect in Jingchu?”

“Yes,” another person admitted, also looking at a set of posters. “But it can’t fight against the sun. Check the notice.”

Wei Wuxian passed behind them, wearing a straw hat which covered most of his face. He glanced over at the posters, then gasped.

“The late Jiang Clan of Yunmeng,” someone read.

Madam Yu growled. The head disciple and heir of the Jiang sect should not need to walk through their own territory like fugitives for crimes they didn’t commit.

And yet, the wall was lined with three accurately-drawn posters of Jiang Yanli, Jiang Cheng, and Wei Wuxian.

Madam Jin scoffed at the Wens, disgusted by their actions.

“In the past, they enjoyed playing around here. But now…”

“Things change. Life is unpredictable.”

Wei Wuxian tilted his hat down, then continued to walk.

Very true; even aside from all this (which they arguably should have seen coming), who could have predicted demonic cultivation? It seemed that in desperate situations, Wei Wuxian would truly attempt the impossible.

Still, Lan Qiren couldn’t excuse it. Wei Wuxian was heroic and righteous and talented and good, but, even given the dire circumstances, Lan Qiren couldn’t accept demonic cultivation. If Wei Wuxian was capable of fighting back with his spiritual cultivation, then him falling to demonic cultivation was inexcusable.

Though Lan Qiren could at least understand why the boy thought it was a good idea.

As he continued to travel through town, the people from earlier continued talking.

“I heard the trouble was caused by the senior disciple of the Yunmeng Jiang Clan.”

Wei Wuxian paused again.

“Oh, don’t you dare blame him!” Jin Zixuan shouted.

“They should not speak while they don’t understand,” Lan Wangji frowned.

“What Clan do you think will be targeted next?”

“...Hard to tell.”

When Wei Wuxian looked up again, he flinched back. Two Wen soldiers were patrolling the town in search of them.

Jiang Yanli felt her heart jump at the sight.

“So we’ll just let the Qishan Wen Clan do whatever they want?”

“Even the Yunmeng Jiang sect was destroyed. Large clans have kept silent out of fear. What can insignificant people like us do about it? We just need to worry about taking care of ourselves,” the man concluded.

Nie Mingjue cursed.

“But isn’t that the mindset that caused all of this to begin with?” Nie Huaisang sighed.

“Yes,” Wen Ruohan agreed with a smirk. “You never seem to learn from your mistakes.”

People on all sides glared at him, but the Chief Cultivator remained unphased.

Once the Wen soldiers were out of sight again, Wei Wuxian lifted his head enough to see and continued on his way. He ventured to a lower-class part of town, far from the market.

Behind overgrown, cracked walls, Jiang Cheng was gazing blankly at Zidian, twisting it on his finger. It was a habit his mother and his adult-self had whenever they were enraged.

To the current Jiang Cheng, it was the only remnant he had of his parents.

Jiang Fengmian moved closer, wishing he could provide comfort to the simulated version of his son. It was pointless, but Jiang Cheng appreciated the attempt.

Wei Wuxian kneeled down before Jiang Cheng.

“How are you?” he asked. “Still dizzy?”

After walking for a while, they had both started becoming faint from the lack of food. Seeing how tired and unwilling to move Jiang Cheng had been, Wei Wuxian had hidden him and moved out on his own.

Jiang Cheng still didn't respond.

Flushing again, Jiang Cheng wished he could make his other-self stop being such a burden to Wei Wuxian. He understood why — of course he did, it was him — but he couldn't help feeling frustrated.

Of course they weren't told to protect each other. He couldn't even protect himself!

"I've done some research," Wei Wuxian explained. "It'll take a few days to get to Meishan. We just need to watch out for Wen scouts along the way. Soon, we'll meet up with Shijie!"

Jiang Cheng remained unresponsive.

"W-we will…" he tried, then set a hand on Jiang Cheng's shoulder and continued. "We'll go back to Lotus Cove one day, but not now, okay? Uncle Jiang and Yu-furen did everything they could to save your life. If you go back there, their efforts would be in vain."

Jiang Cheng still didn't respond.

Finally, Wei Wuxian stood up and ordered, "Sit here. I have some money in my pockets; I'll go get you some food."

He then paused, uncertain about leaving JIang Cheng alone.

"...Sorry," Jiang Cheng whispered, watching his brother leave. Wei Wuxian was only five days older — October 31st to November 5th — so they almost felt like twins. In fact, Jiang Cheng often felt like he was the older one when Wei Wuxian pulled off some of his more insane schemes.

Looking at them now, Wei Wuxian truly seemed to be his older brother.

Jiang Cheng quickly sucked in a deep breath, refusing to let any more tears fall.

"...Stay still," Wei Wuxian continued after a moment. "Don't do anything rash."

The level of care Wei Wuxian was giving Jiang Cheng left him flushed in both embarrassment and a splash of affection. Even in the worst circumstances possible, Wei Wuxian was prioritizing him. As long as he could remember, he had always been jealous of how everyone loved Wei Wuxian more than they loved him.

Now, he was wondering if it was actually the other way around.

After hesitating for a few more seconds, Wei Wuxian forced himself to leave. However, rather than following him, the simulation remained situated on the sitting form of Jiang

Cheng. He glanced up, watching Wei Wuxian's retreating figure with dead eyes.

Above, rain began to pour.

Both Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian moved closer to the simulated figure of their broken son, concern radiating off them. The only source of hope they had was the glimpse at the future — clearly, Jiang Cheng would recover from this. No matter how bad it seemed, Jiang Cheng would survive.

(And Wei Wuxian wouldn't.)

Under Jiang Cheng's solemn gaze, Wei Wuxian pulled his hat low and went to buy him several buns. He spoke softly to the vendor, trying to attract as little attention as possible. Accordingly, none of the civilians around him seemed to notice anything odd, despite all having seen Wei Wuxian before. It was going well.

Then, Jiang Cheng turned, and his gaze focused on a group of Wens.

Lan Wangji immediately stood up, heart pounding. Nearly everyone else sucked in gasps of horror, but Jiang Cheng didn't notice any of them. Instead, all he could see were the white figures slowly approaching the still-oblivious Wei Wuxian.

Why? Why wasn't Wei Wuxian moving? Had he not seen them? Why was he there at all?

(To buy Jiang Cheng food.)

And he wasn't noticing why wasn't he noticing why wasn't he moving — Wei Wuxian, run!.

But the simulated Wei Wuxian continued to buy Jiang Cheng's food, not noticing the threat approaching him. Another step, and the Wens were closer. Another step, and they continued to approach.

It would be fine, wouldn't it? Jiang Cheng knew Wei Wuxian's talent better than anyone. A handful of ordinary Wen disciples were no match for Yunmeng's head disciple.

(But his mom had whipped Wei Wuxian, and there was no telling what would happen now.)

Another step, and they got closer.

Even with the injuries from Madam Yu, Wei Wuxian had managed to use a borrowed sword to tear through the Wen disciples during the invasion just the day before.

(But then he had choked Wei Wuxian, punching him and slamming his injured back to the ground.)

Another step.

"Do something!" Jiang Cheng shouted at his other-self, stress boiling over. "Don't just sit there! You see them, do-"

“A-Cheng!” Madam Yu screamed back. “Why are you asking to put yourself at risk-”

But then, as if reading the real Jiang Cheng’s thoughts, the formerly immobile Jiang Cheng forced himself to stand up. His eyes were glued onto the approaching Wens.

Still far enough away that Wei Wuxian hadn’t noticed them, but close enough to possibly see him first.

“No, no,” Jiang Fengmian whispered. “A-Cheng, don’t-”

Jiang Fengmian didn’t know what he was trying to say. Don’t put yourself at risk? Don’t do anything stupid? Don’t run out to tell Wei Wuxian they’re coming, they’ll notice you if you do?

Whatever it was, Jiang Cheng’s actual decision was so, so much worse.

With shaky legs and hate-filled eyes, Jiang Cheng ran out and passed the Wen disciples. Wei Wuxian didn’t notice him leave the alley.

The Wens did.

“A-Cheng!” Madam Yu shouted.

“That’s a Yunmeng uniform!” one of them declared.

A second later, the entire squadron was chasing after.

Lan Wangji turned, staring at Jiang Cheng with a shocked expression.

The Jiang parents looked faint.

As the heir of Yunmeng, Jiang Cheng’s cultivation was higher than theirs was. Unfortunately, he was still fatigued and dizzy from lack of food and grief. Corners were especially hard for his food-deprived mind, so every time he slipped around one, the Wens began to close in. The distance between them got shorter, and shorter, and shorter, and shorter, and then he stumbled and-

Everything froze.

They were getting another break.

Heavy breaths shook the room as the Jiangs tried to calm down from the adrenaline rush they had just experienced. It was fine, they reminded themselves; they had seen the future. They knew Jiang Cheng would come out of everything this showed strong and healthy and rich and powerful.

But he had just-

“Are you trying to die?!” Madam Yu asked again.

“A-Niang, I-I know that was-”

“Stupid? Yes, it was! I don’t know what Wei Wuxian was thinking in leaving you alone!”

“I-” Jiang Cheng flushed, “A-Niang, I-I don’t need a caretaker.”

“If this is what you do the minute you’re left alone, then clearly you do,” Madam Yu growled, terror at her son’s fate overcoming the gratitude she had begun to feel for Wei Wuxian. “This is all because you came back to look for our bodies instead of just going to Meishan like you were supposed to. How could Wei Wuxian let this — that irresponsible, arrogant, brat-”

“Yu-furen,” Lan Xichen spoke up. “I’m sure your son managed to escape them. He was clearly fine in the future, so surely the Wens weren’t able to capture him.”

“And that makes Wei Wuxian’s uselessness acceptable?”

“San-niang,” Jiang Fengmian spoke sternly. “Yes, I don’t think A-Xian made the right decision, but he and A-Cheng, both needed food.”

“A-Cheng just lost everything, he shouldn’t have been left alone!”

Wen Chao cackled, “Oh, so Wei Wuxian can sacrifice himself for Jiang Cheng as many times as possible, but Jiang Cheng-”

“A-Cheng could have died!” Madam Yu screamed. “Wei Wuxian was supposed to prevent this!”

“Wei Wuxian is five days older than me!” Jiang Cheng snapped, not backing off even when Madam Yu glared. “Why did you ask him to protect me?”

“He’s a servant; it’s his job to protect his master.”

“But he’s also our brother,” Jiang Yanli protested.

Scoffing, Nie Mingjue shook his head and said, “He has to be one or the other — he can’t be both.”

Those words made Wen Ruohan chuckle, “It’s the lie every favored servant is told, isn’t it? ‘You’re like a member of the family.’ At least I actually adopted Wen Zhuliu into the clan.”

“That isn’t what happened,” Jiang Fengmian objected.

“Isn’t it?”

“Can you really say that after watching Jiang Wanyin risk his life to protect Wei Wuxian?” Lan Qiren asked.

“The boy already wanted to die,” Jin Guangshan responded. “The second he saw an opportunity to risk his life without calling it suicide, he took it.”

The Jiangs tensed at the accusation.

“That… wasn’t what I was doing,” Jiang Cheng protested.

“I believe you, A-Cheng,” Jiang Fengmian said softly. “Just… remember: even if Lotus Pier is gone, your life is still far more important than that. Nothing is worth more than that.”

“I know,” Jiang Cheng responded. “And the other-me knows that too. He’s just — I’m just… not thinking clearly. I still have my core, we know I’ll recover. And Yunmeng will recover.”

“No thanks to Wei Wuxian.”

“San-niang!”

“Don’t shout at me, Fengmian! I wasn’t the only one; you also told Wei Wuxian to protect A-Cheng! How can you pretend that we’re different?”

Jiang Fengmian paused, silenced by those words. No matter how he allowed Wei Wuxian to eat with them at the table, or how he allowed him to go to the Cloud Recesses, both he and Wei Wuxian had always known Jiang Fengmian would value his real family first.

That had always been something he had tried to convince the rest of his family of. Now, it was an accusation against him.

Between her parents, Jiang Yanli clenched her fists. Over the course of the simulation, many things had changed. Her father had explained himself; her parents were starting to get along; her mother seemed like she was finally beginning to accept Wei Wuxian as a person, even if not a member of the family.

And yet, it seemed like this one scene had undone all of that.

“Do you disagree?” Madam Yu continued, glaring holes into Jiang Fengmian.

“...I do.”

Instead of the now conflicted Jiang Fengmian, it had been Jiang Yanli who responded.

“...A-Li?”

Jiang Yanli stepped back slightly in nervousness, but Jin Zixuan made eye contact her. He nodded once in agreement, then forced himself to smile reassuringly.

Revitalized, Jiang Yanli looked back at her mother and explained “We know A-Cheng doesn’t suffer any life-changing injuries from this. With or without that knowledge, I don’t think A-Xian necessarily made a terrible choice.”

Madam Yu didn’t even try to hold in her scoff. She had slowly been growing more and more fond of Wei Wuxian, but now the boy’s carelessness meant her son was being hunted down.

Meanwhile, Jin Zixuan, Nie Huaisang, and Lan Wangji glared at her, watching Jiang Cheng out of the corners of their eyes. If Jiang Cheng disagreed with his mother, they would let him speak; if he didn't, they would respond instead.

"I…" Jiang Yanli sucked in a deep breath, then continued. "If you're going to blame anyone for this, blame the Wens! It's not A-Xian's fault!"

Wen Ruohan just titled his head in acceptance, an amused smile on his face.

The sight infuriated Madam Yu, but she refused to back down and continued, "He still shouldn't have left. He's always like this; running around chasing after girls and buying alcohol-"

But he was getting me food!" Jiang Cheng shouted, clenching his fists and looking directly into his mother's eyes. "He wasn't doing any of those things. He was looking after me when I collapsed and couldn't do anything. You and A-Die were… you were… gone and he still came and prioritized me and protected me and there isn't even a Pier for him to be loyal to he was just… he was just doing that… it was because…."

'Because he loves us.'

Jiang Cheng couldn't bring himself to say it. Only the most loyal servants would continue serving dutifully after everything was destroyed ~~and wrongly blamed on them~~, but Wei Wuxian was far more than a servant.

He was a brother.

(Could Jiang Cheng really say that after the last segment?)

However, this time, the other heirs didn't hesitate to help.

"It seems like you two really care for each other," Nie Huaisang pointed out with a cheery grin.

(Wen Ruohan glanced over, watching Nie Huaisang with a cold smile.)

Reassured by Nie Huaisang's observation, Jiang Yanli looked at her mother and nodded once.

"I… I think of A-Xian as my brother, and A-Cheng does too."

Madam Yu flinched.

Subconsciously, everyone had braced themselves for the ensuing explosion. It was one thing for Madam Yu to admit that Wei Wuxian wasn't the scum of the earth, it was another for her to hear this.

However, instead of falling into an unstoppable rage, Madam Yu closed her eyes and breathed out a soft, reluctant "...I know."

She might not owe it to Wei Wuxian to be a mother, but that didn't mean she had to separate her kids from him either. After everything she had seen, how could she?

Behind her, Jiang Fengmian was struck silent. His whole life, he had been the one working to get the rest of his family to accept Wei Wuxian. After continuously proving unsuccessful with Madam Yu, he had changed his behavior to just lessening the struggle Wei Wuxian went through.

But now, faced with his children's declarations, he couldn't help but wonder if he had done something wrong. He wanted to protect his children — of course he did, but-

Could he have done more for Wei Wuxian?

(Watching them, Madam Jin looked down. She had spent years driving off all the mistresses and bastard children her husband had. It was different — Wei Wuxian wasn't Jiang Fengmian's — but some whispering voice in the back of Madam Jin's brain wondered if she should have been different too.)

(Her husband was inexcusable.)

(But could she blame the kids for that?)

Unaware of the conflicting thoughts running through the adults, Jiang Cheng took a deep breath and declared, "Wei Wuxian is my best friend. I shouldn't have tried to choke him — I-I know that. But if anyone tries to take him away I'll-I'll break their legs! Right now, we have proof that Wei Wuxian and I really… we care about each other."

Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen, and Lan Qiren all fell silent at that, thinking it over.

On the other hand, Jin Guangshan smirked.

"How long will that last, though?"

'Break his legs?' Jiang Cheng asked. 'Haven't I told you? When dealing with those without honor, just kill them and feed them to your dog.'

"That…" Jiang Cheng cut off. "I-I'm sure that was just a misunderstanding. I-my other-self didn't really mean — he couldn't have and-"

"I'm sure it's just a misunderstanding," Jiang Yanli agreed, clenching her fists. "A-Cheng and A-Xian would never hurt each other. A-Xian, he… If something changed him enough to make him do that, then A-Cheng is probably just worried someone else will do demonic cultivation and be corrupted just as much."

"So he kills all demonic cultivators, even after they risk themselves to save Jin Ling?" Jin Guangshan asked.

"I… I... most of the things I say aren't literal," Jiang Cheng defended. "I… probably meant something else."

“Yeah… probably,” Jiang Yanli agreed, nodding unsurely.

Right now, it was undeniable that Jiang Cheng had loved Wei Wuxian. Whether that remained true or not would be the deciding factor.

Several minutes later, the simulation began again.

Thunder rumbled, and more rain began to fall. It splashed heavily into the rushing streams of the Gusu mountains, and flowed elegantly as shimmering waterfalls off the cliffs.

Within the Cloud Recesses’ Ancestral Shrine, a single candle was tended to by a graceful hand.

“Wangji,” a Lan elder spoke, causing the boy to look away from the candle and make eye contact.

“Great Uncle,” Wangji saluted, bowing respectfully.

Lan Qiren prayed that whatever news was being brought would be good.

(Most of the people present were nearly collapsing under the collective dread.)

The man spoke calmly, “I heard that you’ve sent disciples to Yunmeng and Meishan to look for Sect Leader Jiangs’ daughter, son, and head disciple.”

“Huh?”

“I have,” Wangji confirmed.

“You…” Jiang Cheng trailed off, looking at the seemingly impassive Lan Wangji in surprise.

“Aw, Wangji-xiong, you do care!” Nie Huaisang sang out in an attempt to dispel the awkwardness.

“Thank you,” Jiang Yanli whispered, bowing in gratitude.

“Wangji,” the elder’s tone switched to stern chastisement. “This time the Qishan Wen Clan used a heavy hand and destroyed the Yunmeng Jiang Clan in a single night. They even mobilized to hunt down and kill those three survivors. Do you know why?”

“I do,” Wangji nodded once.

“Then why do you have to risk getting yourself into trouble by helping the Jiang Clan?”

‘I don’t care if Lan Wangji or Jin Zixuan dies! Just let them die! What’s their deaths got to do with us? With our sect? Why did this have to happen?’ the simulated Jiang Cheng shouted, choking Wei Wuxian.

“The Qishan Wen Clan is doing everything they can to deter us from such an action, trying to prove that it’s the unchallenged leader of all clans. Those who obey will live; those who oppose will die.”

Once again, Lan Xichen couldn’t help but remember the way Wei Wuxian had seen the war as inevitable as far back as the abyss. If this was the way the Lan Clan continued to act, then how could they call themselves ‘righteous?’

“Now, all clans know better than to confront them,” the elder reminded. “Our Lan Clan has been severely damaged. It would be smarter to bide our time and focus on building up strength.”

“Great Uncle,” Lan Wangji responded. “The clans are closely related. The others will be in danger if one of them falls. At times like this, we should contend with the Wen Clan together.”

Jiang Cheng looked away from Lan Wangji, unable to make eye contact. Despite that, some part of him couldn’t help laughing snidely.

‘Look at that,’ his mind sang. ‘He and Wei Wuxian are perfect for each other! No wonder everyone keeps talking about taking Wei Wuxian away.’

“To contend with?” the elder repeated. “The Qishan Wen Clan is so powerful and strong-”

Wen Chao preened.

“-How can you speak as if getting rid of them will be easy?” he turned, facing away. “Whoever takes the lead, will become Wen Ruohan’s next target.”

Hadn’t Jiang Cheng said nearly the same thing to Wei Wuxian after the abyss?

Lan Wangji couldn’t help a slight flutter of happiness inside him at the parallel.

Sighing, the elder continued, “The Cloud Recesses is the legacy that our ancestors have built over centuries. We shall not ruin it.”

After thinking it over for a moment, Lan Wangji looked up to make eye contact with the elder and spoke confidently: “When a nest falls, all the eggs break. Someone must take the lead.”

“Xiongzhang?” Wangji asked quietly, noticing his brother’s approach. Lan Xichen stared at his little brother, clenching his fists. His other-self was still missing; Wangji must be worried out of his mind and scared and alone-

But. He hadn’t changed. He remained unquestionably righteous.

“Wangji,” Xichen whispered. “I am so, so proud of you.”

Jiang Cheng looked away.

The elder sighed again, "Just listen to yourself. Why are you so stubborn."

However, at the same time, someone was approaching the pair.

When the elder noticed him, he relaxed, "Ah, Qiren. Your timing is perfect. Come, talk some sense into Wangji."

Somewhat worried, Lan Wangji swallowed. He wouldn't change his mind regardless, but if his uncle disapproved he was sure there would be tension between them.

Jiang Fengmian stared intently, wondering what his ally would say.

"Shufu," Lan Qiren greeted, saluting as well. "I think what Wangji said was completely right."

The relief that instantly poured into Wangji left him breathless.

"When the nest falls, all the eggs will break," Lan Qiren recited, copying Lan Wangji. "Facing such an obstacle, all clans should join together to pull through this. Tomorrow, I'll travel to Qinghe."

Even after Jiang Cheng had held Wei Wuxian back in the Xuanwu cave to stop him from interfering, Lan Wangji was willing to do this.

What was he supposed to say now?

"...Unbelievable," the elder grumbled, walking off, ignoring the respectful bow Wangji sent after him.

Not looking back at his nephew, Lan Qiren explained, "Your great uncle is just worried about the safety of the clan."

"I understand."

Nie Huaisang cackled, "That's the Second Jade for you! Always so perfectly polite even to dirty, old-"

"Silence," Wangji ordered, but, shortly after, Lan Xichen began to laugh at the expression on his brother's face.

(He looked completely indifferent to everyone else, but they decided to take that as a good sign.)

"Do you have any news about Xichen?" Lan Qiren asked.

The real version tensed nervously.

(The future Wangji was "Hanguang-jun," not "Sect Leader Lan." It was fine; Xichen was fine. He had to be.)

But the other-Wangji could only solemnly shake his head. No one knew where Lan Xichen was.

"...No news is good news," Lan Qiren decided. "Xichen is smart. He'll survive this. How about Sect Leader Jiang's children?"

"Our people saved Jiang Yanli somewhere near Zizhou. To avoid causing trouble for the Yu clan, we've temporarily escorted her to the east."

Jiang Yanli's eyes widened and she gasped, shocked by the proclamation.

""Thank you,"" both Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan bowed in gratitude.

Lan Wangji nodded once in acknowledgement.

"But Wei Ying and Jiang-gongzi… are still missing."

Everything faded to black.

"It's fine," Jin Zixuan whispered, turning to Jiang Cheng. "I-I'm sure you escaped."

But even he didn't completely believe that.

The sound of pouring rain was momentarily broken by a loud thump.

A sack full of buns abruptly crashed to the ground.

"Wei Ying?"

Wei Wuxian stood, frozen in horror, as he stared down the empty alleyway. Jiang Cheng was still gone.

'It's fine,' Jiang Fengmian reminded himself. 'A-Cheng gets saved. It'll be fine.'

Scanning around frantically, Wei Wuxian grew more and more unsettled with every second that passed. His breathing picked up; his pupils dilated; his pulse skyrocketed.

"Jiang Cheng?" he asked, turning back and forth as he searched.

No response.

Jiang Cheng looked down.

Wei Wuxian immediately ran out of the alley into the abandoned road he had come from. He had been gone for less than half an hour, and yet Jiang Cheng was nowhere to be found. Wei Wuxian looked and looked and looked and looked, but no matter where he ran there was no trace of his heir.

"Jiang Cheng!" he shouted, panic sinking in.

Seeing the terror slowly making its way onto Wei Wuxian's face, Jiang Fengmian suddenly felt a crawling sensation of guilt. The last thing he and his wife had told Wei Wuxian was to protect Jiang Cheng. Now-

He didn't regret trying to keep his son safe. Nothing would make him regret that.

(But he felt regret for the way he had done it, if nothing else.)

Finally, seeing that the neighboring streets were abandoned, Wei Wuxian returned to the original location. In his panic, he had lost his hat. Now, with rain-drenched hair and horrified eyes, he looked almost as pitiful as he had when he thought Madam Yu was going to cut his hand off.

No, perhaps even more pitiful.

Searching, Wei Wuxian turned to the left, then to the right, then back to the left, then back to the right, then turned all the way around and still didn't see anything and clearly didn't have even the slightest idea of what to do.

"Jiang Cheng," he whispered again, helplessly.

"Sorry," Jiang Cheng muttered, equally helpless. He couldn't say he regretted distracting the Wens, but he also couldn't help but wonder how his own emotions played into that decision.

He didn't want to die, but his other-self was in a different position.

"A-Cheng," Jiang Yanli whispered. "It's okay. You were very brave."

At those words, Jiang Cheng felt some of the turmoil in his heart ease.

Finally Wei Wuxian ran over to a stall worker and asked, "Mister, there was a young master about the same age as me sitting here. Did you see where he went?"

"The one that was with you?"

"Yeah! Did you see him? Where did he go?"

"I was in the middle of doing something so I didn't really see. He kept spacing out and staring at people in the street. When I looked up again, he was gone. Maybe he left?"

"Gone?" Wei Wuxian breathed out.

The utter hopelessness in his gaze made Lan Wangji wish his other-self was there to help.

"...He left...He left…" Wei Wuxian repeated, dazedly, then straightened. "Lotus Cove!"

Jiang Cheng flinched. After what had happened in the last segment, he knew it was far from unreasonable for Wei Wuxian to assume that the other Jiang Cheng had returned to take the bodies.

Still, the accusation stung.

(And yet, after everything that happened, it seemed so comparably insignificant that Jiang Cheng had no idea how he would have ever gotten angry over it.)

The sun was already set when Wei Wuxian arrived at Lotus Pier, and yet he still hadn't found Jiang Cheng.

Worry grew within Madam Yu.

Rain continued to pour down, and the port was filled with dozens of Wen ships. Along the walls, flags of the Qishan Wen Sect covered every available space. Not a single Yunmeng flag was in sight, all having been either pulled down or burnt in the fires.

Pain flashed across the Jiangs' expressions when they saw what had become of their once-beautiful home.

(But it was fine. The future Jiang Cheng would rebuild Yunmeng. It didn't matter that the building were gone; so long as Jiang Cheng had his core, he could rebuild Yunmeng.)

As Wei Wuxian stood — hands on his knees — hiding behind a wall, he panted heavily.

He had exerted himself to the point where he could taste blood in his throat.

Moving closer, Lan Wangji wished there was some comfort he could offer. However, no matter how much he wanted to interfere, the simulation could not be altered.

Once he managed to quiet down his breathing, Wei Wuxian moved along the walls, sneaking back inside Lotus Pier.

"Be careful, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered. Sharing the sentiment, Nie Huaisang moved closer to Nie Mingjue again. Soon, he was peeking out at the scene around them from within his Da-ge's chest.

That was the most comfort Nie Mingjue could currently provide, but it was better than nothing.

In Wei Wuxian's head, a voice prayed with a desperation akin to despair:

'Please, please,'* he thought. '*Please don't let there be anyone talking about Jiang Cheng. Please don't have anyone laughing about his corpse resting in the training field. Or else, or else I'll…."

Or else?

Even if it was true, what could he do?

The Jiangs had known even before this started that Jiang Cheng would survive. All his limbs would be intact, his face would be unscarred, and his core would be stronger than ever.

But Wei Wuxian didn't know any of that.

As far as he knew, it was entirely possible for Jiang Cheng to be one of the hundreds of corpses on the ground. Pity for Wei Wuxian stretched out across the watchers.

He continued searching, but-

Hopelessness began to sink into him. The Jiangs were dead; he had no resources, no sword, and no support. He was the only one left. He didn't know anything; he couldn't do anything.

For the first time, Wei Wuxian was discovering how little power he held.

Lan Qiren still didn't approve — nothing would make him approve of demonic cultivation — but he was starting to see why Wei Wuxian thought it was necessary.

He should have stuck to using the power of his golden core, but the temptation demonic cultivation offered was now painfully clear to every watcher.

Looking at it like this, the future was really no surprise.

To sneak across an open area, Wei Wuxian soundlessly dove into the water. Only a few seconds after, two Wen soldiers passed through a walkway by the water, conversing casually.

"I heard that Jiang Cheng was caught," one said.

"What?!" Madam Yu hissed. All at once, the anger she had felt towards Wei Wuxian surged through her anew. If he hadn't left Jiang Cheng alone — if he had just done as he was told — then nothing-

"San-niang," Jiang Fengmian whispered. "Enough."

Sect Leader Jiang rarely tried to completely shut his wife down, but now, with drops of guilt beginning to poison his mind, he felt it was necessary. Similarly, Madam Yu simply looked back at him, then nodded once and sat down.

Neither of them knew how to feel about Wei Wuxian right now.

"Why didn't he hide away?" the other Wen finally asked. "Why did he expose himself and get caught?"

"Who knows."

To save Wei Wuxian, apparently. Neither of his parents knew how to feel about that.

(Why not ask them to protect each other? That's what happened anyways.)

"Well, Wen-er-gongzi asked us to lock him up in the storage room and keep a constant watch," the first reminded. The pair turned the corner, slipping out of sight.

A moment later, the watchers saw Wei Wuxian silently slink back underwater.

"Good," Madam Yu whispered. Yes, Wei Wuxian had let Jiang Cheng ~~sacrifice himself for Wei Wuxian and~~ get caught, but he would now stop at nothing to save his charge.

After all she had seen, there was no one she would trust more with that job.

Outside the central storage, two Wen disciples stood in front of the door. They were clearly guards assigned to make sure Jiang Cheng didn't escape.

And yet, rather than alert, they looked bored.

One sighed, "Does someone on the verge of death really need to be watched so closely?"

"Excuse me?" Madam Yu demanded, clenching her fists at the description.

Sighing again, the disciple turned away from his partner to stretch his hips and complain, "My waist hurts."

His partner vanished.

The watchers jumped in surprise.

In a half-second, Wei Wuxian had reached forward, covered the disciple's mouth, and pulled him out of sight. Given that there were no sounds of struggle, it was obvious the Wen disciple had been disposed of.

And yet even Wen Ruohan hadn't heard Wei Wuxian move.

"...Very impressive," he admitted.

Laughing once, the first disciple turned fully and suggested, "Let's sneak out to drink-"

Wei Wuxian leapt forward and snapped his neck.

Although all disciples were trained with the knowledge that they might have to kill to defend their clan, the fact that Wei Wuxian could become so brutal was a shock to all.

Even without his sword, he wasn't someone who could be dealt with lightly.

(Slowly, it was becoming clear how the malicious, powerful, dangerous version of Wei Wuxian they saw in the first segment came into being.)

Wei Wuxian threw the doors open, and instantly fell to the side of a figure on the ground.

"Jiang Cheng!" he hissed frantically. "Jiang Cheng!"

When Jiang Cheng got a glimpse of his other-self, he stepped back in shock.

He was covered in blood. As he laid motionless on the ground, his ashen face became even more obvious.

He looked like a corpse.

"You!" Madam Yu screeched, turning to the Wens. "How dare you? Even a pack of wolves would have more dignity you dirty beasts!"

"Oh? And how do you think criminals should be dealt with? Your treatment of Wei Wuxian seems to imply that we were comparatively merciful, if anything."

"Criminals?" Lan Qiren repeated disbelievingly.

"What else would you call a clan that tries to kill a non-cultivating messenger?"

"Oh, don't even try!" Nie Mingjue snarled. Despite receiving deadly glares from all sides, Wen Ruohan remained undaunted; he continued to smirk, eyes flashing in amusement.

(Behind him, Wen Qing kept her head high, trying desperately to hide her trembling hands. She would not risk her family for no reason, but-

But she knew Wei Wuxian. Had grown to care for him throughout the simulation. Could she continue to view him as an 'outsider' now?)

Jiang Cheng's thin neck lay exposed, and Wei Wuxian immediately checked for a pulse.

The watchers held their breaths.

When Wei Wuxian relaxed in relief, they did as well.

Somehow, even knowing that Jiang Cheng would survive, these events filled them with a sense of dread. Based on the condition Jiang Cheng's body was in, it was clear that the discipline whip had been used on him.

At least three of his ribs were broken.

"What happened here?!" someone shouted from outside.

"Run!" Nie Huaisang begged.

"Someone got hurt," another voice observed. Rather than fighting them, Wei Wuxian quickly picked Jiang Cheng up and broke into a run.

"Hurry!" Jiang Yanli prayed.

The only saving grace was that Madam Yu had clearly been exaggerating when she said that Wei Wuxian's injuries would keep him down for a month. They still hurt — they were still there — but perhaps Madam Yu had already had an idea of how this confrontation was going to end.

Maybe Wei Wuxian would be able to escape.

"Somebody! Hurry up!" the Wens shouted. As Wei Wuxian fled across the rooftops — showing an unbelievable level of agility considering the state his body was in — the Wens chased after.

"It's Wei Wuxian!" someone realized.

"It's Wei Wuxian! Come on! Don't let him get away."

Wei Wuxian sprinted across the rooftops, but, carrying Jiang Cheng, there was no chance of him being able to escape his pursuers. The Wens rode their swords, flying after the fleeing Jiangs and gaining on them bit by bit.

It disgusted Wen Qing to realize she knew some of those people.

(Of course Wei Wuxian was going to kill Wen Ning. After this, why would he care whether one Wen was innocent? How could she be stupid enough to expect anything else?)

The Wens were ten meters away. Five. Two. An archer pulled back and aimed at Wei Wuxian's feet.

Arrows flew.

"No!"

Dodging, Wei Wuxian stumbled. As he did, his grip on his charge loosened.

Jiang Cheng fell.

"A-Cheng!" Jiang Yanli screamed. Nie Huaisang looked away.

Wei Wuxian jumped off the roof and wrapped his arms around Jiang Cheng, spinning so that the Jiang heir was on top and he was on the bottom.

They slammed against the ground.

Everyone winced.

Wei Wuxian gasped, trying to reclaim the air that had been knocked out of him. It was no surprise; after all, his back had just crashed onto the ground.

His back, which Madam Yu had whipped not even 24 hours before.

If she thought she felt guilty before, it was nothing compared to what she felt now.

(A slapping sound of flesh against stone had resounded when Wei Wuxian landed. It would haunt her for years to come.)

"Over there!" someone shouted. Due to Wei Wuxian having jumped off the roof with enough force to catch Jiang Cheng, he had smacked against the ground a significant distance away. The Wen disciples, flying high in the air, couldn't make out the boys' dark forms.

Trembling, Wei Wuxian forced himself to stand up, carrying Jiang Cheng on his back. His breathing was still broken and gasping, but he quickly looked for an escape route.

If nothing else, Nie Mingjue could relate to and admire the desperation Wei Wuxian felt while trying to protect his brother. His respect for the boy moved up another few notches.

Even Lan Qiren couldn't help but be impressed by the dedication and endurance Wei Wuxian showed.

"Let's move!" the Wens shouted.

"Get them!"

"Don't let them run away!"

Madam Yu was going to personally skewer each and every Wen in the world.

Wei Wuxian ran, but soon found that there was nowhere to go. He looked around despairingly, but could only move towards the wall as the Wens' voices got closer and closer. His back pressed up against the door behind him.

It opened.

He was dragged inside.

"A-Xian!!!"

A second later, Wei Wuxian had grabbed the Wen by the neck and slammed him against the wall. The watchers' eyes soon adjusted to the dimmer light.

"...A-Ning?" Wen Qing asked, squeaking it out brokenly.

"Don't say anything!" Wei Wuxian growled. "Or I'll break your neck."

Wen Qing believed him. After all, she had seen him break a stronger disciple's neck not two minutes ago.

So, was this it? Was this where it happened? Was she going to watch her innocent little brother die? Choked — neck snapped — killed, and resurrected as a weapon for this stupid, stupid war?

And, worst of all, she couldn't entirely blame Wei Wuxian.

She sank to her knees in defeat.

"Did you find him?" someone shouted from outside, making Wei Wuxian's expression turn from fierce to terrified in an instant. He looked around, recognizing the place.

This was his room.

Wei Wuxian knew the layout better than anyone. He had to run, but there was nowhere to go from here.

“I haven’t seen him,” someone outside responded.

“He must be somewhere nearby,” the first said. “Keep looking.”

The shadows walked off, and Wei Wuxian let out a stuttering breath of relief, wincing slightly from the strain. On his back, Jiang Cheng continued to sleep restlessly. The pressure from the other boy weighed down on Wei Wuxian like a mountain, and cut through his flesh like a knife.

Back, back, back. Why was it always the back?

Now that she had a second to calm down and watch him, Madam Yu couldn’t help but wonder. Jiang Cheng had smashed Wei Wuxian’s back against the ground. When they fell, Wei Wuxian had turned to make sure his back was the one that made contact with the floor. Nevertheless, Wei Wuxian continued to carry the unconscious Jiang Cheng. He barely seemed to notice the pain.

And yet, before all this, Madam Yu had whipped that back over and over and over and over again. And then told him to protect her son, rendering him incapable of caring about himself.

Was it even possible to regret something this much?

(She would tear out the spines of every last Wen in the world.)

Then, as if intentionally contradicting the thoughts running through Madam Yu’s mind, the captive Wen Ning spoke, “Wei… Wei-gongzi. I’m here to help you.”

“...To help me?”

Wen Chao laughed, “Nice try Wen Ning, but my Wei Wuxian isn’t stupid enough to fall for that. Though I guess you’re too weak to be useful another way!”

Drowning in despair, Wen Qing didn’t bother to refute that.

Wei Wuxian anger surged, “Hey! Wen flunky, what are you up to?”

“You… you don’t remember me?”

‘He never remembers anyone,’ Jiang Cheng thought, and couldn’t help but be grateful. At least now Wei Wuxian wouldn’t be lured into whatever trap this was.

‘Remember me?’ Wei Wuxian mentally repeated, keeping a tight grip. ‘Did an ally dress themselves in Wen robes to serve as a spy?’

But the voice was completely unfamiliar.

Wei Wuxian slammed Wen Ning against the wall again and shouted, "Don't play any tricks!"

"I-I'm not! Young Master Wei, you can look at my face!"

'Look at his face? Maybe he's hidden something inside his mouth and he's prepared to spit it out?'

As humorous as Wei Wuxian abysmal memory was, no one felt like laughing.

'Is this… the Wen disciple who stepped between me and Wen Zhuliu after Jiang Cheng saw his parent's bodies?'

The memory replayed. Jiang Cheng snapped off a piece of burnt wood, but, when Wen Zhuliu looked, he instead saw a Wen disciple who was coincidentally in the way.

"Huh?" Wen Chao blinked, tilting his head in confusion. "Well, I guess Wen Ning really would be that incompetent."

'So long as it was actually a coincidence,' Nie Huaisang thought.

'...I don't know him,' Wei Wuxian decided.

All the blood left Wen Qing's face.

"Who are you?" Wei Wuxian demanded, uncharacteristic levels of killing intent flashing into his eyes.

Wen Ning frowned in disappointment and explained, "I… I'm Wen Ning. From the Cultivation Conference."

Wei Wuxian paused for a moment, thinking 'The Discussion Conference in Qishan… The Discussion Conference… Shooting arrows… Ah!'

"Huh?"

"You're that Wen… Wen-something… the one who was quite good at archery?"

Wen Ning lit up, "Yes! It's me! Don't worry Master Wei, I won't harm you!"

"...Wei Wuxian actually didn't remember?" Wen Qing asked.

Jiang Fengmian looked down, recalling the advice Cangse Sanren had told him time and time again.

'Remember the things others do for you, not the things you do for others. Only when people don't hold all that in their hearts can they finally be free.'

No one lived by that statement more than Wei Wuxian, and yet Jiang Fengmian had somehow forgotten who he was. In addition to being the Jiang Sect's head disciple, Wei Wuxian was Cangse Sanren and Wei Changze's son.

(What would they think, if they knew what Jiang Fengmian's last words to Wei Wuxian had been?)

"I can get Jiang-gongzi to somewhere safe!" Wen Ning declared.

"Huh?" Wen Chao asked.

"What?" Wei Wuxian demanded, glaring skeptically.

"Eh? W-well, I'm also a member of the Wen Clan. I even have a group of disciples who follow my orders."

"Follow your orders to kill people?"

Jiang Yanli flinched.

"N-no!" Wen Ning rushed to say. "My disciples never kill people at random! I haven't killed any of the Jiang Sect's disciples either! I only hurried here after hearing that something had happened in Lotus Pier. It's true!"

Wei Wuxian continued glaring. He looked much, much closer to the first version of him they had seen. The Yiling Patriarch, who easily took on armies by himself.

And not even Lan Qiren could blame him for that.

Slowly, after thinking it over for a moment, Wei Wuxian released Wen Ning's neck.

"...What?" Wen Qing breathed out, hopelessly lost. It looked genuine. As far as she could tell, Wei Wuxian was letting Wen Ning go.

But if not now, then when?

Wen Ruohan frowned; as time went on, Wen Ning's actions were seeming less and less like a trap.

(And more and more like a traitor.)

After glaring skeptically for several more seconds, Wei Wuxian dropped his gaze and asked, "Then… could you… could you help me…."

"Wei Ying?" Lan Wangji asked, and both Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen stepped closer in concern.

"Can you help me reclaim the bodies of Sect Leader Jiang and Madam Yu?"

Both flinched back at that.

After the desecration their bodies had suffered, their minds had shut their self-interest off. Since then, they had only focused on their children's safety.

But for Wei Wuxian to think of that as a priority-

The rumors truly couldn't be more wrong about him.

"I… I'll try my best," Wen Ning agreed.

"Wen Qing."

Wen Ruohan's voice was stern and sharp, making the suddenly hopeful crowd freeze in their spots.

On the other hand, Wen Qing had expected this. Without wasting a second, she stood and bowed low, her torso nearly perpendicular with the simulated floor.

"...Do you understand what has happened?" Wen Ruohan asked. To his left, Wen Chao looked down at the bowing girl with unhidden glee.

"I do, Your Excellency," Wen Qing reported. "I assure you, I will punish him appropriately for this."

Nie Mingjue laughed openly, "What? For doing the right thing?"

"For betraying his sect," Wen Ruohan answered evenly. "We have all agreed to not blame for things that haven't happened yet, so I don't see a need to go too far. However, my generosity has limits; this will not be forgotten. Do I make myself clear?"

"Yes, Your Excellency. I assure you, I will handle it."

Even with the glares coming from all sides she refused to falter. Regardless of Wen Ruohan's promise to not punish for things that hadn't occurred, she knew her family would not get off lightly in the face of such blatant treason.

Yes, her sweet, loving, stupidly kind brother had done the right thing. He had also probably died as a result, so Wen Qing didn't think his strategy was especially reliable.

As they were speaking, Wen Ning had run off. The simulation flashed forward, showing Wen Ning returning along with several of his most loyal disciples.

Wen Ruohan instantly memorized their faces.

"So?" Wei Wuxian raised an eyebrow. "Where's this so-called 'safe-haven?'"

Wen Ning squeaked, "Oh, Wei-gongzi, walk this way! I-I have a ship!"

Wei Wuxian's untrusting gaze followed his every step.

At first most of the watchers didn't know anything about Wei Wuxian; then, they learned more, and wondered how on earth such a bright person could have turned into the famed Yiling Patriarch.

Then, they learned even more, and understood.

(Although he would never condone demonic cultivation, not even Lan Qiren could fault Wei Wuxian for his newfound ruthlessness.)

Carrying Jiang Cheng, Wei Wuxian followed Wen Ning towards a hidden ship, keeping an eye out for potential traps all the while. Once Wei Wuxian was able to set Jiang Cheng down, Wen Ning cleaned Jiang Cheng's wounds and applied bandages with ointment.

While everyone else stood frozen in confusion, Wen Qing watched carefully, mentally grading her brother's performance. It helped distract her from the expressions on Jiang Yanli's and Wen Ruohan's faces.

Neither overflowing hope nor darkening rage were safe things to acknowledge.

Soon, the boat reached land, and they arrived at Yiling. The trio traveled discreetly, stopping at a large, beautiful residence. They snuck inside from a back door and walked into a smaller building.

'A-Ning, don't be stupid,' Wen Qing thought. Yes, she had grown to adore the heroic, cheerful, spirited boy Wei Wuxian was, and she didn't agree with her clan's actions whatsoever. However, the more Wen Ning did now, the more of a precarious position he would be in once they got out.

(Suddenly, Wen Qing wondered if it would be smarter to simply abandon the Wen Sect once she got outside.)

Wen Ning closed the door.

In the next second, Wei Wuxian had grabbed Wen Ning by the neck again, hissing, "Where is this place?"

Holding up his hands in surrender, Wen Ning quickly denied, "I-no, I haven't…."

"What do you mean 'no?'" Wei Wuxian asked. "'No,' this isn't the Yiling Supervisory Office? I heard the whispers in the hallway as we walked in. Just what are you planning?"

"Nothing, it seems," Wen Ruohan growled slightly, making Wen Qing pale even further.

"Young Master Wei, l-listen to me! This is a Supervisory Office, but… but I really don't have any plans to harm you! If I did, I could have just told them I saw you. I-I wouldn't have led you all the way here!"

If Wen Qionglin was telling the truth — and Lan Wangji was beginning to think he was — then that confirmed once in for all that he and Wei Wuxian were right. The Jiangs would surely have been attacked regardless of whether Wei Wuxian stood up for MianMian, but if he hadn't supported Wen Ning, then he and Jiang Wanyin would surely be dead.

That small silver lining wasn't much, but it was better than nothing.

Despite Wen Ning's rather convincing argument, Wei Wuxian remained alert — ready to explode at any moment.

"T-this is a Supervisory Office," Wen Ning reminded. "If there's anywhere the Wen Sect won't look for you, it'd be here. So long as no one finds you, you two can stay here."

"More and more betrayal with every word," Wen Chao huffed. Due to agreeing completely, Wen Ruohan made no move to silence his son. On the other hand, Nie Mingjue's emotions began to tumble like boulders rolling down a mountain.

Why was a Wen doing this?

Wei Wuxian had unblinkingly stared at Wen Ning for several excruciatingly long seconds, trying to get a feel for the boy's trustworthiness. He watched and watched as Wen Ning began fidgeting under his gaze.

Then, finally, he whispered a low, "Thank you" and "sorry."

He carefully laid Jiang Cheng on the bed before them.

Watching the two interact left Wen Qing breathless.

What was this? What was she supposed to do now? What did this mean? Why hadn't Wei Wuxian killed him? If not now, then when? Was it just a mistake? Wei Wuxian wasn't killing her brother but being helped by him because Wen Ning was an idiot and now Wen Ruohan was seeing-

Did the other-Wen Ruohan find out?

(Did the other-Wen Ruohan kill him?)

With this new theory, Wen Qing suddenly felt an enormous divide crack open between her and the other Wens.

Once Jiang Cheng had been set down, Wei Wuxian's eyes landed on Wen Ning again, watching cautiously. The tentative truce between them helped, but the tension was still there. Wei Wuxian was alert, ready to respond at the slightest hint of a trap.

The doors slammed open.

"No!"

Half the watchers jumped out of their seats.

Wind rushed inside as Wen Qing walked through the door.

“No, no, no,” Jin Zixuan whispered, and Jiang Yanli grew impossibly pale.

Wen Ning turned around in surprise, and Wei Wuxian immediately stood up, growling at the threat. He glanced back at where Wen Ning’s sword hung from the wall.

Wen Qing’s heart stopped.

Stunned, Wen Ning breathlessly greeted, “A-Jie-”

His own blade was at his neck a second later.

“Don’t move, or I’ll kill him!”

“No!” Wen Qing shouted running over.

By contrast, her other self — who didn’t know that Wen Ning was going to die soon — remained calm. She merely closed the door and walked forward.

“Alright,” she said. “Go ahead. Anyway, he had it coming.”

Perfectly calm; calling his bluff. Wen Qing supposed she should be grateful that her other-self was managing to approach the situation rationally.

(And, if she wasn’t worried, then Wen Qing knew she must have heard all about Wei Wuxian from her brother.)

Nie Huaisang squeaked in concern for the kind Wen Ning.

“Jie?” Wen Ning cried out. “Jiejie?”

“Is she your sister?”

“Don’t call me sister,” Wen Qing snapped, making Wen Ning flinch back.

Would she turn them in to earn more favor from Wen Ruohan? The version watching with them seemed to care deeply about her brother, but the simulated one-

Nie Mingjue turned his glare on Wen Qing. He didn’t like the Wens, but if Wen Ning was turned in or hurt because of this…

Subconsciously, his mind had already separated Wen Ning from all the other Wens.

“Are you losing your mind?” Wen Qing asked. “Since when have you been so bold? How dare you hide people?”

“Oh, are you the one who killed him?” Jin Guangshan wondered, and, even though she didn’t believe it for a second, the comment made dread rise up in Wen Qing.

(Not because she thought she would turn Wen Ning in, but because she knew she wouldn’t.)

Slowly, she began separating herself from the Wen side of the simulation.

After sighing in annoyance, Wen Qing continued, "So this is why you wanted to go to Yunmeng. How full of yourself are you? Who gave you so much courage? If Wen Chao finds out about this, he'll stop at nothing to tear you apart! If he's really set on killing someone, do you think I could stop him? The Wen Clan has announced to the world that anyone who catches sight of those two must kill them. Every child in the streets knows they're marked die."

'Because I failed,' rang in Jiang Fengmian's head. 'And then asked a child to pick up the pieces for me.'

"How dare you hide them?" Wen Qing asked again, standing tall and glaring down at the pair. With her arrogant expression, high rank — on the same level as Wen Chao — and her brilliant red clothes, Wen Qing could leave almost anyone intimidated.

And yet, Wen Ning spoke back regardless.

"But… But Wei-gongzi…."

"I don't care about what's happened between you two. Gratitude is an understandable reason to do something, but they cannot stay. You went suddenly and left suddenly, a time in which Wen Chao lost track of them. Do you think Wen Chao is that stupid? His search will reach here sooner or later! What do you think will happen then?"

When phrased like this, Wen Qing's best option seemed obvious.

"No, no, please don't!" Jiang Yanli begged pointlessly.

Growing, Nie Mingjue moved to stand between Wen Qing and the simulated figure of Wei Wuxian, consequently defending Wen Ning from her as well.

Because that shy, stuttering, heroic boy just couldn't be a Wen.

"Jiang-gongzi!" Wen Ning shouted, barely noticing the sword Wei Wuxian still had to his neck. "Jiang-gongzi is also injured! He can't move! Moreover, it's… the Wen Clan's fault."

Wen Chao laughed, "'Fault?' He says that like we didn't mean for it to happen."

After a pause, Wen Qing shook her head, "What the Wen Sect does has nothing to do with us. We don't need to pay for their sins!"

Behind Wen Ning, Wei Wuxian's glare sharpened.

"Excuse me?" Wen Chao asked, rearing back, but Wen Ruohan was unsurprised. He had always known Wen Qing didn't necessarily approve of his plans, but, due to the knowledge and skill she had, allowed her to stay uninvolved.

Still, he was starting to wonder how far her disapproval went.

"...Wei Ying, don't look at me like that," Wen Qing ordered. "I'm a doctor. I work to save people. I have never killed anyone, and I never hurt anyone from the Jiang Sect. Besides, your lives are not my concern."

'And you think that excuses you?' Nie Mingjue wanted to shout, but couldn't. Normally he would have, but, before him, was Wen Ning. A shy, incompetent, stuttering, shaking, trembling, easily-crying boy who should not remind him of Huaisang but did anyways.

A boy who had betrayed the Wen Sect to save Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian, the former being the Jiang heir, and the latter being the reason they won the war.

Could he really say Wen Ning deserved to die?

Finally, Wen Qing began to walk off and concluded, "I have no reason to risk the dozens of lives in my branch of the clan just for your sake."

And yet she still hadn't raised an alarm. Was it because she genuinely thought Wei Wuxian might kill Wen Ning, or because….

"Jie?"

Just as Wen Qing raised her hand to open the door, someone spoke.

"Do you think he could have come this way?"

Wei Wuxian tensed. Then, seeing that his threat hadn't done anything, immediately let go of Wen Ning to stand defensively in front of Jiang Cheng.

"They did say they saw a boat go towards Yiling. Should we spread out the search?"

A drop of cold sweat began to fall down Wei Wuxian's face, and Wen Qing turned a thoughtful gaze toward the door. Wen Ning immediately rushed forward, grabbing her sleeve and shaking his head.

A rush of awe passed into Nie Huaisang. Like him, Wen Ning had relatively low cultivation and a powerful older sibling; despite that, the boy was actively getting involved and fighting for what he believed to be right.

Lan Wangji nodded once at Wen Ning, similarly impressed by the boy's actions.

Wen Qing indifferently watched her brother's silent request, then sighed.

"Why so noisy?" she snapped.

"Eh? Lady Wen! Our people are looking for Wei Wuxian."

"This room…" she turned her head, glancing at the boy, "has no one called Wei Wuxian."

His eyes widened.

Was it a secret message? Some discrete way of asking for help? Some way to alert them of the situation without tipping Wei Wuxian off? Or -

(Or was she actually saying-)

"You bitch!" Wen Chao screeched, swinging out towards her. He phased straight through, but Wen Qing backed up regardless.

"What is the meaning of this?" Wen Ruohan asked. Clenching her fists, Wen Qing stood tall and looked right back.

"I don't know, Your Excellency. Perhaps my other-self has some more elaborate plan in mind in order to ensure Wei Wuxian is dealt with. We've already seen how effective most of the soldiers are."

"Do you truly think so?"

"Of course."

Not a single person believed her.

"My brother has been unwell lately," she continued. "He's in poor health. Keep your voices down and stop bothering him."

"Ah, y-yes! We were just leaving!"

As the soldiers outside walked off, Wei Wuxian froze. What was he supposed to do now that he had seen all this?

Slowly, Nie Mingjue turned to stare at the subtly retreating Wen Qing, a look of utter astonishment on his face.

Wen Ning, leaning his ear against the door, suddenly brightened up and declared, "Great, they're gone!"

Sighing again, Wen Qing turned to address Wei Wuxian, "I'm in charge of Yiling, not Yunmeng. Don't raise a fuss."

With that, she walked away.

"Don't raise a fuss?!" Wen Chao repeated. "Jiang Cheng was asleep and Wei Wuxian would never have left him! What, even with all your paralysis needles or whatever there was nothing you could do?"

"Nothing she wanted to do," Wen Ruohan corrected, his gaze turning arctic-cold.

Although she refused to tremble before them, Wen Qing's mind was running at the speed of light. She had just betrayed her Sect, hadn't she? She had never agreed with Wen Ruohan's imperialism, but to go so far as to do this?

It had barely taken anything to convince her.

And Wen Ruohan had seen everything.

(Although he remained silent, Wen Qing could see the way he contemplated whether chopping off her limbs or hanging her above the field would leave a stronger message.)

Abruptly, the adrenaline left Wei Wuxian's body. He sat down on Jiang Cheng's bed, only able to sit upright due to making a post with Wen Ning's sword against the ground.

"Don't worry," Wen Ning reassured. "My sister is a good doctor."

"Understatement of the century," Jin Zixuan grumbled, making Jiang Yanli giggle. Now that this had happened, the pair's earlier stress had transitioned into an awkward sort of humor.

Jiang Yanli turned a tentative glance over, but Wen Qing was keeping her eyes focused on Wen Ruohan.

"The renowned doctress Wen Qing," Wei Wuxian muttered. "Of course she's good."

Well, if Wei Wuxian knew of her skill, it would be much easier to convince him to get examined once she got out. No matter what, she still hadn't given up on that.

(Though, now, it seemed like Wen Qing wouldn't have access to any of her usual resources during the examination.)

"Ah, my sister won't expose you," Wen Ning added unnecessarily.

Nie Mingjue could help but flinch as if something had stabbed into him.

'Not a single Wen will be left alive!' he had said.

'What they have done has nothing to do with us,' she had announced.

He didn't agree — her robes and food and power were all from the Wen Sect, she wasn't unrelated — so he knew she wasn't completely right but….

But right now, he couldn't bring himself to say that.

From the spot where he sat, Wei Wuxian's eyes glistened, then closed.

"Thank you," he whispered.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji muttered, standing close. It broke him to hear such a happy, optimistic, cheerful person sounding so hopeless, especially when there was nothing he could do to help.

Jiang Yanli's eyes drifted to Wen Qing, wishing there was a way to thank her without creating tension with the Chief Cultivator.

Suddenly, Jiang Cheng shifted on the bed.

“Jiang Cheng?” Wei Wuxian immediately spun around to check on him.

“A-Cheng,” Jiang Yanli breathed, moving to kneel by his bedside.

“He’s waking up,” Wen Ning realized. “I’ll go get some medicine for him.”

Slowly, Jiang Cheng’s eyes scrunched together, then blinked open.

“Jiang Cheng?” Wei Wuxian asked again.

Hope began returning to Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian. The knowledge that Jiang Cheng was here, safe, and alive allowed them to finally relax the tension in their clenched fists.

The dark circles under Jiang Cheng’s eyes were now frighteningly visible. With the pallor of his skin and the slouch in his posture added on, he barely looked alive.

“Jiang Cheng,” Wei Wuxian breathed out in relief. The solace Wei Wuxian felt was clear in his soft smile.

Now that the hopelessness in Wei Wuxian’s expression had been relieved, Lan Wangji felt himself relaxing again. They knew that in the future Jin ZIxuan would die, Jiang Yanli would die, and Wei Wuxian would die, but those were all after the Sunshot Campaign. It seemed likely that this was as bad as the Wen’s actions would get. Now, they could start fighting back.

Demonic cultivation was still far too dangerous to use, but it seemed that even his uncle was starting to understand why Wei Wuxian thought it would be a good idea.

Surely it would all get better from here.

Several seconds passed, and Jiang Cheng remained unresponsive.

“Jiang Cheng, you… can you see me? Can you hear me? Do you know who I am?” Wei Wuxian asked.

Due to their glimpse at the 13-years-later future, they all knew Jiang Cheng wasn’t deaf. However, that only made the complete lack of response from him even more worrying.

Both Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue moved closer to the boy, older-brother instincts kicking in.

“What happened to you?” Wei Wuxian worriedly demanded, reaching forward to check his temperature.

Jiang Cheng batted his hand away.

‘At least he hasn’t been temporarily paralyzed?’ Nie Huaisang thought. He considered voicing the comment, but the apprehensive expressions on everyone else’s faces stopped him.

As Wei Wuxian blinked at him in confusion, Jiang Cheng stared down at his own hand, watching it tremble. There was no shock or fear or anger or panic; instead, Jiang Cheng seemed stuck in a too-calm null.

“A-Cheng?” Jiang Yanli asked.

A fire within Madam Yu swarmed. On one hand, she was right; she had known that trying to treat Wei Wuxian as a brother would only cause problems for her kids. This was happening because Jiang Cheng had saved Wei Wuxian. It was the boy’s fault that Jiang Cheng was like this now. Part of her sang out that perhaps Jiang Cheng would finally learn better than to care for him.

On the other hand, her family clearly viewed the boy as one of their own. She didn’t know how much she agreed with that, but she couldn’t disagree as much as she once would have — not after everything she had seen. The fact that the adult Jiang Cheng quite clearly hadn’t viewed Wei Wuxian as family was-

Possibly a direct result of this.

That change in Jiang Cheng’s perception of Wei Wuxian had filled her with joy only a few days ago. She couldn’t bring herself to muster up that same satisfaction now.

Jiang Cheng glanced down at the mark across his chest.

The discipline whip had been used on him. Even if it was just a single time, that was probably a far more serious experience than he had ever felt before. The mark would never go away.

Jiang Cheng had received a discipline whip because he tried to protect Wei Wuxian. As soon as that realization sank in, horror spread across Jiang Yanli.

“A-Cheng,” she whispered. “D-don’t worry. You’ll be fine. We saw the future. You’ll… it’s going to be fine. You don’t need to worry, it doesn’t impede you at all. You’ll recover just fine from this.”

As it was quite clear that Jiang Yanli was saying that to convince herself, neither Jin Zixuan nor Jiang Cheng tried to stop the stream of comfort she was giving.

“Stop looking at it,” Wei Wuxian advised, directing Jiang Cheng’s attention away from the mark. “I’m sure there’s a way to get it off. Don’t worry about it.”

Madam Yu glanced at her husband, then tilted her head at her son.

‘Well? Say something!’ her expression seemed to say. What was the point of him finally building up the courage to talk to their kids if he only did that once?

In all honestly, if Madam Yu tried to say something, it would probably come out in a way that would just make Jiang Cheng feel even worse. Knowing that, Jiang Fengmian accepted his wife’s advise, and kneeled down beside his son.

“A-Cheng,” he whispered, making his now highly-uncomfortable son meet his eyes. “I-I know this isn’t a good thing, and I would never wish the discipline whip on you. I’m so sorry that this had to happen, but… but you were very brave, and I’m proud of you. Just remember, your life is important. Don’t try to throw it away.”

A hot flush spread across Jiang Cheng, and he glanced away from his father’s now-open affection.

Then, he cooled again, and looked back at his other self. Even considering the discipline whip, he couldn’t understand why the other-Jiang Cheng was just lying down, nearly despondent.

Wei Wuxian leaned closer, trying to figure out what was wrong with his brother.

Then, Jiang Cheng slapped him.

Unflinching, Wei Wuxian added, “Go ahead. Hit me. As long as you’ll feel better.”

‘Is that why you let him choke you?’ Lan Wangji wondered.

“Did you feel it?” Jiang Cheng asked.

Wei Wuxian paused, “Feel what?”

“Did you feel my spiritual power?”

A sinking sensation of dread began to pass over the watchers.

“What spiritual power? You didn’t try to use any.”

“I did.”

“...What?”

“Perhaps he got heavily drained,” Lan Qiren suggested, though, for some reason, he couldn’t help but feel like that was a naive hope.

Wei Wuxian frowned, “Just what… what are you talking about?”

“I said, ‘I did,’” Jiang Cheng repeated, his voice so uncharacteristically quiet that it didn’t even sound like him anymore. “When I hit you I used all my spiritual power. So tell me, did you feel it?”

A pause, and then, “Try again?”

“That’s a ‘no’ if I’ve ever heard one,” Nie Mingjue huffed, morbid humor making his attempt at a smile turn grim. Whatever had happened to Jiang Cheng was clearly far more serious than just the discipline whip — and wasn’t that a sentence the watchers could have never imagined themselves thinking.

"...Never mind," Jiang Cheng decided. "Even if I hit you a thousand times, it won't change a thing."

The tone of Jiang Cheng's words sounded almost indifferent. He had gone past downcast, pathetic, and even despairing until he reached a state of unresponsive apathy.

There was nothing left inside of him.

Thunder rumbled outside.

"A-Cheng? What-"

"Wei Wuxian, do you know why Wen Zhuliu is called the Core Melting Hand?"

Ice spread through Jiang Cheng's blood.

"Because his hands can melt away golden cores so thoroughly that you can't ever form a new core again. Your spiritual power will disperse. You'll become useless," he began to laugh, the dark circles under his eyes becoming black holes which sucked in all light.

"What?" Jiang Cheng asked. "But-but the future-me… what?"

"An average person who descended from the cultivation world is no better than a good-for-nothing."

"...Maybe you're wrong?" Lan Xichen suggested. "You could be mistaken-"

"I don't… I don't think I am," Jiang Cheng shook his head, horror sinking in.

"Your whole life will be spent doing worldly business," Jiang Cheng muttered. "You aren't allowed to dream of being at the top ever again."

Jiang Yanli wanted to reassure her brother, to tell him that there was nothing wrong with being a civilian, so long as he lived on, but couldn't. Unlike her, Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian had spent nearly their whole lives working on their cores. It was no surprise that losing it after all this made Jiang Cheng feel like he had nothing.

If Jiang Cheng truly didn't have a core, Yunmeng Jiang would be lost forever.

"A-Die and A-Niang had their cores melted away by Wen Zhuliu, making it easier to kill them."

Based on his expression, some couldn't help but wonder if he wished that had happened to him as well. Before, Jiang Cheng had been mad with grief and not thinking rationally, so Wei Wuxian had constantly reminded him that he could always get revenge another day.

Until this was fixed, his revenge was as realistic as a child's fantasy.

And Jiang Cheng knew that better than anyone.

Lifting a hand to cover his eyes, Jiang Cheng whispered, "Wen Zhuliu, Wen Zhuliu. I want revenge. I want revenge, but how could I?"

He began to laugh.

"I don't have a core anymore. I won't ever be able to form a core again! Revenge? How can I get my revenge now?!"

He laughed and laughed and laughed. His laughter built on itself until it became an unsettling sound of madness. But why not? What did Jiang Cheng have to live for now that he had lost his core?

What else could he do?

"But… A-Cheng, you… I…." Jiang Yanli couldn't say anything, too shocked by change in her brother to speak.

Wei Wuxian stepped back, then stumbled and collapsed onto the ground, unable to say anything in response.

Lan Wangji moved closer to him.

To Jiang Cheng, his cultivation was everything. No one knew better than Wei Wuxian how ambitious Jiang Cheng was, and now….

Even without an especially powerful core, Nie Huaisang knew a cultivator's life was centered around theirs. With Jiang Cheng, who now wanted revenge more than anything, that was especially true.

With a strike of the Core Melting Hand, Jiang Cheng's dreams, cultivation, self-esteem, and hope for revenge had all been smashed to dust.

Huaisang looked down solemnly.

In a situation like this, what could Jiang Cheng do but laugh?

"I don't even have my golden core," he whispered through his laughter. "There's just no way!"

Outside, the thunder rumbled again, and a flash of lightning cut through the sky.

Silently, Jin Zixuan moved closer to the real Jiang Cheng, hoping to provide support.

A symphony of thunder, wind, and laughter formed around them, the outside branches rumbling like a stampede. Jiang Cheng laughed and laughed and laughed until that was all that could be heard.

"Wei Wuxian, why did you bother saving my life?"

"...What?"

“What’s the use of saving me?! Now I have to live on in shame, watching the Wen-dogs go rampant, knowing I can’t do anything?!”

“A-Cheng!” Madam Yu shouted. “I don’t care if Lotus Pier is gone or if you have your core. Your life is worth more than all of that combined, understood?”

“I-”

“A-Cheng,” Jiang Fengmian spoke softly. “Revenge is no where near as important as your life. I don’t care what happens, never give up like that. Please.”

“I….”

Jiang Yanli sat next to him, whispering “Your life is precious, A-Cheng. You need to keep is safe.”

“I know, I-” he paused. “I know.”

It would have been a touching moment if the watchers couldn’t hear the simulated Jiang Cheng laughing madly in the background. As it was, the sound made the Jiangs turn back to the other-Jiang Cheng.

The madness in his eyes was overwhelming.

They knew he would recover — would get back his core and would rebuild the Jiang Sect — but, as it was, Jiang Cheng had essentially lost everything.

“How could it possibly get worse than this?” Jiang Yanli whispered.

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji cried out, making Jiang Fengmian glance away from his son. It was a bit silly — in a situation like this, why wouldn’t he look at his son — but he did anyways.

And the expression on Wei Wuxian’s face shocked him to his core.

In all Jiang Fengmian’s years with the boy, he had never seen him look like this. No matter what Yu Ziyuan did, and no matter how bad things seemed to get, Wei Wuxian was always able to remain calm.

As his daughter had said, Wei Wuxian was born with a smile on his face.

But now-

‘A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him.’

“He thinks he failed,” Jiang Fengmian whispered, finally speaking his thoughts aloud.

“Well, hasn’t he?” Madam Yu snapped. “Look what happened to A-Cheng! In less than a day, he’s-”

“But-but A-Niang, it was my choice-”

“He should have known that you would need to be-”

“He shouldn’t have had to put himself aside to help me! He’s our head disciple, but he’s also my bro-”

“Don’t say that word! He’s not!” Madam Yu shouted. “I… how can you say that when I’ve spent years….”

She cut herself off, but the damage had been done. It was now clear that she was objecting on a basis of her own guilt, rather than an actual dislike of the boy.

“A-Niang,” Jiang Yanli whispered. “He-he is, and it wasn’t his fault.”

“A-Li?”

“A-Niang, this was A-Cheng’s choice. It was… not completely thought out, but… you can’t blame A-Xian for it. Please, I… A-Xian deserves more than that.”

Nie Mingjue, Lan Xichen, Lan Qiren, and Madam Jin all nodded in agreement.

The wind was cut from her sails, and Madam Yu backed off. She knew her daughter was right. Just like she knew she had a tendency to wrongly blame Wei Wuxian.

(The simulation couldn’t have made that any more clear.)

Her children genuinely saw Wei Wuxian as their brother. She didn’t have to be his mother, but she didn’t have to treat him like a slave either. Looking at it from the outside, Madam Yu could clearly see their relationship.

~~And knew she was wrong.~~

As Madam Yu fell silent, Jiang Fengmian glanced between the simulated Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian. Jiang Fengmian had never allowed Madam Yu to pressure him into kicking Wei Wuxian out of the sect. He and Wei Wuxian had personalities that went well together, and Jiang Fengmian had trained him into one of the strongest cultivators of his generation despite his late start.

But they both knew that Wei Wuxian wasn’t really part of the family.

(What would Cangse Sanren and Wei Changze think if they knew about this?)

Jiang Fengmian’s legs seemed to give out under him as he fell into his seat, completely agreeing with his daughter.

How could it get worse than this?

The door squeaked open.

“A-Ning?”

Wen Ning stepped inside, a fawning smile on his face.

Jiang Cheng froze.

“Wait, A-Cheng, he-”

Jiang Cheng kicked Wen Ning to the ground, toppling over the bowl of medicine and spilling the black liquid everywhere. Wei Wuxian rushed to help.

“Hey!” Wen Qing shouted.

“What’s wrong with you!” Jiang Cheng shouted, grabbing Wei Wuxian by the collar and shaking him.

“Jiang Cheng-”

“What are you waiting for?! He’s from the Wen Clan! And you still went to help him? Kill him!”

“Calm down Jiang Cheng!” Wei Wuxian commanded, but Jiang Cheng wasn’t listening. Instead, his eyes focused on the Wen flags hanging on the walls, and realization sank into his expression.

Glaring back at the real Jiang Cheng, Lan Wangji growled, “If you touch him again-”

“I know-”

“Where is this place?” Jiang Cheng demanded. “Did you walk into a trap?!”

“No-”

“No? Then how did you get back here? Don’t tell me — you asked for help from the Wen Clan?!” Jiang Cheng shook him ferociously. “Do you want to die?!”

His hands wrapped around Wei Wuxian's neck.

Then, he fell forward. For his newly-coreless body, even that much exertion was too much.

“A-Cheng,” Jiang Fengmian whispered.

“Does he regret it now?” Jin Guangshan wondered. “If he was hoping to die heroically saving his brother, then this is probably the worst outcome imaginable.”

“How dare you?” Madam Yu snapped.

“Are you really going to take his sacrifice and rationalize it as if you were the one doing it?” Lan Qiren asked. “If he completely regretted it, he would have told Wei Wuxian what he did to make the boy feel guilty. He hasn’t, so he doesn’t.”

“Jiang Cheng,” Wei Wuxian said, wrapping his arms around and trying to help the heavily-coughing boy.

“Perhaps,” Jin Guangshan allowed. “But, considering what he turns into in the future, I can’t help but wonder if he’ll hesitate before helping Wei Wuxian next time around.”

“How dare you-”

“And I guess we have you to thank for what he turned into, don’t we, Madam Yu?”

Right as Madam Yu was about to explode, Madam Jin glared and hissed, “Not another word, Guangshan.”

Her husband turned to her, frowning in confusion.

“Jiang Cheng, you’re injured,” Wei Wuxian reminded. “Don’t-”

Jiang Cheng pushed him back, refusing the offered help.

“Wei Wuxian!” he shouted, panting heavily as his laughter started up again. “I see. My parents’ corpses aren’t even cool yet, and yet you seek help from them?”

“No, no, Jiang-xiong, that’s-”

“What a great Head Disciple of Yumeng!”

The deranged, insane laughter returned, shaking the building.

A silver needle flashed forward, and Jiang Cheng collapsed again.

A light flush spread across Jiang Cheng’s cheeks, and he sank down, wishing he could disappear into the floor.

“Are you two insane?” Wen Qing demanded. “Anyone could find you if he shouts and laughs that loudly.”

Relief spread across Jiang Yanli’s expression, and Nie Mingjue found himself reluctantly impressed by what he had seen. Wen Qing had truly decided to help Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng.

In the face of that, Jiang Cheng’s reaction should have seemed unreasonable. However, Nie Mingjue knew all too well that ‘kill all Wens’ was exactly the strategy he had spent the last few days advocating for.

He sat back in his chair, mind racing.

“Jiang Cheng!” Wei Wuxian spoke, kneeling beside his brother and practically ignoring Wen Qing’s words.

Annoyed, she continued, “I’ll throw you out immediately if you don’t shut up.”

“What did you-”

“Don’t pull out the needle,” Wen Qing commanded, interrupting Wei Wuxian. “That brat will start throwing a fit if he wakes up. I could hear him even when I was outside! Pull it out after his injuries have healed. Don’t cause trouble. I don’t want to interact with Wen Chao, and I especially don’t want to deal with that woman he takes around with him.”

The power she spoke with was undeniably impressive.

(The disgust she felt for Wen Chao drew a clear line between her and them. If the glare Wen Chao was sending her meant anything, then she wouldn’t be welcome with the Wens once they got out.)

Hesitantly, Wen Qing began drifting farther away from her clan, moving closer to the open spot Jiang Yanli was silently offering her.

“Thank you, A-Jie,” Wen Ning said.

As he said that, Jiang Yanli couldn’t shake the feeling that Wen Ning looked like a fluffy, doe-eyed lamb.

Wen Qing confidently walked towards the fallen bowl, picking it up for closer observation. She sniffed once, then glared, making Wen Ning jump.

“If you’re really grateful then put in some effort! What kind of medicine is this? He’s too weak to take a supplement right now! We need to focus on strengthening his body! How many times do I have to tell you that? I’ll brew it!”

Smiles flickered across many faces.

Wen Ruohan remained silent as he observed that, thinking it over. Considering what he knew of Wei Wuxian’s character, Wen Ruohan knew the boy wouldn’t forget this kindness. This interaction was the most positive connection binding Wei Wuxian to the Wen Sect.

And, outside, Wei Wuxian was working with Wen Ning.

(So, was the danger of Wen Qing’s lacking loyalty more or less than the advantage of her possible applications?)

Wen Qing stormed off, leaving Wen Ning to tell Wei Wuxian, “Medicine prepared by my sister will definitely turn out great! Hundreds of times better than mine!”

Breathlessly, Wei Wuxian nodded, “Thank you.”

“He’s rather polite when he wants to be,” Lan Qiren observed, finding the disconnect between the Wei Wuxian before them and the Wei Wuxian from the Cloud Recesses to be odd. Then again, regardless of how he had acted at the Cloud Recesses, even Lan Qiren knew Wei Wuxian had a righteous core. Sighing, he decided the boy’s behavior both times was acceptable, even if he wasn’t anywhere near as proper as a Lan.

(With that, Lan Qiren couldn't help but wonder how many Lan disciples were like Su She — appropriately polite while under scrutiny, but unquestionably unrighteous when backed into a wall.)

A conflicted expression flashed across his face.

Their surroundings changed in a flash forward, showing Wei Wuxian sitting next to Jiang Cheng's bed, watching his sleeping form. Slowly, he reached his hand out and condensed his spiritual power.

A red glow enveloped his hand.

He looked back at Jiang Cheng.

Jiang Fengmian's hands began to shake.

When his other-self had told Wei Wuxian to protect Jiang Cheng, Jiang Fengmian hadn't thought twice. Why wouldn't he protect his son first? It would be illogical to expect anything else.

And yet, could Wei Wuxian be blamed for Jiang Cheng choosing to risk himself? What else could Wei Wuxian have done? And even if Jiang Cheng had moved to defend him, Wei Wuxian didn't know.

All he knew was that he had failed to carry out Jiang Fengmian's final order less than a day after it was given.

The guilt creeping into him began to overflow.

After a bit of switching back and forth between his hand and Jiang Cheng, Wei Wuxian's gaze finally stilled. He took a deep breath, and his fear was replaced by determination.

He turned back to Jiang Cheng, resolution clear in his expression.

Given that, Jin Guangshan felt it was safe to assume that Wei Wuxian had come up with a solution. It should be impossible (there was a reason the Core Melting Hand was so feared), but if anyone could do it, it would be him. However, if Wei Wuxian — the boy who made himself bait against the Xuanwu of Slaughter — was hesitating, it was obvious that the price for regaining a core was immense.

"What a waste of a loyal soldier," he muttered.

"What exactly is that supposed to mean, Jin-xiong?" Jiang Fengmian asked.

"Nothing, nothing," he smirked. "I'm simply curious how much Wei Wuxian is willing to give up for your family without receiving anything in return. Perhaps a slave is truly the most accurate description for him."

Wen Ruohan's lips quirked into a smile.

“How dare you?” Madam Yu hissed. “It isn’t like that. If he has a way to get back his… his brother’s core, why wouldn’t he?”

“You say that, and yet you’re the one who-”

“Guangshan!” Madam Jin snapped. “Enough.”

Several confused gazes turned her way. She knew what they were confused about; she had made it quite clear that what the other-Madam Yu said about her son would not be forgiven. How was she supposed to forgive “you should have let him die” when it had been said so straightforwardly? Madam Jin’s anger had bubbled up within her.

But then the other Madam Yu had died, her corpse pushed down by that whore and her husband dying next to her without being able to show that he cared for her.

She couldn’t forgive Yu Ziyuan, but she couldn’t bring herself to despise her either.

“Madam Jin?” Lan Xichen prompted, seeing that Madam Jin was struggling to continue.

Finally, she took a deep breath and explained, “We’ve all grown fond of Wei Wuxian over the course of the simulation. And, as we established in the previous segments, Ziyuan’s actions against the boy were wrong.”

“And you think you’re better?” Madam Yu hissed defensively.

At those words, Madam Jin was thrown into the past. Memories of a party — Zixuan’s party — and an uninvited guest.

Last year, a boy had shown up on Jin Zixuan’s birthday. Realizing that he was yet another bastard child, Madam Jin had fallen into a deep fury. Not wanting to upset her further, Jin Guangshan had kicked the boy down the steps of Koi tower. As he looked up, the boy’s shocked and betrayed eyes had been scarily reminiscent of the ones she had seen in Wei Wuxian.

Scared; terrified; uncertain; alone.

But he deserved it for coming.

(Was his existence the boy’s fault, or her husband’s?)

“I… I am not ignorant to what I’ve done,” she looked at Yu Ziyuan. “We’ve both made… mistakes. We’ve established that.”

When Madam Yu raised an eyebrow in disbelief at Madam Jin’s words, Madam Jin glared right back.

‘I still don’t forgive you,’ her eyes seemed to say.

Madam Yu merely nodded.

‘I didn’t expect you to.’

While the watchers discussed, Wei Wuxian remained solely focused on Jiang Cheng. The confliction in his gaze was easily apparent, but steady determination shone through as well.

He was scared, but he had a plan.

‘I hope this all works out,’ Nie Mingjue thought with a breathed-out sigh.

Finally, Wei Wuxian took in a deep breath. He dropped his hand, and stepped towards Jiang Cheng. Reaching forward, he pulled out Wen Qing’s silver needle.

“Jiang Cheng.”

Said boy twitched, his eyes scrunching tighter, then slowly blinked them open.

“Wens?” Jiang Cheng asked.

Although his other-self wasn’t given anywhere near enough time to understand what Wen Qing and Wen Ning had done, Jiang Cheng couldn’t help but feel guilty for the blatant hatred that appeared on his other-self’s face.

Oh, well. Once his other-self got some time to process what the Wen siblings had done, he would be able to move them out of his “kill all Wens” plan. He hoped he would get a chance to thank them.

(Or maybe he’d let Yanli thank them for him; she was much better at that sort of thing.)

Then, after a moment of thought, Jiang Cheng’s body went slack again. He rested against the bed like a corpse. Unnaturally calm, Wei Wuxian gave a Jiang Yanli-style smile and began to explain.

“You’ve been asleep for a few days. You’re very weak right now. Come and eat something.”

Jiang Cheng didn’t move.

They had seen traces of it before, but it was becoming more and more obvious that Jiang Cheng would rather die than live on without his core. Slowly, his family and new friends crowded around him, trying to offer support.

Jiang Cheng thought it was rather stupid of them (he still had his core, after all), but opted against saying anything when a warm and fuzzy feeling began to spread across his chest.

“Jiang Cheng, come on. Eat.”

Wei Wuxian's words were ignored. From there, the watchers were treated to a montage of Wei Wuxian's continuous attempts. However, when the subject has no desire to live, it doesn't matter how hard you try.

Time passed, yet Jiang Cheng didn't move at all. He didn't ask any questions, drink any water, or eat any food. It seemed that all he desired was death.

'Well, if this doesn't push Wei Wuxian into seaking out desperate measures, then nothing will,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'So then, little Patriarch, what is your solution to this?'

In some ways, a success here would be even more impressive than demonic cultivation.

(Wen Qing, who had spent years researching the topic and only made it as far as a theoretical transfer, watched intently for any clues she could find.)

Finally, Wei Wuxian caved in.

"Do you really want to die?" he asked, looking down.

"I can't seek revenge even when I'm alive. Why shouldn't I die? Maybe I'll be lucky enough to turn into a ferocious ghost."

"A-Cheng-"

"I know. I-I know," he assured. "I wouldn't do that. It's just that he's… right now he's…."

He cut off, distracted by the absolute anguish spreading across Wei Wuxian's face.

"You've undergone soul calming ceremonies since you were young. Even if you die, you won't be able to turn into a ferocious ghost," Wei Wuxian reminded him, pushing some more food forward.

"If I can't seek revenge regardless of whether I'm dead or alive, then why would it matter which of the two I am?"

The last of Wei Wuxian's resistance seemed to crumble before their eyes.

"You better not do anything stupid," Jiang Cheng hissed at his brother.

Wei Wuxian tried to speak with him more, but, no matter what he said, Jiang Cheng refused to respond. For some time, Wei Wuxian sat by the bed, looking at him.

"You're going to die of dehydration if you don't drink soon," Madam Yu growled, watching her stupid, stupid son gradually erode away. Without access to his core, Jiang Cheng couldn't practice inedia.

If Wei Wuxian didn't do something, Jiang Cheng was going to die.

"Sorry," Jiang Cheng whispered, too soft for anyone to hear.

Then, Wei Wuxian slapped his knees and stood up, immediately moving to busy himself. The watchers flashed forward in time to evening, right as Wei Wuxian finished making a meal. Unfortunately, it was just as bright red as all of Wei Wuxian's meals.

He set everything on the table, then spoke, "Get up. It's time for dinner."

Jiang Cheng ignored him.

The real version breathed out in frustration, annoyed at his other-self. Then again, he couldn't even imagine losing his core. People who lost theirs had a high chance of committing suicidal.

The simulated Jiang Cheng, who had lost everything else too, had all the more reason to feel that way.

Wei Wuxian didn't blink at Jiang Cheng's reaction. Instead, he calmly picked up his chopsticks and smiled mischievously.

"If you don't replenish your strength, how are we going to get back your golden core?"

At 'golden core' Jiang Cheng finally blinked.

Lan Wangji breathed out in a disbelieving half-laugh, "Of course he has something."

"My…" in addition to not having had water in quite some time, the shock of Wei Wuxian's words made it nearly impossible for Jiang Cheng to speak.

Jin Zixuan laughed, "I knew it. I knew he could do it!"

"Wei-xiong is just destined to attempt the impossible, isn't he?"

"Or maybe he's lying?" Lan Qiren suggested. "He would probably be willing to say anything if it meant Jiang Cheng would eat a little."

"It would be proven wrong immediately," Lan Xichen disagreed. "Besides, we know the future Jiang Wanyin has a golden core, so-"

"So that boy genuinely archived the impossible," Madam Yu furnished. Despite the words, there wasn't the slightest trace of annoyance or jealousy in her tone.

Wei Wuxian was once again doing the impossible for her son.

And it seemed like the simulated Jiang Cheng was starting to realize that as well.

"My core?" Jiang Cheng asked.

"That's right. You didn't hear a word wrong. I said we're going to 'get back your golden core.'"

Jiang Cheng moved his lips, speaking through a crackly, dry throat, "...You know how?"

"I do."

Wen Qing stepped closer, unwilling to so much as blink on the off chance that she might miss something.

Finally, Wei Wuxian turned to face him.

"Did you forget who my mother was? Who Cangse Sanren studied under?"

"Studied under? Wait, then he-"

"...You mean…. You mean…." Jiang Cheng couldn't even bring himself to say it.

Nie Mingjue laughed, "I guess if anyone could do that, it would be her."

"It means I can take you to Baoshan Sanren's mountain."

For a brief moment, every mouth gaped open in shock.

"An immortal," Jin Guangshan whispered. With a connection like that, Wei Wuxian was more than just a good investment — he was quite possibly the most valuable piece on the board.

Wei Wuxian wouldn't lie about this, not now. He wouldn't raise Jiang Cheng's hope for nothing. Which meant he had a free ticket to a miracle from an immortal.

No one could speak.

"But…" Jiang Cheng whispered. "I thought you'd forgotten everything from your childhood."

Remembering what Wei Wuxian had told Lan Wangji about his only memory of his parents, traces of suspicion began to slip back into several minds.

"I remember a few things," Wei Wuxian responded vaguely. "Some phrases were repeated to me so many times that even I haven't been able to forget them. I can still hear a woman's voice repeating something to me, telling me a location and giving me instructions. The voice said that if I ever find myself in a hopeless situation, I can go up the mountain and ask the immortal for help."

If it was Baoshan Sanren….

"That just might work," Lan Qiren acknowledged.

Nie Huaisang laughed, "Wow, so the future you sorta owes Wei Wuxian your core, huh?"

“Wei Wuxian is the reason I lost it to begin with, it cancels out,” Jiang Cheng laughed back, too overjoyed to even pretend to be angry. If what they had seen of the 13-years-later future was true, then it absolutely, 100%, worked.

But-

“He’s giving me his chance at a miracle?” Jiang Cheng wondered.

“Of course he is,” Jiang Yanli answered. “We’re siblings. You’re both willing to give up anything for each other.”

Although he didn’t say so out loud, Wen Ruohan wondered how much of Wei Wuxian’s decision was based on the last orders Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian gave him.

(He thought he had failed to protect Jiang Cheng. If he was willing to do anything to fix it, then there was much more at play than a ‘sibling’ willing to sacrifice himself.)

(Then again, the Jiangs had truly sunken their teeth deep into Wei Wuxian. It was equally possible that the boy was genuinely doing this just because he cared.)

Wen Ruohan told himself to keep his mind open to the possibilities.

Regardless of the reason for Wei Wuxian’s offer, it was still enough to make Jiang Cheng roll out of bed. When he threw himself over the table, Wei Wuxian handed a bowl and a pair of chopsticks to him.

“Eat,” he ordered.

“I think he’s turning into you,” Jin Zixuan whispered, making Jiang Yanli laugh delightedly. It was all going to be fine; Wei Wuxian had a solution.

Of course he did. Sometimes, it seemed like he could do anything.

Lan Wangji stared in awe.

Seeing that Jiang Cheng was hesitating, Wei Wuxian reiterated, “Eat. Either we talk while eating, or we sit in silence.”

Jiang Cheng immediately swept food into his mouth, powering through the overwhelming spice.

Seeing this, Madam Yu felt an earlier thought return anew: no one in the world was better for her son than Wei Wuxian. And to think she had spent years trying to separate them.

How was she supposed to talk to him now?

Once he confirmed that Jiang Cheng had started, Wei Wuxian felt comfortable explaining, “I’ll take you there in a few days.”

“Today!”

Wei Wuxian laughed, "What's the rush for? Do you think a centuries old immortal will disappear in just a few days? It'll take a few days because there are many taboos in place. If you anger the master, it'll be over for both of us."

Jiang Fengmian shook his head, gaping in awe, "I can't believe he remembers all of those."

"Wei-xiong's memory makes absolutely no sense," Nie Huaisang decided.

"You… are you lying to me?" Jiang Cheng asked, suspicion growing.

Instead of answering, Wei Wuxian took out a sack of purple cloth.

"Yunmeng Jiang fabric?" Madam Jin wondered aloud.

Eyes downcast, Wei Wuxian pursed his lips, then explained "I asked Wen Ning to find Madam Yu and Uncle Jiangs' bodies. They've been… properly buried now. He also grabbed this for us."

Disbelievingly, Jiang Fengmian slowly turned and bowed to Wen Qing, "Thank you. This is… a debt that can never be repaid."

Jiang Cheng looked down, and found Jiang Fengmian's hair ornament and a clarity bell inside the sack.

At the reminder of what had been lost, the watchers' good mood fluctuated back and forth. Jiang Yanli was forced to look away, unable to stare at the reminder of her parents' fates.

A clear stream of tears fell down Jiang Cheng's cheeks. His breathing became fractured, and he slowly sank to his knees, bowing before the symbols of his parents.

Not speaking another word, Wei Wuxian joined him. He moved into position, bowing lowly out of respect for Madam Yu and the former Sect Leader Jiang.

In the presence of such a scene, no one could bring themselves to speak.

The world around them faded away.

Taking shallow breaths, Jiang Yanli quickly wiped her returning tears.

No one was quite sure what to feel. On one hand, things had reached an all-time low: Jiang Cheng's core had been destroyed, something their glimpse at the further future had caused them to believe was impossible. Anger at the Wens, pity for Jiang Cheng, and embarrassment on Jiang Cheng's part were all prevalent.

On the other hand, Wei Wuxian knew how to fix it.

"I keep forgetting that his Grandmaster is Baoshan Sanren," Nie Mingjue laughed.

Xichen smiled as well, "I think we all forgot. It's just so…"

“Unbelievable,” Wen Qing finished. “Considering that he has no connection to his father’s family, but has a free wish from Baoshan Sanren-”

“I know,” Madam Yu responded, cutting her off. Normally, Wen Qing would have been annoyed by that, but she understood. Of all the things both versions of Madam Yu had done, calling him “son of a servant” was probably the least important.

There was no reason for Wen Qing to press the matter.

Throughout the interaction, Wen Ruohan’s eyes remained glued on Wen Qing. Unlike the death-glares being given to the rest of the Wens, Wen Qing was being accepted without reservation.

Which meant-

There was a sound of shuffling, and then someone cleared their throat.

“Um… Everyone? Hi, um…. Are you… is it better now? Have you… I-”

“A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian responded. “Thank you for contacting us again. Yes, we’re better now.”

Wei Wuxian was silent for a moment as he analyzed Jiang Fengmian’s voice, searching for a hint of hesitance, fear, or spiritual possession. Not finding anything, he breathed out a sigh of relief.

“That’s good — that’s great. I’m… I’m glad.”

In a complete reverse of last time, the watchers were fairly positive, while Wei Wuxian appeared uncomfortable. Though, given what had happened last time, they couldn’t blame him.

(Madam Yu looked down, her other-self’s last words to the boy echoing in her head.)

“The Concealment Zone Add-On is going pretty well,” Wei Wuxian explained, picking up energy. “When I visited the Lans a little while ago, I got the idea to use musical cultivation as a way to more easily manipulate the simulation. I tried it out, and it’s working fantastically! Wen Ning and I were practicing it earlier since he’s apparently going to need to be involved when we apply the Concealment Zone, so we put on a little performance for the kids. I played the dizi, and he used a fǒu. I even managed to get fourth-shidi to join in and play his eru. It was great!”

Remembering the Wei Wuxian in the flash forward — the one who had taken on an entire squadron with just a dizi — left the watchers stunned speechless for a moment.

After a long period of thought, Lan Qiren instructed, “Be careful. Manipulating that kind of energy is dangerous.”

Despite the disapproval, his tone was far from the uncaring condemnation most had expected.

“Yeah, I had a lot of trouble at first. Luckily, using the return message feature didn’t require much energy, and since then Mo Xuanyu has been really helping me out.”

“That explains it,” Madam Jin muttered. If Jiang Cheng was known for hunting demonic cultivations down, there would have to be a significant number of people who could use it in the future. With instructions from the Yiling Patriarch himself, it was no surprise that the real Wei Wuxian was learning demonic cultivation much earlier than his other-self had.

And, because the cultivation was needed to contact them, not even Lan Qiren could raise a fuss over it.

“Well, we’ll probably be done soon. Everyone in Lotus Pier has been super nice about it. They haven’t even really complained about the experiments and flute-playing!”

“And everyone else?”

“...You already know about the help Wen Ning is offering me. And the Lans have contacted me whenever they have questions, and the Nie Sect provided me with a lot of texts! It’s going great!”

If it hadn’t been for the pause before he spoke, they might have believed that.

It seemed the Lans were still distant, the Nie couldn’t provide much help, the Wens were trying to manipulate Wei Wuxian, and the Jins were too class-focused to listen to the son of a servant.

A sting bit at Madam Yu’s heart.

“So, anything I can do for you dearly beloved sect leaders?”

“Wei Ying!”

“Uh, yes?” Wei Wuxian responded, instantly regretting what he had just said. He had forgotten, for a moment, that Madam Yu was present as well.

He tensed apprehensively.

“I…” Madam Yu clenched her fists, nearly unable to speak. “I…”

“Madam Yu?”

“...I apologize.”

More than one jaw dropped open.

“...I’m sorry, I-could you say that again?”

“I said, ‘I’m sorry.’ Are you deaf?”

“Right, right. No, it’s… um, there’s nothing for you to be sorry for?”

“Do you accept my apology or not?!”

“I do,” Wei Wuxian rushed to say through his confusion. “Um… I’m glad you’re all doing better?”

“About to be much better soon!” Nie Huaisang laughed, glancing at Jiang Cheng. As soon as Jiang Cheng’s core was back, they would be able to take the fight to the Wens.

“O… kay?”

Then, Huaisang clapped his hands together, “Oh, speaking of that-”

“Speaking of what?”

“Do you know where Baoshan Sanren’s mountain is?”

Several confused gazes flashed his way, and Wen Ruohan huffed a slight laugh. It seemed both he and Nie Huaisang weren’t entirely convinced by Wei Wuxian’s story.

A pause, and then “You need Baoshan Sanren?”

“Yup!” Huaisang lied through his teeth. “It’s really, really important.”

“...Is it.”

His skepticism couldn’t have been more clear.

“Actually, it is,” Jiang Fengmian countered, chuckling lightly.

“Super important,” Jin Zixuan added.

“Life changing!”

“Ground breaking!”

“It’ll shock Jiang Cheng to the core!”

“Oh, shut up!” JIang Cheng snapped at a laughing Huaisang. “Wei Wuxian, just tell us. Do you think you’d be able to find Baoshan Sanren’s mountain?”

The watchers might be joking around, but the fact that even Jiang Fengmian thought it was important made Wei Wuxian hesitate to say ‘no.’ There had been no objection regarding its importance, not even from the super-serious-don’t-know-the-meaning-of-the-word-’fun’ Lans present.

It seemed genuinely important.

If that was the case, then there was no way Wei Wuxian would give up before trying.

“W-well, I don’t know off the top of my head, but I could try going to some of the places my parents took me. I bet if I searched through them, I could find something. Maybe.”

After thinking it over for a moment, Huaisang accepted the explanation. He couldn't figure out another way for Wei Wuxian to have helped himself remember. And, as Jiang Cheng did recover his core, there weren't any other possibilities.

"I see. No need to look into it, I was just asking. Thank you, Wei-xiong!"

"...Sure. Anything else?"

"Just one thing," Wen Ruohan's grin widened. "I need you to pass a message along. Tell my son that Wen Ning can invite you to Qishan if you need any of our resources. It would be nice for you two to get closer."

Wen Qing froze.

"Thank you, Your Excellency. I'll tell him. Since it seems like you got things figured out, I might go back to checking in every few segments. Would that be okay?"

"I.. wait, A-Xian don-"

"Is there something wrong?" Wen Ruohan asked. "If you're not feeling well, you're always welcome to leave."

The watchers froze. If they objected too much, Wen Ruohan was willing to walk out of the simulation and start the Sunshot Campaign immediately.

"...No, nothing," Jiang Fengmian answered hesitantly. "...Checking in every few days is fine."

"...If you're sure."

"I am…. Stay safe, A-Xian."

The exact opposite of his other-self's last words to the boy.

"Okay! Bye Bye~"

His voice vanished.

Wringing her hands together, Wen Qing turned and said, "Your Excellency, my brother-"

"Shouldn't be spending so much time away from Qishan," Wen Ruohan explained. "If he and Wei Wuxian need our resources, then who am I to deny them? Though, I must commend you on a job well done."

"Excuse me?"

"If it weren't for you, Wei Wuxian might have died there, and demonic cultivation would never have been invented," Wen Ruohan explained, smiling without a trace of his earlier anger. "The relationship you and Wen Ning have formed with Wei Wuxian could be instrumental to the future of the Wen Clan."

And now, he was keeping Wen Ning in Qishan so that Wen Xu could watch carefully for any sign of betrayal.

“And of course, should anything happen to those two, I’m sure you’ll want to be nearby. Neither of us want Wen Ning or Wei Wuxian to be damaged.”

‘But you would hurt them, if it meant punishing Wen Qing?’ Lan Qiren thought. ‘Or do your plans regarding Wei Wuxian involve him being hurt regardless, and you want to make sure the best doctor in the world is on standby to keep him safe?’

Either way, Wen Qing heard the threat loud and clear.

(Wen Ruohan had thought long and hard about this. On one hand, Wen Qing's actions meant wringing her neck would be too merciful a punishment. On the other, who else could he trust with Wei Wuxian's health?)

(And, if he happened to change his mind later, there would be nowhere for Wen Qing to run.)

Jiang Yanli cast a nervous glance between Wen Qing and Wen Ruohan. Before, it had seemed inevitable that Wen Qing and Wen Ning would be kicked out of the Wen Clan, if not killed for their treason. That created a simple line dividing Wen Qing from Wen Ruohan.

But instead, Wen Ruohan had strengthened her family’s ties to the main branch, and made it so that, when they got out, it would be extremely likely that Wen Ning would be in Qishan.

Wen Qing couldn’t leave without Wen Ruohan knowing, and she wouldn’t be able to get Wen Ning out of Qishan before he found them. It wasn’t quite a hostage situation — Wen Xu didn’t know why Wen Ning was under watch, and Wen Ning had no reason to betray the sect — but it was skirting the edge so closely that the smallest tap would cause it to fall.

If she wanted to ensure her brother was safe (and away from Qishan), she would have to leave now.

But then her questions would remain unanswered.

Baoshan Sanren was going to do what she couldn’t. In all her years of study, all Wen Qing had been able to theorize was how to transfer cores, not make new ones. She briefly considered that Wei Wuxian might have chosen to do that, but quickly rejected the idea. Wei Wuxian might be able to kidnap an enemy with a suitable core, and she was fairly confident that the operation was painless and perfectly safe for person receiving it. However, when it came to the person giving the core, she wasn't so certain. If the patient needed to be kept awake or if she couldn't use anesthetics (two very likely possibilities in her untested theory), then it would be impossible for the donor to make it through the operation — especially if they were unwilling.

They would die, and then Jiang Cheng would die. His future self was alive, so Baoshan Sanren had restored his core.

But was finding out about Baoshan Sanren's medical abilities really worth risking her brother's life?

No, of course not.

But she still didn't know how Wen Ning died.

For the longest time, she had thought Wei Wuxian hunted him down to add him to his ghost army. She didn't know why, and she didn't know how, but that had seemed certain.

It wasn't now.

She couldn't leave until she knew how her brother died.

Wen Qing looked away, conceding to her sect leader's desires.

The interaction between Wen Qing and Wen Ruohan did not go unnoticed by the other watchers; Huaisang felt that it was time to switch topics.

"Say, now that we know that the whole 'Wei Wuxian is responsible for the fall of Yunmeng' thing is wrong, how much do we believe the other things that group said?"

"It wasn't technically false," Lan Wangji pointed out. "Wei Ying made the right decision, but it's not as though the people we heard at the beginning were intentionally lying."

"But… you don't really think he killed A-Jie, do you?" Jiang Cheng asked. "I mean… if nothing else, you love him. Why would you suggest that?"

Lan Wangji jumped at that statement, hating at the way his budding, uncertain feelings were treated like an inevitable fact. The invasiveness of the situation was grating him.

He fell silent.

"Demonic cultivation corrupts," Lan Qiren answered. "All of us know that he would never choose to do something like that, but he obviously thinks that the power demonic cultivation offers is worth it. I won't condemn him for being tempted by the opportunity for revenge, but that doesn't change the fact that the things he does as a result of the corruption are his fault."

"Besides," Lan Xichen added solemnly. "When we first learned about it, it was from his point of view. He was remembering the things people said, and had no defense."

Nie Huaisang hummed, thinking that over, and the Jiangs clenched their fists.

"Still," Wen Ruohan laughed. "You wouldn't have won otherwise."

"We don't know that-"

"I think we do," he disagreed. "They said the Yiling Patriarch was an ally of the sects during the Sunshot Campaign. If everyone reviles him, and yet he's still considered a major contributor, then he did so much that no one could deny it."

After a pause, Lan Xichen stood up, “In this world, we won’t need to resort to demonic cultivation. In that world, we did. However, we also know why Wei Wuxian felt pressured into that. Rather than blaming him, it seems more appropriate to consider how you caused its creation.”

“I may have prompted it, but unlike all of you, Wei Wuxian knew this was coming.”

“And then he fixed it,” Jin Ziuan added. “Once Wei Wuxian invents demonic cultivation, you don’t stand a chance!”

“He won’t need it in this world, but he still succeeded there,” Lan Wangji added.

Madam Yu huffed, “A-Cheng losing his core was the worst thing you could have possibly done, and Wei Wuxian managed to fix even that. After this, things will inevitably get better.”

They knew Wei Wuxian killed Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan, so the Wens wouldn’t touch them. They knew Lan Wangji wasn’t sect leader, so Xichen would survive. They knew Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng would turn out stronger than ever. They knew Wei Wuxian died later, so the Wens wouldn’t hurt him again. The narrative showed a build in tension, so the scenes were probably arranged to escalate. What could possibly be worse than losing your core?

The watchers were confident that from here on out, it could only get better.

(Nie Huaisang thought back to his seventeen year old friend trying to fight the world, and decided he wasn’t so sure of that.)

Chapter End Notes

You obviously don’t have to agree with me, but I thought I could try and explain my thought process for what I wanted to show. MXTX revealed Jiang Cheng’s sacrifice right at the end of the book. This shows who Jiang Cheng was: no matter what happened between them afterwards, there was a time in which Jiang Cheng loved Wei Wuxian. He’s not the villain, and probably won’t continue chasing Wei Wuxian down/hunting demonic cultivators. It also shows us how much Jiang Cheng has developed: he doesn’t try to tell Wei Wuxian what he did because, after everything that’s happened, he knows it doesn’t matter anymore. I appreciate and understand that, but I felt like my story didn’t need those things because the watchers can just talk to the real/adult Jiang Cheng once they get out; there’s no point.

On the other hand, the core transfer reveal is done where it is because that’s where MXTX thought it would leave the strongest impact. We’re getting unending disasters now, so everyone’s subconsciously preparing for the worst. On the other hand, after the second siege of burial mounds, we’re somewhat lured into a false sense of security. This makes the reveal that much more heartbreaking. I like it this way, so I’m leaving that where it is. :)

Spoiler #2: It Gets Much, Much Worse

Chapter Notes

“Hello, Xiongzhang,” Lan Wangji greeted as he sat down.

“Wangji,” Lan Xichen smiled warmly. “How are you and Young Master Wei doing?”

For a moment, Lan Wangji seemed to glow with happiness at his brother’s question. Although Lan Xichen and Wei Wuxian hadn’t made any concrete plans about whether or not to interfere with Meng Yao, the conversations they had seemed to be greatly improving their relationship.

“A little overworked,” he finally answered. “Unfortunately, we received some troubling news.”

“Oh?”

“Apparently, when Sizhui and the others used Wei Ying’s invention, they were somewhat careless,” he glanced up. “There’s a chance that Wen Ruohan is inside the simulation as well.”

“Wen Ruohan?” Lan Xichen gasped out, his eyes going wide. “How sure are you?”

“...Wei Ying has a few doubts,” Lan Wangji frowned. “His younger self heavily implied it while he was speaking to us, but, as we don’t actually know what’s happening in that dimension, it’s… difficult to tell whether he’s right.”

It was bad enough when the younger Wei Wuxian revealed that the people within the simulation didn’t want to leave. Now, the chance of creating a far worse world had become exceptionally high.

“Do you have any way to confirm?”

“Wei Ying thinks he knows a way for us to go inside the simulation. We won’t be able to talk to the watchers, but he thinks we’ll be able to see them,” he paused. “...Would you like to join us?”

And leave seclusion, went unsaid.

For a strange, terrifying moment, Lan Xichen actually considered it. To leave seclusion — to rejoin society without his sworn brothers haunting him — and help. To return to work. To offer assistance.

His hands began to tremble.

Leave now? How could he? How could he even consider that when he still didn't understand what went wrong? He knew he shouldn't have trusted ~~A-Yao~~ Jin Guangyao, but he didn't know when he should have stopped. He had no idea when some trust became too much.

How could he trust himself to make the right decision now?

(They wouldn't need him anyways.)

But he still hadn't convinced Wei Wuxian to help the other-dimension's Meng Yao.

But was that really the right thing to do?

Xichen flinched when he felt a hand cover his trembling ones, and looked up to meet his brother's eyes.

"I'm sorry. I shouldn't have asked," Lan Wangji frowned.

"No. No, you were right to do so. I… just don't think I'm ready yet."

Lan Wangji nodded once in understanding.

"...I hope the other Wei Wuxian is wrong," Lan Xichen finally said.

Another nod, "So do I."

When the simulation started again, the optimistic energy of the watchers still hadn't faded away.

And the simulation reinforced that mindset. After days of darkness and fire and blood, the crisp, cool mountains — even if they couldn't feel the wind — were a blessing.

Smiling brightly, Jiang Yanli did a little twirl, observing the mountains in their entirety.

(Jin Zixuan's cheeks turned scarlet at the sight.)

"Is this really where Baoshan Sanren lives?" Jiang Cheng asked, staring up at a steep path.

Frowning, Lan Wangji looked around. Based on the environment and wildlife there, it looked like they were somewhere near Yiling. Was that really where Baoshan Sanren's mountain was?

Then again, they had almost no information on the immortal; this mountain was just as likely as any other.

(Nevertheless, Wen Qing, who also recognized the foliage, stored that piece of information away in the back of her mind.)

From behind Jiang Cheng, Wei Wuxian began to laugh reassuringly and responded, "It's definitely where she lives. Why do you keep doubting me?"

'Because some of the things you said don't quite add up, Wei-xiong,' Nie Huaisang thought, smiling outwardly.

"Why would I lie to you? So that you can be happy for a few days only to crash into even bigger disappointment?"

However, Huaisang had no response to that. After all, Jiang Cheng had gotten his core back; there weren't any other possibilities.

"That's it," Wei Wuxian decided. "Come and let me cover your eyes."

'Cover his eyes?' Wen Ruohan wondered. 'Do you have something to hide?'

Or was that just part of the instructions his mother had left him with?

Jiang Cheng turned, allowing Wei Wuxian to wrap cloth around his head, blocking his sight. Then, Wei Wuxian handed him a walking stick.

"Walk slowly," he advised. "There are no beasts here. You'll be fine. Remember, you can't take the blindfold off even if you fall. Never…. It's forbidden. We can't upset the grandmaster or the other seniors. Whatever they tell you to do, you have to do."

The more he talked, the more awed Jin Guangshan felt. Wei Wuxian had ties to a whole culture full of independent governance and rules, which no one else could access. How on earth had he been satisfied being constantly demeaned as a "son of a servant" by Madam Yu?

(Unless he was lying.)

But how else could the Jiang heir have regained his core?

Clearing his throat, Wei Wuxian concluded, "And don't forget the most important part. If you're asked who you are, you have to say that you're the son of Cangse Sanren. You can't reveal your true identity."

"Okay!"

Madam Yu flinched slightly, momentarily furious at the fact that her son was going to claim that Cangse Sanren was his mother. However, a moment later, that anger vanished.

If Jiang Cheng claimed to be Wei Wuxian, then Wei Wuxian would never be able to ask Baoshan Sanren for something. She would think he was lying about his identity.

Wei Wuxian had given up his only chance at a miracle for her son.

"Stupid, stupid boy," she whispered, unable to keep the gratitude out of her voice.

Wei Wuxian reached forward, then hesitated, his hand hovering just above Jiang Cheng. After a moment's pause, he forced himself to move again, squeezing his brother's shoulder and giving him a little push up the trail.

"Go ahead. You'll need to finish the journey on your own. I'll wait for you at the foot of the mountain."

Jiang Cheng nodded once, then began walking up the path.

While most of the watchers paid attention to Jiang Cheng, Lan Wangji instead focused his eyes on Wei Wuxian's expression. As Jiang Cheng stepped higher and higher up the mountain, a million indistinguishable emotions flashed across Wei Wuxian's face.

Wangji moved closer, wishing there was something he could do to help.

Finally, Wei Wuxian turned and walked in the opposite direction.

"Thank you, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered.

"Seven days later!" Lan Jingyi enthusiastically declared.

Wei Wuxian waited anxiously at the bottom of a mountain, pushing dirt around with a stick. There were terribly dark circles under his eyes, and his hand seemed to tremble slightly.

Despite that, Jiang Cheng couldn't help feeling a little giddy. His core would be back now! Wei Wuxian was clearly tired after having waited for seven days, but soon it would all work out. The so-called "Massacre of Lotus Pier" was over. Now, with his and Wei Wuxian's power added into the mix, their victory was inevitable.

"...Say," Huaisang began, "I'd always figured Wei-xiong would start using his demonic cultivation during a high-stress situation. When the Massacre of Lotus Pier started, I figured that would be it, but, clearly, that was wrong."

"I guess?"

"Of course, of course. But then… what do you think will motivate him?"

"...Your theory had merit," Lan Qiren admitted. At the beginning, he had felt like after they got out they would need to spend every waking moment actively working to prevent Wei Wuxian from inventing demonic cultivation. Now, even Lan Qiren knew that wasn't the case.

When Wei Wuxian had promised to not use demonic cultivation after rescuing the bunnies, he had meant it.

However-

"Revenge is a powerful source of temptation," Lan Qiren added. "In addition, the Massacre took place over a single night. It's impossible to invent anything that quickly. This is more logical."

Nie Huaisang made a slight shrug of acceptance, acknowledging the man's point.

A satisfied grin crept onto Nie Mingjue's face at the reminder of the weapon Wei Wuxian was about to give them. It was unorthodox, certainly — and somewhat unethical, considering the usage of corpses — but, after Lotus Pier, no one could bring themselves to care.

An impatient grin spread out across Jiang Cheng's face.

As Wei Wuxian began to make another circle in the dirt, he heard a crack.

Something was there.

Lan Wangji stood up, subconsciously preparing himself to respond in case a threat attacked Wei Wuxian. He knew he couldn't interfere, but the adrenaline pumping through his veins remained.

"...Maybe I'm back?" Jiang Cheng hoped.

Wei Wuxian scanned around, but couldn't see anything unusual in the grotto.

"An animal?" Lan Xichen suggested, though even he knew that was optimistic.

The simulation hadn't shown them anything irrelevant so far, and that seemed likely to continue.

Soon, they could hear Wei Wuxian's breathing pick up in speed. Combined with the darkness under his eyes, Wei Wuxian's form began to resemble that of a cornered animal.

Something moved behind him.

A shadow struck his chest.

"What the-"

Wei Wuxian flew back, smashing into a tree. He collapsed in a heap, coughing out blood onto his dirt-stained robes.

His attacker, Wen Zhuliu, paused, eyes widening in surprise.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji whispered, running to his side.

Wei Wuxian hurried to his feet.

A sword pierced through from behind.

Jiang Yanli screamed.

He collapsed to the ground, Wen Chao's smirking face behind him.

"Wei Wuxian!" Jiang Cheng shouted.

The Jiang, Lan, and Nie leaders gaped in shock at the scene.

“A-Li!” Jin Zixuan shouted, watching his fiance collapse to her knees. He called out her name again, but she couldn’t hear him because Jiang Cheng might be okay now but her brother had just been impaled and now-

Wen Chao laughed, “What? Already down on your knees?”

‘Where he should be,’ Wen Chao thought gleefully, turning to his father for encouragement. However, neither Wen Ruohan nor Wen Qing were paying attention to him. Instead, they stared down at Wei Wuxian.

‘His core wasn’t broken.’

In the past, when Wen Zhuliu broke a core, they would be brought in to watch it shatter. Wei Wuxian was the focus of the simulation — it wouldn’t skip that. Now, it was entirely possible that Wen Zhuliu simply hadn’t used his core melting hand. To most of the watchers who barely knew him, that was the obvious conclusion.

However, to the two people present who knew Wen Zhuliu well enough to see the shock that had flashed across his face, that wasn’t a reasonable explanation.

Right as he tried to get up, Wei Wuxian coughed out an ocean of blood. He was kicked back to the ground. Weakened, Wei Wuxian trembled and gasped, unable to raise himself again.

“What’s wrong? Fight back! I thought you were supposed to be good.”

“You ambushed him!” Jiang Cheng screamed. “How dare you-”

“Someone like you isn’t worth the dirt he walks on!” Jin Zixuan hissed.

“Wei Wuxian will always be better than you,” Nie Mingjue growled.

Right as Wen Chao was about to respond, he felt his soul leave his incorperal body.

‘They can’t do anything to you,’ he reminded himself. ‘There’s no reason to be scared.’

And yet he couldn’t bring himself to move at all. Because, kneeling next to the illusion of Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji glared at him with an all-consuming hate.

A darkness seemed to surround the second jade, only broken by the piercing gleam of his golden eyes. All Wen Chao could do was tremble like a frightened animal under the gaze of the being before him.

Lan Wangji was seething in rage.

“You brat!” Wen Chao’s simulation self mocked. “Didn’t you jump around quite a bit back in the Xuanwu of Slaughter’s cave? You’re finished with just a strike? Go on! Keep on jumping! Show me how arrogant you are!”

Revulsion was painted across every face.

Then, the dark cloud around Lan Wangji turned into an all consuming abyss.

Xichen flinched, "Wangji-"

"W-what?" Wen Chao stuttered. "He's a fugitive. I'm not… I'm doing…. Don't look at me like that! When we get out, I'll tell my Wei Wuxian to-"

"*D*on' t spe a*k* h*i*s na*m*e."

Wen Chao's jaw snapped shut.

Silently, Jin Guangshan moved closer to loom over the collapsed and injured Wei Wuxian, enjoying his view of the trembling boy.

"Where's Jiang Cheng?" Wen Chao asked.

Other than the heavy breaths leaving his body, Wei Wuxian remained silent.

"What? Don't want to talk?" he laughed. "You can't save him even if you stay silent. Right now, Jiang Cheng is merely a waste of space, no better than livestock."

Madam Yu growled defensively.

"The Yunmeng Jiang Clan is finished."

Here, finally, Wei Wuxian glanced up, glaring at the gathered Wens.

Rolling her eyes, Wen Qing looked away from her ecstatic second young master. Even ignoring the lacking morality of his claims, they knew for a fact that what Wen Chao had said wasn't true.

The Yunmeng Jiang Clan still existed in the future; it was the Wen Clan that was gone.

"What's wrong?" Wen Chao asked. "Your old masters are gone. You should wag your tail and bow down before your new ones."

Enthusiastically, Wen Chao nodded to himself. This was what they were trying to do; this was what would happen once they got out of the simulation.

"Wen-gongzi~" Wang Lingjiao whined, "Quick! Chop off his hand. He still owes me one of those!"

"You-"

"Contemptful witch!"

"No, no, no, let's not hurry," Wen Chao decided.

A low growl began to escape Lan Wangji's throat.

Meanwhile, Wen Zhuliu stood on the side, staring down at his hand in confusion.

And only three people thought to look his way.

(Nie Huaisang, Wen Qing and Wen Ruohan stared at the Core Melting Hand, watching the unquestionable confusion on the man's face. He had tried to break Wei Wuxian's core.)

(And he had failed.)

(Why?)

Unaware of the thoughts running through his bodyguard, the simulated Wen Chao hummed for a bit and continued, "Yes, that's right. It took us so much time to find the brat, let's not rush this."

Jiang Cheng growled.

"Chopping off his hand causes too much bleeding. If he dies afterwards then it won't be fun anymore."

"What are you planning on doing?!" Lan Wangji shouted.

Not a single person was surprised by Lan Wangji's loss of composure.

(Wei Wuxian was heroic. And kind. And self-sacrificing. And beautiful. And clever. And smart. And brave. He was, in some ways, perfect.)

'What are you going to do to him?' was a question on everyone's mind.

"Alright! First melt his core," Wen Chao ordered, kneeling down to grab Wei Wuxian's hair and yank it back, forcing the boy to make eye contact with him. "I want to hear him scream like that bastard Jiang Cheng did!"

Madam Yu growled, then stood.

"With his core back, there'll be nothing you can do to him anymore," she hissed, glaring at the Wens.

Wang Lingjiao laughed, "Great idea, Young Master Wen! Melt his core first, then chop off his hand!"

Wen Qing, Jiang Yanli, Lan Xichen, and Nie Mingjue jumped forward to join Lan Wangji.

"Run!" Nie Huaisang begged.

Instead, Wei Wuxian spat blood onto Wen Chao's cheek.

Jin Guangshan's lips quirked up in amusement.

Wei Wuxian began to laugh.

“What are you doing?!” Jiang Cheng shouted.

“A-Xian, just run!” Jiang Yanli begged. “Try to escape.”

But he was now surrounded by Wens on all sides. Even without the Core Melting Hand being present, escape would be impossible.

“Sure!” Wei Wuxian laughed again. “Whatever torture techniques you’ve got. Bring them out!”

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli cried out, her voice some impossible mix between begging and angry and hopeless and terrified and horribly, horribly confused.

“What is he doing?” Lan Wangji hissed.

No one had an answer.

Wang Lingjiao grinned, “How long will you keep saying that?”

Wen Chao nodded, “You’re so close to death, and yet you’re still playing hero?”

“What is wrong with him?!” Jiang Cheng demanded, watching his brother all but beg for death.

Wen Qing growled, “Is he trying to provoke Wen Chao?”

She’d meant it to be a rhetorical question.

It wasn’t.

“It’s exactly because I’m close to death that I’m happy!” Wei Wuxian explained, grinning wildly. “Go on, torture me if you dare! The crueler the better!”

The madness in his eyes made them step back.

“After I die, I’ll return as a fierce ghost. I’ll haunt you until you’re forced to join me!”

Wen Chao flinched back.

Every mouth gaped open in silence.

“Ha! A fierce ghost?” Wen Chao took a deep breath and recovered his nerve, smacking Wei Wuxian’s head to the ground.

“A-Xian!”

“Young Masters of the great sects have received soul calming ceremonies since they were young,” Wen Chao laughed, unknowingly repeating what Wei Wuxian had told Jiang Cheng just a few days before.

But Wei Wuxian still laughed.

“Oh, young master, you couldn’t be more wrong,” he snickered, his tone turning patronizing. “I haven’t been raised in the Jiang Clan since birth. I’m the son of rogue cultivators. I haven’t gone through the ceremony.”

If that was the case….

“He could do it,” Nie Huaisang whispered. “He could return as a fierce ghost.”

If Wen Chao killed him, Wei Wuxian would hunt him down and repay the favor.

It still might not happen.

But it also might.

“If I die full of resentment, I’ll pay you back a hundredfold after my death!”

Wen Chao paled.

Somewhat relieved, Lan Wangji moved back to his chair, allowing the Jiangs to huddle around Wei Wuxian.

(He hadn’t even met Wei Wuxian yet; what right did he have to stand between him and his family?)

“Young Master Wen, don’t listen to this nonsense,” Wang Lingjiao suggested. “Not everyone becomes a ferocious ghost after they die — the time, place, and situation all need to be right. Besides, even if he did become one, the Qishan Wen Sect can handle a single ghost.”

And yet Wen Chao still hesitated.

Some hope began to reform in the watchers.

“Maybe he escapes now?” Nie Huaisang suggested.

“He has to,” Jiang Yanli agreed. “I mean, this — it’s not supposed to happen.”

Jiang Cheng was getting his core back. It was supposed to be easy from here on out. They were supposed to attack back. Wei Wuxian wasn’t supposed to die.

(Yet.)

Annoyed, Wang Lingjiao continued, “Don’t tell me that you’ll let him go just because he threatened you?”

“O-of course not!”

Madam Jin cursed, “I’ll skin her alive.”

Knowing that he’d definitely die, Wei Wuxian grew calm. The bone-deep hatred within him settled into iron-hard determination.

“A-Xian, don’t just accept it!” Jiang Yanli protested. Yes, it was true that none of them could see a way out of this, but Wei Wuxian could do anything. And yet, it seemed like he wasn’t planning on fighting back at all.

(Wen Ruohan’s gaze turned back to Wen Zhuliu, who was still staring down at his hand with a befuddled expression.)

Finally, Wen Chao couldn’t stand the indifference he saw in Wei Wuxian. There was annoyance that his threats weren’t working, but there was something else too.

Fear.

He kicked Wei Wuxian’s stomach, and the other Wen disciples quickly followed suit.

“You’re welcome to try,” Nie Mingjue threatened, seeing the gleeful look on Wen Chao’s face. “Just see what happens.”

Bruises formed on Wei Wuxian’s face, chest, and limbs, painting his body black and blue. A Wen landed a kick straight to his back, knocking the wind out of him.

Lan Wangji bit his tongue.

After what felt like an eternity, Wen Chao commanded, “Enough!”

Wei Wuxian spat out another mouthful of blood, then looked back, still calm.

‘Is it time to kill me?’ he wondered. ‘It won’t be all that different even if I die. Can’t be worse than living! And there’s a one in three chance I’ll become a fierce ghost and seek revenge.’

This thought filled him with an unparalleled thrill.

“Wait… what?”

“He’s just accepting it?”

“Not fighting back-”

“What is he doing?!”

As more outraged shouts passed through the watchers, Wen Ruohan glared down at the boy. Given what he knew of Wei Wuxian, this behavior was odd. The circumstances left him with limited options, but it was undeniable that the Wei Wuxian before him was trying to die.

Why?

"Can’t be worse than living,” he had said.

Why?

(To cover up the fact that he no longer has a golden core.)

That was impossible.

(But what other explanation was there?)

How could Wen Zhuliu not know? The Core Melting Hand was the only way a cultivator could lose their core.

'No,' both Wen Ruohan and Wen Qing realized simultaneously. 'There's one more possibility.'

"But that's impossible," Wen Qing whispered, too quietly for anyone but Wen Ruohan to hear.

As shamelessly as always, Wei Wuxian continued to cheekily stare up at Wen Chao. Faced with such an unusual prisoner, Wen Chao felt somewhat intimidated. All this time, he had been planning on bringing Wei Wuxian to his knees and making him beg for mercy.

The former had happened, but the latter was seeming more unlikely by the second.

Then, his mouth turned into a smirk, and he came to a decision.

"Wei Ying, you think you're fearless, don't you? That you're brave and mighty, huh?"

Lan Wangji's teeth grit together.

"Oh, look at that. A Wen-dog who can speak like a human."

Wen Chao slammed his fist down.

"Laughing even in the face of danger," Jin Guangshan muttered. Glancing up momentarily, Wen Ruohan nodded in agreement, then looked back down.

(Maybe, if he thought back hard enough, he'd be able to come up with another explanation for why Wei Wuxian didn't have his core.)

Then Wen Chao smirked, his smile hideous, "Fine, keep showing off how clever your tongue is! Let's see how long you can keep up this heroic act for!"

Wen Chao motioned to Wei Wuxian, and Wen Zhuliu picked him up.

"No," Lan Qiren whispered, a crushing fear flooding into him until 'Wei Wuxian must leave' overpowered all else. For that moment, even demonic cultivation seemed like a reasonable tactic.

He shook himself out of that thought a moment later, but the fact that it had appeared at all shook him.

'Nothing is worth it,' he reminded himself. 'I can see why Wei Wuxian wanted to do that, but no situation could possibly be bad enough to make demonic cultivation worth it.'

No matter how many times he told himself that, it didn't change the fact that both his nephews looked faint with worry.

As he hung in Wen Zhuliu's arms, Wei Wuxian's body remained slack. After all the injuries he had sustained, he was too weak to run. He had no choice but to lay limp as the Wens mounted their swords and flew to the skies.

His clarity bell broke off and fell to the ground.

Flinching back as if hit, Jiang Fengmian was forced to look away.

(Yes, Jiang Cheng was fine, but what about Wei Wuxian?)

He would also be fine. He was going to invent demonic cultivation and become a terrifying force against the Wens.

(But why did he invent demonic cultivation?)

Mere curiosity. They figured that out in the third segment, when Wei Wuxian first proposed the idea to Lan Qiren.

(He couldn't say that now.)

Then it was desperation. After the Jiang Clan's destruction, why wouldn't he invent it?

(But what's happening next?)

No one had an answer to that.

The watchers were pulled along as the Wens sped off, traveling through the sky with them. Over time, the mountains became farther and farther away, leaving behind the recovering Jiang Cheng.

'Why are they taking me so high into the air?' Wei Wuxian wondered, barely conscious through the pain. 'Are they going to drop me from somewhere and let me fall to my death?'

The trace of hope in his tone slit Jiang Yanli's nerves in two.

"What… what are you doing to him?" she asked Wen Chao. The Wen heir had no answer.

"I… I'm sure it won't be too bad," Jin Zixuan comforted.

"Well, we know he survives," Nie Huaisang pointed out, trying to keep the terror out of his voice. "I'm.. I'm sure he'll be fine. He scared Wen Chao into leaving him alive, so he's probably about to escape."

"Right," Lan Xichen smiled grimly. "We know he survives with all his limbs intact. He's already so injured — how much worse could it get?"

The watchers were flashed forward in time.

Now, they stood on a cliff.

All around them, jagged mountains jabbed into the sky, their dark forms melting into the blackness of the clouds overhead. Not a trace of light escaped the pitch black valley at the bottom of the cliff, looking to be an endless abyss. A faint, red glow shown through in the ravenous darkness.

But the watchers didn't notice any of that.

Wen Ruohan gasped, swaying on his feet. All around him, the air turned to lava. It was as thick as molasse and as hot as the sun. In the simulation, the only thing the watchers could feel was resentful energy.

And nowhere had more of that than here.

Collapsing onto their knees — an ocean of pressure weighing them down — the other watchers struggled to speak.

"Is… is this…."

"It can't be-"

"The Burial Mounds," Wen Ruohan finished. Everyone else gasped out, then found they couldn't breathe in again.

The energy was trying to suffocate them.

Squawking crows circled overhead, ignoring the simulated cultivators below. They didn't care about Wen Chao, overlooking the valley maliciously. They didn't care about Wen Zhuliu, who remained as complacent as always. They didn't even care about Wei Wuxian, thrown to the ground so he laid at Wen Chao's feet. They didn't find the mere concept inexcusable.

The watchers weren't so indifferent.

"Wei Ying," Wen Chao called out. "Do you have any idea where we are?"

Wei Wuxian forced himself to look up, then flinched.

"That's right," Wen Chao grinned. "The Burial Mounds."

An enormous crack resounded throughout the room. Everyone looked over, startled by the unexpected noise. If they couldn't touch anything, how would that sound get made?

They had forgotten that the one thing they could touch was their chairs.

And Lan Wangji's grip had snapped part of his off.

Even crushed by resentful energy, his fury was strong enough to snap stone in two.

And yet there was nothing he could do.

Completely unhindered, the simulated Wen Chao continued, "It's right in Yiling. I'm sure even you Yunmeng people have heard about it. It's a mountain of corpses — an ancient battleground. You'll be able to dig up a corpse anywhere on this mountain."

In addition to being the sight of a battle, it was also a place for dumping unwanted corpses.

The resentful energy here was higher than anywhere else in the world.

"Look at the darkness in the air. Tsk, tsk, tsk, the hostile energy is strong, isn't it? And the resentful energy is thick, isn't it? Even the Wen Sect couldn't do anything about it. We could only block it off."

With a smirk, his foot slammed Wei Wuxian against the ground.

"How dare you?!" Nie Mingjue shouted, reaching out to grab Wen Chao. But it was pointless. Not only did his hand phase through, but the pressure weighing him down rendered him barely mobile to begin with.

Even though he was collapsed against the ground, Wen Chao's smile only grew at Nie Mingjue's attempt. Not even Lan Wangji's strongest glare could dampen Wen Chao's exhilaration.

'Look,' his eyes seemed to say, glowing in perverse delight. 'Look at the power I have over The Yiling Patriarch. His life is mine to command, as it should be.'

"Wei Ying, can you smell the resentment here?"

His foot grinded Wei Wuxian's head into the ground.

"You-"

"What? This is too much?" Wen Ruohan smirked. "You were perfectly fine with everything Wei Wuxian sacrificed for your son. His back, his chance to escape, his miracle from Baoshan Sanren, his-"

"Enough," Jiang Fengmian commanded, watching his wife's anger build.

Then, the simulated Wen Chao began to laugh, "Don't forget, anyone who ventures inside remains trapped for all eternity."

"He'll get out," Jiang Cheng told himself. "He has to."

"Of course," Lan Xichen agreed. Throwing someone into the Burial Mounds surpassed even the worst torture imaginable.

No one could survive that.

And Wei Wuxian would live past this, so-

Wen Chao grabbed Wei Wuxian's hair to pull him up, a grotesque grin on his face.

He would live, so this couldn't be happening.

Without wasting another second, Wen Chao took off into the air again, hovering high enough off the ground to not be pulled in by the pit of death around him.

Because no one could escape it.

So Wei Wuxian couldn't be thrown in.

The simulation lifted the watchers into the sky as the Wens brought Wei Wuxian high above the valley of darkness. Still paralized from his injuries, Wei Wuxian couldn't fight back.

It didn't make sense for Wei Wuxian to be thrown into the Burial Mounds.

And yet-

"No," Lan Wangji whispered, forcing himself up on trembling arms. "Stop! This-"

"This isn't right!" the crushed Nie Huaisang gasped out, barely conscious under the pressure. "This isn't-he survives. He lives past this, how-"

"Wei Wuxian, what are you doing? Move!" Jiang Cheng shouted.

And yet Wei Wuxian could do nothing as Wen Chao finally located the part of the mounds with the densest resentful energy.

"Stop!"

"This isn't-"

"It's not supposed to be this way! He's supposed to be fine!"

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted, his Lan strength finally giving him the power to shakily stand and stumble towards Wen Chao. Soon, he had forced his body to get within a meter of distance from him.

He reached out to the simulated body of Wei Wuxian.

And phased right through.

Wen Chao smirked.

"So you-"

"No-".

“Will never-”

“Stop!”

“Escape!”

Wei Wuxian fell.

“Wei Ying!” Lan Wangji shouted, instantly sinking to his knees to catch Wei Wuxian, but slamming against the floor instead. He punched the invisible barrier beneath him, but could only watch.

Wei Wuxian fell down….

Down….

Down….

Down.

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji whispered brokenly, slamming his fists helplessly against the floor. “Wei Ying!”

No response.

‘No,’ he thought, barely registering the resentful energy anymore. ‘No, this can’t be happening. Not to him — not to Wei Ying. No, no, no-’

Crows swarmed overhead and Wen Chao smirked, watching the figure of Wei Wuxian shrink as he fell into an abyss from which none had ever escaped.

Every watcher had become as pale as ivory.

And as silent as a corpse.

Wei Wuxian had vanished into the darkness below.

“What?” Jiang Yanli whispered, vulnerably.

“He didn’t…” Jin Zixuan struggled to speak the words. “He didn’t escape.”

“What?” Jiang Yanli repeated.

No one had an answer.

This wasn’t supposed to happen. Wei Wuxian had found a way to fix Jiang Cheng’s core — that was the end of their struggle. They were supposed to group up with the Lans. They were supposed to start the Sunshot Campaign. They were supposed to be victorious in battle after battle against the Wens.

(Wei Wuxian was supposed to invent demonic cultivation out of a desire for revenge.)

"...What?"

The pressure weighing them down abruptly vanished as the watchers were brought back to the grassy grotto Wei Wuxian was abducted from.

In the center of the field, Wei Wuxian's clarity bell laid next to a puddle of his own blood.

At the sight of that, the shock which had frozen Jiang Yanli in place turned into terror. Her breathing picking up to a jackrabbit's pace, and light-headedness overcame her.

Ignoring the way Jin Zixuan tried to offer his sister assistance, Jiang Cheng nearly tilted over, equally dizzy.

Wei Wuxian was in the Burial Mounds.

Wei Wuxian had been captured and thrown into the Burial Mounds.

Wei Wuxian had been whipped, choked, chased, stabbed, beaten up, and then was tossed into the Burial Mounds. He hadn't escaped Wen Chao.

But that didn't make sense.

Wei Wuxian was the strong one. He was always able to bounce back up no matter what Yu Ziyuan did to him, and he could spend as much time goofing off as he wanted while still being the head disciple. He wasn't supposed to be in danger — that just wasn't who Wei Wuxian was.

(He got trapped in a cave with a murderous Xuanwu.)

(But he killed it. It wasn't that big of a deal.)

"M-maybe he escapes?" Jiang Cheng suggested. "Maybe… the Burial Mounds aren't that big of a deal after all. If that idiot got away just fine, then I'm sure everything'll be… fine."

"You think its reputation is exaggerated?"

"Probably," Jiang Cheng shrugged in a false show of bravado.

Breathing gradually returning to normal thanks to Jin Zixuan, Jiang Yanli added, "That makes sense. I'm sure the fall will hurt him, but… maybe he'll figure out demonic cultivation relatively fast? Es-especially if the rumors about the Burial Mounds are actually exaggerated."

Her parents nodded in agreement.

(Wen Ruohan wondered whether he should remind them that the pressure of the Burial Mounds had brought nearly all of them to their knees. Even if the feeling was amplified according to the weakness of whoever's memories were used to make it, something like that couldn't be just written off.)

(Then, he remembered Wen Zhuliu's expression, and decided he had more important things to worry about.)

Slowly, the watchers began to hear a shuffling sound as someone walked through the forest.

Jiang Cheng straightened up, hoping it would be him. Maybe he would rescue Wei Wuxian before the day was up.

Instead, pure white robes swept into the clearing, and Lan Wangji approached the fallen bell. As soon as he laid eyes on it, his expression crumbled into despair.

He knew Wei Wuxian was most likely dead.

Despite knowing that wasn't true, Wen Qing thought Lan Wangji's reaction was accurate. She had seen Wen Zhuliu's reaction. She didn't see how it could be possible — couldn't see how anyone would make that choice — but, with the way Wei Wuxian hadn't been able to fight back, it was seeming more and more likely by the second.

How would you know someone was dead? You might be able to see their ghost, but other than that certain injuries would count. He was decapitated, of course he's dead. He was hung, of course he's dead.

He gave away his core and was thrown into the Burial Mounds, of course he's dead.

And yet, Wei Wuxian had somehow survived.

(Were the Burial Mounds really not as bad as they seemed?)

Slowly, Lan Wangji reached forward and picked up the bell, then held it close to his chest.

"Lan-er-gongzi," someone behind him greeted. "According to the villagers, Wei-gongzi and Jiang-gongzi may have come through here a few days ago. Our people have searched everywhere, but have failed to find them."

Lan Wangji's hand gripped the bell tighter, then slowly stored it inside his robe.

His brother's trembling hands made Lan Xichen's heart break a little. Lan Wangji was seventeen. He shouldn't need to be strong and lead a resistance while his friend might be dead.

(Wei Wuxian was just seventeen too, wasn't he?)

Lan Xichen sat down, forcing himself to take deep breaths.

The Lan disciple frowned at the silence, "Are they…."

He didn't finish, and Lan Wangji ignored him to look up at the sky.

“Wei Ying,” he whispered, praying desperately with just a name.

Realizing the implications, Jiang Fengmian nodded once at Lan Wangji and said, “Thank you for looking for them. Your assistance is greatly appreciated.”

All three Lans nodded in return.

Behind them, Madam Yu was forced to look away. By now, the simulation had made it unquestionably obvious that the Wens would have attacked Lotus Pier regardless of Wei Wuxian’s actions in the cave. But, if he hadn’t interfered and had allowed Lan Wangji to die, then the Jiang Clan would have received no help after the massacre.

She scoffed.

With an internal roll of her eyes, Madam Yu bitterly thought, ‘Of course the wonder-child was right. He’s just incapable of doing anything wrong, isn’t he?’

~~But now he’s stuck in the Burial Mounds. Isn’t he.~~

(Then again, knowing that boy, he’d probably have the whole place conquered and loyal to him within the hour. Madam Yu didn’t know why she was so worried; they already knew he would survive.)

As the grassy clearing faded away, Sizhui’s voice returned.

“In the twentieth year of the reign of Xuanzheng, the Jiang Clan of Yunmeng was destroyed.”

At least half the people present flinched at the reminder.

(But the head disciple would be fine. They knew he would survive. It was fine.)

“The Qishan Wen clan became more and more aggressive as time went on, trying to set up a supervisory office in every major city.”

Nie Mingjue growled and directed a fierce glare at the Wens, but had nothing to add that hadn’t already been said.

(Nie Huaisang found Lan Sizhui’s tone when discussing the Wens to be a bit odd. Almost… personally regretful.)

And continuing in that strangely guilty tone, Lan Sizhui forced himself to conclude, “Any disobedience was met with great misfortune. People shed blood like water.”

‘Including Wei Wuxian,’ Wen Qing thought.

Wen Chao had injured him severely before throwing him into the Burial Mounds. So badly, in fact, that Wei Wuxian couldn’t fight back afterwards.

But even that didn’t explain Wen Zhuliu.

(Had Wen Zhuliu found him earlier — no, he'd been surprised. Had some sort of beast gotten him? No, he had clearly used his core while escaping Lotus Pier the second time, and Wei Wuxian had stayed close to the unconscious Jiang Cheng since then. Could he still have his core, and just be too tired to use it? Maybe Wen Zhuliu just made a mistake. Maybe Baoshan Sanren had truly recovered Jiang Cheng's core.)

(Or maybe Wen Qing already knew what had happened, and simply couldn't accept that a coreless teenager had just been thrown into the Burial Mounds.)

No, she was being ridiculous. Due to an inability to actually test the budding theory, Wen Qing's recent paper on core transfers was not widely known. However, even with just the beginnings of the theory down, she and Wen Ruohan knew no one would ever volunteer to test it.

Wen Qing scanned the room, and saw that, despite his uncanny ability to make accurate predictions, Nie Huaisang didn't seem at all concerned by the possibility. That was no surprise; Nie Huaisang had never been interested in cultivation, so he would have no reason to know about an obscure, untestable cultivation theory. But Wen Qing knew.

And Wen Ruohan knew.

Suddenly, she made eye contact with him.

After Wen Ruohan had blackmailed her into keeping her silence on certain topics, she had done everything in her power to avoid his attention. However, now she felt like she had no choice.

After all, it couldn't be possible. No one was willing to test that. No one would agree to it. Wei Wuxian was one of the strongest in their generation; he had spent almost every day of every week of the last eight years practicing and refining and working on his core. It was his life. And besides, the Jiangs had whipped him and disrespected him and blamed him and then choked him. He couldn't have that much loyalty for them.

Not even Wen Zhuliu would give Wen Ruohan his core.

And yet, Wen Qing and Wen Ruohan had both looked towards each other, the same thought running through their heads: they didn't have another explanation.

But it couldn't be true.

(But, if it was, no reward Wen Ruohan could possibly offer Wei Wuxian would dent his loyalty to the Jiangs.)

Nie Huaisang watched the two of them, lacking the cultivation background to know of the operation, but recognizing the confusion in their faces all the same.

As the pair thought through that, the simulation continued.

"Jinlintai, Lanling City."

Jin Zixuan perked up slightly in hope.

That hope instantly disappeared when the laughter of many women began to ring out.

A slight growl escaped Madam Jin's throat.

Jin Guangshan sat in a pavilion, surrounded on all sides by girls with the Jin's peonies tucked into their hair.

Both Madam Yu and Madam Jin gave simultaneous scoffs at the scene, but neither was surprised.

"Clan Leader," one giggled, sitting on his lap and feeding him a cherry.

"Clan Leader! Clan Leader!" a far more frantic voice called out.

Jin Zixuan followed the sound of the voice, and saw the terrified face of an older disciple.

"What is it?" Jin Guangshan inquired, glaring at the interruption. "Did Lan Qiren come to persuade me to cooperate again? Tell him I'm out."

"We're not helping?!" Madam Jin demanded, and the Lans, Nies, and Jiangs turned deep glares on the Jins.

(Jin Zixuan sank down into his seat.)

"I see," was all Wen Ruohan said, eyes alight with amusement. Although they surely helped out towards the end, Jin Guangshan's hesitance proved the Jins were not on the Sunshot Campaigns side. Jin Guangshan nodded rapidly, relieved that Wen Ruohan had seen this.

"N-no, Clan Leader," the disciple reported. "It's about Qishan. The Qishan Wen Clan has sent a message."

"Ah? What is it?"

Nie Mingjue stood, "So you'll listen to them, but not-"

"They… want to establish a supervisory office here."

Everyone froze in their arguments and focused on the simulation.

"You'll have to submit all our great weapons within five days. Or… or…."

"Or what?"

"Or we will face the same fate… as the Jiang Clan of Yunmeng."

Jiang Cheng and Jin Ziuan both stood up, glaring as Wen Chao began to laugh.

But Jin Guangshan merely sighed, "No need for that…. Send word to His Excellency. I would like to meet with him."

Appeasing Qishan with funds and ignoring the other clans, it seemed.

Face flushing, Jin Zixuan quickly sat down, unwilling to make eye contact with anyone else.

"Gusu," Sizhui explained, allowing the world around them to fade into the black of night. The only sound in the tranquil landscape was the rushing of one of the Cloud Recesses' waterfalls.

For a moment, the sight filled Lan Xichen with an intense homesickness. Although they had been inside the simulation for less than a week, it truly felt like years had passed.

In the half-second before Lan Xichen managed to regain his usual calm smile, Jiang Yanli saw his distress and sent him a blinding smile of reassurance.

Guqin music rang through the air as Lan Wangji's experienced hands began to strum. The player's talent was undeniable.

"Ah, Lan-xiong, it sounds so nice~" Nie Huaisang commented, an appreciator of the arts as always.

"Not for entertainment," Lan Wangji responded.

A moment later, the meaning behind those words became clear. Lan Wangji was playing inquiry, pulling in spirits from all around to answer his call. Glowing balls of condensed spiritual energy began gathering around him, attracted to the sound like crows to jewels.

At the end of a riverbank just outside the Cloud Recesses, Lan Wangji sat and played, joined only by a single Lan elder. Once the spirits came into range, they began floating idly around him, observing the area.

One of the first things they noticed was the clarity bell presented to them on a nearby rock.

At the reminder of what had happened to Wei Wuxian, the watchers' good mood faltered.

After all, no one could survive the Burial Mounds. It didn't matter what those civilians in the first segment said; it was suicide to go there. Then again, that was almost a reassurance; even if time was passing without Wei Wuxian's return, they were sure he had gotten out within the first few hours. Perhaps he was simply recovering before he returned. Or maybe he had lost his memory after the fall, and didn't know there was a place he needed to return to.

(The Jiangs never thought there would come a time in which they would hope Wei Wuxian had gotten a concussion.)

Having given the spirits ample time to observe the bell, Lan Wangji finally asked his question.

He waited, and one of the spirits ventured forward to answer.

It bounced lightly on a guqin string, then backed off.

Lan Wangji's face fell.

Footsteps began to approach, and he instantly turned towards them.

Lan Qiren tensed, praying that his nephew wouldn't be put in danger.

Silently, Lan Wangji stood up, preparing for a possible confrontation with the intruder. A moment later, a man stepping into the clearing, and Lan Wangji's tension instantly switched to shock.

"Xiongzhang," Lan Wangji breathed out, relief rushing into him at once.

"Da-gongzi!" the Lan disciple beside Lan Wangji proclaimed, his entire demeanor lighting up. And indeed, Lan Xichen stood before them, looking completely unharmed.

Lan Qiren collapsed into his seat, showing none of the order and discipline he was so known for. Lan Xichen had returned; his nephew had survived.

The gratitude he felt was so potent it overcame all other emotions he could have felt.

His nephew was alive.

(He had been sure that was the case based off the future, but the future hadn't stopped Wei Wuxian from being thrown into the Burial Mounds. His hopes had been tentative at best.)

(But now Xichen was here. Safe. Alive.)

The storm raging in Lan Qiren's heart finally began to disperse.

"Wangji," Lan Xichen greeted. "I trust you've been well."

A moment later, Lan Wangji managed to ease the shock on his face and return to his usual blank expression. He bowed lowly, saluting his brother.

"Xiongzhang," he whispered.

No one else could see it, but the blatant relief that remained on his brother's expression sent a wave of warmth through Lan Xichen.

Now, if only they knew what was happening to Wei Wuxian.

"I heard someone playing inquiry and knew it was you," Lan Xichen commented, then hesitated. "It seems Wei-gongzi is still missing."

Lan Wangji clenched his fists, turning another vicious glare towards the smirking Wen Chao.

“But it’s so strange,” the unknown Lan disciple muttered. “It’s been several days, and we’ve found plenty of information regarding Jiang-gongzi, but nothing about Wei-gongzi. Has he been caught by the Wen Clan or not?”

“Nothing?” Jiang Yanli repeated.

“Well, if there’s anywhere that no spirit would be able to find out about….”

Nie Mingjue didn’t finish his sentence, but he didn’t have to. If there was anywhere no spirit would be able to get out of, it would be the Burial Mounds.

(But surely Wei Wuxian couldn’t still be there. It was impossible to survive.)

~~But where else would it be impossible to find him?~~

“Lan-er-gongzi has been asking everyone we see, including the deceased, but there hasn’t been a single clue about Wei-gongzi. It’s like he just disappeared.”

Graceful as ever, Lan Wangji merely reached forward to pick up Wei Wuxian’s clarity bell, not acknowledging the hopelessness of the situation.

“Thank you,” Jiang Yanli whispered, bowing slightly to Lan Wangji. Unconsciously, Jin Zixuan did the same, then flinched back in surprise.

Technically, Wei Wuxian didn’t know him. Technically, they weren’t even friends. Technically, he had no right to thank Lan Wangji for a kindness done to someone unrelated to him. Technically, Wei Wuxian wasn’t legally a member of the Jiang family. Technically — and even though they had seen their son — he and Jiang Yanli weren’t married yet.

And yet, every time he saw Wei Wuxian triumph over impossible odds or struggle through unimaginable circumstances, all he could think was “that’s my brother in law.”

Realizing what he had done, Jiang Yanli wiped away the tears that had begun forming in her eyes again and smiled at him in gratitude.

Keeping his expression blank, Lan Wangji stared down at the clarity bell.

Finally, he spoke:

“...Whether he’s dead or alive, there will be clues somewhere. We will find an answer.”

Watching what was turning out to be the greatest love story of all time unfold before his eyes, Nie Huaisangs overjoyed tears begin to form.

(If his worry for Wei Wuxian was also contributing to the water in his eyes, no one had to know but himself.)

(Wei Wuxian escaped the Burial Mounds. The only question was how long he stayed inside.)

After a pause, Lan Wangji turned. With a dramatic sweep of his sleeve, he dissipated the gathered spirits, then bowed to them in thanks for their help.

"Wei-gongzi is strong and clever," Lan Xichen commented. "He'll be fine."

Jiang Cheng nodded furiously in agreement. After all, they knew Wei Wuxian would survive this. No one knew what actually happened in the Burial Mounds, but it couldn't be too bad. Besides, how long could he have stayed there?

(Hours? Days? Weeks? Surely not.)

(Given that it was Wei Wuxian, he had probably already escaped. Attempting the impossible as always.)

Lan Xichen stepped closer to his brother, advising, "Wangji, don't worry too much."

Lan Wangji's gaze fell to the ground, unresponsive.

Seeing that his reassurance had proved unsuccessful, Lan Xichen continued, "A few months ago, I heard that you and Uncle had begun working on uniting the clans. How much progress have you made?"

Wen Ruohan listened with interest.

(What else was he supposed to do? For a second, he had been foolish enough to think that Wei Wuxian would give up his core for the person who had just choked him half to death. Clearly, the simulation had warped his perception of normalcy. He would need to remain vigilant.)

"Most clans are hesitant and haven't made a final decision," Lan Wangji responded calmly.

"Your brother's pretty amazing," Nie Mingjue muttered, causing Lan Xichen to smile warmly. Given who they were up against, Nie Mingjue was sure he was involved too. That didn't make Lan Wangji stepping forward and possibly making himself a target any less impressive.

Seeing the proud expressions on the two older brothers, Lan Wangji felt his ears warm to a dusty pink.

On the other hand, unaware that the Sunshot Campaign would be successful, Lan Xichen seemed to deflate at the clans' hesitance.

"That isn't a surprise," he admitted. "The Qishan Wen clan is powerful. They destroyed the Yunmeng Jiang Clan in a single night. Not every clan will have the courage to face them."

With every word, Wen Chao seemed to glow in happiness. Soon, Lan Qiren, Nie Mingjue, Jiang Cheng, and Yu Ziyuan were glaring at him in disgust.

The dark clouds which had covered the moon were swept away. Moonlight entered the grotto in which the Lans stood, allowing their white robes to shine in the night.

Seeing the sweet glow, Lan Wangji couldn't help but be reminded of the playful gleam in Wei Wuxian's silver eyes.

The simulated Lan Wangji looked up, "The Wen Clan's power won't last forever."

Hearing that, Lan Xichen began to smile.

Lan Qiren nodded once, giving Lan Wangji an approving gaze.

(Wei Wuxian would surely escape the Burial Mounds soon. Perhaps, once he got out, he and Wangji would get a chance to talk things through. Lan Qiren still didn't approve of Wei Wuxian, but he could at least acknowledge that there were many, many worse options.)

"Cloud Recesses, Gusu," Sizhui explained.

The watchers were moved within the Cloud Recesses, and the sky brightened under the sun.

It was the next day.

Or the day after.

Or the day after that.

But it had to be the next day, because Wei Wuxian still hadn't been found.

"He's probably escaped already," Madam Yu muttered to herself. "It would be just like him to hold off on showing up so that he could make it more dramatic."

Everyone wanted nothing more than for her to be right.

As the watchers mentally prayed, the Lan conference hall formed around them. Dozens of Sect Leaders from minor and major sects were seated around, and Lan Qiren stood in the center.

"Everyone," he greeted sternly. "The Qishan Wen Clan has pushed us too far. If you continue to stand back, you'll soon find yourselves in the line of fire."

Silently, Lan Qiren and Jiang Fengmian began wondering whether they would be holding a similar meeting once they left the simulation.

Their agreement not to punish for things that 'hadn't occurred yet' was seeming more and more tenuous by the hour.

As they listened, the other sect leaders made eye contact with each other.

Then, a laugh.

“Lan-xiansheng, our presence here proves we want to discuss it. It’s just….”

“Sect Leader Jin, what are you trying to say?”

Sneaking closer to Jiang Yanli for reassurance, Jin Zixuan hoped his father’s next words would be acceptable. As a filial son, Jin Zixuan knew better than to speak openly against his father, but — no matter how flowery Jin Guangshan managed to word it — an alliance with the Wen Sect now was inexcusable.

‘They killed A-Li’s parents!’ he metally shouted at his simulated father. ‘They threw Wei Wuxian into the Burial Mounds! Even if you don’t care about that, at least care that they tried to kill me!’

But Jin Guangshan merely fluttered his fan delicately, explaining, “In my humble opinion, we shouldn’t rush towards fighting against the Wen Clan. Right now may be too hasty.”

Nie Mingjue didn’t even try to hide his scoff.

“I agree,” another Sect Leader said. “We still have time to think it through.”

As he spoke the watchers’ view was switched to the path leading to the conference hall, where a hooded figure walked with Lan Xichen. The figure’s face was shrouded in shadow, but their stride was confident and sure.

The sect leader continued, “If we really provoke Wen Ruohan, then there’s no way out.”

Practically oozing arrogance, Wen Chao lifted his head high and smirked at the sect leader who had just spoken. Nie Huaisang couldn’t help thinking that the gathered sect leaders would be far more willing to fight the Wen if they could see Wen Chao’s expression.

On the other hand, Wen Ruohan seemed to be barely listening to the discussion. He would occasionally glance up and take note of who had spoken, but it was clear that his mind was elsewhere. By the third time that happened, Nie Huaisang’s confusion had reached its peak; wasn’t the Sunshot Campaign the part Wen Ruohan cared about the most? Why wasn’t he paying attention to such a pivotal moment?

Unbeknownst to everyone except Wen Qing, Wen Ruohan was frantically racking his brain for an explanation — a sign — a bit of doubt — anything that would indicate his theory wasn’t true. A core transfer was so impossible that he almost didn’t want to bother.

And yet, the longer he spent trying to come up with proof against it, the more probable it seemed.

(After all, Wen Qing had already proven whose side she was on.)

“Timing?” Lan Qiren repeated. “Way out? You’re saying you’d rather give up your treasures and live under their supervision?!”

A deep laughter answered him.

“Forgive me for being blunt,” Nie Mingjue began. “But if we give up our weapons and techniques to Wen Ruohan, we’ll just be lambs waiting for the slaughter!”

Jiang Yanli flinched at the description, remembering the piles and piles of Jiang disciple bodies she had been forced to watch. Seeing that, Jiang Fengmian silently moved to kneel beside his daughter.

“I…” he cut off, unsure of where to go from there. He had plenty of experience guiding and instructing, but comforting was unfortunately outside of his skill set. The inexperience he had made him hesitate.

But it was because of that hesitance that Jiang Cheng had apparently spent years thinking he didn’t love him.

“A-Die?” she asked.

“...It won’t happen with us,” he whispered, smiling warmly. “I promise.”

Although it wasn’t quite as reassuring as he had hoped it would be, it nonetheless caused his daughter to give a small laugh, then nod once at him.

“I know.”

As they spoke to each other, the sect leader who had commented huffed in indignation at Nie Mingjue.

“How dare-”

“Now, now,” Jin Guangshan placated. “Everyone calm down. I just mean we should avoid direct confrontation. Qingheng-jun was also powerful, and the Gusu Lan clan is one of the strongest, but the end result of the Wens' attack remained as expected.”

The door swung open.

“Thank you for your generous praise,” Lan Xichen said, voice alight with easy humor. “In my opinion, a lack of capabilities isn’t an excuse to avoid one’s enemies.”

Lan Qiren’s face lit up into a genuine smile when he saw who had arrived.

“From what you just said,” Lan Xichen continued, “does the Lanling Jin clan plan to surrender and serve the Wen clan?”

‘It’s about time someone said that to him,’ Nie Mingjue thought, making eye contact with Lan Xichen and smirking gleefully.

Despite rolling his eyes, Lan Xichen couldn’t keep an amused smile off his face.

“What?” Jin Guangshan instantly backed up, clearing his throat and looking away.

Jin Zixuan was a filial son. He really shouldn’t be feeling as pleased by this as he was.

“Greetings Uncle, clan leaders,” Lan Xichen bowed.

“Xichen. I heard that you were coming back. Why are you so late?”

“Ah, I had to deal with something on my way back. I’m sorry I caused you to worry.”

Lan Qiren reached a hand forward and rested it on Lan Xichen’s shoulder, “it’s alright. I’m glad you’re back. It’s been… months. I’m sure it hasn’t been easy.”

“You’re the one who’s had to work hard,” Xichen replied, smiling warmly.

‘Months,’ the real Lan Qiren mentally echoed. ‘He was gone for months.’

His gaze landed on Wen Ruohan, and Wei Wuxian’s numerous warnings rang in his head. Refusing to oppose the Wens while they attacked smaller clans had led to his nephew being on the run for months.

‘It will not happen with us,’ he promised himself.

“Lan-gongzi!” someone interrupted snidely. “That’s easy for you to say, but the Yunmeng Jiang Clan put up a fight recklessly and ended up being destroyed!”

Madam Yu and Jiang Fengmian had too much training to flinch in a political situation like this — virtual or not.

That didn’t stop the words from ringing in their heads.

(Should have prepared better. Should have fought back sooner. Should have acted before letting them nearly immobilize Wei Wuxian. Should’ve, should’ve, should’ve.)

Then, the hooded figure scoffed.

“So you’re saying that if there’s no chance of victory you’re willing to submit to the Qishan Wen Clan?”

“Wait-”

“That voice!” Jiang Yanli stood.

“Who are you?!” a sect leader demanded.

The cloak fell back, and Jiang Cheng stood tall and proud.

“A-Cheng!” Jiang Yanli declared with a cheer.

“Jiang-xiong!”

“Jiang Wangyin,” Lan Xichen’s eyes widened in surprise. Jiang Cheng’s family huddled around him, whispering ecstatically, and infectious smiles spread across all the viewers.

Except for Wen Ruohan.

‘No longer suicidal,’ he observed. ‘Standing proud. No longer thin.’

All evidence seemed to indicate that Jiang Cheng had his core again.

Everyone else would view this as a miracle only an immortal could achieve. They would think there was no other option. But Wen Qing knew. And Wen Ruohan knew.

But that couldn’t be true.

(But. Wen Qing had already joined his side.)

Of course not; she had no reason to help Jiang Cheng.

(But if Wei Wuxian begged her to-)

She knew better than that.

(It was the Wens who had destroyed Jiang Cheng’s core. She might claim to be uninvolved, but did she truly feel that way?)

Guilt wouldn’t control her.

(But she could understand loving your brother.)

But no one would offer their own core. The mere suggestion was ludicrous.

(But. Jiang Cheng’s core had reappeared.)

(But. Wen Zhuliu couldn’t destroy Wei Ying’s core.)

(But. Wei Wuxian hadn’t even tried to fight back.)

There must be some other explanation-

But.

Unaware of what Jiang Cheng’s presence might mean, the simulated sect leaders reacted in shock.

“Sect Leader Jiang!”

Jiang Cheng flinched.

“Of course you can say such things! The Yunmeng Jiang Clan has already been destroyed!” Sect Leader Yao yelled, causing JIang Cheng’s mouth to switch into a scowl. “We’re different! We need to protect our clansmen!”

“Right,” Jiang Cheng forced his mouth into a smirk. “Everyone has different ideas. You may think it’s fine to make slaves and prostitutes of your people, and you may be willing to do and tolerate anything for as long as you continue to live.”

Nie Mingjue gave a low, long whistle.

The sect leader reacted in indignation, standing up.

“Jiang Cheng!” he shouted. “Don’t push your luck! You’re trying so hard to persuade us. You just want to seek revenge even if it means taking us down with you!”

“That’s right! I want revenge!”

“A-Cheng,” Jiang Fengmian whispered mournfully, making his son glance over. Now that Jiang Cheng had spoken with Jiang Fengmian, he could see that it wasn’t judgement in his father’s tone, but sympathy.

After everything the simulation had shown them, it was hard for there to be anything else.

Jiang Cheng took a deep breath, then hissed, “As long as I can destroy the Wen Clan, I’m willing to do anything! If you don’t have the daring to join me, then sit back and wait for Wen Ruohan to destroy you!”

Lan Xichen raised a hand, silently reminding Jiang Cheng to tone it back.

Nie Mingjue smirked, recognizing the determination on his friend’s face.

“Wen Ruohan is suspicious and cautious. We all know that,” Lan Xichen reminded the gathered sect leaders, speaking so formally that it was impossible to interrupt him. “If we compromise now, we will face even greater trouble in the future.”

“Well said!” Nie Mingjue slammed his cup against the table. “I’ll make this clear right now. Whether you join me or not, I swear I will kill Wen Ruohan!”

Nie Huaisang tensed, turning to the chief cultivator and preparing for an outburst at the blatant rebellion. He waited, but nothing happened. Although Wen Ruohan was still listening, it seemed his thoughts were still occupied by something else.

‘What on earth could be distracting him during such a pivotal scene?’ Nie Huaisang wondered.

Nodding once, Lan Xichen saluted Nie Mingjue, saying, “Sect Leader Nie is a righteous man. I’m impressed by your courage. Our Gusu Lan Clan will do the same.”

Wen Chao’s face began turning a flaming red at the open rebellion from all sides.

Jin Guangshan began to look around nervously.

Seeing that, Lan Qiren spoke, “Any who decide to join us should speak now before the whole world. If one does not join now but instead starts taking part halfway through, we’ll have to discuss whether they should be rewarded or punished once the fighting ends.”

At those words, Jin Guangshan's scanning eyes came to an abrupt halt, and he turned towards Lan Qiren.

"H-however, how can we possibly win against Wen Ruohan with just the clans that are present?"

Hearing that, Wen Chao was able to make himself sit down again. That was right: the Wen Clan had Wen Zhuliu and his father. How could the other clans possibly stand up against those two — not to mention their thousands of disciples!

However, Lan Xichen didn't miss a beat and steadily responded, "The Wen Clan may be powerful, but their people are not as loyal as they think. We can persuade the clans they have enslaved to join us,"

And yet Jin Guangshan continued to hesitate.

"But I doubt any of them would take the risk of fighting against the Wen Clan."

Hearing that, Lan Xichen gave a pleasant half-laugh, then gestured outside.

The watchers were brought to the hill around the conference room, where a large group of cultivators were marching uphill. The clan leaders stood up to get a better look, and even Jin Guangshan's eyes widened in surprise.

Before them, an enormous congregation of hundreds of people had gathered. They were the initial army of the Sunshot Campaign.

Here, finally, Wen Ruohan glanced up.

He had always known it would take a while to convert the clans he had conquered into loyal followers, so some rebellion was hardly a surprise. That said, there was no harm in taking some time to memorize the clans of those who were arrogant enough to think they could kill the sun.

The clans began to announce themselves.

"Ouyang Xin from Baling! The Qishan Wen Clan ruined our ancestral shrine and killed my clansmen! Thanks to Lan-er-gongzi, we were able to survive. Now, I bring with me hundreds of clasmen to join you!"

"Wang Jin from Runan! The Wen Clan killed my family and insulted my sisters. I came here at Lan-er-gongzi's invitation! I swear to help destroy the Wen Clan!"

"Fu Huan from Hedong! Lan-er-gongzi helped me, too! I have over 200 people ready to join you!"

Even Jin Guangshan's mouth had dropped open in shock.

"Hanguang-jun, indeed," Wen Ruohan muttered, glancing at the boy.

When the Sunshot Campaign broke out, Nie Mingjue would be annoying, but Wen Ruohan was more than capable of dealing with him personally, should the situation require that.

The Twin Jades of Lan were a bit of an unknown factor — especially considering the power Lan Wangji had shown as "Hanguang-jun" — but he doubted the teenage versions would be able to do much once the Core Melting Hand was brought in. Wen Xu had managed to break Lan Wangji's leg already, after all. They had inspired many people to join them, but he was sure they could be dealt with.

Even if Jin Guangshan wouldn't openly ally with the Wens now that Jin Zixuan had been injured in the camp, Wen Ruohan was certain the man wouldn't be a massive contributor in the Sunshot Campaign. His son was also not a concern.

Yes, this was more than he had expected. The Sunshot Campaign might even survive for a few months — surely longer than many of his highest ranking disciples expected them to — but they still wouldn't win.

(Unless, of course, they got demonic cultivation.)

"Any more objections, Clan Leaders?" Lan Xichen asked. The announcements continued as "Sun Shan," "Li Tong," "Wu Ye," and "Yang Zaihan" introduced themselves, but the point had already been made.

Jin Guangshan broke eye contact.

The Sunshot Campaign was beginning.

Jin Zixuan gave a massive cheer, covering up Wen Chao's grumbles. This was followed by Nie Huaisang and Jiang Cheng, who both began laughing in delight.

"A-Cheng, you got your core back! A-Xian did it!" Jiang Yanli declared, eyes glistening in grateful tears.

"Good job, Wangji, Xichen," Lan Qiren said.

Madam Yu nodded once at her son.

"Great!" Nie Mingjue declared, stepping forward to address the entirety of the gathered crowd. "In the era of Five Emperors, ten suns caused the rivers to dry. The suffering the Wen Clan has brought is no less than that disaster! In ancient times, Da Yi shot down the suns to save the world."

He stepped onto the stage, addressing the hundreds present with an energy that spread like wildfire, and smirked.

"You people who have gathered here are today's Da Yi! We shall name this battle against the Wen Clan The Sunshot Campaign!"

He lifted his cup into the air, and a tremendous cheer broke out across the crowd.

The smiles amongst the watchers were infectious. No one could deny the delight which spread throughout. Then, Nie Huaisang laughed.

“It’s kinda funny. The burning of Lotus Pier started because Wang Lingjiao claimed a kite meant you wanted to ‘shoot down the sun.’ I guess she wasn’t too far off.”

Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes at that, but even Lan Wangji seemed to smile slightly.

Then wind picked up, and the sky darkened to a stormy black. Crows cawed in the distance like harbingers of doom. An eerie creaking of wood resounded.

When a soul-crushing pressure brought the unprepared to the ground, it removed all doubt as to where they were.

But Wei Wuxian had escaped, hadn’t he? No one could survive the Burial Mounds. They didn’t know how Wei Wuxian could have gotten out, but it made more sense than him surviving there.

Still standing, Wen Ruohan released a shuttering breath as he adjusted to the strain.

‘Why are we back here?’

At the dips between the mounds, bones littered the ground. There seemed to be a new skull two feet in any direction. In the distance, there was a trace of movement along the ground.

The figure blended into the shadows behind them, but their dusty red ribbon gave them away.

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji breathed out, heartbeat quickening.

Pressed up against the ground, Wei Wuxian struggled to lift his head.

How long had it been? Jiang Cheng had met up with Lan Xichen — had made it all the way to Gusu, in fact. Wouldn’t that mean this was days later?

“He’s okay,” Jiang Yanli whispered. “He’s fine. He’s still alive. He’ll be fine.”

With each beat, her heart seemed to jump out of her ribs.

Slowly, Wei Wuxian continued to crawl forward. All around him, the spirits which made up the Burial Mounds’ potent resentful energy whispered and giggled in his ears.

He could barely keep his eyes open.

“Can’t he stand?!” Jin Zixuan demanded. The pressure the watchers felt was what nearby spirits felt. It shouldn’t affect a cultivator to the same degree.

“Thrown,” Lan Wangji whispered. “He was thrown from the sky.”

After a fall from that height, it wouldn't have been surprising if he had died on impact. Were his legs broken? His spine? His ribs?

Wei Wuxian's fingers dug into the dirt as he forced himself to keep moving, ignoring the hisses and screams that echoed in his ears.

Flat against the ground, barely able to drag himself forward. He was being crushed by more resentful energy than anyone had ever felt before. And, in the past week, he had been whipped, choked, slammed against the ground, beaten up by Wen Chao's disciples, hit by the core melting hand, and thrown in.

Were any of his bones still intact? He could barely move — could he even breathe? There was so much resentment and what if a rib had punctured his lung or what if his throat had been damaged on collision or what if he had a broken arm or broken leg or gotten a concussion or a-

A hand snatched his ankle.

Nie Huaisang screamed.

Wei Wuxian was jerked back, pulled in as the arm sank deeper and deeper into the dirt. It was a fierce corpse, buried under the ground Wei Wuxian had just crawled over.

Wei Wuxian kicked at it and tried to stand.

Nearby resentful energy reacted to Wei Wuxian's movement, condensing into another arm and grabbing the leg trying to kick the corpse away.

Wei Wuxian gasped out.

Jiang Fengmian stood, "A-Xian, run-"

But his movement had attracted more spirits' attention.

They swarmed.

"Wei Ying!"

Thousands* of fierce ghosts attacked at once, slamming into his body like a tidal wave. Their screams grew in volume, and they flooded Wei Wuxian's blood with their hate.

Lan Wangji darted to Wei Wuxian's side, but could do nothing to interfere with the simulation's spirits as they tried crushing Wei Wuxian's bones to dust.

"Get lost!" he shouted, his voice breaking under the physical strain. "All of you, leave!"

The spirits just laughed louder.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted helplessly.

A tornado of resentment formed around him, attracting other fierce corpses to their prey. The bodies lumbered forward, circling around Wei Wuxian and closing in.

"Stop it!" Jiang Cheng shouted, trying to block them from his brother's body.

The corpses walked through the watchers, and Wei Wuian fought to escape. However, no matter how hard he pushed off the ground or twisted, he couldn't move.

A corpse snatched his foot and yanked it close, nearly dislocating his knee and causing him to scream. Wei Wuxian kicked out and dislodged its grip, but the resentful energy swarmed in and flooded his lungs.

Recovering from where it had been kicked back to, the corpse stepped forward again. The spirits followed along, circling around Wei Wuxian.

Soon, they would devour him whole.

Lan Qiren felt his heart stop.

The spirits lifted themselves high into the air — nearly outside the Burial Mounds — then aimed at their prey and dived.

They slammed into his chest, and Wei Wuxian choked on his own blood.

Yanli turned away.

The tornado of resentful energy then dispersed, replaced by a white void containing crimson maple leaves. In the center of the void stood Wei Wuxian, his clothes straight and clean despite the way he had dragged his body across the dirt only a few seconds ago.

"A dream?" Nie Mingjue muttered.

"He was exhausted," Wen Qing added. "Given the stress his body is going through, that's no surprise."

The only sound in the void was Wei Wuxian's steady footsteps. Then, in a large sweep, the Lotus Pier formed. It was as lively and vibrant as it was before the Wens had ever shown up.

After the destruction they had been forced to witness, the watchers couldn't help but find the former version of the pier breathtaking.

Wei Wuxian looked up, then flinched back, seeing Yu Ziyuan and Jiang Fengmian sitting at a table up ahead. He heard childish laughter behind him, and turned to see two 10 year olds run by him.

"Wei Wuxian, come on!"

"Jiang Cheng, wait!"

What an unspeakably cruel thing to show someone who had just lost everything. Even knowing her own parents were still alive and well, Jiang Yanli couldn't stop her eyes from watering at the sight.

Jiang Fengmian turned to face the kids, and even Yu Ziyuan's face softened into a smile she had never used in Wei Wuxian's presence before.

Seeing that, the teenage Wei Wuxian smiled warmly.

Lan Wangji detested physical contact with strangers, but, for a moment, the urge to wrap his arms around Wei Wuxian was so strong it overpowered all else.

"A-Xian."

At his shijie's voice, Wei Wuxian lit up even further and glanced to the right, where a thirteen year old illusion of Wei Wuxian sat eating with Jiang Yanli.

"Slowly. Don't choke," she advised.

"I won't! Thanks!"

At the domestic scene, Jiang Yanli couldn't resist the smile that formed on her face. When he saw it, Jin Zixuan began to smile as well.

Right as Wei Wuxian began to approach them, his surroundings rippled and switched to the roof of the Cloud Recesses. It was the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian, standing across from Lan Wangji during their first meeting.

"Here! Emperor's smile!"

"Drinking is forbidden here."

"It seems he values you quite highly," Lan Xichen whispered to his brother. Despite the teasing tone, there was a tension still present in his body.

After all, this was just an illusion; they couldn't forget where the real Wei Wuxian was.

Then, the illusionary Lan Wangji turned towards them.

"Wei Ying!" he shouted.

The illusion disintegrated, and Wei Wuxian's eyes snapped open.

On all sides, resentful energy was shooting into his body. Just as he tried to move, it exploded out. Dead trees were thrown off the ground, and dust was kicked into the air. When it cleared, Wei Wuxian's body was rising unnaturally off the ground.

Two arms made of resentment reached out to lock fingers with Wei Wuxian's, and more arms appeared to wrap around his chest, pulling him in. The nearby fierce corpses reached up like fervent worshipers, hoping for any scraps the spirits left behind.

Lan Wangji reached out and futilely attempted to pull Wei Wuxian up, but there was no way for the other boy to receive any help.

The energy growled, and two crimson eyes snapped open next to Wei Wuxian’s head, one spirit separating from the pack to show its starved expression.

Below, the fierce corpses began frantically climbing on top of each other as they fought for a taste. They and the spirits impatiently began to grab at Wei Wuxian’s form, waiting for his flesh to be lowered into their arms.

Where they would tear him apart.

Lan Wangji couldn’t move Wei Ying away. He couldn’t stop the fierce corpses. He couldn’t purify the spirits dragging him down. He may be one of the strongest cultivators of his generation, but there was nothing he could do to help Wei Wuxian.

His own powerlessness ate him from the inside out.

Then, Wei Wuxian was brought low enough for the yao to reach him.

He screamed.

Jiang Yanli turned away.

It was a fight — a battle. Each fierce corpses was trying to pull him down but some spirits were trying to pull him up and they were all on different sides so he was being stretched to the left and right and up and down at the same time and and they jerked and yanked and twisted and human bodies were not supposed to bend that way and his screams got even louder and-

If he didn’t have a broken arm before, he certainly did now.

Nie Huaisang stood up and ran to his brother, feeling nausea build up in his throat.

It didn’t matter how long Wei Wuxian screamed, the fierce corpses and resentful ghosts had no reason to care.

He snapped his mouth closed and tried fighting back, but the corpses just turned him around and started slamming him into cliffsides to silence him. Meanwhile, the spirits began attacking his body directly. They flew through his veins, making them bulge and crack as they invaded his body like parasites.

His screams became choked-off gasps of agony.

Then, the ground cracked open, and a tsunami of resentful energy swept through the fierce corpses to wrap around Wei Wuxian’s limbs like tendrils. The spirits suffocated him; the corpses broke him; the resentful energy invaded his mind.

In a flash, visions swarmed into Wei Wuxian's thoughts. The burning of Lotus Pier, the Jiangs' bodies.

His eyes opened again, alight not in fear, but determination.

A bony hand scratched at his chest, and a stream of blood began trailing down his arm. The nearby corpses smelled it.

Drooling heavily, the closest one opened its mouth-

"Stop!" Wei Wuxian commanded. For a moment, it looked like it would work.

Then, his body spasmed.

"Wei Ying!"

Just like when he had used demonic cultivation to save the rabbit, the resentful energy poured into his body and made his veins bulge from the strain. Last time he had been in a forest of the Cloud Recesses, fighting a single fierce corpse.

Now he was in the Burial Mounds, fighting thousands.

Wei Wuxian gasped out and choked on his scream, not having enough air in his body to make a sound. He thrashed and writhed in the spirits' hold, pain spreading throughout his body.

But the corpse had indeed stopped.

Wei Wuxian wasn't dead yet.

The watchers were silent, watching the boy shake in agony as he fought the resentful energy for control.

Suddenly, Nie Mingjue laughed in a self-deprecating, broken way: "We have to 'keep him away from the temptation,' we said."

Hearing that, Lan Qiren froze.

Ever since the opening scenes, Lan Qiren's main reason for watching the simulation was to figure out how to prevent demonic cultivation from being invented. He needed some way — any way — to keep Wei Wuxian from following his curiosity and rebelliousness to their dark conclusion. He had thought the hardest part would be deciding whether there was a way to stop Wei Wuxian without killing him. That he would need to turn Wei Wuxian away from the power at every turn.

That Wei Wuxian had chosen to invent it.

His body continued to shake, and Wei Wuxian slowly gasped out, "Off."

The spirits which had been swarming inside his body and pressing down on his throat moved back a handful of centimeters.

If he had stopped them even a second later, he might have been suffocated.

It was possible for someone to be too tired to resist an attack. It was possible for someone to be unconscious while an attack occurred. It was an awful when it happened, but it was possible for someone to be suicidal.

But no one would not resist if they could feel themselves being choked. That simply wasn't something humans were capable of doing. If he thought there was even the slightest chance of escaping, his body would make him do so.

"It…" Lan Qiren turned his eyes on the trembling Wei Wuxian. "It couldn't be easier to prevent this."

Shaking on the ground, Wei Wuxian fought with the resentful energy for dominance. His voice was too hoarse to scream, but the unbearable agony remained.

"How long do you think he'll be stuck in the Burial Mounds?" Jiang Yanli wondered aloud, too afraid of the answer to bring her voice above a whisper.

They had thought it would be impossible to survive more than a few hours. The only reason it was taking longer was because of Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation; the Burial Mounds were clearly just as deadly as rumored.

How many more days would he be trapped in that tortuous hellscape?

The glares sent Wen Chao's way would have incinerated a braver man.

Then, with a disgustingly calm tone, Lan Sizhui narrated, "Two days later."

"Excuse me?" Madam Jin demanded.

Nie Mingjue cursed, then turned his glare on Wen Ruohan as well.

First, they heard Wei Wuxian's heavy panting.

Next, they saw him racing through the valley.

Then, they saw what he was running from.

"A-Xian," Jiang Fengmian breathed out.

Everyone else was frozen in shock.

Although fierce corpses usually weren't very fast, these were the ones in the Burial Mounds. Their resentment was unparalleled by anything on the outside, so, despite their worn-down bodies, even a trained cultivator would struggle against them. Wei

Wuxian, with a hand-made splint around his possibly broken leg, had very little chance of escaping one.

And right now, dozens were chasing after him.

Wei Wuxian turned a sharp corner around one of the mounds, then stumbled on his bad leg. His body crashed against a small hill.

"Wei-xiong, move!"

A spirit dived, and created a crater where Wei Wuxian had been just a half second before. Wheezing from the strain, Wei Wuxian forced himself to stand up and continue moving.

Although it appeared the leg wasn't completely broken, his speed was still diminished considerably.

But he was trying to avoid demonic cultivation.

And yet he'd still been forced to develop it.

"And four days after that."

"More?"

Wei Wuxian stumbled through a field of bamboo soaked in resentful energy. Although the fierce corpses were unable to reach him there, the spirits were even faster. By now, the dirt covering his clothes had turned even the scarlet inner robe pitch black.

No one missed the fact that Wei Wuxian's cheek bones were far too obvious.

(The lack of food and rest was making him wither away.)

Jiang Yanli clenched her firsts.

"And six days after that."

"Again?!" Lan Qiren demanded.

Wei Wuxian was driven into a corner, and fell to his knees. The strain on his legs forced him to double over; not even he could make his body work through this much pain. The spirits reached out hungrily.

"Stop," he ordered again, barely able to speak with how dry his throat had become. This time, instead of spasming under the resentful energy running through his body, he merely took a few deep breaths, then forced himself to stand again on shaky legs.

Hearing the state of his throat, a sudden thought occurred to Nie Huaisang.

Food was one thing, but water was even more important than that. Any water that was in the Burial Mounds was sure to be heavily contaminated by the energy there.

What kind of effects would that have on a person?

“And eight days after that.”

“Just stop!” Jiang Cheng begged.

Once again, Wei Wuxian was running without any regard for his damaged leg or his broken arm or his sprained ankle or his hacking lungs. His lips were so dry that they seemed to crack anew every time they moved, and his eyes fought valiantly to keep themselves pried open.

Every few meters, he would stumble as if he had fallen asleep mid-step.

“...How long had he been running for?”

“Has he been able to sleep at all?”

“Has he gotten anything to drink?”

Silence was their only answer.

Even without the pressure of the Burial Mounds weighing him down, Nie Mingjue would be forced to sit.

War was a terrible, traumatic event which could leave even the strongest soldiers with nightmares. He had heard stories of non-cultivating soldiers becoming terrifying fierce corpses after death due to their experiences. Although he hadn’t personally taken part in a war (yet), some night hunts carried similar risks. Sect Leader Nie was far from unaccustomed to exhaustion from constant battles. Soldiers and cultivators could be forced to fight multiple times a day, and their sleep was plagued by unspeakable terrors. This combination had driven many men insane, filling them with resentful energy and creating some of the most powerful monsters ever.

But at least they could sleep.

Right now, Wei Wuxian was spending every minute of every hour of every day running for his life without a second of rest. Sleep was a luxury he could barely afford to think about. And, if he couldn’t rest, how could he drink? How could he sleep? How could he eat?

(What could he eat?)

By now, Wei Wuxian’s skin was so pale that he practically blended in with the corpses. If it weren’t for the now-brown ribbon still in his hair, he would have been almost impossible to recognize.

Wei Wuxian turned to the left.

A hand was waiting.

Jiang Cheng's eyes snapped closed.

Skidding down, Wei Wuxian managed to avoid the hand striking at his neck, which instead grabbed hold of and pulled off his hair ribbon. Wei Wuxian spun around to face the approaching monsters, his hair fluttering down around him.

The exhausted indifference in his eyes belonged to the Yiling Patriarch, not the Wei Wuxian they had spent the last few days learning about.

(But this was the Yiling Patriarch, wasn't it?)

Cut off on all sides, Wei Wuxian was slowly backed towards a cliff by the approaching corpses. One jumped.

"Stop!" he shouted again.

The one corpse stopped.

The others were merely slowed.

"Stop!" he repeated, halting another one. "Stop! Stop! Stop!"

But there were too many to stop one-by-one. Too many to concentrate on all at once.

His control slipped, and in the next second he had fallen to his knees, trying to force the energy out of his once again bulging veins. Blood rose up in his throat from the exertion.

"Out," he whispered, not having the energy for anything louder.

The spirits stilled, but didn't leave his body. The corpses continued their ominous approach.

"Stop," he hissed again, desperation breaking through. "Stop. Stop. Stop. Stop. Stop."

At last, they did. Seeing that, Wei Wuxian finally relaxed.

The dark circles under his eyes seemed to consume him, and his lids momentarily fluttered closed.

In that half-second of inattention, something snatched his arm and threw him off the cliff.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted, once again forced to watch as Wei Wuxian's incorporeal body phased through his grip.

Wei Wuxian slammed against a rock and gasped — wind knocked out of him — then fell to the ground.

He didn't move.

“He was knocked out,” Wen Qing hissed, kneeling down beside the collapsed Wei Wuxian as if there was anything she could do to help. Up close, the boy’s exhaustion was even more obvious.

A half-second of being relaxed had allowed a spirit to pull him off a cliff. Did that mean Wei Wuxian had to keep himself completely focused at all times? He couldn’t rest for even a second?

(Even with a core, that would be impossible.)

~~Without one, his death was certain.~~

Seeing that their prey had finally stopped moving, the corpses circled around and prepared to move in for the kill. Although they lacked any consciousness for detailed plans, their shared desire to finally catch the prey which had spent the last week slipping through their fingers allowed for some cooperation.

The freshest corpse — missing its legs — crawled on top of Wei Wuxian.

Forcing himself to continue watching, Lan Wangji clenched his fists tightly enough to draw blood.

The corpse pulled itself up Wei Wuxian’s body.

Across his legs….

Over his waist….

Up his chest….

It got to his side, and leaned down.

Nie Huaisang looked away.

Slowly, tiredly, Wei Wuxian blinked his eyes open.

He flinched.

“Stop!”

Around his gasping neck, the corpse’s mouth was frozen open, mid-bite. Its ravenous drool dripped onto Wei Wuxian’s neck and slid down his collarbones. When Wei Wuxian realized he could feel the teeth starting to dig in on both sides of his neck, his heart rate tripled.

“Off,” he hissed. “Off. Get off — get off me!”

Panicked and unable to fully speak while his throat was being squeezed, the command came out as nothing more than a barely-there gasp. The corpse didn’t move.

After what was surely days and days of screaming, his throat had become too hoarse to make a sound.

Looking at the color of Wei Wuxian's skin, the unhealthy lack of fat on his bones, and his bulging veins from the frequent use of resentful energy, Jin Guangshan was overcome by the impossibility of what was on display before him. It shouldn't have been a surprise — people had tried for centuries before Wei Wuxian — and yet the sheer scale of the circumstances stunned everyone present.

Even if he wanted to, Jin Guangshan wasn't sure he would be able to force Wei Wuxian to invent demonic cultivation. Was everything he had stayed in the simulation for meaningless now?

Was it all for nothing?

(No. No, it wasn't.)

They couldn't force Wei Wuxian to invent it, but they didn't have to; outside, the real Wei Wuxian was being taught by the Grandmaster of Demonic Cultivation himself. No one could complain when demonic cultivation was the only way they could get out.

By now, Jin Guangshan had completely memorized the boy's likes, dislikes, nervous ticks, greatest fears, and strongest desires. It would be easy to earn his trust.

Jin Guangshan looked down at the weakened, injured, and exhausted genius, and felt his lips curled up in satisfaction.

In the meantime, Wei Wuxian continued breathing heavily, forcing himself to not get corrupted by demonic cultivation. He swallowed, and the teeth wrapped around his neck pressed tighter.

"Off," Wei Wuxian commanded harshly, then choked as resentful energy flooded his veins.

The mere sight made Nie Huaisang nauseous.

However, the corpses and spirits slowly backed off, leaving the heavily panting Wei Wuxian alone as he fought for control of the resentful energy. Trembling, he turned over and shakily pushed himself off the ground.

'Circulate it through,' he told himself. 'Don't let it linger.'

Every time Lan Qiren had seen a chance for Wei Wuxian's redemption, he had reminded himself that there was no excuse to invent demonic cultivation. That nothing could justify it.

Perhaps Cangse Sanren was onto something when she called him an old fool.

Wei Wuxian's arm spasmed then went limp, momentarily losing to the resentful energy.

"No-"

“Damn it!” Wei Wuxian shouted, forcefully suppressing the energy again. He bit his tongue hard enough to draw blood, and forced his bloodshot eyes open.

“Look at the dark circles under his eyes,” Jin Zixuan whispered.

Once he did, Jiang Cheng wished he hadn’t.

“Figure it out,” Wei Wuxian ordered to himself, trying to forcefully power through his exhaustion. “Figure it out. Figure it out. Figure it out — get out — find Wen Chao — kill him!”

His eyes flashed crimson, and a grin formed on his face.

The world faded to black.

When the watchers were returned to the white void, they were once again struck silent.

Every one of them had thought they would watch the invention of demonic cultivation — the birth of the Yiling Patriarch — with disgust. Why wouldn’t they? Even those hoping to use it for themselves didn’t see how its invention could be anything except a selfish bid for power.

(Jiang Fengmian felt his hands tremble, and wondered why his faith in Wei Wuxian had been so lacking.)

People thrown into the Burial Mounds always died. If Wei Wuxian was the one to change that, it wasn’t because he was willing to do something the others weren’t. It was because he was the only one brilliant enough to consider a solution when left with no other options.

And yet they’d mercilessly condemned him for his choice without understanding the full picture.

What could they say now?

Then, the unusually-dazed Wen Ruohan hummed.

“He didn’t use his golden core to escape.”

“Excuse me?!” Madam Yu hissed. “He’s been… whipped, and Wen Chao’s disciples hurt him and Wen Zhuliu hit him and he was stabbed! Of course he doesn’t have much spiritual energy left for that!”

But Wen Ruohan wasn’t listening. Instead, he had turned to Wen Qing, who was already looking back at him. They made eye contact for several seconds, and a silent conversation transpired.

Neither of them could find any evidence to disprove the core transfer.

Instead, all they could find were facts supporting it.

Wen Qing broke eye contact first, feeling her racing heart rumble in her head. No matter how long she spent thinking about it, she couldn't see how it was possible for Wei Wuxian to experience all that just days after feeling his core get cut out of him.

(Maybe her future self had found a way to use anesthetics?)

(She wanted to believe that, but all the optimism they'd had in the past few days had been proven wrong time and time again.)

'No, it can't be true,' she reminded herself. 'Just because His Excellency and I can't come up with proof doesn't mean it's not there. You can't honestly be considering this!'

And yet, if anyone was willing to give up their core, it would be Wei Wuxian.

Watching Wen Qing slowly begin to fall into acceptance, Wen Ruohan felt a terrifying rage alight within himself. He had seen Wei Wuxian's core. Its power was phenomenal, especially given his childhood in the streets. If Wei Wuxian was given the chance to cultivate it for a few more years, the changes he might be able to bring about were limitless. Someone like that was more valuable than a dozen minor sects put together!

And he had given it away.

It couldn't be true — Wen Ruohan was sure there was another explanation, even if he hadn't thought of it yet — because cultivation was everything to their society. Every clan leader must be a cultivator; anyone worthy of respect must be a cultivator; anyone dangerous must be a cultivator. Even if Wei Wuxian didn't care about that, a golden core was the gateway to immortality. Without one, Wei Wuxian would age like any other non cultivator.

He would be giving the Jiang heir years of his life.

And Jiang Cheng had tried to kill him less than a week ago.

But that was the crux of the issue, wasn't it? The Jiangs had broken him so badly that he would rather tear himself apart for them than accept a coreless Jiang Wanyin. He could have accomplished anything, and yet he threw it all away for him.

Intentionally or not, the Yunmeng Jiang clan had ruined him.

And they would continue to do so unless Wen Ruohan intervened.

After everything that had been shown, there was no chance that the people gathered would agree to send Wei Wuxian to the Wens. That was fine, however.

So long as Wei Wuxian got away from the Jiangs, Wen Ruohan had all the time in the world.

The Nie, Jin, or Lan sects could take him. Nie Huaisang was Wei Wuxian's friend; Jin Zixuan was the fiance of his shijie; Lan Wangji was the boy's partner. Any of those sects would surely be willing to take him.

“Is something wrong, Your Excellency?” Lan Xichen asked, voice frigid. It seemed Wen Ruohan’s gaze had lingered on Lan Wangji a second too long.

However, undaunted, Wen Ruohan merely continued staring and said, “If you need any extra resources to speed up the date of the wedding, Qishan would be happy to lend assistance.”

Even Lan Wangji’s jaw dropped at the offer.

“Excuse me?” Lan Qiren demanded. “No one is getting married-”

“Can you really say that Wei Wuxian is undeserving after everything we’ve seen?”

The silence that followed said far more than words could. Lan Wangji’s ears turned bright pink.

“...Wei Ying and I haven’t met yet,” he reluctantly pointed out, trying to keep his voice from trembling despite the overwhelming embarrassment.

(Luckily, all he had to do to stop blushing was remember the way fierce corpses had nearly torn Wei Wuxian apart.)

“Why would that matter?” Jin Guangshan asked, picking up on Wen Ruohan’s mood. “It’s pretty clear that you fall for each other almost immediately. He might as well just move into the Cloud Recesses.”

“No one is taking Wei Wuxian anywhere!” Jiang Cheng snapped, forgetting who he was speaking to for a moment. Realizing he had shouted at a sect leader, he turned to his mother, wary of an outburst.

But she simply nodded in agreement.

“He should stay with us. He’s our head disciple.”

“Haven’t you spent years wishing he wasn’t?”

“That… that was wrong. He belongs with the Jiang Sect.”

Jiang Fengmian nodded in agreement, “You will not touch him.”

“What? You’re going to protect him from me?” Wen Ruohan demanded with a laugh. How ironic to hear that from the people whose last words made Wei Wuxian cut out his life’s work.

And yet they had the audacity to-

“Why not?” Jiang Yanli asked. “The simulation’s already shown us that A-Cheng is willing to sacrifice himself to protect A-Xian. He still-”

“Given his reaction afterwards, I’d say it’s obvious that he didn’t realize he’d be sacrificing his core.”

The Jiang siblings flinched.

Frowning deeper, Lan Wangji objected, “Nevertheless, it is still-”

“A worthy sacrifice?” Wen Ruohan assumed with a mocking laugh.

(He knew he should reel it back in. He knew he was practically throwing subtlety out the window. He knew he didn’t have any proof. And yet-)

“What exactly are you trying to say?” Nie Mingjue raised an eyebrow.

In that moment, Wen Ruohan’s anger overcame his rationality.

“If Wei Wuxian hadn’t been there, Jiang Cheng would have run back as soon as he saw his parents bodies and lost his core regardless. What you’ve done for him is nothing in comparison to what he’s done for you.”

“What?”

“So,” Wen Ruohan continued, impatient enough to abandon all forms of diplomacy. “Will the Lans take him in once we get out?”

Although they didn’t have personal objections, the lack of Wei Wuxian’s involvement in the decision kept the three Lans silent. In that pause, Jiang Fengmian decided to speak.

“...He’s still my head disciple-”

“He’s wasted on you.”

Not even Jin Guangshan could understand Wen Ruohan’s sudden fury.

(Silently, Nie Huaisang glanced at Wen Qing, noting the careful distance she kept from the speakers.)

However, after that annoyed outburst, Wen Ruohan seemed to reel his emotions back in. He knew that no one present would agree to taking Wei Wuxian away from the Jiangs quite yet — until he could prove the core transfer, there was no point in asking.

By now, it had been quite clearly proven that Wei Wuxian’s loyalty to the Jiangs was so strong that no form of bribery would draw him away from them. Wen Ruohan would need to restart his brainstorming process. Hopefully whatever caused him to kill Jiang Yanli would give him some ideas. Considering what Wei Wuxian's loyalty had survived, Wen Ruohan couldn’t wait to see what the trigger to that was.

(Briefly, he wondered if he should kill Wen Qing the second they got out to remove any possibility of Wei Wuxian giving away his greatest form of protection. An asset had far fewer uses when it could be easily damaged.)

(Though he had to admit, the boy’s unbelievable levels of resilience were extremely impressive.)

Two meters away, Wen Qing very carefully avoided eye contact with everyone else. She honestly didn't know why she and Wen Ruohan were so hung up on an obviously not true theory. They were drawing conclusions far too quickly to be rational. It was entirely possible that Wei Wuxian's story about Baoshan Sanren was actually true.

(But what if it wasn't?)

As the silence stretched on, it soon became clear that Wen Ruohan had nothing more to say. Madam Yu flushed in outrage and considered stepping forward to continue the conversation, but a pleading look from Jiang Fengmian made her begrudgingly back off.

She didn't know what Wen Ruohan was thinking. She treated her head disciple just fine.

(She knew she didn't.)

Then she would start treating him just fine once they got out.

(Would she?)

She would.

However, she couldn't help but think back to the apology she had given Wei Wuxian just a short while ago. The sheer disbelief in his response had silenced the rest of what she had planned to say.

Yes, she could apologize.

But would he believe it?

~~Of course not. What reason did he have to trust her? She could tell him to call her 'Aunt Yu' all she wanted, but it was far too late now for it to seem genuine. After everything she had done, how could she expect him to trust her?~~

She scowled, glaring at the floor.

Seeing that, Jiang Fengmian stepped forward slightly, wondering if he should try to comfort his wife. He didn't love her — their marriage had occurred before he could start to, and their frequent arguments kept anything from forming — but she was still his wife. He wanted to have a better relationship than what they had now. He knew he should say something.

Then, he remembered Wei Wuxian's face — steeped in exhaustion and pain — and recalled that one of the last things Madam Yu had ever done was whip Wei Wuxian's back until blood broke through.

And then she had blamed him, but had still expected him to protect Jiang Cheng "even if he died."

(Were his own last words really any better?)

Some grumbles and discussions continued between the adults, but most everyone was simply muted. After Wen Ruohan's outburst, the watchers had finally been given a chance to allow what they had just seen to sink in.

Right now, there was no denying it: they were wrong, Wei Wuxian hadn't had a choice in the matter.

There was nothing they could say.

Shortly before that segment ended, a door in a parallel-but-future dimension was opened.

"Hanguang-jun!" Lan Jingyi greeted with his usual excitement as Lan Wangji stepped inside.

"Ah, is that you Lan Zhan?" Wei Wuxian called out from another room. "Come over here!"

Once he entered the back room, Lan Wangji saw that Sizhui, Zizhen, and Jin Ling were already present. They sat around Wei Wuxian, eagerly waiting for further instructions.

"Alright," Wei Wuxian clapped his hands together. "Now that we're all here, it's time for the explanation. While this will allow us to see the people inside, we're not going to be able to interact with them. We'll also get to see whatever vision you sent over to them, though that might be a little muddled from how many layers it's going though. Oh, well. What we really care about is the people who are watching anyways, so that's fine."

The quartet of radishes nodded in understanding.

"Great!" Wei Wuxian declared. "Operation 'Figure Out How Wrong Things Have Gone' is a go! Remember to take notes on the people you see there, we'll be having a discussion about how your mistake will impact that world when we get back."

A chorus of "Yes, Senior Wei" followed.

"Okay, then, everyone go lie down now," Wei Wuxian instructed. "I don't have enough resources to do this again, so we better make it count this time!"

With a dip of his finger Wei Wuxian picked up a mixture of his own blood and material from the burial mounds which enhanced the technique's power. The array was fairly simple, but the experimental nature meant that Wei Wuxian would be including every safety precaution imaginable.

He would not accept one of the juniors getting hurt because of him.

Finally, the array was finished, and the red orb of the Píngxíng Gateway was placed in the center. A moment later, everything went black.

"Senior Wei?!"

"Wei Wuxian!"

“We’re all gonna die!”

“Calm down,” Lan Wangji ordered, silencing the screams of Ouyang Zizhen, Jin Ling, and Lan Jingyi. “He told you this would happen, didn’t he?”

“I’m pretty sure I did,” Wei Wuxian added on.

The sudden darkness had started the juniors, but now they were grateful that no one could see the blushes on their faces. At least the only ones present were their Hanguang-jun and Senior Wei; if Lan Qiren had been present, the lecture they would receive would last until the end of the day.

“Oh, I think the light’s settling in,” Wei Wuxian observed.

And he was right. In the next several seconds, the dark abyss around the four radishes and two adults lit the world up into a depressing grey. It didn’t matter to the newcomers, however; their eyes were focused on the other-dimenion’s watchers.

There were some familiar faces and some unfamiliar ones. Thanks to the uniforms, it wasn’t too hard to figure out who everyone was. The teenaged Hanguang-jun, Sandu Shengshou, Zewu-jun, and the Head-shaker were the easiest to recognize, but the others could be deduced easily enough.

“Wait… is that….” Jin Ling spun around to do a double take, but his eyes weren’t deceiving him. “...A-Niang? A-Die?”

Wei Wuxian flinched.

The juniors gaped, staring at Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan, who were huddled close together. It struck both Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji as odd, because the pair had only started truly liking each other after the war.

(If nothing else, Wei Wuxian was glad Jin Ling’s idealistic image of his parents’ eternal love wouldn’t be broken.)

Silently, Wei Wuxian joined Jin Ling in front of Jiang Yanli, basking in her glow for just a few precious seconds.

“Is this really a young Hanguang-jun?” Lan Jingyi asked, standing close and staring shamelessly.

“It is,” Lan Wangji confirmed. Sizhui and Zizhen ran over, disbelievingly observing a Lan Wangji who was younger than them. Zizhen even reached out to touch him, only to phase right through and blush, remembering that they couldn’t interfere. They glanced back to see if the adult Hanguang-jun was staring with them, but his eyes were focused on his brother.

(Had it truly only been a few months since Lan Xichen looked that confident? It felt like it had been years.)

“Uncle Jiang and Madam Yu are here too,” Wei Wuxian observed. “And a young Jiang Cheng.”

It was insanely weird for Jin Ling to see his Uncle at 15, so he quickly turned his attention on the first two Wei Wuxian had listed. As Jin Ling continued to excitedly look around, Wei Wuxian turned to the left, and felt his eyes watering up again.

“Ah, A-Yuan…. Come over here.”

Like the filial son he was, he did.

“This is your Auntie Qing,” Wei Wuxian explained. “Wen Ning’s older sister.”

“You’ve told me about her,” Lan Sizhui nodded, eyes wide. He had heard many stories from Wen Ning and Wei Wuxian, but this was the first time he had gotten a visual image of someone from his past life.

He felt tears start to fall, and hurriedly wiped his eyes.

(Behind him, Wei Wuxian kept his eyes glued on Wen Qing, very intentionally avoiding Wen Chao. There was nothing Wei Wuxian could do to him, so looking would just make him angry for nothing.)

Then-

“Found them,” Lan Wangji reported. Wei Wuxian glanced over, and found Lan Wangji looking back and forth between Jin Guangshan and Wen Ruohan.

Jin Ling and Sizhui couldn’t seem to decide whether or not they wanted to look at them.

On Jin Guangshan’s face, there was a terrifyingly hungry smirk that he wasn’t even trying to hide. Then again, his talent laid in swaying the public’s opinion, so perhaps he didn’t see a reason to have a mask up while the only people present were those already familiar with him.

Then, Wen Ruohan.

Unlike with Jin Guangshan, Wei Wuxian had never gotten a chance to become familiar with Wen Ruohan. The man’s mannerisms and motives were almost entirely unfamiliar to him.

Which was why he wasn’t sure if the white-hot rage on the man’s face was a bad sign.

“What are they all looking at?” Zizhen wondered aloud, noticing what appeared to be abject terror on everyone else’s faces. Now that the others had gotten some time to get over their shock at seeing the people present, they saw the same.

Even Jin Guangshan — who was the most interested in what was being shown — seemed to be stunned by the simulation. Concerned, Lan Wangji followed their eyes, but the simulation was too blurry there for him to determine what it was.

There were too many steps between the simulation and the future people; the layers of resentful energy left this part clouded.

“Step aside,” Wei Wuxian ordered, receiving instant compliance. He hadn’t wanted to do this, but the expressions on everyone’s faces were making him concerned.

The simulation cut off one’s access to their body, and spiritual cultivation was impossible without access to a golden core.

Demonic cultivation, however, wasn’t.

With a long, sharp whistle, Wei Wuxian cleared the leftover resentful energy out of the way.

The image it revealed left him frozen.

A young boy — younger than even Sizhui and Jingyi — ran through a grey valley between two hills. He was unhealthily pale, and barely looked alive. A moment later, the image cleared further, and they could see what followed.

Corpses, ghosts, monsters, and yao ran towards the boy, climbing on top of each other and knocking each other over in their haste to hunt down the human.

A hand jumped out, pulling a dirty ribbon from the boy’s hair.

“Is that-”

“I mean, he looks different, but-”

“....Senior Wei?”

They turned to get an answer, but Wei Wuxian was frozen. He stared at the younger version of himself, watching the boy slowly get backed up towards the edge of a cliff.

“Stop!” his other self screamed, the sound muted due to the residual resentful energy, but no less desperate. “Stop! Stop! Stop!”

One by one, the corpses began to stop.

The younger Wei Wuxian didn’t have time to stop them one by one.

“Wh…” Jin Ling turned to Wei Wuxian. “Why aren’t you stopping them. I’ve seen you stop this many with a whistle before. Why aren’t you-”

“I hadn’t figured out how to do that yet,” Wei Wuxian answered tonelessly, unable to take his eyes off the scene before him.

“Wait, are you saying this is when you invented demon cultivation?” Lan Jingyi asked.

Wei Wuxian said nothing, but the scene before them spoke for itself.

“We’ve seen enough,” Lan Wangji decided, looking at Wei Wuxian’s dull eyes. “Wei Ying, it’s time to leave. Open the array that will get us out.”

But Wei Wuxian seemed unresponsive.

“...Wei Ying?”

Wei Wuxian’s eyes remained firmly on the scene before him. As his other self was backed to the edge of the cliff, he focused his attention on the approaching spirits and corpses.

Hands — everywhere — grabbing, pulling, tugging, holding, breaking, biting-

Well they weren’t yet, but they would.

They would wrap around his neck and bite into his skin and he could feel them on his bones — they had bitten off — were biting — hadn’t bitten yet but would-

There was someone shouting something next to him, but Wei Wuxian couldn’t hear what they were saying.

All he could hear were his legs being ripped from their sockets — his arms broken — his spine snapped — and their hands and teeth were everywhere — on every arm and leg and his chest and his face and squeezing his neck and ripping his skin and clawing and biting, chewing, crunching — those were his bones-

Wei Wuxian was a happy person. He truly, genuinely was. Cheerful, open, confident — almost cocky in his arrogance, but….

One does not simply forget the way they died.

“It’s fine,” Wei Wuxian whispered to himself, trying to calm his racing heart. “It’s fine. I got out — I made it out. I got revenge and then-”

And then he’d bro*k*e*n t*h*e se*a*l so t*h*e*y turn*e*d o*n him and rip*p*e*d a*n*d bit and che*w*e*d an*d to*r*e and yanke*d a*n*d at*e a*n*d ate a*n*d ate — his fi*n*g*e*r*s his feet h*i*s an*k*l*e his ch*e*s*t h*i*s th*i*g*h h*i*s n*e*ck — choki*n*g — couldn’t breathe, couldn’t breathe, can’t breathe — th*e*n thei*r* tee*t*h br*o*k*e th*rough skin and-

From the corner of his eye, Wei Wuxian saw a corpse reach out — trying to grab, take, rip, eat — and knew his life would be over if he didn’t move-

He sent out a tsunami of resentful energy, but only managed to push the corpse back a few feet-

Why? Why? Why?

The corpse approached again, and Wei Wuxian raised out a hand.

“Stop!” he commanded, but it was like demonic cultivation had no effect on this corpse.

Wei Wuxian's heart froze.

"Stop!" he shouted again. "Stop! Stop! Stop! Stop! No — stop! Get off!"

It grabbed his arm — he couldn't escape — and Wei Wuxian gave a blood-curdling screech.

"Stop! Get off! Get lost! Get lost!"

The corpse froze and backed off, released its grip, but Wei Wuxian barely noticed. All he could feel were the corpses clawing knuckle deep into his flesh and biting through his neck and tearing out his eyes and he'd destroyed the seal he'd known this was coming but it still hurt-

As memories assaulted his mind, all Wei Wuxian could do was fall to his knees and give a mangled scream.

He screamed and screamed and screamed and tore at his throat until he felt like he was swallowing shards of glass. He could barely make a sound, but the screams continued nonetheless.

(But why would it matter? None of it mattered! The corpses wouldn't stop no matter how much he screamed.)

Behind him, four radishes stood frozen in shock.

When Wei Wuxian had cleared up the image, they had been confused. Surely that couldn't be their Senior Wei. Yes, they knew Wei Wuxian's original body was different from Mo Xuanyu's, but they still couldn't imagine that their senior would have ever been so cornered.

(When Wei Wuxian fainted after saving the sect leaders at the second siege, Lan Wangji had reminded them that Wei Wuxian was human too. Somehow, they had forgotten that.)

(No, even if they hadn't forgotten it, there was no way they could have possibly expected what came next.)

Resentful energy had exploded out from Wei Wuxian, knocking the teenagers off their feet and pushing even Hanguang-jun back a few meters. It had built and built on itself until it tore the zone they were in apart, forcing them out of the simulation.

They had woken up in their real bodies.

And then the screaming had started.

'We could change everything!' the quartet shouted simultaneously.

Sizhui rejected the idea of asking Hanguang-jun and Wei Wuxian for their memories because he didn't want to force them to remember. He didn't consider the consequences of showing relative strangers their weakest moments.

For the first time, they understood just how naive they had been.

Lan Wangji tried to step closer to his husband, but was pushed back by another wave of resentful energy.

“Stop!” Wei Wuxian shouted. “Don’t touch me! Get lost!”

Lan Wangji flinched again.

“Wei Ying,” he tried. “Wei Ying, it’s me. Wei Ying, please breathe — slowly — in and out-”

“Don’t-”

“Wei Ying. In. Out.”

At Lan Wangji’s gentle coaxing, Wei Wuxian finally stopped hyperventilating. The fearful desperation was still there, but the resentful energy didn’t attack when Lan Wangji approached again.

“Stop,” Wei Wuxian whispered, increasingly begging and distraught each time his command didn’t work. “Stop. Stop. Go away — get off. Get lost.”

Not touching him, Lan Wangji kneeled down in front, waiting for Wei Wuxian to make the first move. For several seconds, Wei Wuxian simply gazed unseeingly at him, as if expecting him to attack.

Then, at long last, the resentful energy around them dispersed. Slowly — hesitantly — Wei Wuxian reached forward and curled his fingers into Lan Wangji’s robes, sinking into them as if he wanted to hide from the world.

Just as slowly, Lan Wangji wrapped his arms around Wei Wuxian, pulling him close.

Then, the door opened, allowing Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren to walk in.

Lan Xichen, who was out of seclusion for the first time in months.

“Zewu-jun?” Lan Sizhui asked disbelievingly.

“I…” he blinked twice. “I heard someone yelling.”

The juniors looked down, unable to acknowledge just how badly they’d messed everything up.

Chapter End Notes

I added my own scenes for Wei Wuxian’s time in the Burial Mounds, hope that was okay! I just thought it would be fun to expand on it a little! That “what did he eat” question will be answered in a later chapter. :)

The Return (Cue Dramatic Music)

Chapter Notes

Why must Wei Wuxian be single handedly responsible for every disaster imaginable?

Lan Qiren had been having a fairly pleasant conversation with his nephew — a somewhat rare thing now that Xichen was in seclusion — on whether to add new clauses to the wall of rules. No one was following "do not talk to Wei Wuxian," so Lan Qiren was willing to compromise. If he could convince the elders to switch it out for "do not speak to Wei Wuxian while he is tired," then he would stop bringing it up.

(That would at least keep things like the current time travel incident from occurring again.)

Lan Qiren had been on the cusp of finishing the argument he would be taking to the elders, when an ear-shattering scream made him spill his ink. It had sounded frantic and terrified, but once Lan Qiren recognized the voice as Wei Wuxian's, he realized what was going on.

This was another one of the boy's foolish pranks. Given who else was inside the room once he and Xichen walked in, he knew Wei Wuxian must have convinced the juniors and Wangji to join him with his usual nefarious tactics. As proof of that, the juniors were now gathered together in one corner, while Wei Wuxian hugged Wangji tightly around his neck.

Were they really dragging teenagers into their roleplay scenarios?

("Get lost," Wei Wuxian had shouted. He really had the audacity to say that to Wangji again? It figured; Wei Wuxian never took anything seriously. That was exactly why Lan Qiren hated him.)

However, as much as he wanted to punish Wei Wuxian, Lan Qiren knew that if Wei Wuxian was shunned, his nephew would willingly leave the Cloud Recesses. Lan Qiren was therefore willing to permit the demonic cultivator's presence with minimal complaint. That said, if they continued disturbing the peace of Gusu in such a manner, Lan Qiren told himself he wouldn't hesitate to take action.

And yet the shameless couple didn't even bother looking up despite the way their rambunctiousness had disrupted Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren. Had Wangji truly fallen so low? He hadn't taken his eyes off Wei Wuxian at all!

At least the juniors seemed regretful; they were avoiding eye contact out of shame, rather than indifference.

"Wangji," he spoke up at last, seeing that Xichen was too uncertain to continue. "What on earth was all that racket?"

"Apologies, Shufu," Lan Wangji responded evenly, still not looking up from his husband.

Lan Qiren felt his annoyance grow.

“Is everyone alright?” Lan Xichen asked, scanning around the room. When his eyes landed on Sizhui, the boy flinched slightly, then looked away as if guilty.

Lan Qiren tensed in concern.

“Sizhui?” Xichen asked.

“Ah-yes. Yes, I-I think it’s alright now. There’s… no immediate danger.”

The carefully-chosen phrasing infuriated Lan Qiren, and he viciously spun toward the couple.

“Wei Wuxian!”

The man jumped and looked back from where he had been shamelessly burying his face in Wangji’s chest. As expected, the boy looked like an absolute mess — his hair disheveled, his lips thoroughly bitten, his eyes red with unshed tears.

Wait-

Lan Qiren stepped closer for further observation, and Wei Wuxian flinched back. As Wangji moved to put himself between them, Wei Wuxian quickly moved to wipe his eyes.

After several seconds of watching, it slowly dawned on Lan Qiren that Wei Wuxian had been crying.

An act, surely.

But it looked just genuine enough to leave Lan Qiren unsettled.

“Ah, Shufu,” Wei Wuxian shamelessly greeted despite knowing full well that Lan Qiren hated it when Wei Wuxian called him that.

(He told himself he was just imagining the shake in Wei Wuxian’s voice.)

“What is going on?” Lan Qiren asked, speaking to the whole group but not moving his eyes from Wei Wuxian’s kneeling figure.

“Nothing, nothing,” the boy responded carelessly. “We’ve got it all under control, I promise.”

“If it was under control, you wouldn’t have disturbed half the Cloud Recesses with your yelling!”

“No need to worry, that was just a minor set back. I can handle the rest, I promise,” Wei Wuxian turned a blinding smile on them that nearly covered up how bloodshot his eyes were.

“Are you sure?” Xichen asked.

“Of course! You don’t honestly think this could be too big a problem for the Yiling Patriarch to fix, do you?” he asked, dramatically gasping in faked offence.

Lan Qiren couldn't resist scoffing at the boy's arrogance, quickly turning on his heel and storming out of the building with as much dignity as he could muster. This was exactly why he hated the boy. No, he couldn't reasonably call Wei Wuxian the enemy of mankind — not since that day thirteen years ago when Wangji came home with a toddler in his arms who they had orphaned — but the demonic cultivator's actions had brought their family nothing but grief.

Lan Qiren wanted nothing to do with it.

(When Lan Qiren had stepped closer, Wei Wuxian had flinched back. For a half-second, Lan Qiren could have sworn he saw genuine fear in Wei Wuxian's eyes. He knew he was just imagining it, but it shook him nonetheless.)

Once Lan Qiren had walked a sufficient distance away from the building, Wei Wuxian turned to the juniors, who were still huddled together in a corner of the room.

"Are you all okay?" he asked.

They refused to make eye contact. Lan Xichen and Wei Wuxian wandered closer to them, steps as silent and soft as the ones they would use while approaching baby animals. Watching them all, Lan Wangji remained a steady, calming presence.

"Senior Wei?" Lan Sizhui whimpered.

"Yes?"

"What… what's going to happen now?"

Wei Wuxian paused for a moment, frozen as memories assaulted him yet again. Then, however, he forced himself to take a deep breath and smiled confidently.

"Well, now I'll be sending you four off with your homework for the day. Tomorrow we'll be discussing how Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan's presences in the simulation will impact that world. Make sure you get a lot of sleep tonight, and don't forget to write down a few notes so that tomorrow's discussion goes smoothly."

"If you feel like you need to talk with someone about what you just saw, you can come to one of us," Lan Wangji added. "Sometimes, discussing it helps."

"But… but what about them?" Jin Ling paused and scrunched his eyes together.

(It had been his idea to send the memories over, hadn't it?)

"We'll handle that," Wei Wuxian promised. "You don't need to worry."

It looked like the juniors wanted to protest, but, a moment later, their emotional exhaustion won out. If there were going to offer help, it would be after they had gotten a long night's rest.

Lan Xichen looked back and forth. Based on what Wangji had told him, he had an idea of what was going on. The juniors, his brother, and his brother in law had gone inside the simulation, and seen something that left Wei Wuxian in that state.

Perhaps he should offer help.

(And who had he actually ended up helping in the end? Nie Mingjue? It was the cure he had offered which led to his sworn brother's death!)

Had they seen something about Jin Guangshan ~~or A-Yao~~ in there? Maybe he should do something.

(Like what? What would he have done if Nie Huaisang hadn't said he'd seen Jin Guangyao move? Would Lan Xichen have actually allowed for the trial? Or would he have taken him back to Gusu?)

He was not his father.

(Or was he? It hadn't happened, so he would never know.)

"...I can walk the juniors back," Lan Xichen suggested softly, forcing himself out of those thoughts. "I… shouldn't stay out too long anyways."

Lan Wangji turned and was about to protest, when he saw Wei Wuxian discreetly shake his head. It was a warning.

'Your brother made some good progress, don't ruin it. Leaving seclusion at all was a huge step; now isn't the time to push him farther than he's comfortable with.'

After a moment of thought, Lan Wangji switched his protest to a suggestion: "Would you like us to visit you later? We can update you on the situation."

"Yes. Yes, I… I would appreciate that. Thank you."

With a nod to the couple, Lan Xichen escorted the four teenagers away. They morosely travelled out the door.

The second Lan Wangji heard it snap shut, he turned to his husband.

"Wei Ying, was that… was that what happened those three months you were missing?"

Wei Wuxian laughed cheerily in response.

"Sorry Lan Zhan, I don't want to talk about it. Anyways, now that those four are gone, we should probably start figuring out what to do next."

He began pacing.

"The plan was to get some political power, but I'm not sure we're going to be able to get enough to stop a war. I'd like to say the best thing to do would be to make Yunmeng as powerful as possible, but it's hard to tell what the world is like over there when we've only got one source. Maybe we could double down on the 'it isn't real' bit — no, there's no way they'd believe that if the memories are that realistic. And they're not stupid either. Maybe the Wens won't want war? They lost but — no, Chifeng-jun will probably use the Sunshot Campaign as an excuse to start a war. We could — no wait, but — or maybe I — no, but the-"

"Wei Ying, stop," Lan Wangji begged, standing up.

Wei Wuxian didn't even falter.

"I'm fine, I'm fine. Don't worry so much, Lan Zhan. It was nothing. I'm just tired — you know how I get. It's nothing, you know that — oh, wait, but the kids don't. Damn, do you think I scared them? Maybe I should head out and talk to them — no, your brother's probably got it. But I definitely scared them, do you think I should-"

Mid-turn, Wei Wuxian felt arms wrap around him and halt him in his tracks. Lan Wangji had stepped behind his pacing husband and pulled him into an embrace. Despite that, Wei Wuxian was practically vibrating with suppressed energy.

"Lan Zhan, I-"

"Wei Ying, it's just us now. Breathe."

At those words, Wei Wuxian unconsciously relaxed. Lan Wangji turned him around so they could face each other, then raised a hand to cup Wei Wuxian's cheek. He used his thumb to wipe off a single tear, which — given the surprise on his husband's face — Wei Wuxian hadn't even noticed.

"I-"

"It's okay. You don't need to explain."

Lan Xichen wasn't ready to completely rejoin the outside world yet; Wei Wuxian wasn't ready to speak about what happened. That was fine. Lan Wangji had lived for 13 years without Wei Ying. He could be patient for a little while longer.

"Lan Zhan-"

"It's fine. You're safe now."

Tentatively, Wei Wuxian reached forward and tugged on Lan Wangji's robe, as if considering hiding his face inside again. Then the moment passed, and Wei Wuxian let go.

"Thanks, Lan Zhan!" Wei Wuxian laughed with a blinding smile. "Sorry about that!"

"No apologies-"

"Between us, I know, I know. Still, thanks for your help," Wei Wuxian barreled through, needing something — anything — to distract himself from his resurfacing memories.

“Though I guess that must have been pretty weird for you, huh? I probably looked like I’d gone crazy!”

To be fair, it wasn’t the first time Wei Wuxian had shouted at him to “get lost.”

(Which only made it that much more painful.)

(Why wasn’t there more he could do to help?)

Lan Wangji was jolted out of his thoughts by a finger poking his forehead. He turned his attention back to his husband, who smiled warmly at him.

“I’m not going anywhere,” Wei Wuxian reminded him. “And I’m not asking you to go anywhere either.”

A genuine smile formed on Lan Wangji’s face, making Wei Wuxian’s cheeks flush as red as his ribbon.

“I-I mean…” Wei Wuxian glanced down, unable to look at his blinding husband. “I just-”

Then, Lan Wangji stepped forward, cupping his husband’s face and placing an unbearably sweet kiss on his brows.

“I love you,” he whispered.

Wei Wuxian’s eyes widened, and he was pulling into a hug. Behind his flushing cheeks, a flash of vulnerability flickered through Wei Wuxian’s face.

“Ah, Lan Zhan, Lan Zhan…” he curled in tighter. “You’re truly too good for this one, aren’t you?”

“No,” Lan Wangji easily disagreed. “Not at all.”

By now, Wei Wuxian was sure that his face and neck were a glowing scarlet that put even resentful energy to shame. He snuggled in tighter, content to spend a few minutes without worries.

The even sound of Lan Wangji’s heartbeats began to lure him into a comforting sense of security.

Then, finally, Lan Wangji spoke.

“What will we be doing next?”

Wei Wuxian hummed, “Well, we’ll definitely need to get the watchers out. I know my other self said he was going to leave them in, but if we just explain that prolonged exposure is dangerous or something I’m sure he’ll forcefully eject them. Then we’ll need to figure out a way to mitigate the damage.”

He paused there and bit his lip, well aware that neither of them had much experience in politics, megalomaniacs, or subtle manipulation. They couldn't physically enter the other dimension, so Wei Wuxian's power, Lan Wangji's cultivation, and their combined reputations were useless.

They needed someone crafty. Someone who could manipulate a situation without any resources but their mouth, and someone who could remain nearly unnoticed all the while.

Someone who had experience taking down power-hungry chief cultivators.

Wei Wuxian's gaze slowly fell to the right, where a stack of papers sat on the table. They were the preparations Lan Wangji was doing so that someone else could take over as Chief Cultivator once he stepped down.

"Wei Ying?" Lan Wangji asked.

"Say, Lan Zhan?"

"Mn?"

"Do you think you could help me arrange a private meeting with Nie Huaisang?"

"Of course."

"Awesome. Guess we really will be conquering another dimension," he laughed. "Why not? Sounds like fun."

"Hello, Wen-gongzi."

"A-ah. Hello!" Wen Ning squeaked, hurriedly bowing far lower than what was probably appropriate for someone of his rank. As expected, the watermelon seller looked extremely uncomfortable when she saw.

Wen Ning hurried to right himself, blushing furiously.

"...Are you here to pick up some watermelon for Young Master Wei?" the woman asked, tucking a strand of hair behind her ear. When Wen Ning nodded with a bright red flush spreading to his neck, she laughed and gestured for him to pick a few from her collection. It was a reassuring sort of laughter. The kind that promised he wouldn't be judged over his breach of decorum.

(It was strange to hear it. In Qishan, no one would ever dare laugh with a cultivator from the Great Sects.)

After much deliberation, Wen Ning managed to pick the watermelons he wanted and paid the woman. He began his journey back, praying desperately that Acting Sect Leader Wen Xu hadn't come for another surprise visit while he was gone. He didn't want to interact with someone that scary, but he didn't want to leave Wei Wuxian to handle it by himself either. He just-

“Hey, Wen-gongzi!” a male basket weaver called out. “Are you on your way back to Wei-gongzi?”

“Ah, yes!”

“My wife made some extra tanghulu today. Take some home for him as thanks, okay?”

“Huh?”

“The Yunmeng Jiang Sect helped my niece a few days ago. It’s the least I can do.”

And that was just the beginning. As soon as the townsfolk were made aware that Wen Ning was picking up things for Wei Wuxian, he was swarmed.

“Here, take a bag of nuts!”

“I got some nice paper he could use!”

“I made a few extra rattle drums. Take some back for the kids over there!”

“A team led by Wei-gongzi saved my little sister from a yao yesterday. Take this flute I made-”

“And these books-”

“And these cards-”

“Dolls-”

“Plums-”

“Peaches-”

“Ink-”

“Th-thank you!” Wen Ning whimpered, trying to not tip over the literal mountain of presents in his arms. The sheer friendliness of people in Yumeng was terrifying!

Then again, it wasn’t just that it was Yunmeng. After the “great sleep” — as the common folk had started calling it — all sects suffered. The Great Sects were left without their leaders, and the minor sects were too reliant on the larger ones to function normally. That was why Wei Wuxian’s quick return to action was so monumental. People of all professions had flocked to Yunmeng, and continued to do so even after the other great sects recovered. If Wen Ning hadn’t wanted to be accosted by the citizens, he shouldn’t have mentioned Wei Wuxian’s name.

“I’m back,” Wen Ning greeted shyly, stepping into Wei Wuxian’s labspace.

Immediately, two shadows darted forward.

“Wen-gongzi, Wen-gongzi, what’s all that?” A-Yue, Wei Wuxian’s helper, asked. Her brother looked up at the pile of toys with excitement shining in his eyes.

“Er — we can look through it later?” Wen Ning tried. “Not all of this is for you-”

“But we can help sort them, right?” A-Lu asked. “I wanna see.”

“It-it depends on what Wei-gongzi says?”

“I’ll go ask!” A-Yue volunteered, slipping past Wen Ning to run out the door.

“Wait, he’s not in his lab?” Wen Ning inquired.

“No, he said he was going to try something in the back field,” A-Lu reported.

Wen Ning froze.

“Wait!” he called out with uncharacteristic volume. “Wait, don’t. I’ll go. Didn’t he tell you not to go there while he’s working?”

A-Yue finally stopped, turning back to pout, “But we need to ask.”

“I’ll ask,” Wen Ning instantly volunteered, putting down the watermelons and presents. “Guard these for me?”

““We won’t let anyone touch them!”” the two preteens declared, saluting Wen Ning. Once he was sure they were serious about staying, Wen Ning sprinted towards the field.

When Wen Ning had first met Wei Wuxian, he had been apprehensive. No matter how nice the other boy seemed, it was impossible to forget that Wei Wuxian was the only one who had been able to wake someone up from the great sleep. When Wen Xu sent Wen Ning to Yunmeng Jiang, he had been terrified.

What kind of person could the Wei Wuxian be?

It took him less than a day to realize that the answer to his question was a young, inventive, desperate genius. One who was more than willing to sacrifice hours of sleep for his experiments.

Once he’d realized that, Wen Ning had tried to help. He had offered assistance, and soon the hidden reservations Wei Wuxian seemed to have about the politics of his new job went away. Wei Wuxian’s smiles became more genuine, and his stress faded.

(It also helped that he had just learned that the Jiangs weren’t technically dead. Yet.)

Wen Ning had slowly begun coaxing Wei Wuxian into getting more sleep and food, tempting him with precut fruit so that he could keep working while he ate. And that had helped.

Somewhat.

Yes, everyone inside the simulation claimed to be fine, but there was no way for them to know whether the watchers would experience any physical consequences for staying inside longer.

(Wen Ning wished his sister was here. Wen Qing would know what to do.)

(From what Wei Wuxian had said, he missed his Shijie just as much.)

Two days ago, Wen Ning and Wei Wuxian had been talking to each other about their next steps. Neither of them completely trusted Mo Xuanyu, so Wei Wuxian was desperate to know more about the simulation.

'How would we do that?' Wen Ning had asked. 'He's the one who made it.'

'I know, but… I think I'm starting to understand the basic principles of it. I just need to start trying to recreate it so I have something to test on. If I just knew more about manipulating resentful energy….'

'But… but Young Master Wei, I-I know what you're doing now is fine — I mean we have to do it — but any more than this is — I mean — this is resentful energy!'

'I know.'

They both knew that. However, as more time went by, their imaginations had run wild with the ways the great sleep could go horribly, horribly wrong.

'Could cause health issues,' Wei Wuxian had said a few hours after the resentful energy conversation.

And half an hour after that, Wen Ning had wondered aloud, 'I wonder if staying in there longer will make it harder for them to get out.'

And the next morning, 'M-maybe we should do another check on Wen-gongzi. Just to see if the simulation's left any lingering effects on him. If anything happens to his son, His Excellency will….'

And an hour after that, 'What if their bodies decay?'

'What if they get sick?'

'What if Mo Xuanyu was lying-'

'What if it wasn't really them-'

'What if they don't wake up?'

As soon as that thought entered their minds, it had become hard to think of anything else.

Then, last night, Wei Wuxian had met up with Wen Ning.

‘I need more information. I’m… going to try to manipulate resentful energy.’

‘Haven't we already been doing that?’

‘Yeah, but only in controlled situations with Mo Xuanyu’s instruction. If I want to actually understand it, I need to find some natural resentment and control that.’

‘But-but Wei-gongzi, that’s… any more than what we’ve done will be demonic cultivation!’

‘I know. But if I don’t act now-’

‘No, please. Mo Xuanyu said-’

‘And I’m just supposed to trust him?! If the Jiangs die because I was… if they… it won’t happen. I won’t let it.’

‘But-’

‘My lab is too small. I guess I could go to the field out back. Maybe-’

‘No, please!’ Wen Ning had begged. ‘It’s too risky.’

After that, Wei Wuxian had dropped the subject.

But he hadn’t agreed.

And now, he was at the field, having told everyone else to avoid going there.

Wen Ning slipped through the disciples in the crowded training grounds and back into a hallway, apologizing profusely as he went. Soon, he reached a deserted stretch of land between the training grounds and an abandoned field. The second he swung open the gate between them, he saw Wei Wuxian.

Collapsed on the ground.

“Young Master Wei!” Wen Ning shouted, running over. “Young Master Wei!”

He checked for a pulse.

It was there, but it was far too fast.

Was he breathing? Yes, but weakly.

Wei Wuxian was shaking. Why? Wen Ning didn’t know.

Wei Wuxian’s veins were bulging. How? Wen Ning didn’t know.

Then, Wen Ning looked over, and saw a decapitated fierce corpse lying on the ground.

Its lingering resentful energy surged into Wei Wuxian.

(Why wasn't his sister here?!)

"Wen Ning?" a quiet voice croaked out.

"Wei-gongzi!"

"Hi. Please don't shout."

"Sorry. Sorry. I know. I know. I shouldn't have left. I know, I'm sor-"

"Hey, no need for apologies. Aren't you supposed to be a valiant hero rescuing a pitiful beauty? The hero isn't supposed to panic once he's done," Wei Wuxian laughed, slurring his words together in his exhaustion.

"I'm sorry-"

He cut off as he felt Wei Wuxian shake, coughing out a clump of blood. Wen Ning immediately looked around for anything he could use to help.

"No need for that, I'm fine," Wei Wuxian assured him unconvincingly, eyes fluttering shut in his exhaustion. "I was just… stupid."

"What… what happened?"

"Turns out the arrays controlling Mo Xuanyu's simulation helped a lot more than we thought. I tried manipulating the resentful energy in a fierce corpse, but that ended up being a bit harder than I expected. Our experiments have brought us into contact with higher concentrations of resentful energy than it had, but it was always… tame, I guess. This was wild. Mo Xuanyu said he's the one who figured out how to manipulate resentful energy originally, right?"

"Right."

"God, he must be absolutely insane."

Wen Ning was inclined to agree. If Wei Wuxian was struggling with demonic cultivation, then he couldn't imagine the kind of person Mo Xuanyu was.

"You… you're okay, though?" Wen Ning asked hesitantly.

"Yeah, fine. I wasn't expecting that much recoil, but I'd brought Suibian so it wasn't too hard to destroy the corpse when things started going south. Sadly, that didn't stop the backlash," he laughed. "Backlash. Lash back. Like Madam Yu. She'll definitely whip me half to death when she finds out I'm doing this. You'll save me, right, my valiant hero?"

Wen Ning frowned and moved to check if Wei Wuxian had a fever.

He did.

It wasn't a bad one, but the fact that someone as powerful as Wei Wuxian was showing a reaction concerned Wen Ning greatly.

"Hey, Wen Ning," Wei Wuxian sat up, then tilted over as nausea settled in.

"Wei-gongzi, you-"

"I'm fine, I'm fine. Hey, could you grab me another corpse? I think I'd be able to do a lot better this time if-"

"No."

That single word was so stern that Wei Wuxian jumped slightly in surprise. He blinked up, wondering if a third person was present because surely that unflinching voice couldn't have been Wen Ning's.

"I-"

"No."

This time, having seen Wen Ning's mouth move, Wei Wuxian had no doubts as to who said it.

"What do you mean, 'no?'"

"Wei-gongzi! You can't do that again!"

"I can't?" he repeated, making Wen Ning back off slightly. "And what? You think this will just fix itself?"

"Of course not!" Wen Ning shook his head.

"Then-"

"No!" he shouted, and this time Wei Wuxian was the one to back off at the exclamation. "I know it's not going to fix itself, but you still can't do this! It's not worth it!"

"Not worth it?" Wei Wuxian growled. "Uncle Jiang could be dying! Shijie and Jiang Cheng aren't here, and Madam Yu and-and I will not stand by and let them-"

"And what will happen if you get yourself killed?" Wen Ning shouted, trying to force his eyes to not well up in tears. He was non confrontational; he didn't like arguing like this.

But if he didn't-

"I had it under control," Wei Wuxian responded.

"No," Wen Ning shook his head. "No you didn't. We don't know anything about this-"

"And that won't change unless-"

“You can’t! I-I’m worried too!” Wen Ning hurriedly wiped his tears. “I want my sister back! She’s all I’ve got! But if you get yourself killed trying to figure this out — or even just what happened now-”

“I’m fine.”

“No, you’re injured. Right now, the whole cultivation world will fall apart if something happens to you! Who are you expecting to run Yunmeng Jiang if you’re out of commission? I-what do you think will happen to the people in Yunmeng if you’re not here? They need you! Please, just stop!”

Wei Wuxian frowned and moved to speak, but faltered when Wen Ning glared right back. For a moment, Wei Wuxian honestly didn’t recognize the uncompromising boy in front of him.

(Wen Ning, channeling his sister as much as he could, tried to stop his hands from trembling as he continued to stare Wei Wuxian down. If there was ever a time to be like Wen Qing, it was now.)

“The Jiangs will need a place to come back to. Please… please don’t.”

At long last, Wei Wuxian broke eye contact.

“...Okay,” he agreed. “Okay, I won’t do it again. I promise.”

At those words, all the tension left Wen Ning’s body. He felt himself tip over and laid down on the ground. A moment later, Wei Wuxian joined him.

The pair breathed in unison, staring up at the passing clouds. When a vaguely triangle shaped one passed by, Wen Ning remembered what he had left for.

“W-Wei-gongzi, there’s some watermelon in your lab. Do you-I mean... I can bring it out for you?”

“Nah, we can eat it together later,” Wei Wuxian smiled, easily covering up his lingering bitterness at how much Wen Ning had sounded like Jiang Yanli in that moment.

(If it meant making sure the clan leaders were safe, Wei Wuxian would gladly endanger himself a hundred times over. Wen Ning had a point regarding Wei Wuxian’s current method, but Wei Wuxian was far from done with this.)

The longer the break went on, the tenser the watchers got. They knew Wei Wuxian would come out of the Burial Mounds even stronger than he was before, but the serious air remained.

Yes, the simulated Wei Wuxian was surviving, but no one could view it as a victory.

(However, they weren’t viewing it as a monstrous crime either. It was desperation, pure and simple. No one could truly blame him for that.)

(And no one would relax until they saw the future Wei Wuxian finally enter a place where he could close his eyes for two seconds without being pulled off a cliff.)

Then, finally, a pop crackled, and the world switched to a battleground.

With a melancholy voice, Sizhui narrated, "When the Sunshot Campaign started, the Qinghe Nie Clan, the Lanling Jin Clan, the Gusu Lan Clan, and the Yunmeng Jiang Clan led 8,000 cultivators to war."

Wen Chao scowled at the mention of the war. It simply didn't make sense that his sect would lose! Yes, he had seen Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation in the future segments, but that didn't seem too bad.

If Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen really thought their puny clans could stand up against the Wen, they would soon be taught their places.

As if aware of what Wen Chao thought, Sizhui continued, "When the campaign first began, no one took them seriously. Sect Leader Wen spoke up, saying that the Lanling Jin Clan was on the fence. It wanted to take part as well, but if they suffered more defeats than victories, they would soon back off and likely return to hugging the Wen Sect's legs and getting back in their good graces."

As each word progressed, an embarrassed flush spread across Jin Zixuan's face like wildfire, turning his pale skin scarlet. He looked down, not seeing the pitying looks Lan Wangji, Jiang Cheng, and Nie Huaisang shot him.

Jin Guangshan just laughed nervously, not making eye contact with any leaders.

"Next, there was the Qinghe Nie Clan's leader, who Wen Ruohan claimed was so stiff that he'd easily snap in half."

The glare Nie Mingjue sent the Wens' way left Wen Chao shaking in his seat, but Wen Ruohan merely acknowledged it with a raised eyebrow. He was inclined to believe what his other self had said, but, from the way that Sizhui boy was phrasing it, it appeared that his initial assessment was wrong.

Curious.

"The GusuLan Sect had been burnt to ruins," Sizhui continued. "Although Lan Xichen had inherited the position of Sect Leader, Wen Ruohan felt that, as he was only a junior, he wouldn't be able to do much."

The Lans acknowledged the statement with the utmost indifference.

Finally, "The most laughable one was the Yunmeng Jiang Sect, the people of which had either been killed or scattered, leaving only Jiang Cheng. Even younger than Lan Xichen, Wen Ruohan considered him no more than a child born yesterday."

This time, even though the Jiangs joined Nie Mingjue in glaring, Wen Chao couldn't hold back a small smirk at the reminder of what he had been able to do to their head disciple.

“Jiang Cheng had no one in his hands, yet he still dared to call himself sect leader, holding up the flag of rebellion as he recruited new disciples.”

On the side, Nie Huaisang hummed to himself and wished he had his fan to hide behind as he worked through his thoughts.

‘I’m sure it being a war made it easier to gain new members, but it’s still surprising that they managed to become a Great Sect again,’ Nie Huaisang tilted his head. ‘Jiang-xiong supposedly led the attack on Wei-xiong, didn’t he? That’s only a few years from now. How did he regain that much money?’

As much as he wanted to credit the new Sect Leader Jiang with that accomplishment, he couldn’t help but wonder how the necromancer on his side had contributed.

(Still, Wei Wuxian was only one person. How much of an impact could he have on the war?)

“Nevertheless,” Sizhui continued. “Everyone who stood on the Wen side took the Sunshot Campaign as a joke. The Qishan Wen Sect was so powerful. It would be almost impossible to overthrow the Nevernight. Wen Ruohan called the rebellion nothing to be feared.”

The battle scenery faltered, and switched to show Lan Xichen fighting back to back with another man whose physical features were scarily reminiscent of Jin Zixuan.

But the boy’s eyes were the exact same shade as her son’s.

(And her husband’s.)

Anger surged within her at the realization. She didn’t know for sure, but, knowing Jin Guangshan, it was more likely than not. She growled, ready to curse him and his bastard child to the ends of the Earth.

However, a moment later, Wei Wuxian’s terrified face staring up at Madam Yu flashed into her mind, and she felt her anger do a strange flip in her stomach.

A moment later, Sizhui’s voice continued, “In Langya, Qilu, the Lanling Jin Clan began losing ground.”

The Jin-looking boy frowned deeper as he surveyed the war around him.

Jin Zixuan internally cursed.

“And the Yunmeng Jiang Clan had already been destroyed.”

The scene changed to show Jiang Cheng bowing before incense. The determination in his eyes was the opposite of helplessness.

Jiang Yanli moved closer to Jiang Cheng, sharing a smile with him.

“Fortunately, the situation in Jianghuai was somewhat stable. Lan Wangji lead cultivators to Jingchu to reinforce, and, in Hejian, the Qinghe Nie clan won the battle!”

Satisfaction radiated off Nie Mingjue’s smug grin.

(Why didn’t they stand up earlier? Fight back sooner? Stop the Wens before it got to this point?)

“In Yunmeng and Hejian, several outposts had been taken over by the Qinghe Nie and Gusu Lan Sects. Then, one month after the start of the Sunshot Campaign, Nie Mingjue scored a crucial victory. He cut the head off Wen Ruohan’s eldest son, Wen Xu, hung it on the front line, and sneered at the Wen Clan’s weakness.”

For the first time, Wen Ruohan did a double take.

Yes, Wen Xu wasn’t anywhere near as powerful as Wen Zhuliu or Wen Ruohan himself (and Wen Ruohan was confident he could win the war even without his eldest), but-

His heir had died. Clearly, he had underestimated Nie Mingjue.

His gaze fell on Sect Leader Nie, calm and assessing.

Although Wen Ruohan would never be considered an especially affectionate father, he did care (for his own legacy, if nothing else). To have lost the main piece of that-

If he’d had demonic cultivation on his side — something powerful enough to demolish a goddess which dozens of cultivators had been ineffectual against — then that would never have happened. If he’d had demonic cultivation — an additional powerhouse which would allow both young masters Wens to be guarded by a game changer — then nothing would touch his heirs.

(If Wei Wuxian had been a Wen, Wen Ruohan would have won the war.)

(Instead, the boy had cut out his future for no reason.)

“Outrageous!” Wen Qing’s voice proclaimed, slamming a message against the table. Around the watchers, the world shifted into the Yiling supervisory office.

Wen Ning watched his sister worriedly.

At the sight of Wen Ning’s unharmed body, Jiang Yanli lit up and turned to Wen Qing, excitedly and silently pointing that out. He wasn’t the Ghost General yet!

Wen Qing rolled her eyes slightly, but smiled as well.

(She doubted there would be much more cause for happiness once the simulation returned to Wei Wuxian.)

“...Jie, what did the letter say?”

“Wen Ruohan has ordered all offshoots and subdivisions of the Qishan Wen clan to join the fight. Any who defy this order will be punished.”

‘Getting frustrated, it seems,’ Nie Mingjue’s smirk widened.

Silently, Nie Huaisang worriedly looked back and forth between Nie Mingjue and Wen Ruohan, praying desperately that nothing would happen.

On the other hand, Wen Ruohan remained confident. His son was an enormous loss — one that would not happen to the real one — but it could be worked around. Yunmeng had fallen in large part due to Wen Zhuliu’s existence. So long as he and Wen Zhuliu were still alive, there would be a way to turn the war around.

Terrified and distraught, Wen Ning asked, “So… we’re going?”

“No.”

Wen Qing stood up, looking forward with a determined gaze.

“Our family name may be Wen, but we’ve always devoted ourselves to medicine. That means we don’t kill people. Remember, we’re doctors. We save lives. Even if we must go to war, we will not harm others.”

After a moment’s pause, Wen Ning nodded and said, “Alright. I understand.”

At that moment, Nie Mingjue’s smirk faltered. When Wen Ruohan had ordered them to go to war, Nie Mingjue had pitied them. It was pressing circumstances — he could see that now — and what else could they do?

Refuse to kill anyone, apparently.

For Wen Qing and Wen Qionglin to have the guts to defy Wen Ruohan as openly as they could-

(Hadn’t he promised to kill every Wen just a few days ago? Could he really take something like that back?)

(Then again, Lan Qiren had also sworn that Wei Wuxian’s demonic cultivation meant the boy was irredeemable, so maybe he wasn’t the only one who regretted speaking too soon.)

However, even after agreeing, Wen Ning grew nervous again.

“But Wen… Wen Chao….”

The disdain in Wen Qing’s expression seemed to triple, “Wen Chao? I don’t think he has time to come and bother us.”

And, with those ominous words, the world faded to black.

Huffing in indignation, Wen Chao glared, “Well, you can be sure that I’ll have time to check on you this time around!”

It was almost amusing how he assumed that Wen Qing would be allowed to live in the Wen Sect at all.

The world changed again, this time switching to a different base of operations in the Wen Clan’s territory.

“Yunmeng Jiang Clan? Lotus Cove?” a drunk voice mumbled. “I joined Wen-er-gongzi and devastated them all!”

The growl Madam Yu gave sent shivers up Nie Huaisang’s spine.

“That poor bastard Jiang Cheng. His golden core was crushed by Wen Zhuliu! Disciple of a gentry family? What a joke!”

His drunken fellow soldiers laughed with him.

“It’s fine, A-Cheng,” Jiang Yanli whispered to her glaring brother. “A-Xian returned your core, remember?”

Her words were meant to be reassuring, but only served to remind the both of them of what was happening to Wei Wuxian.

(Why hadn’t the simulation shown him yet? Where was he?)

“He was a piece of junk after all!”

The disgracefulness and crudeness of the scene before them — tied with the words themselves — left the three Lans present stepping back slightly in disgust. Even Lan Xichen’s ever present smile seemed to falter.

More alcohol was chugged down, until one of the Wen soldiers stepped forward and inquired, “Boss, boss, what about that one… what about that arrogant young master? What was his name again?”

If they couldn’t recall the name of Yunmeng Jiang’s head disciple, then they were well and truly wasted. Wen Qing breathed out sharply through her nose, infuriated by what she saw.

Slurring through his sips, another soldier suggested, “Wei… Wei Wuxian?”

Exclamations of agreement rang out.

“Yeah, I remember his name!”

“Wei Wuxian!”

“Yes, that’s it,” they laughed.

“Gongzi? That’s too big of a title for him! He was just the son of a servant!”

How many times had Madam Yu shouted those very same words? And yet, somehow, it seemed almost laughable to hear them now, knowing what the Yiling Patriarch would be.

As the conversation continued, Lan Wangji felt his carefully-maintained composure dip into rage.

“You know-you know I was there when we found him! We beat him up!”

Lan Wangji’s gaze turned dark.

“Like he was a sandbag!”

His teeth grit together.

“Too bad you weren’t there!” the first Wen declared. “You didn’t see the look on his face when he was thrown down!”

At the reminder of what had happened, Lan Wangji’s breathing stopped.

“He’ll never get to stand up so arrogantly ever again! Our boss is the best, he-”

Just then, someone stepped onto the platform the Wens were discussing on. As wind swept by, the man’s pure white clothes fluttered in the wind, and the forehead ribbon on his head danced gracefully.

He frowned deeper.

A wave of spiritual energy shot out of his hand, sending the drunk soldiers flying back. Two crashed onto the ground, and the rest scrambled for their swords. Before they could act, however, chords struck out and pinned them to the floor by their necks, leaving them either dead or incapacitated in less than a second.

Lan Qiren nodded at his nephew in approval.

Jiang Cheng flew down to join them, looking back and forth between the soldiers and Lan Wangji with confusion. A few seconds later, two dozen Lan disciples finally ran up around the two, quickly securing the platform and outpost.

‘My soldiers were unhealthily overconfident,’ Wen Ruohan realized. ‘I’ll fix that when we get out.’

Slowly, one of the knocked-down Wens began struggling up.

“Kneel,” Lan Wangji commanded.

The ones who could move fell to their knees.

“Getting revenge for what they said about your husband?” Nie Huaisang asked with a mischievous grin. To his great surprise, Lan Wangji merely turned a blank, unimpressed stare on him, not reacting with the abject embarrassment Nie Huaisang had been hoping for.

(Lan Wangji would never forgive his adult self for dragging Wei Wuxian back to the Cloud Recesses, but the feelings of his 18 year old self were now undeniable.)

Both Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng stared down at the Wen soldiers with the utmost disdain. In Jiang Cheng’s clenched fists, Zidian sparked dangerously.

Forcing himself to remain composed, Lan Wangji looked down at the kneeling Wen soldiers and asked, “Where is Wei Ying?”

The soldiers remained silent. They knew all too well that the true answer would most likely result in their deaths by Zidian’s whip.

Jiang Cheng didn’t bother to hide his curse.

Soon after, the Lan disciples marched in formation, bringing the new prisoners of war back to camp. All the while, Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng stood on the sidelines, overlooking the operation.

Then, ten Lan disciples walked briskly toward them.

“Lan-er-gongzi!” the frontmost one greeted, holding out his arms to display what he was carrying.

It was Bichen.

Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan breathed out sighs of relief, seeing their swords among those brought over. Even Nie Huaisang, who never used his sword, felt comforted by the idea that his other-self would get his returned.

(If nothing else, it would probably help Nie Mingjue stop panicking every time he left Huaisang alone.)

Cautiously — almost disbelievingly — Sect Leader Jiang Cheng reached out and picked up Sandu.

“Lan-er-gongzi…” another sword was held up. “This one belongs to Wei-gongzi.”

The stern expression on Lan Wangji’s face faltered for a moment as he looked down at Suibian. As more time passed without confirmation regarding Wei Wuxian’s whereabouts, the chances of his survival diminished considerably.

Finally, Lan Wangji reached forward and took the offered blade, staring down at it as if he was silently begging it to answer his questions.

The real Lan Wangji understood his other-self’s feelings completely.

‘Where’s Wei Ying?’ he mentally asked. ‘If he’s still in the Burial Mounds, why isn’t the simulation going back to him? What’s happening? Is he still okay?’

As soon as he thought that, he frowned at his own stupidity.

(No, of course Wei Wuxian wasn’t okay. Lan Wangji knew what he was going through. No one could come out of that unchanged.)

Then, the virtual Lan Wangji moved. Reaching forward, he grabbed onto the other end of Suibian and tried opening it.

Nothing happened.

“What?” Lan Qiren asked, making his younger nephew look up.

Lan Wangji tried again, but it remained stuck.

“It sealed itself,” Wen Ruohan realized, eyes widening in shock.

“That’s impossible,” Lan Qiren instantly refuted.

“The evidence is right there-”

“He’s a teenager,” Lan Qiren countered. “Not even twenty yet! His sword can’t have-that’s just not….”

“Not realistic?” Nie Huaisang suggested with a grin. “On the contrary, I think this should be expected of the to-be Yiling Patriarch~”

Lan Qiren opened his mouth to disagree, only to close it again and rub his eyes tiredly, sitting back down. Although he would never admit it, he had no counter to that.

However, Huaisang’s words also filled the people present with a sinking sensation of dread. How much longer would they still be able to say to-be Yiling Patriarch?

How different would Wei Wuxian be once he got out?

Those same thoughts were running through the simulated Lan Wangji as well.

‘Wei Ying,’ his mind whispered. ‘Where are you?’

“He’ll be okay,” Lan Xichen whispered, leaning close to his distressed younger brother. “He’ll get out.”

“I know,” Lan Wangji responded. “But who knows what’s happening to him now.”

This time, it was Ouyang Zizhen’s all-too cheerful voice that explained, “Two months later.”

Absolute silence followed.

Night fell, and the scene changed to a large town.

"...What did he just say?" Jiang Fengmian asked.

"Months?"

"Two? No, Wen Xu's death was already a month later. So-"

"Even if Wei Wuxian's escaped by now… he's spent three months in those conditions-"

Nie Huaisang couldn't finish.

After all, it seemed fairly clear that what Wen Chao had done to Wei Wuxian was far worse than even tortured prisoners of war would experience. Humans simply weren't physically capable of doing what those spirits had done.

Three months. Alone. Attacked on all sides at all times in every imaginable way — without food or water or shelter or blankets or heat or allies-

How was Wei Wuxian supposed to rejoin society after that?

"Shongling, this time!" Ouyang Zizhen explained. A lush forest shifted into existence.

In the shade of one of the thickest trees, Jiang Cheng stood, waiting for someone. The sound of footsteps came from his left, and he turned to see Lan Wangji approaching.

Many people glanced back and forth between the boys' real counterparts, wondering why they were meeting up. They had been seen together earlier, but no one would have suspected that they were regularly doing missions together.

"Lan-er-gongzi," Jiang Cheng greeted coldly.

Lan Wangji solemnly nodded and responded, "Sect Leader Jiang."

Then, without another word, the two took off on their swords, a group of cultivators following behind them. They flew through the air for a while before Lan Wangji's gaze drifted to the additional sword at Jiang Wanyin's hip.

Suibian had been transferred back into Jiang Cheng's hold, it seemed.

After a moment, Lan Wangji forced himself to look forward again and asked, "Has Wei Ying been found yet?"

Jiang Cheng turned to him, surprise painted across his face.

The real Jiang Cheng supposed that his other-self must still be under the impression that Lan Wangji hated Wei Wuxian. He wondered how long it would take the simulated Jiang Cheng to learn the truth.

Finally, Jiang Cheng looked down and responded, "No."

Despite having expected the answer, it was still crushing to hear.

After another pause, Jiang Cheng added, "The people on my side haven't gotten news of him yet, but, when he returns, I know he'll come to find me. After he appears, I'll return his sword."

At those words, Jin Zixuan couldn't help but remember the way the 13 years later adult versions had reunited. Zixuan was sure they were misunderstanding something — there was simply no way Jiang Cheng could actually want to torture his shixiong — but the irony was still there.

The future Wei Wuxian had quite clearly not wanted to find the future's Sect Leader Jiang, after all.

(When he glanced over and noticed the Jiang siblings realizing the same, Jin Zixuan silently moved to sit even closer to them.)

Accompanied by a group of Lan and new Jiang disciples, Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng arrived at a supervisory office. They split up, Lan Wangji taking a single Lan disciple with them to infiltrate and Jiang Cheng circling around the back.

The two Lans leapt over the outermost wall and looked down.

Below was a sea of corpses.

Jiang Yanli flinched back, felt her knees grow weak, and collapsed into her chair.

(She recognized this pressure. It was nothing compared to the Burial Mounds, but there was undeniably resentful energy there.)

(And that could only be the work of one person.)

"What happened?" the Lan disciple accompanying Lan Wangji asked. His question was more than justified.

Even at a quick glance, the carnage was clear. One Wen disciple had been impaled by a flagpost; another stabbed in the eye; another had his limbs ripped out; another was beaten until he wanted to die. And those were the cleanest deaths on display.

All dead; all different ways.

Not to mention the ocean of resentful energy spilling out of the place.

'It would be one thing if that was a town of civilians,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'But this is a Wen outpost. Those are soldiers lying there. How on earth could someone have killed each one in different ways without letting any escape?'

Despite it being his cultivators there, Wen Ruohan had to admit he was impressed.

(And, given the cause, he was fairly certain he knew who had done it.)

While the two Lans were still staring in shock, Jiang Cheng, who had entered from the other side, stepped forward and kicked a propped-up Wen to the ground.

'Desecration of the dead,' Lan Qiren thought. 'I guess Wei Wuxian isn't the only one who's past the point of caring about that.'

Jiang Cheng laughed, "I guess tonight's mission has already been done for us."

"Sect Leader," his partner greeted. "All of the Wen Clan's cultivators are dead. They've all died in different ways. But it's… strange."

Lan Wangji glanced over.

"Most of them were scared to death."

Everyone did a double take.

"Did… what?"

Now that they took a closer look at the bodies, it was clear that the disciple was correct. Somehow, at least half of the disciples had died of fright.

This was a power unlike anything they had experienced before.

Jin Guangshan laughed half in disbelief and half in fascination. His excitement only grew.

"...What do you mean they were 'scared to death?'" Jiang Cheng demanded. "Who did this?"

The watchers had a sneaking suspicion they knew the answer to that.

The very first thing they had been shown was the Yiling Patriarch, using Chenqing to take on an entire squadron by himself. But, to have fallen so low as to torture?

That didn't seem like Wei Wuxian, but after what had happened in the Burial Mounds, no one could say they were surprised.

"Sect Leader, we haven't found anything," someone else reported. As Jiang Cheng continued to converse with them, Lan Wangji stood on the side, staring at a paper talisman he had found on the walls.

He narrowed his eyes.

Several people stepped forward, observing the protective talismans which had been peeled off the wall.

They were still intact.

And yet the resentful energy here was impossible to ignore.

Just as the watchers realized that, Jiang Cheng gave a smug chuckle, "It's okay. They killed Wen Chao's men. They must be on our side."

Right as Jiang Cheng was about to turn and leave, he noticed Lan Wangji's distraction. Approaching, he also looked down at the red painted talisman on yellow paper. Although the talisman seemed normal at first glance, after taking a closer look at it, Jiang Cheng realized that there were certain things wrong with it.

Lan Qiren frowned, finding it strangely familiar but not sure why.

"Too many," Lan Wangji observed.

With that, it finally clicked.

"Wait, then that's-"

"A spirit attraction flag!"

As the two simulated cultivators turned to each other in equal confusion, the watchers stepped back in shock.

"It's only been three months," Lan Xichen breathed out. "He's already made them?"

"I mean… I guess he already had the idea…. But still…."

Madam Jin shook her head in disbelief, "They do say desperation is the mother of invention."

And Wei Wuxian had been very, very desperate.

"Sect Leader!" someone else shouted, running into the room. "Someone spotted the Wen Clan's army just south of us! It's headed this way!"

"Burn the grain and supplies," Jiang Cheng ordered. "Then everyone evacuate!"

"Yes!"

Three simultaneous proud smiles were directed Jiang Cheng's way, and he felt himself flush in embarrassment under his family's silent praise. When both Jin Zixuan and Lan Wangji nodded to him (with Nie Huaisang even giving a silent cheer), Jiang Cheng felt his bones disappear and his body turned into an embarrassed pile of goop on the floor.

Luckily for Jiang Cheng, immediately after this, the scene changed again.

"Fort Shayang," Zizhen explained.

Nie Mingjue felt himself tense in anticipation as the scene formed before them.

Outside a moonlit building, crickets sang ominously into the night.

"Have you heard? Everyone in the supervisory office in Jiangling was killed!"

“What?”

“Jiangling, Mianyang, Shongling. They were cursed. The offices of the Wen Clan are cursed by demons!”

“Three offices?” Lan Xichen gasped out.

“I see,” Wen Ruohan hummed. “So he can do that as many times as he wants to. He’s practically a sect all on his own.”

Wen Chao paled, remembering who made it possible for Wei Wuxian to become so powerful.

After a pause, the second person said, “I heard someone say that Lan Wangji did that. That they were trying to disrupt our moral-”

“Bullshit! You’ve seen the bodies at the outpost in Mianyang. Was that something a human could do?”

For a moment, Jiang Cheng wanted to laugh at their ignorance. They were so horribly wrong; Wei Wuxian was a human who could do anything!

But he shouldn’t have had to do that.

(Besides, after the Burial Mounds, who knew how much of Wei Wuxian’s humanity was left. He knew his shixiong; Wei Wuxian would never kill Jiang Yanli. However, the Yiling patriarch — the demon who crawled out of the Burial Mounds in search of revenge — might.)

The two brought their voices even lower.

“Anyway, we can’t stay in the Wen Clan anymore. I don’t want to die.”

If that was the impact Wei Wuxian left after just three battles….

Once Wei Wuxian officially joined the Sunshot Campaign, soldiers must have defected in droves to avoid an encounter with the Mo Dao Zu Shi.

(If he’d been on the Wen Clan’s side, it would be the Sunshot Campaign’s forces running away.)

Just then, the two soldiers turned a corner.

“Stop!” they ordered, seeing a Wen robed figure in the distance. The figure didn’t reply, but, soon after, it was followed by another. Then two more. Then three.

The two Wen patrollers began backing up nervously.

“We… we-”

A sword stabbed through his chest, impaling him from behind.

His partner's screams were silenced a moment later.

Jiang Yanli flinched, then unconsciously stepped closer to Jin Zixuan.

He glared as the simulated attacker revealed himself.

"How dare they try to desert us!" Wen Chao demanded, his expression overflowing with rage. "Anyone who spreads rumors, disobeys orders, or runs away will be killed just like them!"

'If Wei Wuxian had been on our side from the beginning, this wouldn't be happening,' Wen Chao thought, determination growing.

Behind him, Wang Lingjiao looked down at their bodies, hesitation flashing across her face. It wasn't guilt or remorse or sympathy, but rather a selfish, animalistic terror.

His other-self didn't notice, but the real Wen Chao did. After seeing her for so long, he had to admit he was starting to grow tired of her. Maybe he wouldn't go out of his way to find her once he got out.

(He would probably have his hands full training Wei Wuxian anyways.)

Next, Wen Chao turned an annoyed glare on his intimidated third in command and asked, "Any sign of the rebel base?"

"Wen-er-gongzi, we haven't found it yet-"

"Well, hurry up and find it!"

"But-but His Excellency ordered us to go to the main battlefield in Qinghe-"

Wen Chao smacked him to the floor.

"Chao-er," Wen Ruohan's voice reverberated across the room.

"Y-yes, Father?"

"I'm the one who gives orders around here!" Wen Chao's simulated-self shouted.

"This will not be tolerated. Am I understood?"

"Yes… yes, Father."

"Get a move on!" he continued. "If you can't find it, don't you dare come back!"

"Yes!" the man scampered off. Rather than her usual smug sadism, Wang Lingjiao was looking away from the scene with a concerned expression.

'What?' Madam Yu thought scathingly. 'You don't have the guts to face the consequences of your own actions?'

“She better not try and run away,” Jiang Cheng growled. “I’m not through with her yet.”

“And what can you do?” Madam Yu snapped back. “Even with your core back, the Yunmeng Jiang Sect barely has anyone. What? Do you expect to be able to launch an attack on the second young master of the Wens by yourself? Don’t be a fool!”

Jiang Cheng looked down at the floor, gritting his teeth.

“San-niang,” Jiang Fengmian whispered warningly. He knew she was worried — after watching Jiang Cheng lose his core, how could she not be? — but this wasn’t helping.

She glared back at him, but didn’t continue the argument either.

“Those Sunshot Campaign bastards,” Wen Chao cursed. “All they’re capable of is sneaking up on people. I’m gonna destroy their base. They’ll stop playing their tricks then!”

Behind him, Wang Lingjiao shook in fear, and a crow gazed down.

“All we’re capable of is sneaking up on people?” Nie Mingjue repeated with a mocking laugh. “Would you like to put that to the test, Wen-gongzi?”

In response, Wen Chao straightened his posture and tried to intimidate Nie Mingjue into backing off, but only succeeded in amusing the other man. The longer Sect Leader Nie’s patronizing gaze remained on him, the angrier Wen Chao got.

He huffed, finally looking away with a muttered “Fight Wen Zhuliu if you’re so confident.”

From there, the red Wen encampment faded away, and was replaced by the purple of Yunmeng Jiang.

“Look!” Jiang Yanli declared. “A-Cheng, that’s-”

Twenty arrows were released at once, hitting the target perfectly. It was clear that these men had far more than three months of training, especially since they were all adults, far past the age of starting cultivation.

Lan Qiren glanced over, “These are?”

“My disciples,” Jiang Fengmian nodded. “They must have been away on night hunts or other trips when the Wens attacked. And A-Cheng brought them back together again.”

Archery, talisman mastery, sword practice, and more took place over the entirety of the field, running as smoothly as it ever had.

Being faced with proud smiles for the second time in less than an hour made Jiang Cheng certain he would soon waste away into an embarrassed puddle on the floor.

(And yet, some part of him couldn’t help but preen. ’Look: I can do it. Here’s actual proof that I can be sect leader.’)

On the balcony of the fortresses' inner building, the simulated Jiang Cheng looked down at the battling disciples. To make up for the Jiangs' now-lacking numbers, there were some Lan and Nie disciples holding down the fort as well. He could hear the repetitive, even, strong sounds of training occurring below, and watched it with calm eyes.

"Clan leader," someone greeted, bowing behind him.

He glanced back.

"In recent days, Wen Chao has increased the number of people he's sent to search for us."

Jiang Cheng frowned, "Have any been found here in Chongyang?"

"Nothing suspicious yet, but…."

A foreboding sensation fell over the watchers.

(With the exception of Wen Chao, who sat up straighter and shook in giddy anticipation.)

The man looked down to the right, where the new Jiang disciples were training. The optimal ages to start cultivation were from nine to about thirteen, but it would be luticious to expect children to go to war. The new cultivators were all at least fifteen years old.

And, by starting late on top of only having three months to train, would be no better than lambs waiting for the slaughter.

The messenger coughed and explained, "We have new cultivators. If the Wen Clan attacks, I'm afraid we won't last long."

And he was right. It would be idiotic to defend such an important fort with only new recruits, but the advanced disciples from the Lan, Nie, and Jiang sect were a relatively small portion of the people present.

If the Wen attacked, it would be a massacre.

When Madam Jin saw her son give the trembling Jiang Yanli a soft look of reassurance, she felt her determination grow. If there was a way to destroy the Wen Sect before it got this far, she would take it.

(No matter what her husband said.)

As Jiang Cheng considered his aid's words, Lan Wangji stepped up the stairs to join Sect Leader Jiang on the wall. In his hands, he held a single talisman written on cheap, yellow paper.

It was another spirit attraction flag.

As he observed it, Wen Ruohan couldn't help humming in appreciation. With just a handful of strokes, Wei Wuxian had written on top of the evil-repelling talismans and reversed their function.

Subtle; simple; easy to pull off. Something like that could completely change the course of a war.

(And it was just one of the dozens of inventions Wei Wuxian was responsible for.)

"Is this one of the ones that was inside Shongling?" Jiang Cheng asked. "There are additional strokes."

Lan Wangji nodded, "Four additional strokes, drawn in human blood."

"Human blood?"

'Is it more effective that way?' Jin Guangshan wondered. 'Or does Wei Wuxian just have no other resources?'

If the boy joined the Jin sect, he would have access to all the resources money could buy. Jin Guangshan wondered what he'd be able to create in those conditions.

After a pause, Jiang Cheng glanced over, "This talisman is usually painted with cinnabar. I've never heard of one being painted with human blood before."

'We'd never heard of spirit attraction flags or compasses of evil either,' Nie Huaisang mentally pointed out. 'Wei-xiong is just full of surprises.'

"It's a sinister way to write a talisman. I'm afraid this charm isn't written for exorcisations," Jiang Cheng concluded.

"Exactly," Lan Wangji agreed, his impassive face turning slightly stern. "This charm has the opposite effect."

"The opposite effect? What do you mean?"

"Ordinary talismans drive out evil spirits. This one attracts them."

Despite having already known, the verbal confirmation caused many faces to fall.

"It really is a spirit attraction flag then," Jiang Fengmian sighed. He was glad that Wei Wuxian had apparently made it out of the Burial Mounds, but the realization that the flags had indeed been intended to cause destruction was disheartening.

(But, after what he had seen of Lotus Pier and the Burial Mounds, he couldn't say he didn't understand.)

"It… attracts evil spirits? I've never heard of such a thing."

"I haven't either, but I've tested it out. It does have the power to summon specters."

Recalling how the baby Lans had used it in their nighthunt, Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue made eye contact, wordlessly agreeing to test it once they got out.

"So then," Jiang Cheng looked over. "The strange things occurring with the Wen Clan's Supervisory Offices are due to this?"

"It's been used at all three locations that I went to. The strokes written on the talismans were all done by the same person."

"Wait," Jiang Cheng held a hand up. "He's already out?"

"Presumably."

"But-but why isn't he coming to find me?" Jiang Cheng asked. "My other-self, I mean."

"Only a few brushstrokes were added, and the entire function of the talisman was reversed? Who could this person possibly be?"

"This talisman is evil," Lan Wangji glared. "You should not have heard about it."

"I see. Wei Wuxian must be worried about the stigma against demonic cultivation," Jin Guangshan observed. There were sounds of agreement all around.

Lan Qiren flinched.

He didn't want to excuse demonic cultivation — it went against everything he and their culture valued — but he had seen the Burial Mounds. He knew why it was happening.

Wei Wuxian should have switched back to spiritual cultivation once he escaped the Burial Mounds, but-

But Lan Qiren had spent years teaching a zero-tolerance policy for demonic cultivation. If that had contributed (if that was why Wei Wuxian felt like he would receive no help), then wasn't Lan Qiren at least partially responsible for this?

Silently, Wen Qing wondered if Wei Wuxian's now-intentional absence had more to do with Jiang Cheng's mysteriously returning core than anything else.

After a pause, Lan Wangji summarized, "I've never heard of such an evil technique from any righteous clan."

Jiang Cheng couldn't help but laugh at that.

Lan Xichen tensed.

"Evil?" Jiang Cheng repeated. "What could possibly be more evil than those Wen dogs?!"

Lan Wangji narrowed his eyes at the words.

“A-Cheng, I-”

“As long as he continues killing people from the Wen Clan, I don’t care if he’s a monster or a demon. I’ll welcome him myself once we find him!”

Wen Qing flinched. Despite her best efforts, she couldn’t stop a visible shiver from traveling up her body.

(Yes, A-Ning had saved Wei Wuxian, but perhaps it was naive to think that would change anything. Jiang Cheng certainly didn’t care. Maybe Wen Ning would be turned into a weapon regardless.)

(After everything that had happened, she couldn’t even entirely say she blamed Wei Wuxian for it.)

She looked down.

“Wait, Wen-guniang!” Jiang Yanli rushed to say, having seen Wen Qing’s reaction. “N-not you.”

Wen Qing raised an eyebrow.

“A-Jie’s right!” Jiang Cheng added, seeing a pleading gaze from his sister. “Not you. Or your brother. I don’t mean you two.”

Apprehensive, Wen Qing turned to glance at Nie Mingjue. He looked away.

That wasn’t agreement, but, just a few hours ago, he would have been the first person to disagree.

Jiang Yanli sent Wen Qing a blinding smile, and she felt her fear momentarily disperse.

“Lan-er-gongzi, Sect Leader Jiang,” one of the Lan disciples greeted. “Jiang-guniang has been escorted here from Shuchuan.”

“A-Li,” Jiang Fengmian breathed out in relief.

“A-Jie?” Jiang Cheng demanded. “Where is she?”

He took off running.

As Jin Zixuan saw once again how the Lans had saved Jiang Yanli, he felt his stomach do an odd tumble. Yes, their other-selves’ engagement had been broken off, but-

Was his father providing any assistance to the Sunshot Campaign?

He clenched his fists, promising himself that, if it occurred in the real world, the Jin would not stand idly by.

In a tranquil and blissfully private cove, Jiang Yanli waited patiently. Despite the serenity of the atmosphere, her clothes were pure white with mourning, and her face was tense with worry.

“A-Li,” Jin Zixuan whispered, concerned.

Slowly, the simulated Jiang Cheng’s running came to a halt, and he stared disbelievingly at his sister’s turned-away figure. Then, eyes wide in shock, he began to stumble forward.

Relieved tears began to glimmer in his eyes.

“I’m here, A-Cheng.”

“I know, I know!” the real Jiang Cheng hissed, blushing heavily and pretending his eyes hadn’t just started to water. He knew she was fine, but the mere idea of not knowing his sister’s fate for months left him speechless.

And, equally speechless, the simulated Jiang Cheng began a slow walk forward. Turned away, Jiang Yanli didn’t notice his approach until he reached out and touched her hand.

“A-Jie.”

Her eyes widened.

“A-Cheng?”

Jiang Cheng pulled her into a hug. A moment later, Jiang Yanli’s wide eyes relaxed, and tears began to fall.

Leaves fluttered by in the wind, and the siblings’ choked-off sobs swept by.

Smiling through her tears, Jiang Yanli wrapped her hand around Jiang Cheng’s head and whispered, “It’s okay. Everything’s alright now. Everything will be alright.”

The hopeful promise wrapped around the pair like a loving embrace.

Jiang Yanli felt her heart burst at the scene. They shouldn’t have been separated at all, but-

They were together now. They had found each other again.

(Now, all they needed to do was reunite with Wei Wuxian.)

Finally, Jiang Cheng forced himself to separate from her, drying his tears. They made eye contact, and Jiang Cheng reached inside his robes to pull out a package.

Jiang Yanli flinched back as if slapped.

Her eyes snapped shut.

Madam Yu’s bell and Jiang Fengmian’s headpiece were held out to her.

“Thank you,” Jiang Yanli whispered, glancing at Wen Qing. “Truly, honestly, thank you.”

After a pause, Wen Qing looked away, “No need. It hasn’t happened yet, and won’t need to happen.”

“Still.”

Madam Yu, Jiang Cheng, and Jiang Fengmian made eye contact. The Wen siblings had betrayed their sect, but it wasn’t just to save lives. They had also risked themselves to make sure the Jiangs’ bodies could be buried properly.

The Jiangs owed the Wen siblings quite a bit, it seemed.

As Jiang Yanli reached out to touch the objects, every centimeter of distance she covered seemed like a battle on its own. She felt along them, a war between denial and acceptance transpiring in her eyes.

Then, at long last, despairing tears began to fall.

The glares directed Wen Ruohan’s way couldn’t be described as anything but scathing.

“Lotus Cove…” Jiang Cheng growled. “I’ll definitely get it back. I’ll avenge A-Die and A-Niang. I’ll make those damn Wen-dogs pay for this!”

“A-Cheng,” Jiang Yanli whispered, reaching out to cup his cheek. “You’ve grown up…. If A-Die and A-Niang could see you, they would be very happy.”

Apprehensively, Jiang Cheng glanced over.

His father nodded back in warm agreement, and Jiang Cheng felt his fears finally settle.

“Is there… any news about A-Xian?”

Jiang Cheng flinched back, then looked down, unable to meet her eyes.

A memory — Jiang Cheng’s memory — formed. After regaining a golden core, he had returned to the agreed upon location, looking around for his brother.

There was no one there.

Jiang Cheng’s voice overlaid on the scene explained, “I went down the mountain, but there was no sign of him. I spent days searching for any trace. I even went to the Yiling Supervisory Office in case he had been caught, but I didn’t find anything.

‘Of course not,’ Nie Mingjue scowled grimly. ‘No one would ever think to check in the Burial Mounds. The cruelty it would take to throw a living person there-’

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji breathed out, closing his eyes in grief as the possibilities swarmed his mind.

Clenching his fists together, Jiang Cheng whispered, "He might have-"

He cut off, feeling Jiang Yanli wrap her hands around his.

"Don't make wild guesses," she requested. "A-Xian is… going to be okay."

Her voice broke as she spoke the last words, fear sinking in. She glanced down at where Suibian hung on Jiang Cheng's waist, then closed her eyes and turned away.

"Well," Lan Xichen tried for a reassuring smile. "I'm sure he'll be somewhat different after that, but we do know he survives this. He escapes stronger than ever."

Jiang Yanli smiled back, appreciating the attempt.

Then, the watchers were moved farther back until they were nearly hidden behind the bushes. The simulated Jiang siblings could still be heard, but the watchers were covered.

And they weren't alone.

Nie Huaisang glanced down, and saw the Wen uniform on the spy's back.

"Oh," he whispered. "Oh, no, no, no-"

'Ha. We've searched everywhere else. The only place left is Chongyang,' he thought. 'I need to tell Wen-er-gongzi that-"

He ducked, narrowly dodging an arrow.

"Jiu-shidi!" Jiang Cheng realized.

The Jiang disciple leapt forward and attacked.

"A-Die, look! Jiu-shidi survived!" Jiang Yanli smiled. He was one of the newer students, but he would be much more advanced than children with only three months to their name.

The commotion made noise, and soon a pair of Lan disciples were also on the case. All three Sunshot Campaign warriors moved to hunt down the Wen as quickly as possible.

Then, another Jiang cut him off.

The Wen was impaled.

"Yes!" Jin Zixuan cheered, and Nie Mingjue's grin turned terrifying.

"You won't be able to tip him off now," the Jiang disciple who had cut him off smirked, watching the body fall to the ground. However, a moment later, he noticed a trail of smoke rising from the man's hand.

The flare had already been lit.

“No!”

It went off, and the Wen symbol bursted into the air, marking the location.

Lan Wangji gritted his teeth, furious at his own powerlessness. He had run forward to try and stop the flare, only to belatedly remember that there was nothing he could do.

He couldn’t stop the flare, and he couldn’t help Wei Ying.

‘Useless,’ he cursed at himself.

The simulation cut to Lan Wangji, who was still observing the talisman apprehensively. A moment later, however, a red light flashed into his eyes. He turned towards it, and saw the Wen’s sun shining in the sky.

Another cut to where Jiang Cheng and Jiang Yanli stood, staring at that same red light.

“No,” Jiang Yanli whispered.

“A-Li,” Jin Zixuan knelt beside her.

“No, this can’t happen again. A-Xuan, I-I can’t watch this happen again!”

Her parents were struck silent. With the situation as it was, it seemed likely that this would end up being the Massacre of Lotus Pier all over again.

(Because they had hesitated to act against the Wen Sect, their children had to go through this.)

(What could they say except, “I’m sorry?”)

Then, crows cawed in the distance, and the scene changed to a run down fort.

Wen Chao plopped down in a seat, scoffing, “You still haven’t found the rest of the rebels after all this time? Wen Xu was also useless, getting his head chopped off by Nie Mingjue. It’s a disgrace to the Qishan Wen Clan!”

Wen Ruohan’s frown deepened.

On the side, the tea he was being poured began to overflow. Hearing the liquid pour out, Wen Chao glanced back, then screeched at the offence.

“Hey, hey, hey!” he said. “You stupid woman! What’s gotten into you lately?”

At that, the frozen Wang Lingjiao startled, jumping back and spilling even more tea.

“Witch! What are you doing?!”

She ran forward and grabbed onto his sleeve.

“Er-gongzi, do you think-do you think all the strange things happening at the supervisory offices lately, and-and all those dead bodies were… Wei Wuxian’s doing?”

“...I mean, yes, but-”

“He… he’s come to seek revenge!”

The watchers knew it was Wei Wuxian because the Yiling Patriarch was the only person who could invent the spirit attraction flags, but Wang Lingjiao had no reason to feel that way.

Which meant his threat had scared her so much that she spent months thinking about it even after throwing him into the Burial Mounds. Based on the dark circles under her eyes, this was far from the first time.

Nie Mingjue gave a long, impressed whistle.

“How could that be possible?!” Wen Chao growled. “How many cultivators has our sect sent to try and clean the Burial Mounds up? Did a single one of them come back alive? By now, he’s probably already rotten away!”

The reminder of the sheer impossibility of what Wei Wuxian had accomplished left the watchers struck silent.

“It’s scary even if he’s dead!” Wang Lingjiao responded. “If he really comes back as a ferocious ghost to haunt us….”

A memory appeared. Even whipped, beaten up, and stabbed, Wei Wuxian was able to smirk at them.

“After I die, I’ll return as a fierce ghost! I’ll haunt you until you’re forced to join me!”

Both Wen Chao and Wang Lingjiao shivered involuntarily.

In a way, it wasn’t surprising that this threat had stayed with them for so long. They had been threatened numerous times before, but, every time, the Wen Clan’s power had been able to make that person back off in fear. Lan Xichen had been forced to run. Madam Yu had been killed. Jiang Cheng’s core had been destroyed.

And yet, no matter what the Wen Clan did, Wei Wuxian had remained fearless. Of course they didn’t know how to face someone like that.

Wen Chao huffed and turned away, “Even if he’s died, his spirit will be trapped there for all eternity. He’ll never get out!”

The words did nothing to change the terrified eyes of Wang Lingjiao.

“But… but-”

“Don’t scare yourself, can’t you see that I’m annoyed?!” he crumpled up the letter on the table. “What Sunshot Campaign. You want to shoot down the sun? Dream on!”

Seeing his annoyance, Wang Lingjiao's expression switched to one of flattery.

Madam Yu and Madam Jin both rolled their eyes.

"O-of course Young Master Wen. Those few sects won't be able to keep this up for long. Sect Leader Wen will definitely-"

"Shut up! What do you know? Get lost! Stop annoying me!"

With a slap, Wang Lingjiao was thrown to the ground.

"You're making me angry."

Although Wen Qing couldn't bring herself to feel bad for Wang Lingjiao, her opinion of Wen Chao dropped nonetheless.

However, at that moment, they were pulled inside Wen Chao's thoughts.

'No one can escape the Burial Mounds,' he reminded himself, then- 'No one was supposed to be able to kill the Xuanwu either.'

"Attempt the impossible," Jin Zixuan acknowledged with a chuckle.

Just as Wen Chao was about to leave, a voice called from outside.

"Wen-gongzi, we've found the rebels!"

Nie Mingjue clicked his tongue, and Lan Xichen's placid expression faltered.

"Where are they?" Wen Chao shouted. "Kill them now! I want every single one of them dead!"

'Not again,' Jiang Yanli prayed. 'Please, don't become another Lotus Pier. Please.'

Her prayers echoed throughout the minds of all of the Sunshot Campaign's watchers.

Back at the Chongyang base, the Lan, Nie, and Jiang disciples prepared for the coming conflict. They raced up the stairs in droves, arming themselves and evacuating civilians.

"Pass the word!" someone shouted to the droves of soldiers. "All women and children should evacuate to the back hill!"

Jiang Cheng stood on the wall, facing the direction of the coming conflict.

For the first time, the real Jiang Cheng looked at his older self, and saw the Jiang Sect Leader standing there.

A leader who refused to allow his sect to be destroyed again.

"Clan leader," someone greeted, stepping up. "We've found a sword formation of the Wen Clan northwest of here!"

“Damn, they came fast,” Jiang Cheng turned to face the coming army.

And, just as he’d cursed that, the first line of Wens began to descend.

Now, Wen Chao was practically jumping in his seat from the excitement. Yes, the Sunshot Campaign had survived longer than his father had expected — had killed his brother, in fact — but that didn’t matter. So long as he had Wen Zhuliu on his side, there was no way this collection of clans would stand a chance against his army!

At the forehead of the defense, Lan Wangji looked over the field of Wens without fear.

“Thank you,” Jiang Fengmian nodded once. With the simulated Lan Wangji also having sent people for Jiang Yanli, the ‘thank you’s the Jiangs had to give him seemed endless.

‘Good job, Wangji-xiong!’ Nie Huaisang gave a mental cheer. ‘Winning your in-laws over flawlessly!’

However, a moment later, Nie Huaisang’s smile faltered. Luckily, there hadn’t been much focus on the Nie sect yet. That didn’t change the fact that he knew some of the people there.

Although he didn’t phase inside, he moved closer to his brother’s reassuring form.

The Wens paused outside the base and observed the defensive formation. The two sides stared each other down, tension growing. Then, the highest ranking Wen present lifted his hand.

“Fire arrows!”

A storm of flaming arrows fell.

Jiang Yanli looked away.

‘Not again!’ she begged.

However, instead of falling like rain and massacring the people present, the arrows were thrown back by a tidal wave of blue spiritual energy.

The strings on Lan Wangji’s guqin thrummed. Unlike at Lotus Pier, the soldiers present were prepared for an attack.

“Get in formation!” Lan Wangji ordered.

At once, the Lan and Jiang disciples worked together to set up dozens of individual arrays in the sky. The defensive barrier was thinner than the one Lotus Pier had once had, but was also more secure due to how many people were working on it. Unlike last time, an inside attack by Wen Zhuliu wouldn’t instantly destroy it.

They’d learned from their mistakes.

The blue arrays of the sunshot campaign floated proudly, even as the Wen Clan built up their golden arrays for an attack. For a moment, everything paused as the two sides faced each other.

Then, the arrays slammed together.

The resulting shockwaves tore trees off the ground.

The watchers stood up, alert.

On the wall, Jiang Cheng twisted the ring of Zidian, then released it. The whip of purple lighting expanded out at once, burning the air around it.

He looked up at the Wen army.

"Attack!" he shouted.

The Sunshot Campaign's warriors surged forward.

A grin crept onto Nie MIngjue's face.

The world faded to black.

With a pout, Nie Huaisang sat down and whined, "I hate these cliffhangers."

""""Agreed,"""" Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, and Nie Mingjue said simultaneously.

When the world reformed, it was to a cloudy, moonlit sky. Within the barracks of the fort, a woman sat shivering in her bed. At the slightest creak, she jumped in fear, clutching her pillow tightly.

If Wang Lingjiao hadn't begged Wen Chao to melt Wei Wuxian's core and chop off his hand, Jiang Yanli might have pitied her.

On the walls of her room, every square foot was covered with spirit repelling talismans. A quick glance around showed that the whole building was covered by those very same charms.

They had figured out what Wei Wuxian was doing, but they didn't know how to counter it.

Wen Ruohan breathed out an amused half-laugh.

Then, Wang Lingjiao buried herself deeper into her pillow to hide.

"W-Wei Wuxian," she whispered, glancing around rapidly. "Wei Ying."

"Good," Jiang Cheng whispered. "You should fear him."

"Wen Chao pushed you down there. It wasn't me. It wasn't me!"

"That traitorous-"

"No less than you deserve!" Nie Mingjue snapped, cutting Wen Chao off.

Wen Chao had never spent longer than 6 months with a woman. By now, it was clear that regardless of her initial hopes, she was no different. If she stayed in the Wen Sect, the only thing waiting for her would be death.

After a moment of thought, she forced her trembling body to get out of bed. Underneath her bed was a small, lightly decorated chest meant for storing valuables.

'I spent the last six months hoarding this,' she thought. 'There should be enough. It's time to go.'

'She's running away?' Wen Chao realized, huffing haughtily.

She dug a miniscule key out of her belt and put it in the lock.

"What a scum of a man," she muttered. "A greasy thing like you will die sooner or later."

Now, there was absolutely no way he would want anything to do with that woman once he got out of the simulation.

Maybe he'd send Wei Wuxian to exterminate her clan. Could be fun.

"Honestly, I should be grateful now that I don't have to serve you anymo- Ah!"

She jumped back and collapsed to the ground.

Frowning, the watchers hurried forward to inspect the chest.

Rather than treasure or weapons, the chest contained a curled up infant!

Jiang Yanli went pale.

"What?" Nie Mingjue breathed out, scanning around.

What was going on?

Having dropped the chest, Wang Lingjiao was forced to stare directly at the child. However, after several seconds with nothing happening, the rush of adrenaline coursing through her began to ease.

'How is a child in there? she looked all around, terror written across her face. 'I'm the only one with a key, no one else should've been able to get inside!'

She wanted to approach it and take another look, but quickly rejected the notion. Her cultivation was extremely weak; if it ended up truly being a ghost-

‘I’ll haunt you until you’re forced to join me!’ Wei Wuxian shouted, laughing fearlessly even then.

“Psychological,” Wen Ruohan muttered, making Jin Guangshan nod. They had wondered what kind of revenge Wei Wuxian would enact if given the chance. 'Terrify them until they start hallucinating' required much more patience than they had expected him to have.

It appeared he had a much larger variety in tactics than anyone could have guessed.

As if realizing the same, Wang Lingjiao stood up.

She knew she needed to escape.

Like a frightened rat, she ran to the walls of her room, peeling talismans off them to stick onto her body for protection. Once they littered her chest and limbs, she was finally able to relax slightly.

She turned back to the chest.

The baby was gone; her treasure had returned.

“Oh, I don’t like this. I don’t like this at all,” Nie Huaisang murmured, terror sinking in. Although they understood the fearful sentiment, no one else could bring themselves to agree.

(Wang Lingjiao deserved this, after all.)

Shaking her head as if assuming she had just imagined the baby, Wang Lingjiao returned to her treasures and began to count them. However, right as she was reaching the double digits, her attention was attracted by a bright glow.

Under her bed, two, identical white lights were shining.

Eyes.

A shiver ran up Wen Chao’s back.

Then, the wind picked up. The few candles she had were instantly extinguished. Her hands shook in fear, and she looked around wildly for any trace of an attack.

A hand grabbed her.

Her scream made Nie Huaisang flinch.

“Help! Somebody help!” she shouted, breaking off into a sprint. The watchers couldn’t see much in the darkness, but they could vaguely make out the being holding on.

It was the dead child she had found in the chest.

“What the fuck is that?!”

“Get me out of here!” she screamed. “I’m not staying here! Get me out of here!”

She slammed open the door and turned to the guards waiting outside.

“Why are you just standing there? Get me the hell out of here!”

She grabbed onto one’s shoulder, trying to shake him into compliance.

He tipped over and crashed on the ground.

“What the-”

“He’s dead?” Wen Qing breathed out, kneeling down to examine the body.

Terror multiplying at the sight, Wang Lingjiao backed up carefully. She looked over at the other guard, whose slouched posture now showed him to be another corpse.

“My god,” Jiang Fengmian breathed out.

(This was exactly the kind of cruel, evil demonic cultivation they had imagined when they first heard the term.)

(And yet not a single one of them could say they didn’t understand.)

Then, a chilling, terrifying noise cut through the night.

“A flute?” Lan Wangji breathed out, and the first scene’s presentation of the Yiling Patriarch flashed into his mind. “It’s… Chenqing?”

“Where’s that sound coming from?” Wang Lingjiao frantically cried out.

The flute continued, its high notes piercing the listener’s flesh, and its melody crawling within their bones. Clouds covered the moon again, and the terrifyingly beautiful sound scratched through their souls.

Then, movement.

Lan Qiren’s pale face had become the same color as his ribbon.

The corpses of the two Wen guards jolted, shifted, then rose with a crack of their bones.

“Wei Ying,” Lan Wangji whispered.

The two corpses turned to face her. Then, they stepped.

Jiang Yanli fell back.

They stepped closer and closer, swaying in accordance with the demonic music. The looming figures were hungry for flesh.

“N-no!” Wang Lingjiao cried. “Don’t come any closer!”

They saw no reason to listen.

Outside her window, a murder of crows sped by as if they were resentful beings, summoned by the music just as much as the corpses were. Every warding talisman in the base began to glow a deep, demonic red.

The watchers stepped back.

The window slammed open, and the useless talismans flew out. The updraft they rode on shook the whole room, sending the fabric of Wang Lingjiao's dress fluttering wildly.

The corpses moved closer.

It almost seemed like Wei Wuxian had brought the Burial Mounds — no, remade the Burial Mounds — inside the base.

Through the fear, a few satisfied smiles appeared on the watchers.

'Good. She deserves far worse than a mere fraction of what happened to Wei Wuxian,' Jiang Cheng thought, grinning in the darkness. Spurred on by the power Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation imbued the memories with, he moved closer to enjoy the show.

'Wei Ying,' Lan Wangji turned away to stand by the window. 'Where are you?'

The corpses stepped closer, and Wang Lingjiao remained frozen in fear. The drunken, disorderly steps the corpses took didn't slow them at all, and soon they were only a few feet away.

One looked up.

Wang Lingjiao saw her life flash before her eyes.

"No," she whispered. "No!"

She ran, tearing through the hallway and tripping over the furniture, uncaring of the scratches and scars she got as she went.

"Wei Ying, I didn't push you down there!" she shouted. "If-if you want your revenge, go find Wen Chao!"

"Oh, we'll get to him," Jiang Cheng promised.

"Don't come after me!" she begged. The displaced talismans slammed into her, covering her face and eyes and blocking her movement as a tornado arose in her room. They layered themselves on top of the talismans she had placed in an effort to protect herself, turning the defense into a poison. Then, one landed on her neck.

She jerked back, clawing at it and gagging as it squeezed tightly.

When Jiang Yanli remembered the way her brother had choked on a corpse's teeth wrapping around his neck, she felt any pity she might have had incinerate.

More and more talismans wrapped around, bringing Wang Lingjiao to the floor. She struggled against them, but her non-cultivating body seemed incapable of fighting back.

The two corpses moved closer.

"No!" she screamed. "No! No! Get back! Get away from me!"

"Get lost!" Wei Wuxian had shouted, but no one could help him then.

And no one would help her now.

They lumbered forward.

"No! No!"

They pounced.

She screamed.

A truly malicious grin formed on Madam Yu's face.

Three ribbons of blood were scratched into her leg. A hand squeezed at her neck. A moment later, her arm was crushed into a fine paste against the floor.

Her screams were made silent by the pressure on her throat, but the torture was far from over. Her voiceless body fought back as hard as it could, but found itself helpless against the rage of the damned. She slammed her weak limbs against them, and they snapped her fingers in response.

The longer it went on, the more impressed Wen Ruohan felt.

A broken-off chair leg was lifted into the air.

She shook her head, tears running down her face as she silently begged them to stop.

A snap, and the light in Wang Lingjiao's eyes finally went out. The chair leg had been stuffed down her throat.

The simulation then moved outside of the room onto the nearest wall of the base. Standing on it was a nearly unrecognizable figure in pitch black robes.

Tied into ebony hair, a scarlet ribbon fluttered in the wind.

"A-Xian!" Jiang Yanli whispered.

The world faded back to black.

"He made it out," Madam JIn muttered.

Smirks spread across the watchers.

‘And he’s only gotten stronger.’

When the world returned, the watchers were following an entourage of Wens. In the center was a high ranking official’s carriage.

Wen Zhuliu’s presence made it clear who the passenger was.

Even, steady steps echod as the Wens moved at an unhurried pace, unaware of the demon following after them.

Wen Ruohan’s lips quirked up into a smirk. He couldn’t even blame his son’s incompetence this time — no one should have been able to come out of the Burial Mounds stronger than they’d gone in.

It seemed Wei Wuxian had been born to surpass expectations.

~~Even without his core.~~

With just the clothes on his back and a flute he himself had crafted, Wei Wuxian had entered a base alone and created his army out of the people already there.

(If he’d been on the Wens’ side, he could have been sent to negotiate with Lotus Pier alone.)

(Unlike the mere army Wen Ruohan had sent, Wei Wuxian wouldn’t have let a single Jiang survive.)

Just then, the curtain inside the carriage swung open.

“How’s it going?” Wen Chao impatiently asked.

Wen Zhuliu didn’t even glance his way as he answered, “The gates are broken. The rebels are surrounded.”

Madam Yu cursed.

Wen Chao laughed at the response and hummed a pleased, “Great,” before allowing the curtain to fall down again. Through this reaction, it became clear that Wen Chao wouldn’t rest until he’d exterminated all the “rebels” in Chongyang.

Lan Qiren gritted his teeth.

When the simulation changed again, they were back at the Chongyang fort. Purple light flew in every direction as Jiang Cheng continued to wield ZIdian with frightening speed. Although Sandu was back in his hands, he, like Madam Yu before him, was significantly more effective in large battles while wielding the whip.

And wield it he did.

Madam Yu’s satisfied smile turned vicious.

However, the battle was taking its toll. Like Lotus Pier and the Cloud Recesses before it, the Chongyang fort was now bathed in flames. Although Jiang Cheng was still fighting back, he was clearly exhausted now.

Fatigue was sinking in, but he fought on.

Slowly, it dawned on the Jiang family that Jiang Cheng seemed even stronger now than before. Based on what happened during the destruction of Lotus Pier, Jiang Cheng shouldn't have been able to continue fighting for so long against so many people.

Had the desperation of war changed him?

(For the first time, they were starting to get the feeling that Wei Wuxian's offer had been too good to be true.)

(They refused to think too deeply into that.)

Unfortunately, pure desperation could only fuel Jiang Cheng for so long. More and more Wen soldiers piled up on him, closing in now that most of the Jiangs' new recruits were no longer able to offer support. Surrounded and lacking an escape route in the narrow alley, Jiang Cheng had no choice but to start using shorter and shorter ranged attacks.

Eventually, the range Zidian offered him would prove to be a hindrance instead of an advantage. Right as it seemed like he needed to switch to Sandu, five Wens attacked simultaneously.

Four were knocked to the ground, but one blade cut through Jiang Cheng's back.

"A-Cheng!"

Jiang Cheng fell to his knees and, in the next instant, three swords shot forward to wait threateningly under his neck, keeping him in place.

When Wen Chao began to laugh, the collective hate sent his way was strong enough to incinerate a million Xuanwus by itself.

In a farther part of the fort, Lan Wangji continued his battle. Like Sandu, Bichen was extremely useful for one on one battles, but less applicable when it was one against a hundred. Instead, Lan Wangji's guqin worked tirelessly to fight back against the army. He and the Lan disciples who had been present defended an area of the fort without rest.

But the tips of Lan Wangji's fingers were worn down. Now, they dripped blood onto the guqin's strings. The dark circles under Lan Wangji's eyes had grown into black holes of fatigue.

The desperation on his face was starting to be overpowered by the exhaustion.

He wouldn't last forever.

Lan Xichen clasped his trembling hands together, forcing himself to not look away. His conflicting desires of being unable to watch his brother get hurt and being unable to forgive himself if he didn't see left him shaking in his seat.

"Xichen," Nie Mingjue leaned over to whisper. "It's fine, remember? We've seen the future-"

"Did the future keep Wei Wuxian safe?"

Nie Mingjue flinched back.

Everyone knew the answer to that.

No one was willing to say it.

Another wave of Wen soldiers attacked, and Lan Wangji forced himself to move again. With a powerful strum of energy, he ran his hand across the strings and sent out waves which knocked dozens of Wens off their feet at once.

The strings snapped from overuse.

Lan Wangji nearly fell, barely catching himself on his upright guqin. It was now only useful as a cane.

Xichen's shaking was joined by his uncle's.

Lan Wangji's normally pristine clothes were covered in dirt. The fluctuations and unevenness in his breathing spoke of the struggle it took to stand; the scratches adorning his face did the same. With his guqin now thoroughly destroyed, he forced himself to draw Bichen.

It went flying, knocked out of his hands by a stream of red power.

Obnoxious laughter spread out across the field.

They knew they had promised to not punish for things that hadn't yet occurred.

However, if given the chance to do so, those on the Sunshot Campaign's side would end Wen Chao without remorse.

Next to Wen Chao stood Wen Zhuliu, his hand still outstretched from the attack he had just given to Bichen. Overly confident while being defended by the Wen Clans' strongest guard dog, Wen Chao gleefully presented the captive Jiang Cheng to the world.

If Madam Yu had her way, every bone in Wen Chao's fingers was going to be broken and then stuffed down his throat.

"Lan Zhan, I suggest you stop struggling!" the despicable Wen heir laughed. "Wei Ying has been waiting for you for a long time!"

Lan Wangji stood, turning his terrifying glare on Wen Chao once more.

"You dare?!" he asked.

"When you die, you'll finally be able to join him!"

All the simulated Wen Chao knew about Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian's relationship was that they had destroyed the Xuanwu together. To him, it was a standard taunt.

To anyone who knew what they felt, it was a knife twisting deeper and deeper until it broke through to the other side.

"What do you mean?!" Jiang Cheng demanded.

Wen Chao's laughter began to pick up in volume, "What do I mean? I heard you two have been going around looking for him. Don't waste your time, you're not going to find him."

Jiang Yanli was going to tear that grin off his face.

Breathing out, Lan Wangji forced himself to stand up again.

"Where… is… Wei Ying?" he forced himself to ask.

Finally, Wen Chao gave him the answer.

"I threw Wei Wuxian into the Burial Mounds long ago. By now, there won't even be a corpse left!"

Just like the simulated Lan Wangji, the watchers couldn't help but flinch at those words.

(If they needed demonic cultivation to kill this man, then they would welcome it with open arms.)

Wen Chao laughed and laughed and laughed, so completely assured of his power in this situation that he didn't even bother to watch his enemies. Lan Wangji fury boiled over.

With a shout, he leapt forward, abandoning all reason in favor of one final attack. Wen Zhuliu intercepted it.

And Lan Wangji was thrown back.

"Wangji!" Lan Xichen shouted, copying what his brother had done with Wei Wuxian and trying to catch him, only for the simulation to phase through his distraught body.

Lan Qiren's eyes went wide in horror.

(He didn't care about how his nephew had lost composure upon hearing of Wei Wuxian's fate. He hadn't expected anything else. If the simulated Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji decided to get engaged the second they reunited, Lan Qiren, while not pleased, would be satisfied with that outcome.)

(If it made the two of them happy, it would make him happy. He was tired of watching them suffer endlessly.)

Although Lan Wangji managed to land, his now-abolished guqin was thrown out of reach. Forced to kneel in exhaustion, Lan Wangji could only watch as Wen Chao stepped closer and closer.

"If you so much as think about doing this again," Madam Jin hissed. "You'll find out why the Wens lost the Sunshot Campaign first hand."

Over the course of the simulation, Madam Jin had watched Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian interact with each other. Slowly, she had begun to emotionally invest herself in their relationship.

And now, Wen Chao had thrown one into the Burial Mounds, and forced the other down on his knees.

Some of the watchers had never seen the pair before entering the simulation.

(However, no one could remain uninvested after all this.)

Unable to hear her words, the simulated Wen Chao continued to step closer.

"Alright," he laughed. "Let's kill them now."

Jiang Cheng was thrown to the ground next to Lan Wangji. Even drained, the two of them might be able to take on Wen Chao and his entourage if they worked together.

However, with the Core Melting Hand standing against them, they knew they had no chance.

Jiang Yanli collapsed to her knees.

"No," she whispered, and Lan Xichen's fractured breaths agreed. She had already been forced to watch her parent's bodies — Lan Xichen had already been forced to hear about his father's death — but this?

If they were forced to watch as their younger siblings got-

They didn't know if they would be able to continue after that.

Then, a crow flew by.

Then another.

Then another.

Wen Zhuliu scrunched his brows, then glanced to the left.

The sky was painted black by a countless number of crows flocking toward them.

"What?" Jiang Yanli breathed out, barely able to speak through her tears.

More and more crows joined the flood. They were too far away to be properly distinguished. Instead of birds, what looked to be a cloud of darkness surged forward like a tsunami of resentful energy. The symphony of caws grated at the ears and cowed all other animals into hiding.

A wave of fear spread across all living beings in the area.

Finally, the Wens began to react. Muttering broke out, and even Wen Chao's smile finally disappeared.

"What?" he asked. "What's going on?"

A piercing note cut through the world.

Wen Chao flinched, going pale.

He had seen what had happened to Wang Lingjiao.

(But he had Wen Zhuliu. He would be fine! But-)

The flute music seemed to slice through the nerves of anyone who listened. As the high pitched, scream-like sound got louder and louder, the orange fire the Wens had spread turned an unhealthy green.

"He's here," Madam Yu whispered. For the first time in her life, that realization brought her nothing but glee. "Wei Wuxian."

The Jiang Sect's guardian demon had come for their revenge.

And, with a rush of adrenaline passing through the watchers from the demonic cultivation's rallying command, no one could deny it.

Jiang Cheng and Lan Wangji stared in shock. Even the Wens had no idea what was happening. Trembling in terror, they began to group closer together, Wen Chao moving to stand directly behind Wen Zhuliu for safety.

As the music continued, the real Wen Chao began to shake.

Wen Zhuliu would protect him. He had to. He wouldn't let Wei Wuxian do anything to him.

(Wen Zhuliu was effective against humans. Would he be able to do anything against a genuine demon?)

The murder of crows circled overhead like vultures waiting for the kill.

A shiver ran up Wen Chao's spine.

The flute notes continued — fast, aggressive, haunting — and the green fire filling the base turned the night sky a sickly cyan. Lan Wangji forced himself to look up.

"That flute," he whispered, then cut off when he heard movement.

The corpses which had been cut down in battle rose again.

All the blood left Wen Chao's face.

Now, rather than a few dozen Wen surrounding Lan Wangji and Jiang Cheng, it was thousands of corpses surrounding the few Wen. There would be no escape for them.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji whispered. Everyone followed his eyes.

Atop a distant roof was a figure: the source of the terrifying melody.

The man's music beckoned the crows, the corpses, and the endless emerald fire to his will. His fingers flew across the flute at breakneck speed, and the melody seemed to gaze over the listeners like a harbinger of death.

Crimson eyes glared down.

Wen Chao's heart stopped.

Wei Wuxian had found them.

No, not Wei Wuxian.

This* was the Yiling Patriarch.

The world faded to black.

For a long, long time, the watchers simply sat and stared at where the simulated Wei Wuxian had been.

Then, a question.

"...What?"

"...I think it's over."

The world returned to the white of the in-between phase.

"...What?!"

"No, wait — they can't stop it there!"

"Hey!"

“Why does it keep doing this?” Nie Huaisang sunk down into his chair, watching his brother rub his eyes tiredly.

“I hate the person who made this,” Jiang Cheng decided. His nephew was part of that group, but no one disagreed with him. An unhappy pause settled over the grounds.

The watchers all glanced around, hoping someone would find a way to begin the conversation.

(After that, what were they supposed to say?)

“That was quite exciting,” Jin Guangshan commented. “I never would have expected the boy to be capable of such cruelty.”

“Guangshan!” Madam Jin snapped. “After… after everything that happened, it’s more than understandable.”

“Of course, of course,” he placated. “I was just admiring his ingenuity and effectiveness. Especially in the way he went about disposing of that maid.”

As the gruesome memory flashed through their minds, some watchers flinched back, while some smirked in agreement.

(Jin Zixuan once again battled with his temptation to speak out against his father.)

“...Wei-xiong’s hair seemed different. I was wondering when he made that change,” Nie Huaisang mumbled. Several people nodded, blank looks on their faces. Right now, the watchers were so overwhelmed that the change in appearance was the only thing they could currently bring themselves to accept.

(And Jin Guangshan was very, very accepting of this particular change.)

“He…” Wen Ruohan’s usually-controlled expression turned disbelieving. “How many corpses were there?”

Jiang Fengmian’s lips pressed into a thin line. They all knew the answer — they had all seen the answer for themselves.

Hundreds if not thousands of corpses had been under Wei Wuxian’s command. It had been a massacre on both sides, and every fallen soldier had been turned into Wei Wuxain’s puppet.

(Given those numbers, one thing was clear: Wei Wuxian, by himself, was equal to a great sect.)

“Well,” Madam Yu laughed. “It’s good that the boy finally showed up. That maid got what was coming to her.”

Not even the Lans objected to her words.

“And I guess it’ll be your turn next, huh?” Jiang Cheng asked, glancing at Wen Chao. An ecstatic smile crossed his lips as the memory of Wen Chao standing over his parents corpses flashed through his mind.

Swallowing down his nervousness, Wen Chao merely scoffed, “Don’t be ridiculous. I admit that Wei Wuxian would be fun to have, but there’s nothing that low-born brat can do against me while Wen Zhuliu is there!”

“Are you sure about that?” Wen Qing snapped. “We saw what he did to your woman.”

“Of-of course.”

Wen Ruohan merely hummed once in response.

He could see the fear in his son’s expression.

He didn’t care.

(In terms of the impact Wen Ruohan could leave on the world, his hopelessly disappointing son — and the spare, at that — was far less useful to him than the Yiling Patriarch. No matter what this future Wei Wuxian did to Wen Chao, he wouldn’t mind.)

“What?” Wen Chao continued, seeing the disbelief still on Wen Qing’s face. “You can’t honestly think killing a simple maid is equal to killing an heir, do you? And Wen Xu might have died, but he didn’t have Wen Zhuliu.”

Once again, Madam Yu laughed, “You really think your dog can do anything now? Once he comes up against ours, he’ll pay for what he did to A-Cheng.”

It took a second for Jiang Yanli to realize what her mother had just implied about Wei Wuxian.

And when she did, a horrible sinking feeling spread throughout her body.

She turned to speak, only to be interrupted when her father stepped forward and whispered, “San-niang.”

Madam Yu glanced back — one eyebrow raised — but, after several seconds of a staring contest, she eventually accepted the silent request and moved to join him. The Jiang family was soon far enough away from the rest to have at least the illusion of privacy.

“What is it?” Madam Yu demanded. “Did I say something wrong?”

“I…” he pursed his lips. “I’ve been doing some thinking recently. About how we act now, and how we should.”

“And?”

“Please…” he forced himself to make eye contact with her. “Don’t talk about A-Xian that way.”

“What? You-”

“I know. My other self said almost the same thing during the massacre of Lotus Pier, but… I don’t think ‘master and servant’ is what I want our relationship with him to be.”

Madam Yu froze.

Yes, she had been slowly warming up to the boy. For a while, she had almost wondered what it would be like to accept him as a nephew of sorts. However, she had quickly rejected that idea.

The things she had done to him would always be an uncrossable barrier between them.

He had never been part of the family. Both she and Jiang Fengmian knew their new regret couldn’t automatically force him to fit there.

And yet he still dared to request that?

“What?” Madam Yu hissed. “Is it wrong to want A-Cheng to be safe?”

“No — no, that isn’t what I’m saying.”

And she knew that wasn’t what he meant, but that didn’t change the fact that he had the audacity to value Cangse’s son over hers and-

‘A-Ying, A-Cheng… you must look after him.’

Her jaw snapped shut. Seeing that, Jiang Fengmian stepped closer as if to continue, only to halt when a mocking laugh escaped her lips.

“Or is the problem that A-Cheng had to be saved at all? If it had been Cangse’s son in that situation, the Wens wouldn’t have stood a chance. Is that what you’re saying?”

Jiang Cheng flinched.

“San-niang-” Jiang Fengmian cut off, worried that continued discussion would just upset Madam Yu further. And yet-

‘He’s not strict with me, he just doesn’t like me,” Jiang Cheng had explained.

Wasn’t the problem his hesitance to speak?

“San-niang, please. All I’m asking is for you to not refer to A-Xian like that.”

“You-”

“A-Niang,” Jiang Yanli whispered, standing next to her now-trembling brother. “Please.”

The problems in their family wouldn’t be fixed overnight — they all knew that.

(But, if Madam Yu had a chance to help, shouldn’t she take it?)

(Her other-self hadn't, but her other-self had also died without ever seeing the hairpin Jiang Fengmian had fixed for her.)

"...Okay," she acknowledged.

While that was happening, Lan Wangji sat on his knees next to where his simulated self had been a few minutes before. Various murmurings were occurring around him, but he paid them no mind.

Instead, he kept his eyes focused on where Wei Wuxian had been.

The person up there had nearly been unrecognizable. Instead of Wei Wuxian's easy smile, open charisma, and kind silver eyes, there were cold, crimson orbs staring down at the Wens like a hunter looking down at prey.

But it was still Wei Wuxian.

And he had been hurt so, so much.

'It will not happen with us,' Lan Wangji told himself. 'I won't let it happen to him.'

And wasn't that what the calm Lan boy — Sizhui — had told them? That the information had been sent over so that they could ensure their Wei Wuxian didn't experience the same suffering? That he would be treated as he deserved to be? That he wouldn't be torn to pieces and reformed into a monster against his will?

'It will not happen,' he repeated, his determination condensing into a force powerful enough to crush diamond.

"Wangji-xiong," came a voice from his right. Lan Wangji glanced over, and saw Nie Huaisang sit down beside him. A moment later, Jin Zixuan joined them. Apparently, they had seen the look on Wangji's face and decided he could use some companionship. A show of support, and a silent promise to help him.

(He didn't need it.)

(But he also wouldn't object.)

"...Jiujiu, can we talk?"

Jiang Cheng froze mid-step.

When Jin Ling had sent a letter asking him to come to Koi Tower, he had assumed that the Jins were causing trouble for him again. With Zidian in hand ~~and Wei Wuxian's core in his chest~~ he had prepared for a confrontation.

But the hesitance in Jin Ling's voice lacked the embarrassment his requests for help always had. Instad, he sounded…

Scared.

He had just left The Cloud Recesses after a visit to Wei Wuxian, hadn't he? What had that man done this time?

~~Why didn't Jiang Cheng ever know anything?~~

"...What do you want to talk about?" Jiang Cheng finally asked.

"I don't, I just-" he cut himself off. "Wei Wuxian and Hanguang-jun suggested it, so here I am."

Jiang Cheng was getting more confused by the second.

With a long sigh, he rubbed his temples and mentally prepared himself for whatever was to come.

"Alright, what is it?"

"Er-well…" he glanced down.

'I saw A-Niang,' he wanted to say.

But, given what had come next, he had trouble being too happy about that.

"Jin Ling?"

"I-it's just… how much do you know about what happened while Wei Wuxian was inventing demonic cultivation?"

"...This is what he wants you to ask me about?"

When Jin Ling guiltily avoided eye contact, Jiang Cheng gave another sigh. Whatever this was, it was so devastating that his nephew felt like he had to dance around the issue.

"...Jiujiu?"

"I don't know," he ran a hand through his hair. "He started working on it after vanishing for three months after-"

'After giving me his golden core.'

"...After. I guess he probably holed himself up in a library or something and worked it out. After that, he figured out some more stuff while in the Burial Mounds."

At 'the Burial Mounds,' Jin Ling froze. He turned and stared at the large field of bamboo on the right, eyes wide and haunted. Growing up, his Jiujiu had always felt a little cold and dark to him. If the Jin Ling of a year ago had a choice about who to talk to about this, he would have picked his other Uncle, Jin Guangyao.

But, the second Jin Ling had learned the truth, that resource had been cut off. Even before Jin Guangyao's death, the man's position in Jin Ling's life had been destroyed.

(But did Jin Ling really need to talk about this with someone?)

The bamboo he was staring at swayed slightly in the wind.

Chenqing was made out of bamboo from the Burial Mounds, wasn't it? Had Wei Wuxian chosen to make the demonic flute, or had he been left with no other options?

~~Because Wei Wuxian had been backed up into a cliff and attacked and he fell and fell and fell.~~

"Jiujiu…" Jin Ling forced himself to swallow. "What… what would you say if, during those three months, he was learning while in the Burial Mounds?"

"Oh, was he?" Jiang Cheng scrunched his brows. "I guess I remember Wen Chao saying something like that."

"And you weren't worried?"

"He came back immediately after, so I didn't have much time to think about it. Besides, I went to the Burial Mounds while he was living there and it seemed manageable. Don't you remember it? During the second siege?"

"Yeah, but… Wei Wuxian had already purified it then, hadn't he?"

Jiang Cheng frowned and growled, "Will you stop dancing around the subject and just say what you want to say?"

"Is Wei Wuxian alright?!" Jin Ling blurted out, a flush rising up his face from his outburst.

"...You literally just saw him. Why are you asking me that?"

"Well Jingyi messed up a few days ago and we sent back things — I mean it was technically my idea I guess but it's still his fault — and now Wen Ruohan's seeing the future and we wanted to check on it and Wei Wuxian called it a learning experience so we went in and we saw him in the Burial Mounds and it looked like it really hurt and I was going to talk to him but he wasn't okay so I left and Hanguang-jun said we should talk about it with an adult and I don't need to but I figured it couldn't hurt so here I am," he concluded in a single breath.

Throughout the whole long paragraph, the only thing Jiang Cheng was able to understand was "future."

"...You used Wei Wuxian's time travel device?"

"He's started calling it the Píngxíng Gateway."

"Jin Ling."

“I mean… I guess?”

“Okay, and what was the problem again?”

“Ah. We sent over memories of the future so that they can prevent the Sunshot Campaign and things, but we… kinda included Wen Ruohan in the watchers.”

“...Right. And then?”

“Well, we wanted to make sure Wen Ruohan was actually there before doing anything drastic, so we popped in. At that time, the simulation was showing Wei Wuxian… in the Burial Mounds.”

A sudden chill zipped through Jiang Cheng which he attributed to the fact that a thick cloud had just shadowed the sun.

(He almost didn’t want to keep asking.)

(But if Wei Wuxian thought Jin Ling needed this, then he supposed it was the least he could do.)

“What did you see?”

“It-he…” Jin Ling paused. “I’d-I’d always thought demonic cultivation was evil.”

Knowing that he was in no small part responsible for that belief, Jiang Cheng remained silent. With a raised eyebrow, he waited for Jin Ling to continue.

Just then, the frantic, terrified edge that had been lurking under Jin Ling’s words throughout the entire conversation grew until it encompassed the boy’s entire being.

“Jin Ling-”

A shaking hand grabbed onto his robes.

“I…” Jin Ling pulled away and turned around so Jiang Cheng couldn’t see his watering eyes. “I just — I don’t understand. He seems so happy, but — and the ghosts and the corpses — how does he joke around with them? He never takes them seriously! He plays with them — he likes Wen Ning — he-it’s like he’s never been scared of them at all! It’s like — I just… how can he stay so happy?”

Unlike Jiang Yanli and Wei Wuxian, Jiang Cheng had never been good at comforting people. As a result, he could do little more than flounder helplessly as his nephew began to tremble and shout in grief.

“I spent so many years hating everything about demonic cultivation! I called anyone who mentioned it a heretic — I thought it was an evil thing created by a power hungry monster! And I knew that wasn’t it already — I’d met Wei Wuxian. I knew he wasn’t evil, but-but everything still seemed like a joke to him, so I thought-I think….”

Even after getting to know Wei Wuxian, he had never really thought about why the man invented demonic cultivation. He had grown up knowing about it; it just seemed like the way the world worked.

"...I feel so stupid," Jin Ling cursed, stomping his foot on the ground as his anger boiled over.

After a pause, Jiang Cheng hesitantly muttered, "...Yeah. Wei Wuxian has a way with making people feel that way."

A broken chuckle escaped Jin Ling's lips, and he hurriedly wiped his tears.

He took a deep breath in.

He had to admit, he felt a lot lighter now.

It seemed Lan Wangji was right: getting it all out in the open really helped.

Jin Ling pursed his lips together, then huffed out a sigh and turned around.

"...Jiujiu?"

"Yeah?"

"I… why didn't I see it before? Why doesn't he ever seem affected? I mean, he's clearly affected, but… why didn't I notice?"

After everything that had happened between them, Jiang Cheng felt like he was the last person who should be asked questions about Wei Wuxian. Nevertheless, he forced himself to answer.

"...I wouldn't say he's unaffected. It's just… who he is."

Even Jiang Cheng knew that was a terrible explanation.

"What I'm trying to say is…. Your mother had this thing she used to say."

"She did?"

"Yeah. She told Wei Wuxian he was born with a smiling face. No matter what happened to him or how bad the situation got, he would always be happy. He feels things like anyone else, but, when there's nothing he can do about it, he's able to just… move past it. He doesn't like letting his history control him, I guess. He rarely holds grudges for too long."

'Unlike me,' Jiang Cheng mentally added.

"Then… what am I supposed to do?"

"About what?" Jiang Cheng asked.

"I want to help him!" Jin Ling explained, his face becoming as red as an apple. "Zizhen and Jingyi were talking, and they thought maybe they'd get him a stupid book as an apology. I can do something better than that!”

Jiang Cheng still had no idea what was going on, but Jin Ling seemed to be feeling better now, so he counted that as a win.

“Just get him some emperor’s smile or something,” Jiang Cheng suggested. “He loves that stuff.”

“I can’t do that!” Jin Ling’s pitch doubled until it was a piercing squeak. “Then everyone will say I put no thought into it and I just used my money to win him over! Jingyi would never let me live that down! It has to be something better!”

“Like what?”

Jin Ling groaned and rolled his eyes, “You’re absolutely no help, Jiujiu.”

Chapter End Notes

Me: The Yiling Laozu is a tragic character. He goes through so much pain, and suffering, and trauma, and his eventual fall feels both inevitable and like his own flaws were the cause! His character arc is an amazing, emotionally gripping piece of writing that I will forever be in awe of MXTX for.

A sharp, mocking laugh sent shivers down Wen Ning's spine.

"W-Wei-gongzi?" he asked.

His friend was lying on the ground, just having woken up after a message from Mo Xuanyu.

"Well, that's very believable," the Yunmeng disciple muttered, sitting up.

"Is everything alright?" Wen Ning leaned closer.

In response, Wei Wuxian shrugged:

"Depends on how much we trust Mo Xuanyu."

Wei Wuxian's brow dipped into deep consideration as he began to pace.

"The message was a warning," he explained. "Since the simulation was experimental to begin with, Mo Xuanyu said he's still figuring it out. Apparently, he recently discovered that spending an extended amount of time in the simulation could be dangerous for the watchers."

Wen Ning paled. It was exactly as they had feared.

"We should go force them out then," Wen Ning instantly suggested, standing up. It was unfortunate that they discovered this right as the last steps of the concealment zone were being finalized, but they obviously couldn't leave their families in the simulation now. They would need to be forced out. By the end of the day, the watchers would have been inside the simulation for a full week.

Wen Ning was half way out the door when he realized that Wei Wuxian hadn't followed.

"Wei-gongzi?" Wen Ning prompted.

"...I'm not sure we should," Wei Wuxian admitted.

"But-but that's exactly what we've been worried about!"

“No, I’ve been worried that Mo Xuanyu doesn’t have our best interests in mind. For all we know, there’s something about the amount of time they’ve spent in there that will cause releasing them now to be dangerous. Or maybe the forceful release works differently than the voluntary one. It-”

“Wait, then… then what do we do?”

“I… I don’t know,” Wei Wuxian admitted, running a hand through his hair. “Mo Xuanyu’s explanation has some logic to it, but it… it doesn’t seem to be true. And it doesn’t help that everyone inside the simulation has been keeping things from us.”

“...They have?”

At that, Wei Wuxian paused in his pacing and glanced over with an amused smile.

“Really?” he asked skeptically. “You don’t think they’ve been acting just a little weird?”

As soon as those words were spoken, Wen Ning was forced to remember the way the watchers had flipped between being absolutely distraught and uncharacteristically ecstatic between segments. How they had chosen to stay inside the simulation — as confirmed by Wen Xu himself. How, the few times he had listened in while Wei Wuxian contacted them, they always seemed to be cutting themselves off before saying too much.

“So, my valiant hero, what do you think this means?” Wei Wuxian asked, tilting his head teasingly and sending a bright red flush through Wen Ning’s cheeks.

“I-um… they… know more than they’re saying?”

“And we already figured out that Mo Xuanyu’s keeping things from us.”

“I guess?”

“And I’m pretty sure those secrets are related.”

“Eh?” Wen Ning tilted his head. “Why would you say that, Wei-gongzi?”

“The people inside the simulation keep reacting oddly. Lan Qiren asked me to describe Mo Xuanyu in detail. When I did, they all made sounds of understanding or agreement. When I mentioned how Mo Xuanyu had been helping me with demonic cultivation, I heard Sect Leader Nie mutter ‘that explains it.’ All I’ve told them is that Mo Xuanyu said he created the simulation; they know something about this that we don’t.”

“But-but then what do we do?”

Here, Wei Wuxian fell silent again, sinking into deep thought. All the while, Wen Ning patiently waited for his friend to come to a decision.

“They’re… they’re still at a break,” Wei Wuxian lit up, spinning toward the room which housed the Jiangs. “It’s in between the segments right now, we can talk to them!”

He broke into a run, and Wen Ning rushed to follow behind.

Lan Wangji, Nie Huaisang, and Jin Zixuan were all seated together, staring at where the simulated Wei Wuxian had last been. Despite the slight murmerings occurring all around, the watchers as a whole were muted.

Their shock had still not faded.

(And how could it, after what had just happened?)

The Yiling Patriarch had arrived in all his glory. Everything they had expected when they first heard the words "The Grandmaster of Demonic Cultivation" had come true. He was cruel, vengeful, and vicious. He was terrifying. He tortured spiritual cultivators and left no one standing.

And not a single one of them could blame him.

(There was so much they hadn't understood. If they were able to go back in time and smack their younger, naive selves over the head for their assumptions, they would. They hadn't thought there would be anything that could change their minds about the evil that was demonic cultivation.)

(Clearly, they had been very, very wrong.)

'I'll make it up to him,' Lan Wangji mentally promised himself. 'I won't let the real Wei Ying go through that.'

But there was still so much they didn't know.

"Question," someone said.

"Yes?" Lan Qiren inquired reflexively, glancing around to see who had spoken.

"Can you guys think of any reason why Mo Xuanyu wouldn't want us all to stay in the simulation?"

"'Mo Xuanyu?'" Jiang Cheng repeated. "Oh, do you mean Wei-"

"WAIT!" Nie Huaisang screeched, cutting off Jiang Cheng's 'do you mean Wei Wuxian's older self?'

"Huaisang?" Nie Mingjue frowned. "What's wrong?"

Huaisang looked around, and shrunk back a bit when he saw everyone staring at him blankly.

"I just… I mean…" he surveyed the room again. "Is that voice… Wei-xiong?"

Jiang Cheng's heart stopped mid-beat.

“Yup,” a sly, mischievous voice responded. “Go on, Jiang Cheng. What were you going to say?”

Absolute silence greeted his question.

He was here. Wei Wuxian — the real Wei Wuxian — was talking to them.

And they had almost told him everything,

But they couldn’t bring themselves to care about that. All they could pay attention to was the teasing, cheerful tone of Wei Wuxian’s voice. The joy was somewhat fake, but it was also somewhat real.

And it made him sound so young.

(He was young and kind and warm and stunning in his every present joy.)

(And Wen Chao had destroyed that.)

“E-everything’s fine, A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian lied. “What are you… it seems a little late to check in on us. The next segment will be starting any second now.”

“I know, my bad,” Wei Wuxian laughed. “If you don’t mind, I’d like to do another check to make extra sure you are who you sound like. Uncle Jiang?”

After thinking it over for a moment, Jiang Fengmian responded, “Your father and I snuck out once under disguise when we were just a little older than you. We went to the market and won every single game there, and we ended up needing to call for some help because there were too many prizes for us to carry home in one trip. You can ask the older townspeople; they’ll remember. It was for my sixteenth birthday.”

And, since Wei Wuxian didn’t know about that, it was impossible for them to be illusions created by a mind reading demon.

“Great, thanks,” Wei Wuxian laughed. “Wen Ning, can you go check up on that real quick?”

“O-okay,” a meek voice responded. “D-don’t do-I mean… be careful.”

“I will.”

Footsteps became quieter and quieter as a figure walked away.

The more Wei Wuxian spoke, the more it seemed to Lan Wangji that there was a distinct wariness to his tone that didn’t belong there. Had something happened to him?

Sensing the same, Jiang Yanli frowned and asked, “A-Xian, are you alright?”

“Yup. Wen Ning and I are just here to tell you that the Concealment Zone is almost done. We’ll be installing after the next segment if that’s okay.”

“Oh, uh, sure!” Jin Zixuan coughed awkwardly. “Great idea.”

“Mmhm. So, my darling A-Cheng, what was it that you were saying? What does Mo Xuanyu have to do with my family? We may dress similarly, but, if anything, he looks more like a Jin to me, not that you would know that.”

All the blood rushed out of Jiang Cheng’s face.

“I…” he cut himself off. “Yeah, I was just… I was just saying ‘do you mean the guy who dresses like Wei Wuxian.’ Only someone like you could be ridiculous enough to wear such a bright red ribbon in their hair.”

At this point, there was no way they could explain the truth. They wouldn’t be believed.

(No, it was even worse than that. If Wei Wuxian saw too many inconsistencies from what he was expecting them to sound like, he might think they were spirits pretending to be the Clan Leaders and force them out.)

And besides, how could they explain this? They knew better than anyone how misleading the raw facts could be. Yes, Wei Wuxian had invented demonic cultivation, but unless someone saw what had led up to it, they would inevitably demonize the boy.

(Just like they had when they’d first heard about it.)

They could not let this information reach the outside world.

“W-well, thank you for updating us on the Concealment Zone, A-Xian,” Jiang Yanli said, nervously brushing some hair behind her ear. “We’ll see you after the next segment then.”

“You sure?”

Jiang Yanli made a sound of agreement.

In the silence that followed, Wen Ruohan could almost hear Wei Wuxian’s betrayed ‘even you, Shijie?’

However, even before this, it was clear that something had changed for Wei Wuxian. There was something that had motivated him to abruptly contact them, and something that had increased his wariness.

“Did you get any new information?” Wen Ruohan asked.

“...Somewhat, Your Excellency,” Wei Wuxian responded. “Mo Xuanyu sent over a message that told me staying in here too long would lead you to get corrupted by resentful energy.”

“What?” Madam Yu gasped.

“Do you want me to let you all out? He gave me instructions on how to force that if the exit circle isn’t working. He also said I had to put you all in different rooms for the forced exit, but that shouldn't take too long, so I can get you out now if you need me to."

"Wait-"

"Hold on."

"Don't do anything yet!"

The watchers looked at each other.

If anyone would be able to figure out about the possible danger involved, it would be the future Wei Wuxian. And, given how he had acted in the future segments, the watchers were sure he wouldn't want them to be hurt.

(But the Wens were there, and he might want them to be hurt.)

(No, more importantly, he wouldn't want them to know the future.)

"You're hesitating," Wei Wuxian observed. "Something wrong?"

"I could ask you the same," Wen Ruohan answered. "Is there a reason why you decided to ask us instead of just taking us out forcefully?"

There was a long pause as Wei Wuxian considered how to answer.

"...I was trying something yesterday, and I… got in a little over my head."

He paused again.

"I was trying to figure out a little more about the simulation and manipulating resentful energy, but it turns out manipulating raw resentful energy is just a bit harder than just manipulating the simulation."

"What?" Jiang Yanli stood-

"It's fine, Shjiie. Nothing to worry about."

"But-"

"Really, I'm fine."

But everyone here had seen Wei Wuxian getting corrupted while saving the bunny and while inside the Burial Mounds. It was far from "nothing."

"Be careful," Lan Qiren advised. "We're fine. Don't force yourself to do more demonic cultivation than necessary."

He knew, now, that Wei Wuxian would only use demonic cultivation if he felt like he had no other choice. It was time to nip his unnecessary desperation at the bud.

“Alright. But really, don’t worry about it. I got a Lan to flush it out of my system. I’m good now.”

“And your point is?” Wen Ruohan asked.

“Well, now I… have a pretty good idea of what resentful energy corruption is like, and I just… can’t find any traces of that in your bodies. It should be pretty obvious, and I felt something sorta similar from Sect Leader Nie, but other than that….”

Concerned gazes turned Nie Mingjue’s way, but he simply shook his head.

‘It’s not something to be concerned about.’

He didn’t bother to explain, but several people couldn’t help but wonder if that would be something the simulation was going to go over. They had a lot left to cover, after all.

“But you’re the ones inside the simulation, so it’s your choice.”

If the future Wei Wuxian had only recently discovered that they were staying inside the simulation or that Wen Ruohan was here, he would want them to leave. Yes, there was a chance that the future Wei Wuxian’s warnings were true, but if the older Wei Wuxian had been suspicious enough that the younger chose to ask them about it....

(Even as a teenager, Wei Wuxian had always been observant.)

And the more the watchers thought about it, the more reasons they could come up with for why the future Wei Wuxian would want them gone.

“Wait, no-” a panicked voice cried out. There was a click.

“A-Xian?”

The white void around them switched to darkness.

The segment had started. Wei Wuxian wouldn’t be able to contact them until it was over.

And now, the Wei Wuxian they would be seeing would be the Yiling Patriarch, not Wei Ying.

An ear-piercing screech of a high note filled all nearby spirits with a single command.

There — them — kill them!

Power rushed into the watchers like a shot of adrenaline, and the song began to dangle even more energy before them like bait. They swayed on their feet or sank to their knees, unprepared for the sudden jump in resentful energy.

(Its power was intoxicating.)

The whispers of revenge rose in volume. The sounds Chenqing produced were intentionally grating — unquestionably sinister — and perfectly conveyed the message

Wei Wuxian wanted to send.

‘Help me,’ the song sang. ‘I’ll give you more power — more energy — more life. Rip them to pieces and I’ll give you everything.’

Lan Xichen swallowed, stunned to find saliva pooling in his mouth.

(But he could taste the power it offered and-)

'What do you want us to do?' Jin Guangshan thought, swaying on his feet. Even knowing it wasn't real, the call was nearly impossible to ignore. The memories were from a spirit, so the watchers were experiencing what Wei Wuxian's army felt.

It was breathtaking.

And the song freely offered them more of this feeling; in exchange, the spirits and corpses and other resentful beings would only have to find the Wens. Find them — hunt them down — rip them — tear them to pieces for what they’d done and-

The watchers forced themselves to take deep breaths, trying desperately to resist the urge to pounce on Wen Chao and tear his skin off his body. They knew it was only a spirit’s memory.

(They wouldn’t be able to touch him; there was no point.)

But everyone’s eyes sharpened like a predator’s regardless.

“What?” a Wen soldier asked. “What’s going on?”

His only answer was a menacing flute and the starved growls of corpses.

Nie Huaisang swallowed, trying to shake himself out of the effects of the demonic cultivation. Somehow, that only succeeded in making him hungrier.

Swaying on their feet, the corpses clumsily stepped closer. The music continued its beckoning orders.

‘You’ve found them,’ it said. ‘You know what to do.’

Even Lan Xichen began unconsciously stepping closer. And closer. And closer.

The Wens were there. And hadn’t he seen what they’d done? Didn’t he know they deserved this?

Revenge. For the Cloud Recesses. For Lotus Pier. For Wei Wuxian.

‘Yes!’ the music sang, filling their minds with even greater desire. ‘Yes. Yes. Yes.’

Suddenly, Jin Guangshan’s stomach felt more empty than it had ever been in his life.

If he plucked out a Wens’ eye, he would have something he could eat.

Right as drool began to form in the watcher's mouths, the simulated Wen Chao looked up to where Wei Wuxian stood.

His eyes widened in terror.

"Sorcery…" he accused. "Sorcery!"

'You're a Wen,' the song made Wen Chao acknowledge. 'You're the Wen. Go on. Look down at your hands. You're so hungry. Won't you feel better if you take a bite?'

"No," the real Wen Chao whimpered, shaking in his seat, drool falling out of his mouth. "No. No. No. No-"

The flute picked up speed into a single command.

'Go!'

And the spirits who had followed it along — the corpses who could feel the emptiness in their stomachs for the first time in centuries — obeyed.

At once, every corpse broke into a run. Like starving animals, they tore into the Wens. Flesh was ripped off; teeth were pulled out; bones were crunched and crunched and crunched and the blood of those their master disliked was spread across the ground.

"Yes!" Nie Mingjue shouted, for his personal grudge just as much as for the music. And it went just as he'd always hoped it would. It was a massacre.

As more and more corpses came, Wen disciples were thrown to the ground and eaten alive. Their necks were crushed under powerful jaws.

(Just like the corpses had tried to do to Wei Wuxian.)

Hands clawed at their chests and the blood that trailed down only attracted more.

(Just like Wei Wuxian.)

Their limbs were yanked out of their sockets and their bones were crushed to dust.

(Just like-)

It was justified. It was paying them back equally.

(It was wonderful.)

(And it wasn't indiscriminate.)

The few Jiang and Lan disciples left all had their swords unsheathed and ready, but no corpses approached them. Instead, the demonic beings ran straight past, only interested in the Wens their master had set as targets.

"Come on!" Wen Chao shouted. "Stop them!"

Wen Zhuliu ran forward, knocking corpse after corpse aside. But, no matter how many times one was sent flying back, there were ten more to take its place. Wen Zhuliu knocked away as many as he could.

But he couldn't stop them all.

More and more got by him, sinking their teeth into the Wens they reached.

A vicious grin formed on Jiang Cheng's face.

The corpses devoured the Wens, and left everyone else alone.

The simulated Jiang Cheng looked around in shock, "They're only… killing the Wens."

Lan Wangji frowned up at the distant figure of Wei Wuxian.

"He is a man with evil methods…."

Like he'd been slapped, those words shocked Lan Wangji out of the song's effects. Yes, he knew why his other self was against such evil cultivation. It was wrong — he knew that.

But the Burial Mounds hadn't given Wei Wuxian a choice.

'If you had seen it,' he thought. 'If you had felt it, you wouldn't be saying that.'

"But…" Lan Wangji continued. "He seems to be a friend, not an enemy."

'Yes,' Wen Qing thought, glaring fiercely. 'Which makes it that much harder for us to resist his orders.'

As the demonic cultivator's song reached another crescendo, Jin Guangshan greedily sucked in a desperate breath of resentment-filled air.

A laugh.

"I don't care how he does it," Jiang Cheng declared. "If he kills those Wen dogs, he's my ally!"

'Yes,' the song agreed. 'Your ally. Your master. Kill them. Kill them. Kill them!'

Just like Wei Wuxian, the simulated Jiang Cheng had been completely altered by the war.

He didn't care what he had to do to get revenge.

Watching what her brothers had been turned into, Jiang Yanli felt her adrenaline from the song transition into frustrated hopelessness.

The simulated Wen Chao began to back up in fear. Rather than any sort of resistance, his soldiers could only function as food for the approaching army.

"Help me!" he yelled, turning to run. "Help me!"

A hand snatched his ankle, pulling him to the ground. He looked back, and saw Wang Lingjiao's mangled corpse crawling over him.

"No," Wen Chao begged, feeling the world blur around him as the song pierced through his skull and wormed its way inside his mind.

'Yes!' the song continued. 'Good. The Wens. That Wen. Get him. Get him. Get him. Get him!'

"No-"

'Yes. Tear through their skulls!'

"No. No. No-"

'Rip off their flesh!'

"No-"

'Break his bones!'

"No-"

'Eat. Eat. Eat.'

Pain shot up Wen Chao's arm and he flinched back. He was inside the simulation; nothing should be able to hurt him.

But, when his eyes traveled lower, he saw teeth marks implanted into his now bleeding hand. Something had broken through skin trying to bite his finger off.

Under the influence of the Yiling Patriarch's cultivation, something had been ordered to eat his flesh. Something had wanted to eat him.

A few seconds passed, and realization began to creep in. It was him. He had wanted to bite his finger off. He had wanted to eat himself.

(And then he'd tried.)

'Good!' the music sang again.

Wen Chao's blood dripped onto the floor.

He screamed.

And the simulated Wen Chao screamed with him, trying to kick off Wang Lingjiao as she bit into his arm.

"Get off me!" he shouted. She was thrown back, and Wen Chao began to crawl away.

She followed after him, the flute beckoning her forward.

Loud laughter shook the room as Jiang Cheng's joy joined Wei Wuxian's song.

This was exactly what Wen Chao deserved.

"Get back!" he ordered. "Get back!"

Because of Wen Chao, Wei Wuxian had been forced to shout the very same thing when he had been thrown into the Burial Mounds.

They hadn't been able to help Wei Wuxian; they wouldn't bother trying to help Wen Chao.

"Wen Zhuliu, save me!"

Right as Wang Lingjiao pounced forward, she was knocked aside by the Wen dog. However, there was no core for him to destroy, nor life in her to end.

She landed on her stomach and skidded across the ground, only to look back, cracking the bones in her neck until her head was facing 180° away from where it should be.

Wang Lingjiao's corpse stood up.

At the sight, the real Wen Chao's screams became silent. His mouth opened, but no sound came out.

In his head, only one thought remained.

'Wen Zhuliu will save me. Wen Zhuliu will save me. Wen Zhuliu will save me!'

Blood continued to pour from his hand onto the ground.

Then, at long last, the song ended.

The army summoned by Wei Wuxian had dealt with all the Wens but Wen Chao and Wen Zhuliu.

(And those two were personal.)

"A-Xian?" Jiang Yanli asked, her head finally clearing now that the flute was gone.

Rather than the brother she knew, a figure draped in shadow stepped forward. Black energy circled around him, and the green fire in the surroundings parted in his presence.

He walked to the edge of the roof, and then, surrounded on all sides by the caws of crows, he began to glide through the air. The resentful energy was holding him up.

It was nowhere near as fast as a cultivator's sword — useless for long distance travel — but, if he truly no longer had his core….

Wen Ruohan shook his head disbelievingly, speechless before the boy in front of him.

Wei Wuxian's figure glided to the ground, descending like a panther who had already caught its prey. As he landed, his long, flowing, elegant robes drifted down around him.

Not* the robes of Yunmeng Jiang.

Because this wasn't Wei Wuxian, their head disciple. This was the Yiling Patriarch: the demon who had conquered the Burial Mounds.

When they heard the tavern guests speak in the first segment, they thought the people in the future had gone crazy. The Burial Mounds? An "ally" of the four clans? Killing thousands of cultivators at once?

Ludicrous.

Or so they'd thought.

But now, before them, was a man bathed in resentful energy. A man who the army of corpses bowed to in subservience. A man whose cruel smile could silence even the arrogant, idiotic Wen-er-gongzi.

A tragedy.

Wei Wuxian continued walking forward.

As the footsteps began to near him, all the excess blood drained from Wen Chao's face. Trembling, he moved his outer robe to cover himself, as though blocking his eyes would somehow protect him from demon before them.

Step by step, Wei Wuxian moved closer.

Tears began to fall out of Wen Chao's eyes, which Wen Ruohan acknowledged apathetically.

It would be wrong to say he didn't care at all; an heir was vital if Wen Ruohan wanted to leave his mark on the world. Wen Ruohan would keep his son fed, protected, and enabled, because any stain on Wen Chao was a stain on him.

None of that changed the fact that Wen Chao was his spare.

On the other hand, there was the Yiling Patriarch. Wen Ruohan might not care for Wei Wuxian on a personal level, but he valued talent, determination, hard work, ingenuity, and loyalty. He had adopted Wen Zhuliu as a member of his clan. Before her betrayal was revealed, he had favored Wen Qing regardless of her distant relation.

~~In another world, he would have moved Meng Yao up in his ranks without a second thought for the boy's scandalous origins.~~

With the Yiling Patriarch standing before him, why would he care for his talentless disgrace of a son? Between the two of them, Wei Wuxian was the one who invented talismans people continued to talk about for decades after his death.

(Between the two of them, Wei Wuxian was the one who would ensure Wen Ruohan's legacy.)

And the Yiling Patriarch's march continued:

Step.

Step.

Step.

Wen Chao looked faint.

"What kind of monster could do such a thing?" the simulated Wen Chao demanded from behind Wen Zhuliu.

Wei Wuxian didn't bother to answer him. Chenqing held by his waist, he continued to approach the pair.

He paid no attention to Jiang Cheng or Lan Wangji, who stared from the side in open-mouthed shock. On their faces, their thoughts could clearly be read.

It was Wei Wuxian.

And it also wasn't.

Aside from his face, the man before them looked nothing like Wei Wuxian. The cold grin couldn't have been further from Wei Wuxian's easy smile. He was handsome, yet pale.

His aura was eerie.

Remembering how they had felt seeing the Yiling Patriarch in the first segment, the watchers were sympathetic to the boys' shock.

(But, after what Wei Wuxian had gone through, nothing about him could be the same.)

Finally, Wei Wuxian came to a stop.

Wen Chao was frozen before him.

"We meet again, Wen Chao," Wei Wuxian greeted. His voice was even, malicious, and cold.

Nothing at all like it should be.

"You — who are you?!" Wen Chao demanded.

"Stop," the real Wen Chao whispered, clutching his bleeding hand tightly.

Instead of answering, Wei Wuxian smirked deeper.

“Core Melting Hand,” Wei Wuxian greeted mockingly.

“Be careful A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli whispered, terrified that what had happened to Jiang Cheng might happen to her other brother. “Remember, he’s still the Core Melting Hand.”

Demonic cultivation or not, there was no defense from that.

‘Unless he doesn’t have a core,’ Wen Ruohan thought. Wen Qing’s face became increasingly grim.

After making eye contact for several seconds, Wei Wuxian tilted his head inquisitively, “Do you really think you can protect him from me?”

“Look out!”

Wen Zhuliu attacked.

Ruby red eyes gazed down at the man. Then, with a simple wave of his hand, Wei Wuxian sent Wen Zhuliu flying back.

The watchers were knocked off their feet.

Black energy had burst out of Wei Wuxian’s body, overpowering the Core Melting Hand just like Wen Zhuliu had overpowered Lan Wangji just a few minutes ago. However, instead of skidding to the ground, Wen Zhuliu remained suspended in the air. Black energy seeped out of the surrounding corpses, fueling the binds trapping Wen Zhuliu in place.

Then Wei Wuxian raised the hand carrying Chenqing, and played.

Wen Zhuliu’s bones cracked under the strain. His gasping mouth couldn’t even scream due to the pressure contracting his chest, and his struggling arms began to bend until they heard them shatter.

‘What?’ Wen Chao stared.

The spirits making up the black resentment binding him began to laugh at Wen Zhuliu’s futile struggle.

“What a loyal dog,” Wei Wuxian commented.

“I…” Wen Zhuliu couldn’t breathe. “I must repay… His Excellency’s kindness.”

“Repay his kindness?” Wei Wuxian growled.

Resentful energy exploded out in an avalanche of darkness, increasing until the only things visible were two glowing eyes.

They could taste Wei Wuxian's fury.

"Why is it that the debt you owe has to be paid at the expense of others?!" he demanded.

More energy rushed out, building on itself to greater and greater heights.

Nie Huaisang fell to the ground.

(The pressure Wei Wuxian exuded nearly equalled that of the Burial Mounds.)

The power circled around the Yiling Patriarch like a tornado.

Then, it swept inside.

(Resentful energy would poison a human's body. Wei Wuxian knew that better than anyone. And yet, now, it seemed to fuel him.)

"The Core Melting Hand," Wei Wuxian muttered.

He made a fist, and the spirits around Wen Zhuliu twisted. His arms were turned until his shoulder broke and his legs did the same and his bones crumbled under the strain-

In the last segment, people had claimed that no human would be able to do the torture Wei Wuxian was enacting.

In a way, they were right.

(Wei Wuxian only knew how to do all this because the spirits had done it to him first.)

Wen Zhuliu would receive no pity from them.

With a groan, Wen Zhuliu was forced to his knees. The bones in his arms shattered as they were moved, and his blood dripped onto the ground.

The blood on Wen Chao's hand did the same.

(It would be fine. It had to be. Wen Zhuliu would find a way out of this. Wen Zhuliu would protect him!)

Wei Wuxian stepped directly in front of the kneeling Core Meling Hand. Resentful energy swept around him, making his robes move like shadows.

He didn't even look human anymore.

(Was he still human?)

The bright red eyes looking down at the Wen seemed to say 'no.'

"...A-Xian?" Jiang Yanli asked, hoping the word would help her find her brother somewhere in the being before her.

Wei Wuxian lifted a hand forward, and the resentful energy commanded by it pulled Wen Zhuliu back into the air.

'Wen Zhuliu will be fine,' Wen Chao thought. 'He'll get out and save me and-'

Red light flashed through the darkness, and Wei Wuxian was behind the Wen. As Wen Zhuliu gasped in agony, the Yiling Patriarch's eyes turned an even brighter crimson than before.

Blood rushed out of Wen Zhuliu's coughing mouth.

When Wei Wuxian turned back, he was holding a golden orb between his thumb and forefinger.

"That's…" Wen Ruohan couldn't finish.

No one could.

That couldn't be-

Wei Wuxian turned the orb, observing its form, and then, in a shockwave of resentful energy, shattered it.

Even if they knew what to say, no one would be able to speak a word.

Wen Ruohan stepped back and sat down, unable to believe what he had just seen.

Had Wei Wuxian removed Wen Zhuliu's core? That was impossible. It couldn't have happened. But if it had-

"Who…" Wen Chao shook. "Who are you?"

Wei Wuxian walked by the feared Core Melting Hands' body without care.

If it had happened — if Wei Wuxian had actually ripped out a core — then that was the final proof he needed, wasn't it? All this time, Wen Ruohan and Wen Qing had been trying to find something to disprove their theory on how Jiang Wanyin had regained his core. After all, a core transfer was absurd.

Wei Wuxian continued to walk forward, unharmed despite Wen Zhuliu's best efforts.

No, Wen Ruohan was being silly. Perhaps Wei Wuxian's time in the Burial Mounds had given him an opportunity to expand his understanding of his own core. Maybe he had learned so much about cores while on his own that he'd figured out how to extract them, even though he had no outside resources. Maybe he had found an ancient text in the Burial Mounds with instructions.

(Or, maybe, he'd spent days feeling each and every cut it took to remove a core from a cultivator's body.)

Wen Qing would never have suggested the operation, so Wei Wuxian must have read through her notes on the subject. If he knew that — if he'd survived the excruciating pain of getting it removed one piece at a time-

It would be no surprise if Wei Wuxian's knowledge of core extraction exceeded even Wen Zhuliu's.

(And a transfer was when it was meant to be intact. If Wei Wuxian didn't care about its condition… if he just wanted to rip it out….)

'No,' Wen Ruohan shook his head. 'I'm getting ahead of myself. He couldn't have done a transfer. Besides, if he could repeatedly rip out cores, everyone in the world would know about it. Someone would have mentioned it.'

Then again, Wei Wuxian was doing this specifically for the irony of it. If he was aiming to simply kill everyone else he went up against (and using his army to do so), then why would he bother? Given how many corpses had to be present for him to restrain Wen Zhuliu in such a way, Wen Ruohan had no doubt it was extremely difficult to do.

(But to give away a core that, in less than a decade, had grown strong enough to seal his sword?)

That didn't make sense; Wen Ruohan couldn't understand how anyone would do that.

But he didn't need to. He could recognize patterns when he saw them, and this one was becoming clear as day.

Finally, Wei Wuxian came to a stop. He looked up, and the blood-red glow in his eyes sent shivers down the watchers' spines.

(Or maybe that was the smile on his face, so cruel and malicious that it couldn't even be recognized as Wei Wuxian's.)

Jiang Yanli looked away.

(And yet, after the Burial Mounds, no one could say they were surprised. Wei Wuxian still looking and acting remotely human was better than any of them could have hoped for.)

They had seen what Wei Wuxian had gone through. They knew why he had changed. Judging by the undisguised horror on his face, the simulated Lan Wangji wasn't so lucky.

"Wangji," Lan Xichen whispered sadly, watching both his simulated and real brothers' faces crumple in despair.

"Wei… Ying," the simulated second jade whispered.

The Yiling Patriarch didn't spare him a single glance. Instead, he turned his attention to the gasping Core Melting Hand, who was fruitlessly crawling across the ground, trying to stop him from killing Wen Chao.

Barely able to crawl on twisted arms, the now-coreless guard dog struggled to look up. All the power that had once been in his body was gone — ripped out — until he was less than a civilian. His limbs were mangled beyond recognition.

Nauseous, Nie Huaisang looked away.

"Wen Zhuliu," the Yiling Patriarch purred. "Did you want to protect him?"

"Wei Ying?!" Wen Chao gasped out, finally recognizing the monster before him. "No way! That's impossible!"

'Attempt the impossible,' Jiang Fengmian thought. However, this time, he couldn't bring himself to be proud of his head disciple's accomplishment.

(It shouldn't have had to happen.)

"You-"

Wei Wuxian's deepening smirk silenced Wen Chao's protests.

"Monster…. Monster!" he ran.

'This isn't how it's supposed to be,' Wen Chao thought. 'He's mine! He's not supposed to — he can't kill me. He can't! He-'

With an amused hum, Wei Wuxian twirled Chenqing around his hand. A moment later, the fleeing Wen Chao was cut off. Wang Lingjiao's corpse stood before him.

"Wei Ying!" the cowering Wen Chao shouted, backing up. "If-if you dare touch me… my father will kill you!"

Wang Lingjiao's mouth crept open.

(Jiang Cheng's face switched to a bloodthirsty smirk.)

"No," Wen Chao whispered. "No! No-"

"I wonder," Wei Wuxian muttered. "Do you know what it feels like to eat human flesh?"

"...What?" Wen Chao whispered helplessly.

With a smirk, Wei Wuxian directed a hand forward, silently commanding Wang Lingjiao to move.

Connected to resentful energy as the watchers were, they instantly knew what Wei Wuxian's command had been.

A piercing scream cut through the night. The laughter of corpses joined it.

The jaws of a child snapped down, tearing out a chunk of Wen Chao's leg. Another ate his ear. Another ripped off his pinky. Wen Chao opened his mouth to scream-

The pinky was shoved down his throat.

Lan Qiren gagged.

The spirits clawed at Wen Chao's stomach — his calf — his ribs. Fingers, feet, neck, thigh, eyes-

They sunk their fingers knuckle-deep into his flesh. They played with his organs — they tore out muscle — they continued without rest, because the founder of demonic cultivation ordered them to.

'Take,' the resentment whispered.

And they wanted to.

Like starved wolves whose only sustenance was Wei Wuxian's approval, they wanted to.

'Good. Do it! Do it! Peel it off! Make him eat! Break him! Tear him! Rip! Shatter!-'

The commands of Wei Wuxian's cultivation were almost impossible to resist. Wen Chao felt his mouth start to water, and the flesh that covered his own bones began to draw his famished eyes.

(He was so, so hungry.)

No matter how much Wen Chao thrashed his legs in pain, there was no way for him to escape. A hand clawed at his thigh, carving out a strip with knife-like nails. Wen Chao's screams doubled.

So hungry.

Wen Chao thrashed widely, slamming his hands against the ground until the bones in them snapped in two.

So very hungry.

(No. No! He was not going to eat himself! He was not. He was not-)

Panic set in and Wen Chao stood up. He had to run. He had to leave-

But there was nowhere to go from here. He could do nothing but listen to his other-self's screams.

Seeing Wen Chao's broken hand, a male corpse ripped off a chunk of his forearm and stuffed it in the unwilling mouth. On its way out, the corpse's hand pulled off a tooth.

Wen Chao's screams became gurgles of blood.

Wen Chao gagged, coughing out bile and spit. He couldn't watch — he couldn't, but-

He couldn't look away.

(The laughter of the corpses rang in his ears.)

“Wei Ying! That’s enough!” Lan Wangji called out, running forward.

A wall of resentful energy bursted out of the ground, separating Wei Wuxian from Lan Wangji.

“Wei Ying!” he shouted.

But Wei Wuxian remained focused on the scene before him.

(Three of Wen Chao’s fingers were gone. About half his left thigh had been torn off. His right ear was in tatters, and his left was completely removed.)

(And all of it had been stuffed down his own throat.)

They might not pity Wen Chao (after what he had done, that was impossible), but, as Wei Wuxian’s revenge went on and on, more than one person was forced to look away.

While Wei Wuxian continued to observe the show, two spirits separated themselves from the shadows and took human form. One was a young woman, whose too-long fingers began lovingly combing through Wei Wuxian’s hair. The other was a pure white child, leaning against Wei Wuxian’s knee as it gnawed on another one of Wen Chao’s removed fingers.

Swallowing back bile, Nie Huaisang moved inside Nie Mingjue.

As Wen Chao’s toes were torn off, Wei Wuxian began affectionately patting the head of the ghost-child next to him.

Jin Guangshan licked his lips.

Looking at it like this, it was quickly becoming clear how much Wei Wuxian had changed. After the Burial Mounds, it wasn’t a surprise that he was more at home with ghosts than people.

And yet, the sheer scale of Wei Wuxian power left Jin Guangshan an equal mix of disbelieving and ravenous. If he hadn’t seen it for himself, he would never have believed it. Something like this couldn’t even count as a battle.

Wen Zhuliu had been child’s play for Wei Wuxian.

When the Wen Sect attacked Lotus Pier, the number of soldiers they had brought equalled the number who came for this battle. Yes, the Sunshot Campaign’s side had done better than Yunmeng alone had, but….

If, right now, the army that took down Yunmeng had to face off against Wei Wuxian, Jin Guangshan knew without a doubt they would lose. It wouldn't matter whether Wei Wuxian had any allies; he could take them all on by himself. He hadn't made the Stygian Tiger Seal or the Ghost General yet, but, even without his two strongest tools, no clan could stand a chance against him.

Before them was the Yiling Patriarch, the strongest weapon in the cultivation world.

Jin Guangshan stared at it and hungered.

(He wanted it. He wanted this being by his side, at his feet — controlled, suppressed, submissive — those beautiful silver eyes glowing red with hate but unable to do anything as Jin Guangshan approached.)

He glanced to the side, and saw Wen Ruohan finalizing his own plan on the matter.

(Well then, it seemed to be in his best interests to remain as close to the Chief Cultivator as possible.)

Blood gushed out of Wen Chao's body, soaking the ground in red liquid. His cheeks were stained in blood and tears, and any attempts to flee were crushed instantly. Another cut of arm was stuffed into Wen Chao's mouth.

He wouldn't survive much longer.

Both the real and virtual Wen Chao directed their eyes toward Wei Wuxian, searching desperately for a shred of mercy.

The cold, crimson eyes staring down at them had none.

'I...I'm sorry,' Wen Chao thought, too afraid to speak. 'I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I didn't — it wasn't me. It was my father! He's the one who ordered me to do all this. You understand, right? You know that.'

Tears and snot ran down his face.

'You're Wei Wuxian,' he thought to himself. 'You'll stop, right? You know it was my father. My father and that bitch of a maid. She tricked me! It was her idea! She sent the flare out! It wasn't my fault!'

Wei Wuxian tilted his head, shaking off the female spirit who had been hanging on his shoulder.

'Yes! You'll let me go! You know it wasn't my fault, right Wei Ying? You'll let me-'

Wei Wuxian brought Chenqing up to his mouth, and sent a new order out.

"I-"

Energy impaled Wen Chao and Wang Lingjiao, making Wen Chao's agonized screams increase in volume. He swung his limbs wildly, unable to move as the stake through his chest kept him suspended in the air.

Wen Zhuliu crawled across the ground, trying to help, but halted when he saw shadows loom over him.

Dozens of corpses dived into the Core Melting Hand at once.

Wen Ruohan frowned minutely.

It was like he wasn't worth being killed by Wei Wuxian personally. Instead, with a careless flick of his wrist, he let the corpses tear Wen Zhuliu apart.

Nausea crept up Jiang Fengmian's throat.

Wen Chao continued to thrash, coughing out blood as more and more dripped down from where energy impaled his stomach. His gurgled, broken wails begged Wei Wuxian for mercy. Then, the Yiling Patriarch's song changed and energy surged.

Wen Chao's screams came to an abrupt halt.

Two bodies fell to the ground, their heads and limbs severed from the torso, along with various other bits and pieces Wei Wuxian's energy had ripped off. With so much of it having been torn off already, the flesh couldn't even be recognized as a human's anymore.

The world seemed to tip around Wen Chao, and he gagged out bile from where he was collapsed on the ground.

No one knew what to say.

Then, unnoticed by Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji began to approach.

"Wei Ying," he whispered.

The Yiling Patriarch glanced back. His eyes had returned to silver, and, without the red hate, looked even colder than before.

"Hm?" Wei Wuxian glared. "Lan Zhan."

There was a pause.

"No, I suppose I should call you 'Hanguang-jun' now."

All the warmth that had once been in his tone was gone.

The two stared at each other for several long, agonizing seconds.

As much as the watchers had all wanted revenge, what Wei Wuxian had done was far, far more severe than any of them could have predicted. What he had done was inhuman.

But Wen Chao was the one who had made him that way.

“Here!” Jiang Cheng shouted, tossing something into the air. “Your sword.”

Wei Wuxian caught it easily, then slowly allowed his arm to drop slackly. After gazing down at it for several seconds, he forced himself to speak.

“...Thank you.”

The words which had come so easily to the Wei Wuxian of just a few months ago now sounded stilted and awkward.

(He had communicated with the spirits and Wens through orders, music, and threats; how long had it been since he had last spoken with someone?)

Another awkward silence spread over the trio.

How long had it been since Wei Wuxian had last interacted with anyone? Even without the status of an heir, Wei Wuxian had been fourth highest on the list of desirable young masters. His charisma was known throughout the land.

And now he could barely speak to his brother.

Finally, Jiang Cheng walked over and struck him.

“You brat! Where have you been these past three months?” Jiang Cheng asked, voice overjoyed despite the harsh words.

But the fact that he had to ask meant he didn’t believe that Wei Wuxian could have been in the Burial Mounds. And why would he? It was supposed to be impossible to escape.

(Had Wei Wuxian escaped? It almost seemed like he had just brought the Burial Mounds with him.)

And, as they had expected, Wei Wuxian paused blankly, as if not registering that Jiang Cheng’s question had been directed at him.

(And why would he? These past three months, everything he had encountered was a threat. It was probably all he could do to not attack the two boys before him.)

Jiang Cheng collapsed in his seat, cursing angrily.

Wei Wuxian just gave a bitter laugh: "If I'd been thrown into the Burial Mounds, how could I be here now?"

"Liar," Madam Yu hissed. It wasn't technically a false statement, but it was an implied one and he-

Why would he feel like he needed to hide that?

~~Had she trained this behavior into him?~~

Jiang Cheng looked like he was about to continue, when Lan Wangji spoke up.

"Wei Ying," he stepped forward. "Are you the one who has been killing the Wen Sect's disciples?"

Having expected the question, Wei Wuxian just sighed and responded, "Of course."

"And those sinister talismans?"

"That was me."

Lan Wangji's frown deepened.

"Ah, Lan-xiong," Nie Huaisang shook his head. "What he needs right now isn't judgement-"

"I know," Lan Wangji whispered.

He knew. He had seen what happened. But his other-self hadn't.

Taking one step forward, Lan Wangji asked, "Wei Ying, what are you doing to control those dark creatures?"

Any approachability in Wei Wuxian's expression vanished at the question.

"Lan-er-gongzi, what are you trying to say?"

Lan Wangji's eyes were glued to Wei Wuxian.

"Answer me," he demanded.

This was not the reunion they had been hoping for. And yet no one could truly blame either side.

Frustration building, Lan Xichen began to clench his fists.

Behind the pair, the ghost woman and child Wei Wuxian had summoned began to stir. When Wei Wuxian sent a careless glance back at them, they backed off and sank into the darkness.

Having felt the power of the silent command, some watchers began to sway on their feet.

"...What will you do," Wei Wuxian wondered, "if I don't answer?"

He slid to the side, dodging Lan Wangji's sudden attack, and walked three steps back.

"Lan Zhan, we've just reunited after so long and you're already trying to catch me."

"Stop it!" Jiang Yanli protested. "This isn't how it's supposed to-"

"Wei Ying, there is always a price to pay for practicing evil. There has never been an exception."

A terrifying smile appeared on Wei Wuxian's lips.

"It doesn't matter. I can pay whatever price there is."

'Arrogant,' was their first instinct.

'Desperate,' was their second.

It was arrogant of him to assume he would be fine — to not realize that he would soon die, torn apart by his own corpses as he lost control. To believe that he would be the only one capable of more. That much confidence was dangerous, and he would pay dearly for it.

However, it was desperation that fueled it. Wei Wuxian had no other options while in the Burial Mounds, and, now, he wanted revenge more than anything else. He should have gone back to spiritual cultivation once he escaped, but his effectiveness now was unquestionable. It was still wrong, but, after what had happened, the watchers could understand why he was making this decision.

(None more than Wen Qing and Wen Ruohan, who realized just how few options Wei Wuxian had been left with.)

However, Lan Wangji hadn't seen what had forced him to develop it, nor did he have the full story of what caused Wei Wuxian's hate. He, as Hanguang-jun, continued.

"It's bad for your body and your mind."

"I know what I'm doing-"

"Some things are beyond your control!"

"Everything is within my control."

Yes, that was arrogance.

But if he hadn't been arrogant enough to believe he could single-handedly leave somewhere inescapable, he never would have made it out of the Burial Mounds.

Finally, Wei Wuxian turned around and asked, "As for any changes to my mind… what would a stranger know about that?"

Lan Wangji flinched back.

His other self snarled.

"Wei Wuxian!"

"Lan Wangji!"

Wei Wuxian didn't trust him.

As soon as that realization sunk in, a collage of memories flew past Lan Wangji's eyes.

'Get lost!' he shouted.

'Lan Wangji will hate you forever,' Jiang Cheng commented.

'Oh, wake up. Lan Wangji was constantly telling you to 'get lost,' wasn't he? Did you forget that?'

'Wei Ying, you really are… the kind of person I hate the most.'

Yes, Wei Wuxian had continued provoking him and trying to get a reaction, but, given what Lan Wangji had said in response, was a lack of trust really surprising? Especially after Wei Wuxian spent so much time alone.

'Why is he here?' the thirteen years later Wei Wuxian had thought. 'I need to get out of here.'

"Wei Ying," he whispered, praying that, somehow, his feelings would be understood.

Then, as if in direct contrast to his wishes, Wei Wuxian's anger seemed to grow.

"You — save your lectures! What could be more evil than the Wen Clan?"

A tidal wave of resentful energy bursted out of him and spread in all directions, pushing the watchers back and sending a shaking Wen Chao tumbling further away.

The air seemed to turn black under Wei Wuxian's rage. To the spirits in the area, it truly felt like the Burial Mounds had been released on the spot.

Wen Ruohan swallowed, unable to contain his awe at the sheer intensity of the cultivation on display before him.

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji whispered. "Come back to Gusu with me."

"To Gusu?" Wei Wuxian asked, his eyes returning to a warm silver in his confusion.

"Yes," Jiang Yanli whispered. "He needs help."

Jiang Cheng nodded. He knew why Wei Wuxian was acting like this (understood it better than he would ever admit), but he was also able to see this logically. After all, his brother wasn't a demonic cultivator. The real version of his brother was doing just fine outside. His parents weren't dead — were, in fact, right next to him.

So Jiang Cheng could see just as well as anyone that Wei Wuxian needed help.

However, a moment later, the red returned.

"I see," Wei Wuxian laughed. "After all, your uncle despises people who cultivate on the dark path! You're his most beloved disciple; of course you're the same as him!"

"Wei Ying-"

"Who do you think you are?" the Yiling Patriarch growled. "I'm not afraid of you or the Gusu Lan Clan!"

Energy exploded out of him again, and the drained corpses dropped to the ground.

"A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered helplessly. "Please. You're hurting. You need help."

"Lan-er-gongzi," Jiang Cheng stepped forward. "With all due respect, whether Wei Wuxian is right or wrong, he belongs to the Yunmeng Jiang Clan. What he has done is not up to the Lan Clan to judge."

"Oh no," Nie Huaisang whispered.

Yes, Wei Wuxian was (for now) part of the Yunmeng Jiang Sect, "belonging" to its leader. However, it seemed unlikely that the newly reformed sect would have the resources to give Wei Wuxian the help he needed.

And the other Jiang Cheng either didn't notice, or didn't care, too caught up in the possibilities of revenge Wei Wuxian offered to give that a second thought.

Scowling, Jiang Cheng walked forward and kicked his other-self's shin. It phased through, but it made him feel better regardless.

(Still, maybe it was all for the best. Wei Wuxian was a member of the Jiang Sect, after all. They needed to stay together.)

Confident in his choice, Jiang Cheng stood like a wall between them, while Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian stared down at the ground, refusing to make eye contact. Then, finally, Lan Wangji turned around.

With a heavy heart, he walked away.

The world faded to black.

"What?"

"You're leaving?"

“Lan-xiong, just explain that you want to help!”

Lan Wangji pursed his lips, conceding to the point. Yes, if he would just explain that it wasn’t for punishment — that it was an act done out of love-

‘And don’t worry, I’m not into men like that! I wasn’t planning on really taking advantage of you.’

He didn’t have to explain that it was out of love. He just needed to convince Wei Wuxian to go back-

‘No! I’m not going in!’ the future Wei Wuxian protested outside the gates of the Cloud Recesses.

Convince him to go somewhere he clearly didn’t want to go to?

No. He would not be his father. Wei Wuxian had made it quite clear he wasn’t interested in him as anything more than a friend — no matter what Nie Huaisang said. Lan Wangji would not force his feelings on him. Leaving was his best option.

(If he could just remove the pit rapidly expanding in his heart, he might be able to make himself believe that.)

Time passed by, but the room’s gray surroundings remained stagnant. Soon, it became clear that they were in another break.

“...Well,” Nie Huaisang laughed in false cheer. “That was… certainly exciting.”

“Depressing might be more accurate,” Madam Jin disagreed, a statement to which no one objected to.

Wei Wuxian was back.

But he was different.

(Of course he was. They’d known the Yiling Patriarch was the complete opposite of their Wei Wuxian, and they’d known no one could get out of the Burial Mounds unchanged. And yet, somehow, the sheer scale of the changes left everyone speechless.)

Finally, Madam Jin turned to the Jiangs and spoke again, reaffirming, “I am willing to not request punishment later.”

“What?” Jiang Cheng asked, wondering how it could be possible for them to not punish Wen Chao.

“In regards to Wei Wuxian,” Madam Jin clarified, joining him in glaring at the Wens.

“O-oh… right.”

The Wens were already planning on this. With Wei Wuxian….

Jiang Fengmian frowned, then turned to Lan Qiren, Nie Mingjue, Jin Guangshan and Wen Ruohan to ask, “Do we all agree that what… happened to Wei Wuxian makes his change understandable?”

He was answered by nods from all around.

“So the things he does later as a result of this change are not to be punished?” Madam Yu assumed.

Another round of nods.

“Wait, no,” a strangled voice gasped out.

Heads turned toward the sound, and the watchers saw Wen Chao, trembling on the ground.

“Problem?” Nie Mingjue growled out.

“Yes. Yes. No-I…” he shrunk down. “No… no, when we get out… we need to — it’s not a punishment, but we… we’ll need to stop him. You can’t — you won’t right? We need to-we — you need to kill that monster! You can’t let him turn into that! Nothing can stop him now, you need-”

“Chao-er,” Wen Ruohan growled, making his son flinch.

(The other watchers looked to be seriously considering whether or not it would be worth it to leave the simulation just to kill Wen Chao.)

“Father, please-please, we have to! We can’t — not him — We can’t let that thing live!”

“And yet, wasn’t it your attempt to kill him that turned him into this?” Wen Ruohan asked. “You even tried to ensure he couldn’t come back as a vengeful ghost. Instead, because of that, he turned into a demon. Why would trying to kill him as soon as you get out lead to a different conclusion?”

The little blood that had been left in Wen Chao’s body seemed to vanish at that question.

Withholding a sigh, Lan Xichen turned to the other watchers and confirmed, “So, are we all in agreement to not hold Wei Wuxian’s later actions against him, provided that they don’t seem like things he would have done normally?”

“We are,” Nie Mingjue confirmed.

No one disagreed.

Frowning, Madam Yu directed her eyes toward her daughter, who was making eye contact with her fiance. No one was willing to say it, but they all knew what was to come.

Someday, soon, the Yiling Patriarch would kill Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli, forcing Jiang Cheng to lead a siege against him. He would kill Wen Ning and turn the boy into a weapon.

He would create the Stygian Tiger Seal and use it to battle hundreds of people at a time, unjustly massacring them all.

But no one had ever escaped the Burial Mounds before. In all honesty, he could have turned out much, much worse.

(It was clear the normal Wei Wuxian would never do those things, so even Wen Qing was willing to look the other way when they happened. They couldn't blame him for going insane.)

A tense silence began to spread out over the watchers, and Lan Qiren forced himself to look away.

'I see,' Wei Wuxian laughed. 'After all, your uncle despises people who cultivate on the dark path! You're his most beloved disciple; of course you're the same as him!'

Was it his fault?

Demonic cultivation was wrong and amoral, Lan Qiren knew that better than anyone — had taught that better than anyone. And yet, for the first time in his life, Lan Qiren couldn't help but feel like the rigid, unwavering rules he had loved were wrong.

Inside the Burial Mounds, Wei Wuxian's demonic cultivation had been more of a reflex than anything. It was his only option if he wanted to survive; there was literally nothing else he could have done. However, now, he could have returned to spiritual cultivation and sought help. And his nephew was offering assistance.

But Wei Wuxian didn't believe him because Lan Qiren would never compromise on the matter.

In the back of his mind, a voice that sounded a lot like Cangse Sanren tutted disapprovingly.

On the side, Wen Ruohan glanced over everyone present. Even without Wen Zhuliu, it wouldn't be easy for the Sunshot Campaign to win. The Wens had an enormous army, and, based on the descriptions Sizhui had given, Wen Ruohan was relatively certain that the war would last for a few more years.

However, Wei Wuxian was here now. The Sunshot Campaign had survived long enough for the Yiling Patriarch's return.

(Now, the Wen army would be chipped away bit by bit until they were wiped out.)

This was a failure on his other self's part.

It would not happen to him.

Then, at long last, light returned.

Jiang Yanli walked through a crowded pavilion, holding medicine in one hand and a cloth in the other. Her white mourning robes had been exchanged for more practical, cheaper, darker ones.

All around her, medical professionals worked tirelessly to save injured soldiers.

Jin Zixuan clenched his fists, mentally preparing himself to defend his fiance if Wen Chao decided to foolishly mock her lack of battle participation. Given the work Jiang Yanli was obviously doing, it would be easy for him to verbally demolish any argument Wen Chao made.

However, nothing came.

“Endure for a moment,” a healer requested as an agonized scream broke out.

Wen Qing clicked her tongue, annoyed at the amateur work being done, but aware that the war left the Sunshot Campaign with few other options.

“Are you okay?”

“Ah!”

All around, what looked to be hundreds of cultivators scurried from one sickbed to another; the ground was covered by a carpet of bodies.

Jiang Yanli moved to kneel next to a patient, gently tilting his head up so he could take the medicine she offered.

And Wen Chao paid her no mind. He had far more important things to worry about.

(Every time he closed his eyes, he could see the demon’s red orbs staring down at him, glowing in the night. His father was a sect leader, and Wen Zhuliu had been his bodyguard; none of that had been enough to stop Him.)

“Slowly, slowly. Don’t hurry,” Jiang Yanli requested.

Why would Wen Chao care about them? It didn’t matter what those humans did or felt; all that mattered was ~~Wei Wuxian~~ the Yiling Patriarch.

‘It can’t happen again,’ Wen Chao thought. ‘It can’t. Don’t let it happen. Don’t make it happen — why did it happen? Why? Why? Why? Why?’

“Have some medicine,” another healer requested.

Then, the simulation switched focus so that the doors were the center of the watcher’s attention. After a moment, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng stepped through, instantly looking up to survey the room. Jiang Cheng’s terrifying grin had disappeared, but, even more obviously, the cloud of darkness (which had been as attached to Wei Wuxian as his shadow) was gone.

Some time had passed. Enough for Wei Wuxian to have calmed down and realized that bringing resentful energy into a hospital was a recipe for disaster.

(Had Wei Wuxian finally gotten food? Sleep? Shelter? Was he back to normal, or-)

After several long seconds of searching, Wei Wuxian found what he was looking for.

He approached a gasping patient, whose severed arm had already been treated. Having returned to a more normal state of being, he was able to walk through the crowd without issue.

(But to the watchers, who were receiving the memories from a spirit, the power within him was still a blazing firework, impossible to ignore.)

"Endure it," Jiang Yanli requested again, wiping away the injured Nie cultivator's sweat with her damp towel. Wei Wuxian paused before her, his expression apprehensive.

Just a short while ago, the simulation had shown them Wei Wuxian's return to Lotus Pier after leaving the Cloud Recesses. His overjoyed smiles and cheerful demeanor during that reunion with Yanli couldn't be further from the muted version before them.

Jiang Yanli glanced back at the shivering Wen Chao — the person who had destroyed the boy Wei Wuxian used to be — and felt her fury spread to every cell in her body.

"Come," Jiang Yanli continued, wiping the patient's neck.

"...Shijie," Wei Wuxian whispered.

Her hand froze.

The watchers frowned. Even after everything, the voice he spoke to her with was affectionate.

(So then why did he kill her?)

After a pause, Jiang Yanli slowly turned and looked back, making eye contact with her to-be murderer, her shidi, the Yiling Patriarch. Even with his new look, she could instantly recognize him.

"XianXian," she whispered.

For the first time, a smile that looked vaguely reminiscent of the old Wei Wuxian formed on the Yiling Patriarch's face.

At the sight of that, Lan Wangji felt his clenching fists finally relax.

In a private room of the fort, away from the crowd gathered outside, the three siblings all looked at each other. Then, slowly, Jiang Yanli reached forward, cupping his cheek with her hand and trailing it up and down disbelievingly.

"A-Xian," she smiled, overwhelmed by the experience. "You've gotten so thin."

Her words brought another non-malicious smile to Wei Wuxian's face-

Something that shouldn't be considered rare, but now was nonetheless.

He nodded once and added, "You too, Shijie."

She laughed, her head ducking down momentarily as if trying to hide the tears forming in her eyes. She sniffled, battling with her emotions to calm herself down.

'It won't happen,' Jiang Fengmian promised himself. He made eye contact with Madam Yu, and saw the same determination blazing in her eyes.

Wei Wuxian raised his hand, and, after a moment of hesitation, wiped away a tear from her face. Behind them, Jiang Cheng's expression similarly flashed into sorrow, before he shook it away and forced his usual scowl to return.

Like this, it almost seemed like everything was going to be alright.

A small smile formed on Lan Xichen's face, and he nodded once at Jiang Yanli in support. The warm glow she sent back was reassuring and uplifting to the highest degree.

But-

"A-Xian," she leaned forward. "Where have you been all this time?"

Just like that, the easy happiness which had begun to appear in Wei Wuxian vanished. He looked down.

"Wei Ying?"

The pause spread out.

Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue made eye contact, broadcasting their shared concerns to all who could see.

The longer Wei Wuxian neglected to respond, the further into despair Jiang Yanli's face fell. Just when it looked like she was considering retracting the question and apologizing, Wei Wuxian leaned forward and pulled her into a hug.

"W-well," Nie Huaisang coughed. "Earlier, he keep physically avoiding Jiang-xiong and Lan-xiong. Maybe this is progress?"

"Progress that won't be enough to save him," Nie Mingjue countered, frowning deeply. Right now, Wei Wuxian was faced with an inevitable, resentful energy fueled decline into insanity.

(So much like Nie Mingjue's own impending doom, that he couldn't help but sympathize.)

Then, finally, Wei Wuxian forced himself to speak.

"Shijie," he whispered. "Don't worry so much. I'm fine."

“Liar,” Jiang Cheng shook his head, forcing himself to calm down. Why was Wei Wuxian always blocking them out? Why was he always shutting them off? Never answering questions? He hadn’t even planned on coming back! Was Wei Wuxian just going to stay long enough for the Jiang Sect to become a great sect again, and then leave?

‘I’ll follow your lead, just like my father followed your father,’ he had promised.

Both Wei Changze and Wei Wuxian had abandoned the sect, only to die young. They’d set out on their own from the sect they’d helped make strong, and then, without resources or help, had died.

(No matter what, Jiang Cheng wouldn’t let that happen to Wei Wuxian.)

A smile returned to Jiang Yanli’s teary face, and Wei Wuxian reached forward to wipe her tears. Carefully, she reached out to cup his cheek again, as if unable to believe that he was really there. They smiled at each other, so overwhelmingly loving and tender that some of the watchers were forced to look away.

A throb tugged at Wen Qing’s heart, and she found herself wondering how her brother was.

“Wei-xiong!” a familiar voice cried out. “Wei-xiong!”

“Huaisang,” Nie Mingjue gasped out in relief, grateful for further confirmation that his brother was alive. At that, Lan Xichen, Jiang Yanli, and Wen Qing gave small laughs.

“Wei-xiong!” Nie Huaisang cheerfully exclaimed, entering the room and running over to where the three were.

“Wei-xiong, I heard you were back. It really is you!” he laughed, raising a teasing finger to wiggle it in mock disapproval.

There were smiles all around.

He walked around the table to sit next to a distracted Wei Wuxian, “You’re really-”

He jumped close.

Wei Wuxian flinched.

A body moving near him was all it took to make him jump back.

(After he spent three months surrounded by corpses constantly reaching out to grab a bite of the human who had fallen in, what else could be expected? Yes, things seemed to be going alright now, but they knew the Yiling Patriarch’s crimes had yet to be revealed.)

In the past few segments, the watchers had allowed naive hope to blind them from what was to come. ‘He’ll escape. He won’t be thrown in. The Burial Mounds aren’t that bad.’ Even now, the calm interactions had fooled them into believing Wei Wuxian was more recovered than in truth.

(Somehow forgetting about the 3,000 murders yet to come.)

They would not allow themselves to be blindsided again.

After Wei Wuxian had flinched back, an unmistakable aura of awkwardness spread across the Yunmeng siblings and Nie Huaisang. The Nie heir's hand remained still in the air, and the Jiang siblings' expressions were equally frozen.

Then, Wei Wuxian gave a nervous smile and pushed Nie Huaisang's hand down.

"Nie-xiong, long time no see," he greeted quietly.

Even if he wanted to, there was nothing a barely-functional cultivator like Nie Huaisang would be able to do to the Yiling Patriarch.

Literally no one except his birds had ever been scared of Nie Huaisang.

And yet-

Eager to disperse the awkwardness, Nie Huaisang began, "Wei-xiong, you've been missing for months. Everyone was desperately looking for you. Especially Lan-er-gonzi and Jiang-xiong and-"

"That's enough," Jiang Cheng interrupted, grabbing onto Nie Huaisang and pulling him up. "You're talking too much."

"Eh? I wasn't finished!"

Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang gave simultaneous snorts at the red spreading across Jiang Cheng's scowling face.

"But-"

"Come on!"

The door clicked shut, leaving Jiang Yanli and Wei Wuxian alone. After a moment, Jiang Yanli rested a comforting hand on Wei Wuxian's arm and stood up.

"A-Xian, I'll go prepare you some food. Rest for a while. We just got you back. Don't exhaust yourself."

Hearing her soft, sweet voice, Jin Zixuan felt her cheeks heat up to a dusty pink.

Once he had made sure Jiang Yanli had left the room, Wei Wuxian allowed his smile to disappear. He reached to his side to pick up Chenqing, lifting it into the air to give it a closer look. With light fingers, he ran his hand around the flute, re-familiarizing himself with its grooves.

And with what it represented.

Behind the wall to his left, the watchers were brought to see a soft-footed figure step forward. Lan Wangji moved to stand at a large crack in the wall, giving him a vantage point from which to look inside. When he laid eyes on Wei Wuxian — who was holding Chenqing, instead of Suibian, and wearing his hair down, instead of up — Lan Wangji's hand clenched dangerously around the hilt of his sword.

However, he didn't speak up.

Wei Ying clearly hadn't wanted to see him anymore. The real Lan Wangji was glad his other-self seemed to agree.

Then, the world shifted, and switched to a worn down but no-longer-burning pier.

"Yunmeng?" Jiang Yanli asked, looking around at the scarred wood around them.

"Following the victories at Jingchu and Chongyang, Jiang Wanyin and Wei Wuxian chased the Wens to the north of the Qin mountains, recovering all the lands lost from Jingchu. A mere month after Wei Wuxian's return, the Yunmeng Jiang Clan had reclaimed Lotus Pier."

A cheer erupted from Jin Zixuan, Nie Huaisang and Jiang Cheng, and even Lan Wangji smiled.

(But there was a bitter tint to it all the while. After all, this was only made possible by ~~Wei Wuxian~~ the Yiling Patriarch's demonic cultivation, something he shouldn't have had to invent.)

(And now that they had returned to Lotus Pier, it was easy to see just how much Wei Wuxian had changed.)

Soft footsteps echoed across the pier as the Yiling Patriarch walked forward. A gust of wind pulled his loose robes into a graceful dance, making the changes in his appearance even more obvious than before. His new, unfamiliar clothes; his changed hairstyle; his flute. None were insulting on their own, but….

(Such long, flowing robes would be annoying for an agile swordfighter. Loose hair would be dangerous in a close ranged fight. A flute should not be a cultivator's main weapon. All combined, it was obvious how much Wei Wuxian had changed.)

Then again, the changes themselves weren't inherently bad. Even if they didn't match Wei Wuxian's close ranged and agile fighting style, those features could suit the Lan one. Wei Wuxian's significantly cheaper robes lacked the ease of motion Lan Wangji's had, but perhaps he didn't have any spare Yunmeng ones. And while his youthful cheer had been replaced by a subdued melancholy, he was still breathtakingly beautiful. The alterations could almost be excused as a sudden jump in maturity.

(Almost.)

(It wasn't a natural progression; it was an engineered one. He hadn't needed to be that mature before.)

Silently, Wen Qing wondered how much of Wei Wuxian's aura could be attributed to the sudden loss of his core. When Jiang Cheng had lost his, he had seemingly withered away, losing all life and starving himself for days. While more extreme than most, it was hard to call that an a-typical reaction for people who had lost their cores.

(And none of them had been thrown into the Burial Mounds immediately after.)

The previous fight had shown that Wei Wuxian was still powerful, but, to a doctor's eye, there were many causes for concern.

'He's so thin,' Wen Qing thought. It wasn't obvious at first glance — especially with how his loose robes covered almost all of his body — but a close look at his hands showed signs of starvation. His jaw and cheekbones had become sharper, but it was difficult to tell how much of that was natural, and how much was from starvation.

It had been months since he had gotten out of the Burial Mounds, hadn't it? Why did he still look so bad?

'A-Ning better be taking good care of him out there,' Wen Qing mentally added. As if knowing what she was thinking based off her expression, Jiang Yanli glanced back at her and smiled.

Wei Wuxian looked to the left and watched as a new, undamaged flag of the Yunmeng Jiang Clan was raised into the air.

When Jiang Cheng glanced behind him, he saw his father watching him with a regretful but nonetheless proud expression. The man nodded at him.

'Be more open with praise for your children,' Jiang Fengmian reminded himself.

Given the way Jiang Cheng seemed to be struggling to avoid melting into a puddle of goo, Jiang Fengmian felt he had done acceptably with that interaction.

All around the pier, there was similar evidence of recovery. The wood was charred at the edges and the grass was nearly gone, but new saplings were beginning to grow in the cracks left behind. Large blemishes on the walls had been covered by new flags, and the faded Lotus symbols were looking brighter in the sunshine.

'Wei Wuxian,' a voice — a memory — called out.

'Did you miss me?' the past's Wei Wuxian teasingly responded.

The Yiling Patriarch looked down, unwilling to think too deeply into all of that.

As Madam Yu looked around, she couldn't help a nostalgic sensation that crept up in her. How long had it been since she'd last seen this?

‘I…’ Madam Yu had breathed out, unable to contain her anger. ‘You damn brat! I hate you! I hate you more than anything else! Look what our sect has turned into because of you!’

She froze.

(Were those really the last words she'd ever said to him?)

(Well, her simulated-self had, but she knew she would have done the same in that situation.)

Could Wei Wuxian even bear to stand in Yunmeng anymore? He couldn’t have believed the attack was his fault — surely he knew she was just saying that — but both her words and the physical attack Jiang Cheng had given him immediately after would stay with him. Did this place even feel like home anymore?

Why was she still thinking about this? She had already admitted her simulated-self was wrong! It was over.

(Was it? Or was she still acting the same?)

Wei Wuxian wasn’t a member of her family-

(But he could have been, if it wasn’t for her.)

He wouldn’t believe her apology anyways.

(And whose fault was that?)

Madam Yu cursed and turned away, unable to watch Wei Wuxian any longer.

Then, finally, Wei Wuxian began to move again. He stepped forward and journeyed to the stairs of the main building, tracing the wooden rail with his hand as he walked up. The delicate, calming touch wasn’t like the past Wei Wuxian at all.

But it did look human, rather than demonic.

(However, Wei Wuxian was going to kill Jiang Yanli. Any humanity they saw in him couldn’t be trusted too deeply.)

Wei Wuxian’s journey brought him back to the dining hall, where much more restoration had been done. The wooden floor was smooth, the furniture had been put back, and Yunmeng Jiang’s flags hung from every wall.

It looked just like it had before the Wens.

‘Where have you been?’ Wei Wuxian’s memory of Madam Yu had asked. ‘Jiang Cheng, how many times have I told you to focus on practicing? You never listen!’

Something in her was guiltily grateful that he remembered that instead of her last words to him.

'And you!' Madam Yu's voice continued. 'You should set a better example for your junior disciples!'

'San-niang,' the memory of Jiang Fengmian's voice responded. 'You don't need to push the children so much.'

'They're seventeen!' Madam Yu shouted. 'They're not children anymore!'

Jiang Fengmian's smile vanished.

At seventeen, Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng had been children. And now, just a few months later, he wasn't sure he could say the same.

Wei Wuxian came to a stop before what had once been Jiang Fengmian's seat.

"A-Xian."

He flinched and turned around.

There was no one there.

"Oh, A-Xian," Jiang Yanli whispered, taking a deep breath to collect herself. That had been her father's voice. There was no one to act for; the humanity they were seeing in Wei Wuxian was genuine.

And right now, the vulnerability in the Yiling Patriarch's eyes made him look like the teenager he was.

(But they couldn't let themselves forget that the Burial Mounds had changed him. Once something made him snap, Wei Wuxian would have no mercy for anyone.)

And yet, as Wei Wuxian stood alone in the silence of the now-empty pier, they had trouble making themselves believe that.

Slowly, Wei Wuxian allowed his face to fall, realizing that he had imagined the voice. From his right, Jiang Cheng entered the room and began walking forward.

"Uncle Jiang and Madam Yu's bodies…" Wei Wuxian began. "Were you able to find them?"

A nod.

At the reminder of how Wen Ning had stolen them — saved them — Jiang Fengmian and Jiang Yanli gave Wen Qing small bows of thanks. She shook her head to show how unnecessary it was, but the gentle smiles sent her way made her back down.

(They reminded her of Wen Ning.)

"The ancestral hall… have you set places for them in it?"

“I have,” Jiang Cheng responded.

As the conversation continued, the watchers were brought outside the room to where Jiang Yanli stood behind the wall.

At the concrete proof that she was still okay, Jin Zixuan allowed his tense hands to finally relax.

(Based on what had been shown, he was certain that his sect would be trying to stay out of the war under his father’s lead. His new friends in the Jiangs siblings, Nie Huaisang, and Lan Wangji were the only ones he had to worry about.)

In Jiang Yanli’s hands was a carefully-balanced tray carrying five bowls of soup. As she stood behind the wall, she seemed to battle with herself about whether to go in.

“Don’t worry,” Wei Wuxian hissed. “I’ll place Wen Ruohan’s head in front of your parent’s tomb soon enough.”

Upon hearing that, Jiang Yanli took a deep breath and forced a gentle smile on her face.

In the past few months, Jiang Yanli had lost her parents, her sect, and Wei Wuxian. She had gotten the latter two back, but something like that would shake even the strongest people. Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng had responded to the trials life threw their way by making themselves strong enough to stop it.

And yet Jiang Yanli’s strength — inner strength — was just as admirable.

‘She’s so cool!’ Jin Zixuan’s brain couldn’t resist shouting at him.

She stepped forward and walked through the door.

“The lotus and pork rib soup is ready,” she offered.

At those words, the terrifyingly determined gazes on Sect Leader Jiang and the Yiling Patriarch vanished, switching to mystified gratitude.

‘She has quite a bit of influence on him,’ Wen Ruohan noted calmly.

“Who wants some?”

“Me!”

“And me,” Wei Wuxian added instantly, finally relaxing.

“How could Wei Wuxian kill her now?” Lan Qiren wondered. It seemed impossible.

But so many things in the simulation had, and yet there had been an answer for all of them.

The soup was placed on the tables. One for Wei Wuxian; one for Jiang Cheng; one for Jiang Yanli.

And one for each of her parents.

'Thank you, A-Li,' Madam Yu thought, but didn't say.

Some part of her mind could acknowledge that maybe that was something that should have been spoken out loud. To her great disbelief, her husband seemed to be trying to do that, and the grateful smile he sent their daughter's way served its purpose. She probably didn't need to say anything.

But she could.

And she didn't.

'You're not the right person for this,' a voice in her subconscious whispered. 'Don't even try.'

Once every bowl of soup was set down, conversation resumed.

Jiang Cheng took a bite out of a piece of root and commented, "Although we've reclaimed Jingchu, Wen Ruohan has tens of thousands of well-trained soldiers on the way. The four clans are all concerned; we haven't come up with a plan yet."

Of course not; they shouldn't have, but there was still a reason the Sunshot Campaign's members had hesitated for so long. Wen Ruohan was far from simple to defeat.

"Well," Wei Wuxian hummed. "I think I have an idea."

"Of course he does," Jiang Cheng muttered, then flinched when Lan Wangji glared.

"You do? What is it?" the simulated Jiang Cheng asked.

Lan Wangji's unimpressed gaze made his complaint perfectly clear.

(Right. It wouldn't do to fall into the 'Wei Wuxian can fix everything' trap again.)

"Let's hear it," Jiang Cheng ordered.

"Remember last year, when I told you about the black sword I found on Muxi Mountain?"

"Last year," Nie Huaisang muttered, amending his mental timeline of events. He might not be able to help his brother and friends with the fighting once they left the simulation, but this, at least, he could do.

"You mean… the one that sank into the lake?" Jiang Cheng asked.

"That's the one."

The world around the watchers instantly darkened into the cave where the Xuanwu had hidden for thousands of years. Then, a bright red glow filled the cavern.

Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan both leaned forward in interest.

Blasting out of the lake like an erupting geyser, the black sword was summoned by a command it had no choice but to obey. It was made to hover in the air, kept suspended by a force the watchers couldn't see. To the side, Wei Wuxian floated parallel to the blade, kept up by a mountain of resentful energy.

When Wen Chao's breathing stopped, it wasn't just because of the layers of energy weighing him down.

(Those red eyes were there again. And he would never escape.)

Wei Wuxian's arm was outstretched towards the sword, controlling its movement.

In a voice-over, Wei Wuxian continued his explanation:

"It's claimed countless lives, and absorbed the resentment of thousands more due to being buried under murdered corpses for two thousand years."

The watchers knew that better than anyone. When Wei Wuxian had picked up the sword while fighting the Xuanwu, they had felt the energy it contained. They had expected it and were, at the time, far more worried about Wei Wuxian than the sword, but its strength hadn't gone unnoticed by anyone.

Wei Wuxian frowned.

"If we can find it and use it to our advantage…."

He clenched his hand into a fist, and beams of red light shot through the sword's corroding rust. They condensed, and a shockwave of red light bursted out.

Jiang Yanli and Nie Huaisang yelped, knocked off their feet by the blast.

Wei Wuxian and the resentful energy battled for dominance, turning the lake below turbulent and vicious. Waves crashed against the rocks and leapt into the air, but Wei Wuxian paid them no mind.

His gaze was entirely focused on the sword which contained the energy of thousands in its metal. Anyone else would have been swallowed whole, just like what had nearly happened to Wei Wuxian in the cave a year ago.

But the Wei Wuxian battling it now had tamed the Burial Mounds.

This sword was nothing compared to that.

The next burst of energy made even Lan Xichen wobble where he stood, demolishing the stone in its path. Something this powerful seemed untamable.

And yet, after putting up one final attempt at resistance, the metal caved in and bent to the Yiling Patriarch's will.

With a smirk, Wei Wuxian reached forward and grabbed the newly-forged Stygian Tiger Seal.

Wen Ruohan couldn't help but grin-

Wei Wuxian gasped, waking up. All around him was the Cloud Recesses, and his body was no longer just his.

Mo Xuanyu's eyes stared up at the ceiling.

Two blinks.

"...What?"

Wei Wuxian sat up.

Again.

"What?"

Wei Wuxian looked around, observing the white bed and blue furniture that was located in the Jingshi.

"We're… back in the future, it seems," Lan Xichen observed.

'Wei Ying's in my room,' Lan Wangji realized. 'He's on my bed.'

The second after he thought that, he cursed his mind and doubled his planned punishment.

(Wei Wuxian had made it clear he wasn't interested, Lan Wangji had no right to think of him that way. Just like he'd had no right to think of the Yiling Patriarch that way. How he'd had no right to turn what was the result of endless suffering on Wei Wuxian's part into something else, no matter how delicious the smirking tilt of his lips had looked.)

A fierce blush darkened Lan Wangji's ears, and he decided to triple his planned punishment instead.

(Wei Wuxian had said 'no' to returning with him. Any affection Lan Wangji might have thought was there was clearly a mistake. He needed to stop.)

The blue sky outside the window was just starting to become dim. Based on the position of the sun, it was most likely late afternoon on the same day Wei Wuxian had been brought back to the Cloud Recesses.

"He's been… sleeping?" Nie Mingjue wondered.

"Probably," Wen Qing nodded. "He's still not used to this new body, and he had experienced a lot the night before."

Jiang Cheng nodded in agreement, seeing the logic. Wei Wuxian had run from Lan Wangji, fought Jin Ling, gotten saved by Hanguang-jun, killed a terrifying goddess, ~~gotten whipped by Zidian~~, and been dragged to the Cloud Recesses. He had only been brought back to life a short while ago, it was no surprise that he had fallen asleep so deeply.

After a moment's hesitation, Nie Mingjue nodded to Wen Qing in thanks.

"Sixteen years later; the Cloud Recesses!" Jingyi nearly shouted, most likely overjoyed at returning to a point in the story that he was there for.

This time, when the Lans looked around and saw slight changes in the buildings of the sect, they knew the cause.

Wei Wuxian forced himself to sit up, bringing a hand to his head as if trying to rub away a headache. He sighed.

"Guess I'm an old man now, always dreaming about the past."

If you counted the time he had been dead, he was in his thirties; if you didn't, he was in his early twenties. Even if he hadn't been a cultivator, neither of those would classify as an old man.

The adults in the room wanted to sigh in amusement, but, remembering how quickly Wei Wuxian's innocence had been lost, felt any humor they might have had evaporate.

He looked around, cataloguing the room with a questioning gaze.

"Where's Lan Zhan?" he wondered.

His use of the second jade's birth name was overly-familiar and rude. Lan Qiren should disapprove of it — especially considering it was Wei Wuxian saying it.

And yet, after the Yiling Patriarch's arrival, he couldn't help but feel grateful for its use.

(Wei Wuxian seemed much calmer now than he had been as the Yiling Patriarch. Even after reconquering Lotus Pier (months after his return), there had been a notable tension in his body.

Then again, back then, he had been overflowing with resentful energy. Perhaps now he had gotten somewhat cleansed. Or maybe the resentful energy had nothing to do with it at all, and it was simply that some time alone allowed him to come to terms with everything he had been through.

(If only it hadn't taken dying to get there.)

The world faded away.

When the world shifted to return the watchers to the in-between area, Nie Mingjue felt himself scowl deeply. They had all known that Wei Wuxian would be changed by his time in the Burial Mounds, but their predictions had differed.

Jin Guangshan, Wen Qing and Wen Ruohan had assumed it would be a seemingly instantaneous switch into an irredeemable monster, lacking both the morality and logic his human self had once possessed. Wen Qing had figured it would take a monster to turn her brother into a weapon, and had set her expectations accordingly. They had originally believed that they were correct, but the later scenes and the reminder of how he was in the future proved them wrong.

The Jiangs, Lans, and Jin Zixuan had hoped that there wouldn't be many changes. It was, in hindsight, foolish of them to think so, but the idea that someone they had gotten to know could change so much was staggering. Appearance wise, he still looked physically like an older version of himself.

And yet everything else — even the way he interacted with his Shijie — was wholly and completely wrong.

The Nies and Madam Jin had taken more realistic approaches. Madam Jin knew full well the effects her husband's actions could have on the less willing girls he targeted. Although Wei Wuxian hadn't been raped, she couldn't imagine nearly being eaten alive was much better. Similarly, Nie Mingjue understood better than anyone how mentally damaging resentful energy could be, and had a general idea of what that would change Wei Wuxian into. In comparison, Nie Huaisang had very little understanding of the corruption of resentful energy, but a much more accurate understanding of his friend. Wei Wuxian had lost so much, of course he changed. They were only somewhat surprised by the end result.

Still, it was far from ideal.

Lan Wangji sighed.

In synch, almost everyone else copied him.

"At least we know he does get better," Lan Xichen attempted, referring to the thirteen-years-later future. The Wei Wuxian of that time had been playful and teasing. Even when the Mo family's young master tried to grab him, he hadn't flinched away.

(And he had flinched from Nie Huaisang of all people.)

Huffing a bitter laugh, Nie Mingjue sarcastically muttered, "Of course, very helpful. If he ever gets that bad again, we'll be sure to do everything we can to kill him-"

"No!"

Ever since watching his own death, Wen Chao had become a muted, trembling figure in the corner of the room who ever watcher had started subconsciously tuning out. His sudden outburst was more than a little unexpected.

"What?" Jiang Cheng hissed. "You have a problem with him dying? Weren't you just advocating for that?"

“No. No, you were right. I’m sorry. He dies and he-he’ll become that. No, we need to-we have to keep him human-”

“He is human! You saw him speak to my A-Jie!”

“It’s just an act, we know he’s going to kill her!”

Everyone flinched back.

(They had all thought the same. That didn’t mean they wanted someone to say it.)

“...It’s not an act,” Jiang Cheng stubbornly bit out. However, having no basis for that claim, he had no choice but to back off.

“And besides, whose fault is it that he got that far?!” Madam Jin demanded. “When asked who’s responsible for my son’s death, I think a much more accurate answer would be you.”

“We don’t even know how that happened yet,” Wen Ruohan corrected.

Frowning at being forced to agree, Lan Qiren added, “Those at the beginning also said that Wei Wuxian was responsible for the destruction of Lotus Pier, and we all saw how that went.”

Madam Yu growled.

“But his future self never admitted to Lotus Pier,” Jin Guangshan pointed out. “He did, however, ask himself why he ‘of all people’ had mentioned her son’s lack of parentage. Given the slap that followed, I doubt it was a simple matter of him loving his Shijie.”

“And you would prefer that, wouldn’t you?” Jiang Fengmian couldn’t resist asking. “A weapon that lacks discourse of reason and mercy, instead of how A-Xian is supposed to be.”

“We can talk about ‘supposed to be’ all we want, but this is what happened,” Jin Guangshan responded. “And besides, if a proper clan backed him and helped remove the stigma against his powers, it might not be so bad. He seemed rational enough.”

“Please, Sect Leader Jin,” Jiang Yanli bowed. “I think we can all agree that the changes A-Xian has gone through were not good for anyone. Avoiding it is the least we can do.”

Jin Guangshan fell silent, but it was clear to everyone that he didn’t agree. And why would he? The Yiling Patriarch had ripped out Wen Zhuliu’s core. The mere threat of Wen Zhuliu had kept the heirs in line at the labor camp for weeks; any sect Wei Wuxian allied with would be unstoppable.

Unfortunately, it was now clear that his loyalty to the Jiang Sect was nearly impenetrable. Luring him away with honor wouldn’t work, as Wei Wuxian had already proven himself to be indifferent towards his reputation when he and Lan Wangji credited each other for taking down the Xuanwu. Putting pressure on him wouldn’t work, as the Massacre of Lotus Pier had already shown him to be extremely adaptable. Perhaps Jin Guangshan could send a woman over to seduce him?

(He did seem to enjoy flirting with them, but his instant interest in Lan Wangjij's righteousness, character, and strength made that avenue obsolete. Even if it worked, it would never last.)

Both Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan reviewed the moments of weakness they had seen in Wei Wuxian. Jiang Yanli seemed to be the strongest contender, but she and Lan Wangji had both seen the simulation, and would never agree to coercing Wei Wuxian to join them. They knew almost nothing about his martial siblings, and the friendships he had formed while in the Cloud Recesses were also undisclosed. And in the future….

Hadn't he gotten awfully protective of the juniors in a short amount of time? And given Jiang Yanli's comments about how he was as Yunmeng Jiang's head disciple, that protectiveness seemed to be true even now.

With a sigh, Jin Guangshan mumbled, "It's too bad. If he was a woman, we'd be able to force a child on him that would bind him to a sect. With the face he has, there'd be no shortage of volunteers."

Jin Zixuan froze.

Unfortunately for Jin Guangshan, as Wei Wuxian wasn't a woman, there would be no way for the mother to have more claim over the child and trap him in a sect.

For a moment, Jin Guangshan pictured the view the Yiling Patriarch would make if someone tried anyways. Swollen lips, disheveled hair, heavy breathing, and bite marks all along that smooth, delectable neck.

He hummed to himself.

"Maybe we should try anyway. If we chained it up somewhere, it could be quite a prize."

"...I'm sorry, I… I beg your pardon?" Lan Xichen asked, and all other conversation immediately halted. Given the volume Jin Guangshan had spoken at, only the people closest to him had heard him.

However, Lan Xichen's tone instantly alerted everyone that something was wrong.

Jin Guangshan blinked under the sudden attention and gave a nervous laugh, "Ah, nothing. I-"

"That was not nothing."

"I was merely brainstorming ways to keep him from falling so out of control."

"We won't need to!" Jiang Cheng shouted, glaring at Wen Chao. "So long as that idiot doesn't throw him into the Burial Mounds, he won't need to fall that far!"

"And if it does happen?" Wen Ruohan wondered. "Yes, those were extreme circumstances, but we all know them now. If someone else finds out about this, they could force it to happen."

“‘Someone else?’” Lan Qiren parotted.

“Hypothetically.”

“Of course,” Jiang Fengmian glared, knowing full well that the most dangerous candidate for that was the person who had suggested it.

“Well, it-it won’t happen,” Jiang Cheng declared.

“I just feel like a little insurance would be necessary,” Jin Guangshan disagreed. “Surely we can at least consider a plan.”

“But that’s not what you were thinking about.”

It took Jin Zixuan a moment to realize that he was the one who had spoken.

“Jin-xiong?” Nie Huaisang prompted, having not heard what Jin Guangshan originally said. As much as Jin Zixuan wanted to answer, the look Jin Guangshan gave him scared the truth into hiding in the back of Jin Zixuan’s mind.

‘You’re a filial son,’ he told himself. ‘You can’t embarrass your father in front of the other four Great Sects.’

His mother’s worried eyes connected with his.

‘You care about your sect,’ he thought. ‘You don’t want to be associated with those words, do you? So long as you don’t say them — Lan Xichen isn’t saying anything, so he probably didn’t hear all of it, so-’

Jiang Yanli’s concerned gaze fell on him, and all his protesting thoughts screeched to a halt.

“I just… I mean…” he looked down. “Sorry, A-Die. It… it just sounded like you wanted to take action before he gets that far, and I think, if we do make a plan, it should be reactionary. We promised to not punish him for things that haven’t happened yet, and I think we should stick to that here.”

In response to his suggestion, Jiang Yanli sent him a blindingly grateful smile that should have set his mind at ease.

Instead, guilt welled up within him.

(That was some of the truth, but not all of it. He’d hidden it. That was the time to say something, and he’d hidden it.)

“I see,” Lan Xichen nodded with a relieved huff, then bowed. “My apologies, Sect Leader Jin. It seems I overreacted slightly.”

‘You didn’t,’ Jin Zixuan wanted to say. ‘You heard right, he-’

But Jin Guangshan was his father. He couldn’t say that!

But he could have. Should have.

(And he didn't.)

Jiang Yanli scooted closer, her expression clearly displaying how thankful she was that he had spoken up against her father, and Jin Zixuan felt the regret growing within him devour him whole.

On the side, Madam Yu narrowed her eyes.

She could have sworn she heard something more, but, with Jin Zixuan giving his statement and Lan Xichen backing off, she had no idea if the bit she'd heard was true.

Part of her knew she should press for information.

(But why would she? Yes, she could acknowledge she had treated her head disciple somewhat improperly, but it wasn't her responsibility to monitor his every action.)

Except the rest of her family had been too far away to hear, so they had no reason to say anything.

(And why would she? It wasn't like the boy was part of their family.)

But he could be.

(No. After what she'd done to him, that would never be possible. The years she had spent hating him would never go away.)

But didn't she have a responsibility-

'No,' she thought, shaking her head. 'I didn't say anything, Jin Guangshan's the one who did. No matter what he said, it's none of my business. It's stupid for me to feel guilt over that.'

Satisfied with that conclusion, she looked back to her children, who were speaking casually with the tense Jin heir.

Next to them, Nie Huaisang sat still. He hadn't heard what had been said, but, based on the expressions of everyone who had heard, he thought he had an idea.

Jin Guangshan might not be interested in men, but he and Nie Huaisang were both appreciators of art. Jiang Cheng and Lan Wangji would probably kill him if he said it out loud, but he had to admit that he knew where Jin Guangshan was coming from. No one who had seen the man would be able to deny the allure of the Yiling Patriarch. With dramatically billowing robes contrasting against his glowing red eyes, it wouldn't surprise him if most people present had felt their thoughts drift in that direction.

However, no one could truly control their thoughts; what needed to be watched was actions.

(And Nie Huaisang was fairly certain that Jin Guangshan would not hesitate if he got a chance.)

Nie Huaisang sighed.

Worst of all, Jin Guangshan wasn't even the greatest cause for concern. Right now, a suspiciously silent Wen Ruohan was watching the Jiangs with an expression Nie Huaisang didn't like at all.

(Not that Nie Huaisang knew anything about this! Of course not! These sorts of politics were better left to his brother and Lan Xichen than him.)

As if having felt Nie Huaisang's eyes on him, Wen Ruohan glanced back. The two made eye contact for several seconds, Nie Huaisang rapidly blinking in confusion and Wen Ruohan giving him an appraising glance. After a moment, he turned to look at Nie Mingjue instead.

Nie Huaisang flinched and hurriedly pulled his eyes away.

Wen Ruohan smirked.

(The younger could be used to control the older, but the older was just as effective against the younger.)

Noticing the frightened aura his brother had gained, Nie Mingjue walked closer to him and was about to ask what was wrong when-

"Alright, I'm back," Wei Wuxian's voice greeted.

"Ah… A-Xian," Jiang Yanli smiled slightly. "Hello."

"Hi. Wen Ning's here too! Say 'hi' Wen Ning."

"Uh, hello A-Jie, Sect Leader… everyone."

"A-Ning," Wen Qing breathed out warmly.

(By now, it was clear that she didn't have to worry. The Wei Wuxian of now would never hurt Wen Ning.)

Still....

(Would any of them have been able to guess that he'd kill Jiang Yanli? Why would this be any different?)

Taking a deep breath, Wen Qing calmed her racing heartbeat and asked, "Is everything alright out there?"

"Ah-yes!" he squeaked. "I-I'm good."

His voice rapidly rose in pitch, allowing her to hear the glow of happiness encompassing his body.

Wen Qing smiled.

Wei Wuxian coughed, "Well, we've confirmed you are who you sound like. So, you got us an answer yet? I'd be happy to pull you out if you think Mo Xuanyu actually has your best interests in mind."

The watchers hesitated. They all knew what their answer would probably be, but they weren't sure they could convince Wei Wuxian of that without raising his suspicions.

"Er…" Nie Huaisang laughed awkwardly. "Before that, how's the thing you were working on going? Whether or not we leave, I wanna see it. Is it done?"

"...Alright, we'll start with that."

If Nie Huaisang's words made Wei Wuxian suspicious, he was hiding it too well for any of the watchers to hear it.

"Is everyone ready? Then I'm pleased to announce the great news: we've finished the Concealment Zone! It'll activate based off a voice command. You don't need to say anything specific; so long as the general sentiment is 'I don't want to watch this,' you won't have to! The parts that are boring you will no longer be a concern!"

"...Ah."

When Lan Xichen had originally requested it, it had been in the hopes of maintaining Lan Wangji's privacy. With everything that had been revealed, it almost felt obsolete now.

Not that Lan Xichen would tell him that.

"Thank you, Wei-gongzi," he said instead. "Do you need any help installing it?"

"Nope! Just give me a second."

A blinding red glow covered the floor, forcing the watchers to look away. When it vanished, there were no detectable differences in the appearance or feel of the room.

"...Are you sure you did that right?" Jiang Fengmian asked.

"I think so. I can check in at the end of the next segment if you want me to. Provided you decide to stay, of course."

"No need," Nie Mingjue decided. He doubted they would be using the Concealment Zone regardless. The information the simulation offered had long since proven itself to be indispensable.

"Whatever you say. Anyways, onto the thing that's about to make all the work I did on the Concealment Zone completely pointless!"

"Wait, Young Master Wei-"

"Oh, my bad. All the work Wen Ning and I did-"

“Young Master Wei!”

“Wait, are you just going to go ahead and-”

“Letting you out now!”

“““““NO!”””””

It was only after several people had spoken — and Nie Huaisang had subsequently sighed — that they realized Wei Wuxian was probably just bluffing to scare a genuine reaction out of them.

“No?” Wei Wuxian repeated. “You sound awfully sure about that. I would have thought you’d have more questions to ask before making a decision.”

‘It seems he knows we’re hiding a few things,’ Nie Huaisang observed. ‘In that case, is there any point in denying it?’

Feeling the same, Wen Ruohan stepped forward and explained, “We already have all the information we need to make our decision. There will be no need to let us out.”

No one disagreed.

“But-”

“We’re sure, A-Xian,” Jiang Fengmian said.

“...Alright then.”

“Really, A-Jie?” Wen Ning asked.

“Yes,” Wen Qing unflinchingly declared. “Just… take care of each other.”

“Alright?” Wen Ning responded. The telling silence from Wei Wuxian perfectly expressed his confusion around the ‘each other’ clause.

Lan Xichen coughed, “Also… be careful with Mo Xuanyu.”

“You think he’s dangerous?”

“No.”

“He’s not.”

“He won’t hurt you.”

There was no uncertainty.

Yes, the Yiling Patriarch had been corrupted, but it seemed clear that the version inside Mo Xuanyu’s body was fairly similar in temperament to the fifteen year old one speaking to them. It wasn’t an issue.

“However,” Lan Qiren added. “He is… intelligent. He has very strong reasons to want us out of here, so treat anything you get from him with caution.”

“Understood,” Wei Wuxian instantly responded.

“Um,” Wen Ning coughed. “I-I thought I should mention what we’ll be doing. Only if you want to know of course, I just-”

“Go on,” Wen Ruohan commanded.

“Th-there’s going to be a conference soon. Between the sects. Um-Qishan is hosting. So we’ll be out of contact for a little while in a few days.”

“The Sects have gotten control of things again?” Madam Jin asked.

“Yes. It’s-it’s all going well!”

"Any other questions?" Wei Wuxian asked.

“Yes, actually. Wei Wuxian, would you-” Wen Qing abruptly bit her tongue, cutting herself off.

“..A-Jie?”

“No, it’s just….”

His core. Would he give up his core for Jiang Cheng if the Jiang heir lost his?

She shook her head at her own foolishness. When asked whether he’d resist being choked, he had responded that “of course” he’d fight back. Why would this be any different? There was no way he could understand this.

“It’s nothing,” she decided.

“...Well, if that’s all, I’m going to go,” Wei Wuxian decided. “I think I’ll send back a ‘thank you for the suggestion, but I’ll be leaving them inside’ to Mo Xuanyu. That should be fun. Wish me luck~”

“Good luck, Wei-xiong!” Nie Huaisang shouted.

‘Stay safe, Wei Ying’ Lan Wangji thought.

A moment later, his and Wen Ning’s voices vanished.

Left without someone to keep secrets from, Jiang Cheng breathed out a large sigh of relief. There probably wouldn’t be any direct consequences of making Wei Wuxian believe that Mo Xuanyu was his future self, but if he didn’t believe them — if he thought they were crazy or that resentful energy was corrupting their minds — then they would be pulled out without having finished the simulation.

(They had to be very, very careful when speaking to him.)

As most of the watchers considered that, Wen Ruohan resumed his thoughts from before. To his left was his son, Wen Chao, who had remained pale-faced and unnaturally silent throughout the entire time Wei Wuxian was speaking. Wen Chao had even slowed his breathing down, terrified that a too-loud exhale would attract the baby Yiling Patriarch's attention.

(How useless.)

(Wei Wuxian wouldn't cower in fear.)

The Wei Wuxian who had spoken to them was not the Yiling Patriarch, but, maybe, he didn't have to be. He was already learning the beginnings of demonic cultivation trying to understand the simulation, and he, unlike his other-self, would still have a golden core to protect him. Whatever Wen Ruohan needed to convince him of could come in time, there was no need to rush this.

So long as the Yunmeng Jiang Sect didn't ruin him first.

At that thought, Wen Ruohan's improved mood crumbled. Getting Wei Wuxian on his side could wait. Right now, the most important thing was keeping the young Patriarch safe.

He refused to allow the boy to destroy himself for no reason.

However, regardless of whether it came from genuine love, guilt, or conditioning, the fact remained that Wei Wuxian was loyal enough to the Yunmeng Jiang Sect to secretly give them his life's work. And, if that was true, then Wen Ruohan couldn't win the boy over. Nothing would break his loyalty.

(In some ways, he was surprised it had taken him so long give up on this. When the Jiang disciples had been shirtless on that hot day, Wei Wuxian had been singled out for punishment by Madam Yu, and Jiang Cheng hadn't been even remotely surprised. If Wei Wuxian was used to taking the fall, then then maybe Wen Ruohan should have expected this.)

By now, Wen Ruohan had become certain of one thing: Wei Wuxian would do anything for the Jiang Clan.

So then, why not take the greatest obstacle, and turn it into a tool?

Hypothetically, if the Jiangs were brutally murdered, and Wei Wuxian was made to believe the Lans or Nie had been the culprits, what would he do?

(If tensions continued to rise, and war broke out as soon as they left, wouldn't Wei Wuxian join the Wens, who would be opposing his family's murderers?)

And if Wen Ruohan, the Chief Cultivator, generously offered him a path for revenge, wouldn't he receive Wei Wuxian's utmost trust and gratitude?

Even if it was revealed the Wen soldiers had been involved in the Jiangs' murders, Wen Ruohan could pretend they had been bought off and he knew nothing about it. Wei Wuxian would believe him.

He had trusted in the Jiangs; unlike them, Wen Ruohan would actually respect Wei Wuxian.

(Wei Wuxian was running Yunmeng well. What use were the Jiangs in the face of that?)

Then again, Wen Ruohan couldn't allow himself to forget that Wei Wuxian was different from Wen Zhuliu and Wen Ruohan himself. He liked people, and worked well with them. If he was suddenly deprived of the family he had worked so hard to save, immediately moving him to Qishan (away from the martial siblings he was clearly close to) could be dangerous for the boy's mental health.

Wen Ruohan frowned deeper, then allowed his eyes to drift over the Jiangs again.

(Jiang Yanli sat next to Jin Zixuan, speaking with a cheery smile.)

Some of the Jiangs had an unquestionably negative effect on Wei Wuxian, but what about Jiang Yanli? Yes, the future Wei Wuxian would go on to kill her, but, as far as Wen Ruohan could tell, Jiang Yanli's impact on Wei Wuxian's life was unquestionably positive. She redirected her mother's anger, and she supported him where she could.

If she was left alive, would the emotional support she provided be worth increasing the risk of Wei Wuxian being turned against the Wens?

After thinking about that for a short while longer, he shook his head. There were too many unknowns for him to finalize any plan now, especially as the simulation had continuously flipped their expectations. It would be better to wait before making any irreversible decisions.

Wen Ruohan would secure Wei Wuxian's loyalty, no matter what it took.

"So, what do we think?"

"Well, for one, Wen Ruohan's obviously going to want to kill you," Jin Ling declared.

As he looked around, he saw Wei Wuxian give a bitter smile, Hanguang-jun frown deeply, Lan Sizhui and Ouyang Zizhen flinch, and Zewu-jun, who had been pouring them tea, falter.

Lan Jingyi just rolled his eyes.

"Oh, of course you started with that one," he grumbled. "Can't let anyone else say anything important, can you?"

"Huh? Then where would you have started?" Jin Ling indignantly snapped back.

"Hanguang-jun, of course!"

Lan Sizhui laughed, “We’re discussing how things in that world might go wrong; I doubt Hanguang-jun will change much from what was shown. The Lans will put up more defenses to prevent the burning of the Cloud Recesses, but there isn’t anything else for him to do.”

“No, no, don’t you see?” Ouyang Zizhen stood up. “He’s going to fall even more in love with Senior Wei!”

Hanguang-jun nodded once in agreement, while Wei Wuxian broke into open laughter.

“Zizhen, that’s very sweet of you,” he complimented. “Unfortunately, the baby-Hanguang-jun and I haven’t met yet in that world.”

“It doesn’t matter!” Zizhen ferociously shook his head. “Learning about you is all it will take! Now he’ll understand why you started demonic cultivation, so as soon as he lays eyes on your younger self he’ll pick him up off the ground and carry him to the Cloud Recesses and get married on the spot!”

As Ouyang Zizhen gazed into the distance with a far-off look in his eyes, Wei Wuxian’s laughter became so strong that he practically tipped over.

(All the while, Lan Xichen remained frozen. This was the second time he had left seclusion in the past six months; the loud laugher was startling.)

“Zizhen, if the little-Lan Zhan does that, Lan Qiren’s going to hate me more than ever-”

“Won’t matter,” Lan Wangji declared. “I don’t care.”

“Lan Zhan!” Wei Wuxian shouted, pinching his husband’s cheek. “Where on earth is this unfilial child coming from. Come now, Hanguang-jun’s supposed to be the most honorable person ever! You can’t say something like that!”

“Can.”

“Lan Zhan!”

“Wait, Hanguang-jun,” Sizhui looked back and forth. “You-you think what Zizhen said is a possibility?”

The high pitched squeak of Sizhui’s question contrasting against the hopeful exuberance on Lan Jingyi and Ouyang Zizhen made Wei Wuxian laugh even harder. It was nice that the kids didn’t seem especially bothered by what they had seen anymore.

“...No,” Lan Wangji responded once his cheek was released. “My younger self will know better than to do that.”

Than to copy their father, Lan Xichen acknowledged.

Jin Guangyao’s face flashed into his mind.

“Xiongzhang?”

Lan Xichen flinched.

“Ah, yes?” he asked, forcing his mind out of the dark corner of thoughts it had been trapped in.

Frowning in sympathy, Wei Wuxian asked, “If your younger self was given knowledge of everything the Wens did through the Massacre of Lotus Pier, how do you expect yourself and Lan Qiren to react?”

After a moment of thought, Zewu-jun responded, “It’s made much more difficult by the fact that the Wens are there. If they weren’t, I would expect the Lan, Nie, Jiang, and Jin Clans to follow Da-ge in launching a preemptive strike, knowing that we lost a significant portion of our army simply delaying the conflict. Now that they’re there, however… I assume the four other clans will join together to create an alliance that would discourage the Wen from attacking.”

Wei Wuxian nodded, feeling like that was a safe bet.

“Though it’s really too bad,” Jingyi sighed.

“Oh, what is it now?!’ Jin Ling snapped.

“And what’s that supposed to mean? I don’t complain all the time!”

“No, but when you do complain, it’s never about anything important-”

“Hey!” Zizhen interjected. “Hanguang-jun and senior Wei’s relationship is important!”

“Guys,” Lan Sizhui coughed, glancing around at the three highly bemused adults watching them.

“Uh, right,” Jingyi sat up straighter. “What I was going to say before someone rudely interrupted-”

Jin Ling huffed.

“-was that it’s too bad that other world’s Sect Leader Nie and Chifeng-jun didn’t stay longer. They don’t know he’s going to die or how.”

Lan Xichen flinched.

(Right. That was what he was risking in wanting to keep Meng Yao alive. But the young Meng Yao hadn’t done anything yet. But he might.)

Wei Wuxian laughed again, waving away their worries, “Don’t worry about that. The adults are taking care of it.”

He wasn’t sure whether or not to be insulted when all four juniors levied highly skeptical looks at him.

“What about the Jiangs?” Hanguang-jun asked, hoping to move the conversation back on topic.

“Well, they’ll put up much better defenses, for one,” Jin Ling proudly declared, head raised high. “And they’ll all obviously be much more protective of each other.”

“Yeah,” Wei Wuxian agreed, then frowned as Madam Yu flashed into his mind. “The only thing I’m worried about is whether or not they’ll want to kill my younger self when they get out.”

“What?” Sizhui gasped out. “Why would they want to kill you?!”

Wei Wuxian laughed, “Remember the whole ‘Grandmaster of Demonic Cultivation thing?’”

“Well, that’s stupid,” Jin Ling humffed. “We all know you’re a good person, and anyone who’s watched that much of your life will definitely agree. And-and besides, they’ll all know why you invented it, so….”

The Burial Mounds flashed into the juniors’ minds, and, with that, came the way Wei Wuxian had broken down in panic when Lan Wangji approached because fierce corpses had been attacking on all sides-

“Alright, enough of that,” Wei Wuxian clapped his hands together loudly, shocking the juniors (and Zewu-jun) out of the memories they had all found themselves in.

(At ‘kill my younger self’ Lan Xichen’s mind had become overwhelmed by the possibilities of what Jin Guangshan would do to Meng Yao.)

“Wei-gongzi,” he spoke up. “What do you think… the Jins will do?”

Wei Wuxian paused here and glanced at Jin Ling as if debating with himself on how much to say.

“Don’t hold back,” Jin Ling ordered. “Just give me the truth. I can take it.”

“Can you though?” Jingyi whispered.

He got three simultaneous smacks from Sizhui, Jin Ling, and Zizhen at that.

Thinking it over, Wei Wuxian hummed then responded, “Well, starting with the easy ones, it seems like your parents as even closer now that they were at this point in our time.”

A blanket of relief seemed to settle over the juniors at that.

(At least one good thing would come out of what they did.)

“I’m sure, just like Madam Yu, Madam Jin will be much more protective of her child after watching this.”

Nothing specifically bad had happened to Zixuan yet, but he was still brought to the Wen indoctrination camp and had gotten into a significant amount of danger even before the Xuanwu showed up.

Then, remembering what Madam Yu's last words to him had been — what Jiang Cheng had shouted while choking him — he felt a shiver run up his spine.

"There's also… a chance of there being some tension between the Jiang and Jin houses after this."

Now, even Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen were staring at him in confusion.

"Didn't you literally just say my parents were getting along better?"

"Yeah, I'm just worried about how your Grandparents will feel about each other."

"...Oooooh."

"Yeah," Zizhen nodded. "Even without seeing the worst of what he did, no one can deny how disgusting Jin Guangshan is! The former Sect Leader Jiang must be outraged by him, right?"

Wei Wuxian decided not to comment on the matter.

"So," Lan Xichen glanced over. "You don't think Jin Guangshan will be especially different once he gets out?"

Wei Wuxian nodded, "All he knows is what the Wens did, not what his future self had planned. It's hard to tell whether he'll try to side with Wen Ruohan or with the Sunshot Campaign once they get out, but I figure he'll try to remain neutral. At most, he'll want to kill me like he did at the end of my last life."

"Not recruit you?"

"Since everyone saw the same thing, it'd be way too obvious if he tried to."

With every word Wei Wuxian spoke, Lan Wangji seemed to get more and more tense. He refused to allow Wei Wuxian to die, regardless of which Wei Wuxian it was.

"Anyways," Zizhen coughed. "We talked about the Jiangs, the Jins, the Nie, and the Lan. Only one Great Sect left to talk about!"

"Wow, I'm surprised you remembered them this time."

The juniors flinched. They knew Wei Wuxian had a right to be angry — they had specifically told him that only the Jiang, Jin, Nie, and Lan were inside the simulation — but it still stung.

"A-anyways," Jin Ling barreled forward. "Like I said, Wen Ruohan's obviously going to want to kill you."

"Probably," Wei Wuxian agreed.

“What about Wen Qing?” Lan Sizhui asked. “Will she be okay?”

“No, Wen Ruohan’s going to want her dead too,” Wei Wuxian revealed, and, upon seeing a dozen shocked eyes, elaborated, “She and Wen Ning save me and Jiang Cheng during the Massacre of Lotus Pier.”

“She did?” Lan Sizhui asked, voice breaking in emotion. The expression on Jin Ling’s face was simultaneously shocked into silence and annoyed at himself for not realizing that sooner.

“Jiujiu never told me,” Jin Ling muttered.

“Well, don’t worry too much. Luckily, we have a few things working to our advantage there” Wei Wuxian assured them. “No one knows what the simulation has done, so if Wen Ruohan instantly tries to kill Wen Qing upon waking up, it’ll be assumed that he was corrupted by the resentful energy and he’ll be stopped — Chief Cultivator or not. I told my younger self they’ll need to be in separate rooms for the ‘forced ejection’ to work, so Wen Qing will have plenty of time to escape before Wen Ruohan realizes.”

“But…” Sizhui frowned. “Is there nothing else we can do?”

“Not really,” Wei Wuxian responded with a sigh.

“We can’t enter that world,” Lan Wangji reminded them. “If we ask Wei Ying’s younger self for too much, he’ll stop trusting us completely.”

“Well, luckily, little-me has basically no experience with resentful energy, so it should be fine,” Wei Wuxian shrugged. “Honestly, it’s a good thing you messed up and didn’t manage to put little-me inside the simulation. We never would have known what was happening then.”

Another wave of guilt seemed to settle over the juniors, and they looked towards the ground in embarrassment.

“Will your younger self face any concerning problems?” Lan Xichen asked, staring directly at Wei Wuxian. “After all, the people inside the simulation will have spent around a week learning everything about you.”

“Remember, time’s slower in there. The amount of content they’ve watched is probably only around 10 hours or so, not a full week.”

“Still.”

When Wei Wuxian seemed to hesitate, Lan Wangji moved forward to nod, “I expect it will be. If nothing else, the people who had never met Wei Ying before will now be fairly familiar with him, while he still won’t know them. That will be easy enough to fix, but when they first wake up it may seem like a problem.”

“Yeah, but a little confusion like that will be good for him,” Wei Wuxian decided. “He kept asking me questions about why I wanted to let everyone out, so it seems like becoming substitute Sect Leader has made little-me get a bit uppity lately.”

“You always have been.”

“Lan Zhan!” Wei Wuxian leaned over, disbelieving laughter lighting his face up. “What is this?! Betrayal from my own husband?!”

“No,” Lan Wangji responded. “You are perfect just the way you are.”

“No, no, I’m not falling for it! First the thing with Lan Qiren and now this? Who are you and what have you done with my Lan Zhan?!”

He reached forward and began squishing Hanguang-jun’s cheeks again.

“Um, Senior Wei?” Lan Sizhui asked.

“What is it, my darling, most-favoritest radish?” Wei Wuxian asked, not looking away from where he was alternating between squeezing and pulling Lan Wangji’s cheeks.

“Are we done with the, um… ‘Operation: Figure out How Wrong This Has Gone’ end discussion?”

“Sure. Unless you have more to say?”

“No. It’s just… we…” he blushed deeply. “Jingyi, Jin Ling, Zizhen, and I wanted to apologize.”

Wei Wuxian froze and finally looked over.

“Apologize?” he repeated, as if not understanding the word. For a moment, in Sizhui’s place, he saw Wen Qing gazing back at him with warm, regretful eyes.

‘Thank you,’ she had whispered. ‘I’m sorry.’

Seeing his husband’s reaction, Lan Wangji reached forward and rested his hand on top of Wei Wuxian’s.

“W-well,” Jin Ling flushed. “We all went out and got you something, so you better be grateful!”

“My present is the best,” Lan Jingyi instantly declared.

“Excuse me?!” Jin Ling roared back.

“How dare you?” Zizhen added. “Wait until you see what I got-”

“It’s not a competition,” Sizhui protested.

“”””””Yes it is,””””” Jin Ling, Jingyi, Zizhen, and Wei Wuxian decided. Beside them, the twin jades looked at Sizhui and slowly shook their heads, silently telling him this was a battle he could never hope to win.

Sizhui reluctantly backed off.

As he watched the juniors gleefully hand their Senior Wei the gifts under his brother's watchful eye, Zewu-jun felt something in his heart throb. How long had it been since he had last seen something like this? Since when had the comforting, thoughtful silence of seclusion turned oppressive?

In what ways was seclusion actually helping him?

He looked away, unable to watch the idealistic scene any longer.

Chapter End Notes

Before you all angrily rush to the comments, please give me a moment to explain. Yes, I know the book is amazing. Yes, I know it does a better job of showing how much Wei Wuxian has changed. Yes, I know what the donghua did doesn't really make sense. Yes, I just made up an explanation for how Wei Wuxian was able to remove a core. Do I care? Not one bit!

(In other words, the book is probably objectively better, but I refuse to miss out on the way the donghua did Wei Wuxian's return. Sorry, but I'm a slave to the rule of cool when it comes to Wifi.)

Absolutely Nothing Happened — a Defense by Lan Wangji

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Never in his life had A-Lu been so furious. Not only was he being left behind while his Da-shixiong went to the inner sect conference, but the preteen Jiang disciple hadn't even been given a role to help with the preparations! Even his sister — who, mind you, was the same age as him — had been given the job of testing out the swords that would be brought along.

He could have helped her test out the swords. But no, just because he'd broken a few of them — less than five! — Wei Wuxian hadn't asked him to help.

Now, the need for vengeance running through A-Lu's veins had overpowered all else.

With confident steps (that may or may not have been stomping) he entered the room where the unconscious Sect Leader Jiang was being treated (the other Jiangs having been moved to different rooms just in case Mo Xuanyu's request about the need for separate rooms was correct). Normally, seeing his Sect Leader's unconscious body filled A-Lu with a sense of powerlessness and despair.

Now, it doubled his anger.

"…. the presentation should go over the way we contacted Mo Xuanyu. If we don't, everyone's going to throw a fit," Wei Wuxian decided, marking something down.

"But… but won't it bother Mo-gongzi if every sect starts sending him messages?"

"Just because we tell them how to do it doesn't mean they'll be able to actually make the array," Wei Wuxian pointed out with a smug grin. "Can't accuse me of hiding anything then~"

A deep scowl fell onto A-Lu's face. There he was! And his Da-shixiong wasn't even commenting on the loud stomping A-Lu was possibly doing through the hallway. He didn't even look over!

With another set of maybe-stomps, A-Lu marched over to where Wei Wuxian was speaking with Wen Ning and sat himself down on the head disciple's lap.

"No, the strange things they've said about Mo Xuanyu probably don't need to be in the official report. Wen Xu will be there, won't he? We can just ask him about that," Wei Wuxian continued, unfaltering even after A-Lu sat on his lap. If it weren't for the hand Wei Wuxian wrapped around his waist to keep him from falling over, A-Lu would have wondered if he'd somehow become an invisible ghost in the last half hour.

"But Young Master Wei…." Wen Ning got quiet. "He… Wen Xu hasn't answered any of our letters on what he saw inside. He keeps dancing around the-the subject."

“Just like the rest of the watchers.”

“...Just like the rest of the watchers,” Wen Ning hesitantly confirmed.

“Then I think it would be in our best interests to not let him figure out how much we suspect him. If we can find a hint based off his reactions, then we’ll get a much better picture of what’s going on.”

Infuriated at being ignored, A-Lu began to wiggle around in Wei Wuxian’s lap indignantly. In response, Wei Wuxian began running his fingers through A-Lu’s hair, which appeased the boy more than he was willing to admit.

He leaned back against Wei Wuxian’s chest, content to relax as Wei Wuxian’s hand patted his head.

“But… wouldn’t it be best to just tell him?” Wen Ning asked. “It seems like everyone’s keeping secrets for no reason.”

“Well if they’re not telling us, I’m not telling them,” Wei Wuxian responded cheekily.

“Yes, but… what if they have a good reason? We don’t know why they’re doing this.”

Wei Wuxian took on a serious expression, “My current theory is that, right now, a terrifying dragon fish is holding us all hostage. If they reveal it to us, the whole country will be swallowed whole! The only way we’ll be able to help them is by figuring things out for ourselves and rescuing the dragon fish’s weakness, an enormous pearl, from the bottom of the ocean! It will be a difficult and dangerous mission, but we have no choice.”

“Really?” A-Lu turned to ask, fear easily apparent in both his and Wen Ning’s faces.

“Well, it’d be interesting if that were the case, right?”

“Young Master Wei!” Wen Ning whined, deflating abruptly at the realization that Wei Wuxian had just been making it up. A-Lu joined him in pouting.

“You shouldn’t lie, Da-shixiong,” he grumbled.

“But the conference is going to be so boring!” Wei Wuxian dramatically sighed. “Say, how many people do you think I would trick if I started my report to the other sects with that? I bet I could make Wen Xu go along with it if I really tried.”

“A-Yue says conferences are serious,” A-Lu interrupted, still bitter that he and his sister couldn’t go because of that.

“And A-Yue doesn’t have to know, does she?” Wei Wuxian asked, reaching down to tickle the boy in his lap. A high-pitched squeal cut through Wen Ning’s ears as A-Lu tried to escape Wei Wuxian’s hands.

“Young Master Wei?” Wen Ning shouted, trying to be heard over A-Lu’s laughter.

“Yeah?”

“What would you want to find out from Young Master Wen?”

At that question, Wei Wuxian paused in his tickling, glancing over at Wen Ning out of the corner of his eyes. In Wei Wuxian’s half-second of hesitation, it suddenly occurred to Wen Ning that, while Wei Wuxian didn’t trust the people inside the simulation, he might have just as much reason to not trust Wen Ning.

He was practically asking Wen Ning to go against his current sect leader, after all. What assurance did he have that Wen Ning wasn’t in on the secret already and just at Lotus Pier to spy?

Finally: “...Remember? During the last call, I asked them about Mo Xuanyu, and nearly got an answer from Jiang Cheng before Huaisang warned him. Jiang Cheng tried to amend his answer to be ‘the guy who dresses like Wei Wuxian,’ but that’s….”

Wen Ning nodded and breathed out a relieved gasp, grateful that Wei Wuxian had trusted him with that. He would take anything he could get, but the belief lifted a weight off his chest that he hadn’t even known was there.

Coughing to clear his throat, Wei Wuxian continued, “They also mentioned how his bright red hair ribbon matches mine, and I never told them anything about that.”

So they knew something about Mo Xuanyu that they weren’t saying.

“...How can I help?” Wen Ning asked. Wei Wuxian had defended him when disciples from his own sect were harassing him; even if Wei Wuxian hadn’t been the amazing, brilliant person Wen Ning had come to know, Wen Ning would want to help out.

“I-I can help too!” A-Lu rushed to say. A smile returned to Wei Wuxian’s face, and he pulled A-Lu close to his chest.

“I guess how you help will depend on what we do to get information from Wen Xu. On one hand, I’d love to just be able to interrogate him until he answers, but that’s… probably not going to go over well.”

“Could we just ask him to explain what’s going on inside?”

“I mean… we could.”

“...But?”

A shrug, “Like you said: he just keeps avoiding the details when asked.”

As the two teenagers thought to themselves, A-Lu turned to look back and forth between them. Their faces were frowning in concentration, and the hand Wei Wuxian had been running through his hair had stopped completely. After watching them for a bit, he spoke.

“Why don’t you just get Mo Xuanyu to tell him to tell you?” A-Lu asked.

“Ah, it’s a little more complicated than that,” Wen Ning responded. “He’s probably not an enemy, but….”

There were so many reasons asking for that wouldn’t work that Wen Ning wasn’t even sure where to start explaining. He had hoped Wei Wuxian would do it, but, to his surprise, Wei Wuxian seemed to be contemplating the suggestion instead.

“Wei-gongzi?” he asked.

Two thoughtful silver eyes glanced up at him again, assessing the trustworthiness Wen Ning had shown. Right now, as the sole defender of Lotus Pier, Wei Wuxian knew he had to be careful.

Could he trust the innocent act Wen Ning was putting on?

‘The Jiangs will need a place to come back to,’ Wen Ning had pointed out, desperate to stop Wei Wuxian from trying demonic cultivation again. ‘Please… please don’t.’

Wen Ning had begged him to stop. It was true that Mo Xuanyu and the watchers hadn’t wanted him to do much demonic cultivation either, but….

Wen Ning’s request was only around his safety. Everything they could figure out without causing danger to themselves, Wen Ning had supported him in.

Wei Wuxian looked down at A-Lu and said, “What if we lied? Not a lot — not so much that we could be accused of anything if the truth was found out — but just stretch the truth a bit. Mo Xuanyu told us to take the watchers out. The Sect Leaders told us not to do that, but Wen Xu doesn’t know that. And the instructions we got were to do it without checking with the people inside, so… maybe revealing what we’re planning on doing will be enough.”

“It probably will!” Wen Ning lit up. “Wei-gongzi, you’re a genius!”

“Of course I am!” he glanced down. “Though it’s really all thanks to my wonderful assistant over here, right?”

“Right,” A-Lu responded, preening despite not being entirely sure what Wei Wuxian was talking about.

Oh, well. He’d just have to ask for stories once the head disciple got back from the conference. If it was going to be a bunch of talking like this, he supposed he’d be okay with being left behind so long as Wei Wuxian brought him a few souvenirs from his trip.

Wei Wuxian looked around the Jingshi and frowned, recalling how he had gotten there.

“Don’t bother with him,” Hanguang-jun had said. “Let him cry. When he becomes tired, drag him in.”

Lan Qiren breathed out sharply through his nose, and Lan Wangji clenched his fists.

“Where to?” Lan Jingyi asked.

“...The Jingshi.”

“Jingshi?!” Lan Xichen repeated. The Jingshi.

Wangji’s bedroom.

Lan Xichen had recognized it as the place Wei Wuxian was inside at the end of the last segment, but-“Woah! Hey-I — hold on!” Wei Wuxian protested as the juniors dragged him away. The disbelief on the juniors’ faces was clear but unsurprising given the unusual situation.

The Jingshi was Lan Wangji’s private room where no one else was allowed to enter. Even the cleaning was done by Lan Wangji alone. And, above all else, it was his bedroom.

Looking back and forth between his uncle and brother, Lan Xichen saw that they were reacting similarly to how he was.

They were angry — they knew this was far too much like Lan Wangji and Lan Xichen’s father — and yet, now, they could see how complicated the situation actually was.

The last segment, just like the end of the second segment, featured Jiang Cheng and Lan Wangji arguing over which sect Wei Wuxian would return to. Last time, Lan Wangji had respected Wei Wuxian’s distrust and backed off.

(And then Wei Wuxian had died.)

And had the Yiling Patriarch version of Wei Wuxian wanted to go back to the Jiang Sect either? Given the way he had put off returning for so long, Lan Xichen was inclined to say ‘no.’ The same had been true during the second segment in the thirteen years later future.

While Lan Xichen had trouble believing that the future Jiang Cheng would actually have tortured his brother, he probably would have insisted on Wei Wuxian coming back to his sect. Clearly, the adult Lan Wangji’s decision was much more complicated than it had initially appeared to be.

(Though, to his right, he could see his real brother internally and viciously cursing the simulated Hanguang-jun for his actions.)

When they finally arrived, Lan Jingyi turned to Wei Wuxian and shouted, “Hanguang-jun isn’t here right now, so don’t you dare touch anything! Do you hear me?”

Wei Wuxian just laughed, “Ah, young man, that’s so troublesome. Why don’t you just let me go?”

“He really is back to normal,” Nie Huaisang muttered, and Nie Mingjue nodded in agreement. The sudden flip from the Yiling Patriarch to the Yiling Patriarch post-death was shocking, and yet didn’t seem like an act.

(This one was the Wei Wuxian they had gotten to know. The Yiling Patriarch was practically a stranger by comparison.)

In response to Wei Wuxian's request, Lan Jingyi scoffed: "If Hanguang-jun wants you to stay, you stay. Besides, it's not like you can get out regardless of what we do!"

And that was true; without a jade token, it was impossible to enter and exit the Cloud Recesses. Although they were treating him almost carelessly, Wei Wuxian was a prisoner in all but name.

Lan Wangji clenched his fists.

Noticing continued silent (but half-hearted) attempts to escape them, Jingyi snapped, "Didn't you hear me?"

"I did. I did. I just think-"

"Just get in already!" Lan Jingyi told Wei Wuxian as he and Sizhui shoved him inside. Before Wei Wuxian could get off the ground, the door had been slammed closed.

As the door was closed, Lan Wangji couldn't help but momentarily see the silent walls of the Gentian House his mother had once resided in.

'Prisoner,' his mind whispered. 'You did this.'

Though, having seen Wei Wuxian's full power, the watchers knew he was more than capable of taking one of the kids hostage or stealing a token, should it be necessary. Wei Wuxian was worried about what the Cloud Recesses would do to him considering he was a demonic cultivator, but not so much so that he was genuinely trying to escape. It was more a casual annoyance at how his travels had been delayed.

(This version of Wei Wuxian would never put the juniors in danger.)

(And this Hanguang-jun had known that.)

Frowning to himself, Nie Huaisang couldn't help but wonder if the Yiling Patriarch was truly as different from the normal Wei Wuxian as he first appeared to be.

After a moment's pause, Wei Wuxian walked closer to the door again. It was faint, but he could hear Lan Sizhui and Lan Jingyi still talking outside the walls.

If he was going to sneak out, now was not the time.

With an exaggerated sigh, Wei Wuxian laid himself down and closed his eyes, waiting for an opportunity to arise.

Wen Qing supposed she was glad that Wei Wuxian had at least gotten some sleep. Considering that he had been whipped by Zidian just a few hours ago — and the fact that Mo Xuanyu's body was surely much weaker than a body whose core had managed to seal his sword — she was sure he had been exhausted.

‘Has he been getting enough rest out there?’ she wondered, glancing up. ‘A-Ning better be keeping a close eye on him.’

Having remembered how he had gotten there, Wei Wuxian stretched his arms and stood up, glancing around.

‘I need to get out of here,’ he thought. ‘When I summoned Wen Ning on Dafan Mountain, he obviously wasn’t conscious. I need to meet up with him and figure out what happened.’

“...He seemed like a pretty normal fierce corpse to me,” Jiang Cheng commented disgruntally. The whiplash between the different versions of Wei Wuxian was getting exhausting.

Wei Wuxian turned to step outside the door, only to pause and sniff the air.

“Sandalwood?” he asked. “This is… what Lan Zhan smells like.”

A high pitched squeal came from Nie Huaisang as he stood up and turned to Lan Wangji, pointing excitedly at Wei Wuxian. Unable to resist, Madam Jin joined him in smiling at the comment.

However, underneath his reddening ears, Lan Wangji couldn’t say he was happy. After all, during the last segment, Wei Wuxian had quite clearly rejected his help. He wasn’t wanted.

(He couldn’t let himself think that this was a sign of Wei Wuxian liking him. He wouldn’t make that mistake again.)

Curiosity piqued, Wei Wuxian began to explore the Jingshi — Lan Wangji’s room — until he stumbled upon an incense pot. Picking it up, he brought it close and inhaled deeply.

Jin Guangshan brought his eyes up and down to give Wei Wuxian a long, assessing look.

Right as he stepped forward to put the jar down, Wei Wuxian heard an odd thump from the wooden floor tiles. He set the incense down completely and repeated the motion.

Another thump.

Lan Wangji stepped closer, wondering what the cause could be.

Frowning cautiously, Wei Wuxian bent down and removed the loose floor tile. His eyes widened in shock.

“What?!” Lan Qiren screeched.

“Emperor’s smile?” Wei Wuxian revealed, recognizing the contents of the seven jars just by the smell. A moment later, overjoyed laughter erupted from his chest as he dropped onto the bed behind him, the ends of his hair gliding down playfully.

A blinding, ecstatic smile lit up his face like it was the sun.

“Ah, Lan Zhan, Lan Zhan, you hypocrite. You told me off for smuggling wine, but now you’re hiding some in your room!”

“Wangji!” Lan Qiren shouted scoldingly.

“I apologize, Uncle,” Lan Wangji bowed lowly, shaking despite his forcefully calmed tone. “I don’t have any now, and I won’t allow myself to fall to-”

“I certainly hope not!” Lan Qiren continued, too shocked to remember the rule regarding interrupting. “With this and Wei Wuxian, why you… you....”

“Uncle,” Lan Xichen spoke up. “Perhaps we should wait a little longer before deciding anything. We’ve already seen how wrong we were when we tried doing that to Wei Wuxian; we don’t even know if he’s ever tried to drink them.”

“Of course he has! Why else would he have-”

Lan Qiren froze. The initial shock of the revelation had been too much for him to think properly, but now that he was taking a moment, the answer became obvious.

Emperor’s Smile.

Just like-

Wei Wuxian picked one of the jars up and began drinking from it gleefully. A small stream of alcohol flowed down his neck towards his barely-covered collarbones.

Just like it had his first night in the Cloud Recesses.

Like a river had washed it away, the cheer and disbelief that had spread across the kids vanished. Jin Zixuan looked down, Jiang Cheng scowled, Nie Huaisang frowned, and Lan Wangji froze.

Yes, Wei Wuxian stealing some of Lan Wangji’s alcohol was a hilarious concept, but, looking at it now, all it served to do was remind them of the fact that Wei Wuxian had died.

Jiang Yanli unconsciously clasped her hands together, forcing herself to breathe deeply.

From outside, a muted voice observed, “You don’t look very good. Did you have trouble during training?”

“Recently I’ve been struggling a bit,” a second voice agreed. “It’s been hard for me to concentrate.”

“Maybe you should ask the masters for some additional help.”

At those words, realization flashed through Wei Wuxian’s expression.

‘The cold springs!’ he thought.

“...What?”

The cold springs used to calm cultivator’s minds and help with meditation, so it was no surprise that Wei Wuxian had made a connection between it and the spoken words.

But that didn’t explain the look on his face.

With a worryingly conniving smirk, Wei Wuxian stood up completely and began refilling the jars he’d emptied with water. He sealed them, put them back inside, and recovered the floorboard.

By now, even Nie Huaisang was impressed by Wei Wuxian’s shamelessness. On the other hand, Madam Yu scoffed at the scene and rolled her eyes.

(If some part of her was grateful that Wei Wuxian was back to his normal self, no one had to know but her.)

Once he could no longer hear the passing footsteps, Wei Wuxian opened the door and sneaked out.

‘Everyone in the Gusu Lan Sect has a jade token for passage through the barrier. You need to take off your clothes to get in the cold spring. No one would bother carrying the token with them after they’ve taken off their clothes, would they?’

Growling, Lan Qiren cursed, “Shameless, unruly, undisciplined-”

‘But he wouldn’t have to do any of that if the Lans weren’t keeping him prisoner, would he?’

Prisoner wasn’t exactly the right word, but it was close enough that Lan Qiren’s infuriated mind wasn’t willing to bother considering the distinction between the two.

Silent as a mouse, Wei Wuxian walked down the paths with an easy confidence that discouraged people from questioning him. If anyone found his dark robes or unfamiliar face strange, the unworried look on Wei Wuxian’s face stopped them from asking any questions.

Mostly.

“Young Master Mo!” Lan Sizhui greeted.

After having spent so long hearing that voice only as a narrator, it was indescribably strange to hear it being spoken by the actual person again.

“Ah… Sizhui, was it?” Wei Wuxian smiled, carefully not showing the internal annoyance he was undoubtedly experiencing. “What are you two doing here?”

“Ah, Lianfeng-zun invited Zewu-jun to Jinlintai for a discussion. Hanguang-jun is seeing him off.”

A pause.

“Who?” Jin Zixuan asked.

“Lianfeng-zun?” Wei Wuxian repeated.

“Don’t tell me you don’t remember him?” Lan Jingyi demanded with an incredulous expression. “He’s the leader of the Jin Clan! He’s also your half-brother!”

“S-sect Leader?”

Frozen, Jin Zixuan was barely able to notice the way Jiang Yanli moved closer to him, her beautiful eyes wide with concern. His mother, who was clenching her teeth tightly enough to crack diamond, also went unnoticed.

In some ways, this shouldn’t have been a surprise. Jin Zixuan had already known he was going to die, and they were told in the second segment that Jin Guangshan was dead in this 20-years-later future. Of course someone else had been made Sect Leader; one of his half brothers was the best option.

But he had also been told from birth that the title would one day be his. Hearing it belong to someone else….

Seeing the unrecognition on “Mo Xuanyu’s” face, Lan Jingyi heaved a large sigh.

“Jin Ling did say you went mad and lost your memory. I guess he was telling the truth.”

And that was another interesting point. As Nie Huaisang furrowed his eyebrows, he thought over what they knew of the actual Mo Xuanyu. Kicked out of the Jin Sect for harassing someone and sent to his abusive, non-cultivating family.

(So then where had he gotten the instructions for the ressurection ritual? No normal disciple would have access to that.)

As Nie Huaisang continued to ponder over the mystery that was Mo Xuanyu, the simulation brought them through the Cloud Recesses. They passed towering stone staircases, tall, twisted trees, and serene, exquisite buildings, all the way to the base of the Cloud Recesses, where Hanguang-jun stood across from his brother.

“Xiongzhang, are you going to Lanlinjin to visit Lianfeng-jun?” Lan Wangji asked.

Lan Xichen nodded, “A-Yao wants to negotiate about the next discussion conference at Koi tower.”

“‘A-Yao?’” Nie Mingjue repeated, mystified. Lan Xichen shook his head at his friend, indicating that he didn’t currently know anyone who went by that name.

However, given the context, everyone could assume that “A-Yao” and “Lianfeng-zun” were one and the same.

‘The bastard who stole my position,’ Jin Zixuan thought.

A second later, he flinched back, horrified at himself. His mother had warned him for years that it was a possibility he needed to look out for, but…

That didn’t mean it was a valid reaction for him to have. After all, hadn’t Wei Wuxian unjustly been forced to face similar comments from Madam Yu?

He paused, then shook his head.

‘What am I doing?’ he wondered. ‘I don’t know anything about him. Besides, I’m already dead in this reality; what right do I have to feel offended? That doesn’t make any sense.’

His eyes turned to the side, and, as he looked at his father, he suddenly remembered the man’s quiet comments about Wei Wuxian’s new look. How if they’d chained him up somewhere-

Some ungrateful, disrespectful, unfaithful part of Jin Zixuan couldn’t help but laugh, ‘It doesn’t matter who Lianfeng-zun is. He might not have gotten trained for the position his whole life, but the Jin Sect is obviously still thriving. It’s probably fine.’

A pause.

‘It’s not like he can be any worse than our father.’

“What are you going to do with the arm you brought back?” Lan Xichen asked, allowing the watchers to recall the powerful limb that had appeared in the first segment.

Here, finally, Lan Wangji’s neutral expression gained a slightly stern tone.

“The arm is dangerous,” Lan Wangji responded. “According to Sizhui and Jingyi, the timing of its appearance is also unnatural. There’s a chance that someone deliberately brought it to Mo Village.”

And there was also a chance that whoever brought it had known Wei Wuxian would be resurrected at that time. Nie Huaisang had to admit that he was impressed; if someone was actually behind everything that had happened, their capabilities should not be underestimated.

(Not that he would know anything about that.)

“I will join the elders tomorrow to try and summon its owner,” Lan Wangji explained. “We’ll see if we can find something.”

Just then, Wei Wuxian, Lan Sizhui, and Lan Jingyi appeared in the watchers’ lines of sight. Apparently the mention of Lan Xichen’s plans had piqued Wei Wuxian’s interest to the point where he was delaying his search for a token.

As soon as he saw Lan Xichen, a smirk formed on Wei Wuxian’s face.

A foreboding shiver ran up Lan Qiren's spine.

'Perfect,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'Gusu-Lan places a lot of importance on seniority. If I horrify Lan Xichen, not even Hanguang-jun will be enough to keep me from being kicked out!'

"Oh, no," Jiang Cheng rubbed his temples, mentally preparing himself for what was to come.

However, right as he moved to open his mouth, Lan Wangji glanced over and Wei Wuxian's lips were sealed shut.

"Huh?"

When muted sounds of distress began to escape Wei Wuxian's sealed lips it became clear what had happened. Lan Wangji had cast the silencing spell on Wei Wuxian.

Nie Huaisang snorted, then fell over in full-blown laughter.

"Wangji-xiong, would you look at that. You kept being caught off guard by Wei-xiong, but your older-self can predict his every move!"

Lan Wangji did his best to not show the way that realization created a strange flutter of happiness within him.

Noticing what Lan Wangji had done, Lan Xichen gave an amused smile before undoing the silencing charm with a wave of his hand.

"It's not often that you bring guests home, and it's even more rare for you to be so happy about it," Lan Xichen commented. "Treat him with courtesy, Wangji."

There was a long pause.

"...Happy?" Jiang Fengmian checked, half-sure he had misheard. Looking at the perfectly neutral face of the adult Lan Wangji, it was clear that thirteen years had made Hanguang-jun's discipline vastly eclipse his teenage self's.

Even Wei Wuxian would surely struggle to get a reaction out of this version of Lan Wangji.

As Lan Wangji silently instructed the two disciples to drag Wei Wuxian back inside, the Yiling Patriarch expressed similar thoughts. No one but Lan Xichen could read Lan Wangji's expression.

The two juniors continued to follow Lan Wangji's orders, and Wei Wuxian cooperated with them without complaint. Soon, seeing his lack of struggle, Lan Jingyi began to speak. He rambled about the plans being made and the decisions at play, as well as the current political climate. To Wei Wuxian, who had been dead for the last thirteen years, and the watchers, who knew none of this, it was extremely informative.

"You know, Lianfeng-zun, Chifeng-zun, and Zewu-jun became sworn brothers after the Sunshot Campaign," Jingyi offhandedly mentioned.

"...What?"

"They're legendary masters known as the Venerated Triad!"

Gaping, Lan Xichen and Nie MIngjue turned to each other, making bewildered eye contact. There hadn't been much focus on them in the simulation so far, but it seemed like that was starting to change.

"Should I call you er-ge, then?" Nie Huaisang wondered, smiling widely.

"...I suppose that depends on Lianfeng-zun's age," Lan Xichen pointed out. "Or… 'A-Yao's,' I suppose."

Nie Mingjue gave a hearty laugh, unable to resist the smile forming on his face as well.

"It's such a pity that Chifeng-zun has passed away."

Nie Huaisang's grin froze.

"He died in his prime. It was a qi-deviation. Something went wrong while he was practicing."

Slowly, Nie Huaisang turned to look at his older brother.

Nie Mingjue's eyes were wide with the shock of how abruptly that had been revealed. He did a double take, analyzing Lan Jingyi's expression, and found nothing but honesty in it.

He took a deep breath, then opened his eyes.

In them, there wasn't fear, disbelief, or denial; just a tired, silent acceptance.

(A look so at ends with the battle-hungry, uncompromising person Nie Mingjue was supposed to be that Lan Xichen felt his blood halt abruptly.)

"It's a sad story," Jingyi concluded.

"...Da-ge?" Nie Huaisang asked.

Nie Mingjue shrugged, "Everyone dies eventually."

Even Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli — whose deaths had also been foretold — gaped in shock at him. Their parents, friends, siblings, and teachers all reacted the same.

Wen Ruohan couldn't resist the intrigued smirk that appeared on his face. He wondered if it was one of the natural, qi-deviation caused deaths of the Nies.

(Or if someone had planned it, just like he had planned Nie Mingjue's father's.)

After a pause, Sizhui added, "Back in the day, during the Siege of Nevernight, the four clans fought as one and battled for days."

The world around them shifted, reforming into a bloody battleground around the Nightless City.

“The final battle?” Wen Ruohan wondered.

“The Venerated Triad joined forces, and the battle was won.”

A large gate creaked open, revealing a room painted red with blood. There seemed to be countless corpses present, and not even the active ones Wei Wuxian used in his army. This area had already been taken care of.

The Yiling Patriarch stepped through the gate, his silver eyes apathetically taking stock of the scene before him. In his hand was Chenqing, not Suibian.

Instead, Suibian was with Jiang Cheng, who held the sword out for Wei Wuxian to take. Without speaking, the Yiling Patriarch reached forward.

And the vision faded away, leaving Wei Wuxian in Mo Xuanyu’s body grasping at nothing.

Throughout the simulation — the abyss, the rabbit, and the Yiling Patriarch’s arrival — the simulated Jiang Cheng had always returned the sword to his shixiong.

Where was it now?

“The battle… shook heaven and earth,” Sizhui solemnly concluded.

Not noticing the far-off look in Wei Wuxian’s eyes, Lan Jingyi nodded and added, “They say the water surrounding Qishan turned red and remained red for years!”

“Jingyi, you’re exaggerating things again.”

Lan Xichen smiled at the familiar antics.

“I’m not! Okay, maybe not years, but at least one year, alright?”

Wei Wuxian began to smile as well. He looked over at the clear, still lake beside the boardwalk they travelled on, trying to clear his mind of those thoughts.

Wen Ruohan frowned, annoyed at the lacking description of what had happened. Perhaps there would be more later.

“You know, the Yiling Patriarch was there.”

Wei Wuxian startled.

“Oh?” Wen Ruohan wondered.

“They say he used the Stygian Tiger Amulet to massacre the city in cold blood.”

Wei Wuxian looked down, and, in his reflection, the cold gaze of the Yiling Patriarch stared back at him, surrounded on all sides by brilliant fire and blood.

Then he blinked, and it was gone.

Knowing that the spirits had put in what Wei Wuxian was imagining at that time was somehow a very different sensation when they had experienced the effects of demonic cultivation first-hand. Yes, they weren't as fine-tuned as the spirits, but they could now understand how such a detailed image could be pulled from a demonic cultivator's thoughts.

The demonic cultivator was probably the hardest to ignore.

Jingyi sighed, "They say Wei Wuxian was a great warrior before he went astray. He was a cultivated gentleman, excelling in the six arts. What was he thinking when he chose the dark path?"

"It wasn't a choice," Lan Qiren whispered. And it hadn't been a choice; it had been a reaction. Wei Wuxian had been thrown into the Burial Mounds and had reacted when corpses attacked by subconsciously commanding them to stop. Yes, he should have switched back once he had escaped, but, after what he had been through, it would be no surprise if his mind was broken in more than one way.

~~And, because of Lan Qiren, he had refused the help Lan Wangji offered.~~

'The Stygian Tiger Seal,' Wei Wuxian thought. 'That should never have been created.'

Concern abruptly flooded Lan Wangji's body, and he recalled the battle it took to forge the seal in the first place. Considering the resistance it put up, he would not be surprised if the seal had been difficult for Wei Wuxian to control.

And the Wei Wuxian of the future, after death, regretted what he had done. That, more than anything, confirmed for the watchers that this was the Wei Wuxian they knew.

Then, as silently as ever, Wei Wuxian glanced over to where Sizhui and Jingyi were departing, not noticing that Wei Wuxian was lagging behind. They had been told to take him back inside, but, with his good behavior and seemingly lacking cultivation, they had dropped their guards.

Now, it was easy for Wei Wuxian to take a left and head back to the cold springs.

'He's annoyingly good at reading people and responding accordingly,' Wen Ruohan thought. 'I'll have to keep a close eye on him when we get out.'

As the sky darkened to a rouge-dusted orange, Wei Wuxian's black robes and red ribbon gave him an impeccable camouflage against the shadows of the forest. With everyone else wearing blindingly white robes, it was nearly impossible for someone not expecting him to notice him.

He snuck through the Cloud Recesses, collecting things for his journey.

Within minutes, the world had become a dull-blue dusk, and the walkways turned desolate. A gleaming ivory moon lit up the night sky as the ever-flowing rivers of gusu poured over the cliff edges. The water lilies and lilypads floating in the stream swayed with the rushing current. On land, the only motion was Little Apple, munching on some grass.

"Hello again, Little Apple," Jiang Yanli greeted warmly, and Jin Zixuan couldn't help but wave at the virtual donkey as well, flushing in embarrassment as he did.

A jar was rolled onto the ground in front of it.

"Lan Zhan was always so determined to capture and punish me," Wei Wuxian muttered, storing a few things he would take with him on LIttle Apple's back. "What's taking him so long?"

He patted Little Apple down, making sure the supplies he had stolen were secure.

"No, he'll probably come for me after he sorts out the severed arm. I'd better get going."

Remembering the broken look that had flashed across Wangji's face when Wei Wuxian had first accused him of that, Lan Xichen frowned deeply. Why were there so many obstacles in between his brother's relationship with Wei Wuxian? It seemed like every time they turned around a new challenge appeared.

"Alright, Little Apple. Let's go."

Wei Wuxian hadn't taken more than two steps before he was abruptly jerked back by teeth on his sleeve. With the stubbornness of a rock, Little Apple was holding tight.

"Yes, Little Apple!" Nie Huaisang cheered. "Keep them together! Make them meet!"

(If putting on a false act of cheer would lower his brother's guard, Nie Huaisang was more than willing to pretend he'd forgotten about Nie Mingjue's reaction to his death for the time being.)

"Huh?" Wei Wuxian asked, mouth open in shock as Little Apple grumpily turned its head away. "Seriously? Don't you think this place is boring? Why do you want to stay?"

The world 'boring' began to echo in Lan Wangji's mind without rest.

Wei Wuxian pouted and looked away.

'This place is heavily guarded,' he thought. 'Maybe I should get the token first, and pick up Little Apple later.'

A playful smirk formed on his face.

Bouncing on the edge of his seat, Nie Huaisang impatiently awaited his friend's latest great scheme.

The moon was now high in the sky. As Wei Wuxian approached the brook, the tweets of birds were soon joined by the sound of tumbling waterfalls crashing into a lake below. Wei Wuxian continued confidently, grateful that the rebuilt part of the Cloud Recesses had been made identical to how it was before the Sunshot Campaign.

Once he arrived, he heard a slight, unnatural splash.

'Is someone inside already? Perfect!'

Lan Qiren sighed once again, dreading the shameless act to come.

(But at least Wei Wuxian seemed to be back to his normal self. He would gladly accept this disgraceful but altogether harmless behavior from the boy to maintain that.)

The disciple on duty at the cold spring was quite a ways away, and female cultivators didn't come to this section of the Cloud Recesses to use it. Nobody in the Lan Sect would ever consider watching someone bathe anyways, so the security wasn't especially tight.

Then again, peeping wasn't Wei Wuxian's goal either.

'I'm sorry, gongzi,' he mentally apologized. 'I'm not intending to watch you take a bath; I just need your jade token. Please don't turn around.'

Madam Jin couldn't help but quirk her lips up slightly, amused by the way Wei Wuxian's shameless act was actually quite understandable if you knew why it was happening.

(So many things about Wei Wuxian changed when you knew why they were happening.)

In the center of the pool, surrounded on all sides by running water, a Lan disciple stood. He was facing away, preventing the watchers from seeing anything except his long hair and his cloud-patterned ribbon.

Flushing warmly, Jiang Yanli turned away again, briefly making eye contact with Jin Zixuan as she did. Somehow, that half-second of shared acknowledgement only made her more embarrassed.

It was adorable.

(Jin Zixuan could barely keep himself from squealing at her cuteness.)

However, a moment later, a cold, sinking feeling spread over him. He hadn't forgotten his father's comments about Wei Wuxian, nor was he blind to the way Jin Guangshan had been looking at the future Lan Wangji.

But this was his father. Jin Guangshan wasn't even interested in men; as his mother had said, he was just acting somewhat like that because he was bored and ~~interested in~~ respected the pair's power. It wasn't serious. It wasn't something to be concerned about. Jin Guangshan wasn't actually going to do anything.

~~Probably.~~

Behind a large boulder to the back of the pond, Wei Wuxian waited, out of sight of the unknown man. He glanced over, and found a set of folded clothes laying on the ground.

Even Jiang Cheng couldn't resist gaping slightly when he saw their perfection.

'Damn. It's folded so neatly that I almost don't have the heart to look through it,' Wei Wuxian though, silently chuckling to himself. 'At least he's alone, that'll make it easier to-'

He glanced up and froze.

At that moment, the simulation cleared up and allowed the watchers to see what Wei Wuxian was looking at.

The person in the water was quite tall. His skin was fair and his hair was pitch black, dripping and gathered to one side. The lines which outlined his waist and back were smooth; graceful, yet holding strength. In simple terms: he was a beauty.

However, that was not what had pulled in Wei Wuxian's eyes.

What had attracted his attention was the man's back. Specifically, the dozens upon dozens of intersecting scars whipped onto his skin.

The scars of a discipline whip.

Jiang Cheng subconsciously flinched and found himself reaching toward his own body, remembering how his other-self had received one at the hands of the Wen. That scar would never come off, and a single strike had been considered appropriate torture for the heir of an enemy sect.

And the person before them had far, far more than his measly one.

"Who is this?" Lan Qiren hissed, scrunching his brows. Unlike with Jiang Cheng, these scars had most likely been punishment given by the Gusu Lan Sect's elders. Who could have possibly done something this horrible, and yet been allowed to stay in the sect regardless?

Frowning, Lan Xichen stepped forward, walking across the virtual lake to get a look at the mystery disciple's face. Once he had reached the other side, his eyes widened in shock.

"Xichen?" Lan Qiren asked. "Who is it?"

Lan Xichen opened his mouth, but no sound came out. Any answer he might have planned on giving was swallowed by the horror rapidly spreading across his expression.

"Xiongzhang?" Wangji asked.

Lan Xichen flinched at the voice.

Moving past his surprise, Wei Wuxian shook those grim thoughts from his mind and looked around. When he spotted a large leaf by the clothes, he smirked, then waved his hand in the air.

Now that they had experienced it in full, the watchers had become more sensitive to every use of demonic cultivation from the founder of the art. As soon as the command was given, they knew what it was for.

There was a dim spark of red light, then movement. From underneath the clothes, a red-tinted leaf pulled itself out and then stood up, waddling back to the clothes for further inspection. Within moments, it had found and retrieved a jade token from the pocket.

"My, it's surprisingly useful for subtle work," Jin Guangshan commented, not having expected that after the terrifying display Wei Wuxian had put on last time.

All the while, Lan Xichen remained frozen and focused on the man in the pool. Concern growing, Lan Qiren began to walk forward to join him and see for himself.

Face lighting up in smug satisfaction, Wei Wuxian lifted a finger and made a beckoning motion towards the leaf.

Lan Qiren abruptly halted in his journey, forced to fight an artificial urge to turn around and walk back to Wei Wuxian.

However, right as the leaf made its daring leap towards Wei Wuxian's waiting hand, the figure in the water glanced back. As two familiar golden eyes landed on the watchers, a sudden burst of water covered their vision, knocking the leaf to the ground.

One of the droplets landed on Wei Wuxian's gaping face as the man exited the pool and pulled on his robes in a single, smooth motion. Now, the figure was fully in view.

"Lan Zhan?" Wei Wuxian asked.

Those golden orbs found their way to him.

'He's grown up nicely,' Jin Guangshan thought, observing the way the now-soaked, semi-transparent robes clung to Lan Wangji's sculpted body.

Everyone else was too stunned to move.

"Those scars…" Lan Qiren whispered. "He had… did I-"

"And a brand?" Jiang Yanli noticed.

And indeed, there was. On his chest was the sun of the Wen Clan, burned onto his skin like he was cattle in exactly the same place Wei Wuxian's had once been.

Just like the simulated Wei Wuxian, the watchers were confused beyond belief.

Wei Wuxian gave a nervous laugh, standing up and explaining, "I… I found the pass on my way. I was just trying to give it back."

Silently as ever, Lan Wangji stepped forward and picked the token off the ground, observing it calmly. At his feet, the damaged leaf struggled like a fish out of water.

Wei Wuxian stilled it with a glance.

How many times would Wen Ruohan be rendered speechless by the careless power Wei Wuxian wielded? Even something as small as this demanded an intricacy Wen Ruohan had never seen from a talisman before.

(Behind him, Wen Chao's trembling increased, the silent orders of the Yiling Patriarch rattling in his bones.)

The two men stared at each other for a long moment.

One smiled.

In the next instant, Wei Wuxian was gone. He had fearlessly taken off, reminding many of his days of fleeing Lan Wangji's discipline during the disciple exchange at the Cloud Recesses. The return to the now long-ago moment was more than a little weird.

Nevertheless, Wei Wuxian ran like a beam of light, darting through the trees and roots at breakneck speed-

And promptly crashing into Lan Jingyi.

Wen Qing stood up at the sudden collision, quickly checking Wei Wuxian over for injuries.

Immediately after, Lan Jingyi grabbed his arm to keep the stumbling Patriarch still and shouted, "There you are! How could you disappear like that? Do you know how hard we've been looking for you! If you leave and Sect Leader Jiang finds you-"

"I didn't see! I didn't see anything! I'm not here to watch Hanguang-jun bathe!"

"What?!" both Lan Qiren and Jiang Cheng shrieked. Madam Yu stood up, outrage overflowing at Wei Wuxian disgusting, disgraceful, absurd-

'Perfect. They'll have no choice but to kick me off the mountain now!' Wei Wuxian thought.

Although they could see the logic, very few could bring themselves to agree.

"I get that you want to leave," Jiang Cheng muttered tiredly. "But do you have to do it… like that?!"

In his disbelief at Wei Wuxian's words, he promptly forgot about the 'if Sect Leader Jiang finds you' clause in Lan Jingyi's warning.

"You… what?" Sizhui asked, finally recovering from his speechlessness. "Hanguang-jun? Hanguang-jun is in there?"

“That’s absurd, you-you damned — is Hanguang-jun someone you can peek at?!” Jingyi followed up.

“Aw, Wangji-xiong, look. Your little ducklings are defending you.”

Wei Wuxian as the Yiling Patriarch had rejected Lan Wangji’s offer of help. Therefore, Lan Wangji had absolutely no right to think about how Wei Wuxian was the only person the juniors shouldn’t need to defend his honor from.

His ears burned a fiery red.

“No, no! I didn’t see how he looks without his clothes at all!”

Even in his seemingly infinite composure, Jiang Fengmian couldn’t resist a small snort at Wei Wuxian’s comment. When Lan Qiren sent him an undeniably betrayed look, Jiang Fengmian forced himself to bow back in apology, trying desperately to not start laughing again.

(It didn’t work.)

“If you didn’t, then what were you doing here?” JIngyi demanded. “Just look at you — you have no face at all!”

Wincing dramatically, Wei Wuxian covered his ears with his hands and said, “Hey, hey, quiet down a little. Loud noises are prohibited in the Cloud Recesses!”

“You-!”

More than one jaw dropped open.

Lan Qiren gave a long sigh.

“Of course. He knows the rules perfectly well, but he insists on breaking them regardless.”

“To be fair, given the way he turned the Wen rules against Wen Chao, it could be much worse,” Jiang Fengmian pointed out. The look Lan Qiren sent him made it very clear that he was still not forgiven.

Then, footsteps began to approach, and the juniors quieted at once.

“Hanguang-jun,” they greeted respectfully.

Seeing the unquestioned deference the juniors showed to his brother, Lan Xichen couldn’t help but smile. It seemed Lan Wangji had continued to prove himself worthy of his title even after thirteen years.

(But then what about the scars? What could explain those?)

“Hanguang-jun!” Jingyi spoke up. “This Mo Xuanyu has gone too far! You brought him back to thank him for helping us, but he… he-!”

‘Kick me out, kick me out, kick me out!’ Wei Wuxian mentally begged.

And Lan Wangji undoubtedly would, after what just happened.

However, after a moment of silence, Lan Wangji simply sheathed his sword and grabbed Wei Wuxian by the collar.

“Leave,” he ordered to the juniors, dragged Wei Wuxian in the opposite direction.

All at once, their memories of what happened the last time they were watching the future returned full-force. Wei Wuxian — a flirtatious pout on his face — claiming that Lan Wangji was “his type,” and Lan Wangji responding in kind.

“That… isn’t how I expected you to react,” Nie Mingjue admitted.

Wen Qing nodded in agreement, “I thought you would become offended and walk… away.”

Just like he had at the end of the last segment. And that had ended with Wei Wuxian dead and reviled by the world for decades after his demise. After that, was it really a surprise that he was trying something new?

‘No,’ Lan Wangji shook his head. ‘He didn’t want to come back with me. He mistakenly thinks I’m going to punish him, but it’s not as though Jiang Wanyin was actually going to hurt him — we saw how much they cared about each other. He might have not intended for it to go that far, but the past Jiang Cheng lost his core in an attempt to protect Wei Ying. I’m deluding myself thinking my older self did it to protect him.’

He was not his father.

(But then where was Hanguang-jun taking him?)

The Jingshi, as it turned out. Again.

And this time, Wei Wuxian was thrown onto Lan Wangji’s bed!

Jin Guangshan gave an impressed whistle, and Lan Wangji felt so much blood flow to his head that he began to feel faint.

‘Since when has the Lan Clan tolerated something as shameless as watching one of their most distinguished cultivators bathe?!’

“We don’t,” Lan Qiren sternly announced.

‘Fine then. I’ll strike while the iron’s hot!’

He turned around, ready to launch into his next segment, only to pause when his eyes fell on Lan Wangji’s form. He was used to seeing Lan Wangji dressed impeccably. To see him now, with loose hair and thin clothing, meant Wei Wuxian couldn’t help but glance back a few times.

While Madam Jin felt an amused smile form on her face as Wei Wuxian was abruptly confronted by his attraction, her usual partner in the WangXian cheer squad, Lan Xichen, was far more solem. It was difficult to see, but Lan Wangji's clothing was loose enough right now for Lan Xichen to make out the Wen mark branded onto his brother's chest.

Fear for his brother abruptly overwhelmed Lan Xichen, and he moved closer to the real Lan Wangji as if that would protect him from the rest of the world. As much as Wangji wanted to protest, the scars of the discipline whip kept him silent.

(Taking Wei Wuxian back? Putting him in his room? On his bed? His older-self was now undeniably shameless. The scars must signify that Lan Wangji had allowed himself to be tempted away from righteousness.)

Following Wei Wuxian's gaze, Lan Wangji noticed how it had fallen to the sear. Without speaking, he adjusted his collar so that it covered the mark, becoming the indifferent Hanguang-jun once again.

At that moment, a bell toiled outside.

"It's nine," Lan Wangji explained to Nie Huaisang's questioning glance. Which meant it was the end of the day.

"You will be sleeping here," Lan Wangji explained. Without giving Wei Wuxian a chance to reply, he turned on his heel and walked to another room in the Jingshi. The door clicked shut, and Wei Wuxian was left alone, sprawled on the bed and indescribably confused.

Seeing that Lan Wangji had no plans to take advantage of Wei Wuxian (despite the other man's persistent and provocative flirting) set Madam Jin's mind at ease. It made sense — given his reputation, there was no way Lan Wangji would behave like her husband — but it was still reassuring.

'Does he know who I am?' Wei Wuxian wondered. 'But Lan Wangji is the most upright person I know. Our arguments weren't insignificant back then — if he knew who I was, he would have fought with me no matter what.'

Remembering the argument they had in the previous segment, any optimism that had been in Lan Wangji's expression was washed out. No one else could tell, but it was obvious to Lan Xichen. He sent his brother a reassuring smile, but the complicated emotions toiling within Lan Wangji remained.

Wei Wuxian sighed.

'Back then, he didn't tolerate anything I did. And yet now I've pulled out every trick I have, and he still hasn't lost his patience. Should I congratulate him for making so much progress? How could he have changed so much?'

At those words, Wei Wuxian was forced to recall the scars he had seen on Lan Wangji's body.

Lan Qiren clenched his fists.

'Lan Wangji has always been an example to all disciples. What kind of unforgivable mistake could he have done to receive such a severe punishment?'

No one had an answer to that. In some ways, this was just as unbelievable as Wei Wuxian killing Jin Zixuan and Jiang Yanli — and yet both seemed to be true.

And now they knew Nie Mingjue was also dead.

"I don't like this future," Nie Huaisang grumbled angrily.

From there, the simulation sped forward, flashing forward around half an hour. After that long time of staring at the ceiling, Wei Wuxian sat up. He looked around, and saw a dim light still emitting from Lan Wangji's room.

'Maybe I'll be able to get the jade token from him now.'

Considering how his last few attempts had turned out, the watchers were excited to watch this one unfold.

Even after searching around the room, Wei Wuxian was unable to find anything. It seemed, despite his hopes otherwise, that the token was truly still with Lan Wangji.

Silent as a mouse, Wei Wuxian crept inside the adjacent and found Lan Wanji sleeping peacefully on his bed. Smirking gleefully, Wei Wuxian reached out a hand to inspect carefully.

Lan Wangji's eyes fluttered open.

Jiang Cheng didn't even try to withhold his groan.

Wei Wuxian jerked back upon the realization that Lan Wangji was awake, before desperation overcame his expression. He didn't have time to plan an excuse out.

So he jumped onto the bed-

"What?!"

"Wei-xiong!"

"Wei Wuxian?!"

Remembering how Lan "I don't touch strangers" Wangji had reacted at the abyss, Wei Wuxian tensed up and prepared to be thrown off.

Hanguang-jun was frozen.

"Ah, Wei-xiong, you've misunderstood-"

Lan Xichen took a step towards his brother, who was frozen in shock. Right now, it was clear to all the watchers that Lan Wangji's feelings for Wei Wuxian were not disgust, but Wei Wuxian — who, unlike them, hadn't been able to see inside Lan Wangji's head — didn't know that.

"Wait…" Nie Mingjue subconsciously began to move back. "How… how far is this going to go-"

He cut off, unable to finish as Wei Wuxian began to adjust his body. His legs were wrapped around Lan Wangji's waist like a blanket, and his hands rested to each side of the second young master's face. In that position, his head was probably close enough for Lan Wangji to feel the heat radiating off his body.

As the silence bore out, Wei Wuxian soon realized that he would have to do more. Slowly, he began to lower himself further, giving a seductive grin as he shortened the distance between their faces.

Six centimeters.

Then three.

Two-

"Get off."

"No," was Wei Wuxian's instant, cheeky response.

Even knowing it was an act, Jiang Cheng had to look away in disgust. Feeling unquestionably embarrassed, Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan did the same.

(They knew how Lan Wangji felt. If the object of someone's affections came on to them in such a way — looking as unquestionably temping as Wei Wuxian did — who could possibly reist?)

Lan Wangji's cheeks turned scarlet.

"Get off," Hanguang-jun repeated.

"No. You let me sleep here; you should have known that something like this was going to happen."

But Wei Wuxian was the one who didn't understand-

"Are you sure this is what you want?"

Wei Wuxian blinked.

'For some reason, I feel like I should think twice before answering this question.'

If Jin Zixuan's face got any more hot, he would start releasing steam from his ears. The flush spreading across his body was boiling, and he could hear more than one person giving high-pitched squeals.

This couldn't be happening.

But Lan Wangji liked him, and Wei Wuxian was literally asking for it and-'

"I… I don't think we should be watching this," Nie Huaisang observed. Yes, he was an appreciator of the arts and knew his friends were incomparably attractive (he had eyes, thank you very much), but this was different. This was a whole new level of personal.

Even he knew they shouldn't watch this.

"Complaint registered," a voice that sounded a lot like Wen Ning announced.

"What?"

"Pausing now."

A bright red light in the shape of an array appeared under most of the watchers, dictating the "zones" which would be influenced by the spell.

And, just like that, they froze. Jin Zixuan, Jiang Yanli, Jiang Cheng, Madam Yu, Lan Qiren, Lan Xichen, and Nie Mingjue were all too uncomfortable to want to watch. Wen Qing, although a doctor, respected the boys' privacy too much. The same was true for Jiang Fengmian, Madam Jin, and Nie Huaisang.

Although Wen Ruohan wasn't the type to be made uncomfortable by such an act, he had no interest in it either. Outside from its function of producing heirs, he had never been particularly invested in sex. He had no desire to watch.

"Xiongzhang?" Lan Wangji asked, speed walking towards his brother. However, no matter what he did, Lan Xichen continued blankly staring into space, frozen in time.

'Then I'm pleased to announce the great news: we've finished the Concealment Zone!' Wei Wuxian declared. 'It'll activate based off a voice command. You don't have to say anything specific; so long as the general sentiment is 'i don't want to watch this,' you won't have to.'

A yelp shocked them out of their thoughts. With a single tap on a pressure point, Lan Wangji had paralyzed Wei Wuxian's body, forcing it to collapse on top of him.

"Then you can stay like this for the whole night," Lan Wangji decided, his deep voice vibrating in his chest.

Now, Lan Wangji knew he had more important things to worry about than the simulation. The Concealment Zone had activated, and he had no idea when the watchers would be released from its hold.

However, at that moment, he couldn't focus on anything else.

“What?” he whispered.

‘You paralyzed him,’ his mind responded.

“...What?” he repeated, doing a double take. However, the second he did, he realized what a mistake that had been. With Wei Wuxian switching back to his normal hair style, he looked nearly indistinguishable from his real body. And right now, that very same body was lying across Lan Wangji’s chest.

Up close like this, he could see the slight rise and fall of Wei Wuxian’s chest, and a temptation to wrap his hands around it grew. Around Wei Wuxian’s wide eyes, long eyelashes fluttered in confusion. A mouth was gaping open in shock, looking inviting enough for him to-

“Oh?” a voice muttered. “Are you going to have your way with him?”

Before those words could sink in, they were replaced by another concern altogether. The simulation was showing Lan Wangji. Of everyone present, he was the only one who had a right to see this.

But Jin Guangshan had never known shame in his life.

(And, going by the quiet, broken breaths in the background, Wen Chao was there too.)

The flush that had been gradually spreading across Lan Wangji face instantly paled to a pearly whiteness, making him truly resemble a piece of jade.

Luckily for the real Lan Wangji’s sanity, when Hanguang-jun shifted, it wasn’t to take part in any inexcusable acts. He simply shut the light off with a single hand motion, and pulled the blankets back up.

“Sleep,” he commanded.

Jin Guangshan clicked his tongue in disappointment.

Frozen though he was, Wei Wuxian’s thoughts raced forward at record speed:

‘What?’ he thought. ‘Hold on… what?!’

He couldn’t move at all. His befuddlement multiplied.

‘What’s happened to Lan Zhan?! How could he have become like this? Is this the same Lan Zhan I know? Between the two of us, he seems more likely to have been possessed!’

Lan Wangji gave no answer.

As Jin Guangshan’s discontentment increased, Lan Wangji felt a rush of gratitude wash over him. It was fine; he was fine. No matter how much his future self seemed to have changed, it hadn’t been this much.

On the side, Wen Chao clicked his tongue.

“Should have done more,” the Wen Chao breathlessly grumbled, growing more and more panicked with every word. “You had it pinned and motionless. How could you just let it go? Fool. It’ll take revenge now! Can’t you see that it-”

“What?” Lan Wangji asked, slowly realizing who ‘it’ referred to.

Wen Chao glared up, “You should have taught it to fear you while you had the chance!”

Hanguang-jun had fallen back asleep.

“...No.”

Wen Chao glanced over.

“No,” Lan Wangji repeated, looking back and forth between both of them. “No, you cannot say that. You-”

“You must have been thinking it too,” Jin Guangshan commented with a raised eyebrow. “Considering how enamored you are with him, I can’t imagine you were indifferent to the way he presented himself to you and crawled on top of your-”

“Stop!” Lan Wangji commanded. “That isn’t — you can’t-”

“Hanguang-jun should have at least considered it,” Wen Chao hissed.

“Be silent. If you-”

“Wangji? When did you get over there?” Lan Xichen asked. To the people who had just woken up from their frozen state, it almost looked like Lan Wangji, Wen Chao, and Jin Guangshan had teleported between one blink and the next. Their sense of time had completely frozen for those minutes.

“I…” Lan Wangji looked between Wen Chao, Jin Guangshan, and Lan Xichen, unsure of where to begin.

“The Concealment Zone,” Wen Ruohan realized first. “It kept going for you three?”

Finally, Wei Wuxian caved in and tried falling asleep, lost in his thoughts atop Lan Wangji’s body.

Taking a quick inventory of the state of things, Wen Ruohan raised an eyebrow and asked, “You didn’t sleep together? I would have thought you would capitalize on such an opportunity.”

Struggling to find his voice, it took Lan Wangji a moment to respond, “He… didn’t mean it.”

As Lan Wangji tried and failed to come to terms with what had just (not?) happened, Lan Qiren stepped back. First the whip scars, then the brand mark, and now this? Even if Lan

Wangji hadn't actually slept with Wei Wuxian, he had still-

Did Lan Qiren even know this version of his nephew anymore?

The world faded to black.

Noticing that, and having nothing their speechless minds could think to say, they turned back to the simulation and waited for it to begin again.

When it did, the crowded forests around Jinlintai were what appeared before them. Koi tower appeared to approach from the distance as the simulation brought them closer and closer.

Madam Jin clenched her fists in preparation.

As they approached the Sect, the watchers couldn't help but notice numerous, unfamiliar towers which had been set up along the way. They were set over equal distances, as if governing those areas of land.

Then, they made it to the shining symbol of the cultivation worlds' wealth: Koi tower.

With even, steady steps, a figure walked out towards the balcony. His golden robes shimmered as the wind brushed them, and the tall hat on his head did nothing to diminish the serene look in his eyes.

'My replacement,' Jin Zixuan thought, unable to keep a sting of bitterness from biting him no matter how illogical he knew it to be. He was dead; there wasn't anything else that could have happened.

But it hurt nonetheless.

Once he was fully in the light, the watchers were greeted to the sight of a vermilion mark atop two clear eyes.

'Eyes the exact same shade as A-Xuan's,' Madam Jin noticed, then flinched.

She recognized that face. How could she not, after her words had prompted her husband to push the boy down the stairs? She could be wrong — he was years older now — but with this and the brief glimpse of the young man fighting with Lan Xichen in the last segment?

She knew that bastard child.

And he had stolen her son's rightful place.

"Meng Yao, courtesy name Jin Guangyao," Ouyang Zizhen revealed.

A few people raised a confused eyebrow at the "Guang" prefix, but no one spoke up about it.

(As the name "Meng" rang in Jin Guangshan's ears, he began to tear through his memories in the hopes that he would be able to figure out who it referred to. His wife was already mad; if he couldn't even remember who the boy's mother was, her anger would undoubtedly skyrocket.)

"Sect leader," a man said, confirming their suspicions about the Jin. Jin Guangyao's eyes momentarily narrowed, before a kind smile appeared on his face and he turned to face the disciple who had spoken.

"Yes?"

"Zewu-jun is here."

"Ah, let him in," the new Jin Sect Leader ordered, walking towards the main hall.

As the man stepped through Koi tower, Jin Zixuan's thoughts ran in a million different directions.

'Here he is. The thief who-'

'Didn't you say you wanted a brother?'

'Look at how obnoxiously composed he is. As if he didn't take-'

'I'm supposed to be there. It shouldn't be him! It's not supposed to be him, he-'

Jin Zixuan didn't know what to think. How could he say anything when the person before him had stolen his job except he had already been dead so it wasn't stealing except it was still his and this man had no right except….

Somehow, until now, it hadn't quite sunk in for Jin Zixuan what "dead" entailed.

"Er-ge," Lianfeng-zun greeted, nodding to Lan Xichen.

Even Lan Wangji couldn't keep his eyes from widening at the greeting. Judging by the kind smile Lan Xichen was sending back, they truly viewed each other as brothers.

Lan Xichen and Nie Mingjue made eye contact, tentative excitement beginning to bubble over in their expressions.

"A-Yao," Lan Xichen nodded back.

"You've had a long journey," Jin Guangyao commented. "You must be tired."

That was supposed to be Jin Zixuan's place.

And as a result, Jin Zixuan couldn't help but compare them.

(Jin Guangyao was calm, composed, and graceful, but-)

Giving Jin Guangyao a quick look over, Lan Xichen mentioned, "It looks like you stayed up all night working again."

Glancing back at the pile of papers on his desk, Jin Guangyao laughed and commented, "I am a man with little talent, yet you all trusted me and made me chief cultivator. I can't let you down."

(Humble; hard-working; the Chief Cultivator.

Perfect.)

'If this person had heard what our father said about Wei Wuxian, he would he have hesitated to speak?' Jin Zixuan wondered. 'And Mo Xuanyu… he was our half brother too, wasn't he? If this man had known about the circumstances Mo Xuanyu was living in, what would he have done? Would I have done the same?'

Jin Zixuan didn't know. He didn't know anything. He didn't know how he was supposed to feel about his brother ~~the thief~~ and he knew he shouldn't blame the man, but-

With practiced hands, Jin Guangyao began to pour Sect Leader Lan tea.

"A-Yao, don't undervalue yourself," Lan Xichen recommended. "You were a hero in the Sunshot Campaign. If you hadn't killed Wen Ruohan, tens of thousands more would have died."

"Don't mention it."

"Alright," Lan Xichen allowed with a huffed laugh, picking up his cup.

Startling, Wen Ruohan did a double-take towards the man. Killed him. Him? He knew he had died, but to see Jin Guangyao and know that everything he had worked for was ruined because of-

He took a deep breath, gritting his teeth together and refusing to lose composure even as Jin Guangshan made a pathetic attempt to separate himself from his successor.

"I heard you plan to ask each clan for manpower and money to build another 2,000 watchtowers."

"Watchtowers?" Nie Huaisang asked, looking at the human encyclopedia that was Lan Wangji. However, the second jade merely shook his head, indicating that he didn't recognize the term.

"Yes," Jin Guangyao confirmed. "Very few of the great sects live in the remote places evil spirits tend to haunt. When there's a situation, the watchtowers allow for the rest of us to be alerted on time. I hope that this project will allow us to protect far more people from evil."

The comfortable smile on Lan Xichen's face was nothing but genuine.

'Don't look at him like that. He stole my job!' Jin Zixuan thought, then looked away. He knew Jin Guangyao hadn't — he knew that — but that man was right there and-

But Jin Zixuan had never given much thought to his half siblings before. It would be silly to; his mother would never allow them to meet. But he had seen first hand how bad things were for Mo Xuanyu.

(And how bad things could get in the Jiang Sect for Wei Wuxian.)

Why had he never asked about them before?

(Behind him, Wen Ruohan watched Jin Guangyao with terrifyingly frigid eyes.)

Then, Lan Xichen stepped forward and rested a hand on Jin Guangyao's shoulder, causing the other man to glance back.

"I agree with you. However, you must be careful. Some believe you are requesting this money just to fill your pockets. The watchtowers have proven useful, but building 2,000 more in one go… you'll face even greater opposition."

Jin Guangyao laughed, "It's fine. I have a clear conscience."

Could Jin Zixuan say the same?

(No. Not after he'd kept silent about his father's words.)

"Besides, I have you to support me."

Hearing that, Jiang Yanli glanced over and moved closer to her fiance, giving him a warm smile. It was all the support she could offer for now, but she hoped it would be better than nothing.

(She couldn't imagine how strange it was for him to see a stranger standing where he should have been. In this world, Jin Zixuan had died when he was still just an heir, hadn't he? He had never become Sect Leader Jin.)

The unjudging reassurance in Jiang Yanli's clear eyes helped ease the turmoil growing inside Jin Zixuan's mind. He flushed in embarrassment at his own reaction, but made sure to send her a grateful smile in return.

After a half second of surprise at Jin Guangyao's declaration of unconditional trust, Lan Xichen smiled and nodded in agreement.

"The three of us took an oath to protect the world and maintain peace. Da-ge died before us, leaving his unfulfilled ambitions for us to take on."

A petal on a nearby peony broke off and fell to the ground.

As silent and unnoticeable as a speck of dust drifting through the air, Nie Huaisang moved closer to his brother to give him a full look-over. This time, even worse than his earlier resignation, Nie Mingjue had just blinked once in acceptance.

The Jiangs, who had gotten far more time to accept their deaths, still flinched whenever it was mentioned. The Lans, who had barely known Qingheng-jun, still frowned whenever they were reminded. Wen Ruohan, usually far more calm than Nie Mingjue, still growled whenever his was mentioned. Wen Chao would never be able to forget his own death.

And yet Nie Mingjue seemed completely unphased.

Was he just pretending to be strong for Huaisang? No, Nie Huaisang could always tell when his brother was trying to do that. This was something else and-

He and Lan Xichen made eye contact with each other, the same thought running through both of their minds. Battle-hungry or not, Nie Mingjue should not be treating this so casually.

They would need to talk to him once the simulation ended.

After his pause at the reminder of Nie Mingjue, the simulated Lan Xichen continued, "You've worked tirelessly for our common cause, A-Yao. I'll support you with whatever you need."

Letting out a relieved sigh, Jin Guangyao stood up and bowed in appreciation, "Er-ge, that's very kind of you. Thank you."

'Evil, thieving, stealing, bastard!' Madam Jin mentally hissed. However, as his eyes glanced warmly on Lan Xichen, she couldn't help but see the boy her husband had kicked down the stairs in response to her fury.

(And no matter how much she tried to ignore it, a newfound feeling of guilt remained.)

Jin Guangyao looked down, "...If I recall correctly, the anniversary of Da-ge's death his approaching."

Nie Huaisang couldn't help but flinch, but Nie Mingjue once again gave no noticeable reaction.

"It is," Lan Xichen confirmed.

The more apparent Nie Mingjue's easy acceptance became, the more frozen Nie Huaisang felt. A cold, sinking feeling was spreading through every nerve in his body and weighing him down.

(Why wasn't Nie Mingjue asking any questions? Why wasn't he double checking anything? Asking other people to look for clues? Didn't he want to at least try to prevent his own death?)

With a melancholy air, Jin Guangyao walked over to the rows of peonies encasing the aisle and gently ran his hand over them. He gave a small, sad smile:

"Huaisang wrote to me and asked when we'd arrive so that he could get ready."

Here, finally, they got a reaction out of him. However, instead of worry about his death, it was relief that Nie Huaisang was still alive. The tension in Nie Mingjue's body had vanished as soon as his brother's name was mentioned.

The second they left the simulation, Nie Huaisang was going to ground his brother — Sect Leader or not. Lan Xichen would undoubtedly help him in the endeavor.

"I've almost sorted out my affairs, so I can leave at any time," Jin Guangyao finished. "What about you?"

"Oh, everything has been going well at home. Wangji brought back an arm the other day. An unusually ferocious one."

"An arm?" Jin Guangyao repeated, his eyes narrowing.

Wen Ruohan immediately picked up on that, directing his full attention to the conversation.

Jin Guangyao — Meng Yao — had killed him. To have done that meant one of two things: Meng Yao was either a very powerful cultivator, or a very skilled manipulator. If it was the former, Wen Ruohan would do everything he could to get that man on his side. If it was the latter….

Nie Huaisang might not be the only one Wen Ruohan would need to deal with once they got out.

(Either way, the more weaknesses Wen Ruohan could find, the better.)

Turning, Jin Guangyao made eye contact with Lan Xichen and asked, "Can you tell me more?"

Xichen shook his head, "That's all I know. Before I left, I entrusted all the domestic affairs to Wangji. He'll handle it."

The world darkened to black.

"Aw, such trust," Nie Huaisang teased with a smile, referring to both the trust Lan Xichen had in Lan Wangji and the trust he had in Jin Guangyao to explain all that. The comment brightened Nie Mingjue's mood, proving to Nie Huaisang that his brother hadn't zoned out at all.

(But if his mind hadn't shut down from the shock, why wasn't he reacting to his own death?)

As Nie Huaisang continued to ponder, the day's first slivers of sunlight were beginning to reach over the horizon, and the simulation returned them to Gusu. It was the morning after Wei Wuxian's escape attempt.

In the early morning light, a figure brushed some hair out of the sleeping Wei Wuxian's eyes. It was too dark to clearly make them out, but the grace in the figure's actions made it obvious who they were.

A high-pitched squeal of excitement escaped Nie Huaisang's mouth, and only Madam Jin's rigorous discipline kept her from acting the same at the sight of Hanguang-jun's affection.

Lan Wangji himself, on the other hand, was far too distracted by the Yiling Patriarch to pay that any mind.

Although there were a few minor differences, Mo Xuanyu's face and body were so unbelievably similar to Wei Wuxian's that knowing they were the same soul made it easy to transfer any attraction over.

So the sight of this — Wei Wuxian sleeping peacefully yet carelessly in a thin white under robe (which he hadn't been wearing when he fell asleep) — was intoxicating. As the shadow of Hanguang-jun tucked the Yiling Patriarch into bed, Wei Wuxian's free flowing, silky hair made a stark backdrop for the low-collared inner robes he was wearing.

Nothing had happened. Lan Wangji had seen for himself that Hanguang-jun had simply paralyzed Wei Wuxian so he had collapsed on Lan Wangji's bed. The real Lan Wangji couldn't necessarily blame his older self (Wei Wuxian had been the one to jump on the bed after all), but, seeing it like this now-

"Wow, you really look like a married couple who slept together, don't you?" Jin Zixuan asked.

Lan Wangji would never be able to make eye contact with his brother or uncle ever again.

There was another flash forward, and the sun moved high in the sky. Bright daylight shone through the paper doors and illuminated Wei Wuxian's sleeping form.

Two knocks against the door.

At their sound, Wei Wuxian groaned and stretched himself out, finally starting to rise.

"Young Master Mo, have you woken up?"

"Xiao Sizhui, why have you woken me up this early?" Wei Wuxian complained.

"Early?" Sizhui parrotted. "But… it's already nine."

The Nie brothers snorted at that declaration, and Jiang Cheng gave a heavy roll of his eyes. Internally, however, they were all pleased. Wei Wuxian's sleep schedule had been discussed during his arrival to the Cloud Recesses back when he was fifteen; the mention of it again almost made them feel like he hadn't changed at all.

(As if the Yiling Patriarch was just a bad dream.)

After thinking it over for a moment, Wei Wuxian laid back down on the bed.

'My bed,' Lan Wangji couldn't help but think.

“I can’t get up,” Wei Wuxian declared.

“Eh? What’s wrong this time?”

“What’s wrong?” Wei Wuxian repeated, before sobbing dramatically. “I’ve been ravaged by Hanguang-jun!”

“WHAT?!” Lan Qiren shouted.

The composure Lan Wangji had desperately tried to maintain was demolished by that declaration.

“You-how dare you?!” Lan Jingyi bellowed. “Come out here! If you keep speaking nonsense like this, I’ll make you regret it!”

No matter how loudly Lan Jingyi screamed, Lan Qiren remained still. His haunted eyes turned on his younger nephew, who was frozen in shock.

“Really! He took me all night long! I can’t go out! I don’t have the face to see anyone anymore!”

“...Wangji,” Lan Qiren said. “You… during the time in which the Concealment Zone was active, did your other self — did he-”

“No!” Lan Wangji shouted, his self control completely eroded by Wei Wuxian’s endless taunts.

“You have no shame at all!” Lan Jingyi shouted, stomping his feet but unable to enter the Jingshi due to it being Hanguang-jun’s residence. “Hanguang-jun is not a cut-sleeve. He did you? I’d be more than grateful if you would tell me you didn’t do him! Get up!”

Inside the Jingshi, Wei Wuxian listened to Lan Jingyi’s shouts with an amused expression and began to pull on his robe.

At the reminder of the change in clothes, Lan Qiren’s face lost all its color as he turned back to his nephew.

“Wangji-”

“No,” Lan Wangji repeated, straightening himself up and trying desperately to calm down. “No, Wei Ying is just… making it up. We didn’t do it — didn’t have — didn’t anything.”

Looking at the state of Wei Wuxian’s disheveled appearance now, Jin Guangshan has to admit that he’s extremely impressed with the future Lan Wangji’s restraint. If it had been him in that situation-

Before Jin Guangshan could finish that thought, Jingyi continued, “And take that donkey of yours and train it properly! It makes so much noise!”

“What did you do to my Lil’ Apple! Don’t touch it; it’ll kick you,” he advised, finally opening the door now that he was dressed.

“W-what’s Lil’ Apple?”

“My donkey!”

“He seems like a completely different person,” Jiang Fengmian muttered, unable to connect The Yiling Patriarch with this post-death version.

“Well, I don’t know about that,” Nie Huaisang shrugged. “Though more subdued, he seemed pretty normal to me when he was talking to Jiang-guniang.”

“He’s always able to hide his true self from A-Li,” Madam Yu scoffed, and her husbands’ disapproving look was far from enough to change her mind. Wei Wuxian would kill her daughter and son in law; nothing would make her forget that.

(But, remembering how she had blamed him right before he was thrown into the Burial Mounds, she could acknowledge that part of that eventual disaster was her fault.)

~~Maybe a little more than just ‘part.’~~

The brays of a donkey hammered into the watchers like a mallet, announcing to them that Little Apple was on its way. Soon, the rest of the world faded into existence, and they were able to see the donkey expressing its displeasure, surrounded by an army of fat, round rabbits.

“Oh my,” Jiang Yanli gasped out, shocked at their sheer quantity. Seeing that, Wen Qing couldn’t help but wish Wen Ning was inside the simulation to see it too.

Poor Little Apple continued to make sounds of distress, unable to eat any grass due to the few dozen pompoms covering the field. As he saw them, Wei Wuxian’s expression lit up in delight.

“So many rabbits! Here, here, let’s put them on a stick and start roasting!”

“No killing in the Cloud Recesses,” Lan Qiren snapped, speaking in sync with Lan Jingyi. However, unlike Jingyi, Lan Qiren’s shouts were somewhat subdued. After all, after spending so much time watching Wei Wuxian, he knew full-well that the threats were unlikely to be serious. Wei Wuxian just enjoyed riling up poor, unsuspecting Lan disciples.

Little Apple gave an especially violent bray.

“Make your donkey shut up right now!” Lan Jingyi ordered. “The disciples doing early readings have asked about it multiple times! If it keeps this up, we’ll be scolded to death!”

“No shouting in the Cloud Recesses,” Lan Qiren grumpily added.

“At least he’s trying to enforce the rules, right Uncle?” Lan Xichen suggested, recalling the shouting Lan Qiren himself had been manipulated into creating once Wei Wuxian identified him as a target. That time, Wei Wuxian had been rebelling against the — admittedly unfair — way Lan Qiren had singled him out; this time, Wei Wuxian was trying to escape.

Huffing in annoyance, Lan Qiren glanced over at his younger nephew and muttered, “At least your older self seems to be able to keep him on his toes.”

Lan Wangji stubbornly looked away.

Little Apple made another noise of protest, and Lan Jingyi straightened himself up to shout again-

“Have some patience, won’t you?” Wei Wuxian requested. “Lil’ Apple’s only doing this because it’s hungry. We just need to feed it a little. Here, I took this from the Jingshi.”

And with that, he pulled an apple out of his sleeve — possibly tucked away for when Wei Wuxian made his attempted escape — and stuffed it in the donkey’s mouth. At long last, the obnoxious noise Little Apple was making quieted down.

Jiang Cheng scoffed and rolled his eyes, “Of course. It takes him two minutes to figure out a solution to a problem that stumps all the other cultivators who try.”

A temptation sprung up in the watchers, but they forced it down fiercely. No matter how appropriate it seemed, they would never say ‘Wei Wuxian can do anything’ again. They had all seen exactly what that meant.

A bitter taste formed in Lan Wangji’s mouth.

“By the way, where did you get this donkey from?” Lan Jingyi asked.

“What do you mean? From Mo Village! We seem to get along so well, so I took it as my servant.”

Little Apple made an offended noise.

Despite his best attempts, Jin Zixuan couldn’t help but snort at the donkey’s reaction.

As Wei Wuxian reached out to stroke Little Apple’s neck, his thoughts inevitably began to drift to the barrier of the Cloud Recesses locking him inside.

The watchers had no doubt that he would be more than capable of shattering the barrier if he wanted to. However, just like they didn’t need to worry about him taking one of the kids hostage, they knew they didn’t have to worry about him splitting open the Cloud Recesses barrier and leaving everyone inside vulnerable while also revealing his identity as the Yiling Patriarch. He wasn’t quite that desperate yet.

Then, a round ball of fluff sat itself on Wei Wuxian’s foot.

“I really can’t roast them?” Wei Wuxian glanced over to confirm. “...If I roasted them, would I be chased off the mountain?”

“You can’t!” Jingyi immediately responded, spreading his arms wide to block the bunnies. “These are Hanguang-jun’s! We just occasionally help him look after them! Don’t you dare roast them!”

‘No shouting in the Cloud Recesses,’ Lan Qiren wanted to say. ‘No pets in the Cloud Recesses. Do not disrespect your seniors. Do not threaten others.’

However, every time he opened his mouth to speak, the image of Hanguang-jun’s flayed back jumped into his mind.

(What rule had Lan Wangji broken to get those marks? If he was keeping these rabbits to remember Wei Wuxian by, then was the brand mark on his chest the same?)

(Who had to be the one to tell him that Wei Wuxian had died?)

Ignorant to the implications running through Lan Qiren’s mind, Wei Wuxian fell to the ground, laughing at the ridiculousness of Lan Wangji taking care of so many rabbits.

‘What an interesting person Lan Zhan is!’ he thought. ‘Back then, I had to trick him into accepting them, but now he’s secretly raising a whole bunch! And he said he didn’t want them. Who was he kidding? Oh, please. I bet he actually loves these white, fuzzy things! Hanguang-jun, holding a rabbit while maintaining a straight face — Oh my god, I’m going to die!’

With every word, the red spreading across Lan Wangji’s face became darker and darker, and the laughter of the other teenagers became louder and louder.

However, right then, Wei Wuxian recalled how he had been stuck on top of Lan Wangji the previous night, and his laughter died abruptly.

The same happened to the laughter of the heirs, and the blush in Lan Wangji’s ears seemed to glow scarlet.

“...Are you sure-”

“Nothing happened!”

Before Wei Wuxian could make any further comments, the ringing of a bell spread out across the Cloud Recesses. It was hurried and violent, as if a madman was striking it.

The three Lans instantly paled.

Lan Sizhui and Jingyi took off at once, all joking forgotten. Seeing that, Wei Wuxian immediately followed them to the source of the sound, understanding instantly that something was wrong.

The sound was coming from a watchtower.

“What’s going on?” Wen Ruohan demanded.

Lan Qiren glared at Wen Ruohan — furious that the person whose son burned down the Cloud Recesses would ask — but answered the question regardless:

“That watchtower is called the ‘Mingshi.’ Our Lan Sect uses it to summon spirits. The walls are made from a special material with incantations carved on it that are sensitive to the situation inside. When the bell starts to ring on its own, it can only mean one thing — an accident has happened to the people performing inside.”

Recalling the power the arm had shown in Mo Village, Nie Mingjue frowned and clicked his tongue in annoyance.

Outside the watchtower, Lan disciples were scurrying around like a swarm of bees whose hive had been smashed apart. They darted from one way to the other nervously, pulling different elders towards the problem in the hopes that one could help. As more and more people were incapable of doing so, the crowd gathered in front of the tower grew and grew.

Even those who hadn’t known of the tower previously could read the incantations on the door. It was clear why the Lan disciples were unable to enter.

The door of the Mingshi was black and made of wood, but it was also tightly locked, only able to be opened from the inside. It was not only extremely difficult to destroy the doors, but it was also forbidden to do so. There were almost no times when the summoning had failed before, so the Lan disciples’ panic was understandable.

Wen Ruohan sat back, wondering how the Yiling Patriarch would tackle the situation.

Resentful energy radiated out of the ringing tower in waves, spreading in every direction at a terrifying speed. The dark clouds blocking the sun left the area a dull monotone that was reminiscent of the Burial Mounds (and made all the more-so by the layers of resentment).

Struggling to draw breath, Jiang Yanli allowed herself to sit down.

“It’s been almost an hour since they went in,” Sizhui revealed, his face grim as he stared at the tower. “Why is the bell still ringing now?”

A wind picked up, making the spirit attracting flags on the walls raise themselves until they were parallel to the ground. The watchers had no time to comment on them, however, as they were immediately brought inside the tower to see the battle for themselves.

The arm thrashed wildly, it’s resentment struggling against the Lan’s spiritual energy and becoming a cyclone of power.

Now, Jiang Yanli was joined on the ground by quite a number of people whose breaths were cut off by the unbelievable power.

And this included the simulated Lans. All around them, the powerful and talented Lan elders were knocked out on the ground, having lost to the arm. The only reason the arm hadn't broken out was the powerful song created by a single guqin.

Hanguang-jun was still there.

At that moment, the pride Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren felt for Lan Wangji nearly surpassed their heart-stopping fear for him, causing them to both turn to the youngest member of their family and nod at him. Lan Wangji was supremely grateful that his older self at least somewhat lived up to his reputation.

However, the arm wasn't stopping either. Hanguang-jun narrowed his eyes, playing with even more power than before. His fingers flew across the guqin's strings as more and more spiritual energy was put into the attack. That energy then wrapped around the thrashing arm, trying to control its movement.

Hanguang-jun strummed-

The guqin's power knocked the outside juniors off their feet.

"It's power is stronger than it had been at Mo Village," Lan Sizhui revealed. "I've never seen something like this before."

None of the people present had either. It was quickly becoming clear that even though this was a 13 years-later future, there would be no shortage of surprises from the simulation.

Wen Qing clenched her fists, annoyance at her own inability to help bubbling over.

Wei Wuxian frowned and straightened up, grabbing his hastily-made bamboo flute with one hand. He marched toward the doors.

They had no way of knowing what was going on inside. Normally, Lan Qiren would be able to compose himself, but just a short while ago, the simulated Lan Wangji had nearly died to the core melting hand. And just before that he had nearly died to the Xuanwu of slaughter. And before that the burning of the Cloud Recesses. And just before that he had nearly died to the fierce corpses who had broken out. And just before that was the waterborn abyss and-

All those times, the watchers had constantly reminded themselves that they had seen the future; they knew Lan Wangji would survive past those encounters. That wasn't true now.

Lan Qiren felt faint.

What could be happening inside — what was that arm — what could it do — why wasn't anything working — what could be done now? The doors were sealed shut and Lan Wangji couldn't open them because the arm was still attacking and they had seen what resentment could do if something more went wrong and they had no way of helping because there was no way to open the door and-

"Open!"

The doors slammed open, releasing a huge gust of wind that sent everyone but Wei Wuxian stumbling back.

It wasn't the sudden jump in resentful energy that made half the watchers gape, and it wasn't the danger Wei Wuxian was going to be facing either.

"...Did he just-"

Before Lan Sizhui and Lan Jingyi's impossibly wide eyes, Wei Wuxian entered the Mingshi. The doors closed behind him.

"...I think he did."

Inside, the cyclone of resentful and spiritual energy gathered around the arm generated a fierce wind that sent the flowing clothes and hair of the collapsed cultivators flying dramatically. Despite that, Wei Wuxian showed no signs of fatigue as he walked opposing the direction of the current.

Finally, Wei Wuxian reached the steps and climbed up them to the platform where the Lan elders laid.

Lan Wangji's deep concentration turned into unhidden shock when he saw who had entered.

"Go Wei-xiong!" Nie Huaisang enthusiastically cheered. "Save your to-be husband!"

"Huaisang!" Nie Mingjue shouted back in a voice that would be terrifying if not for the smile he (along with everyone else) couldn't quite keep off his face. In the last segment, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji had parted ways. As the Yiling Patriarch, Wei Wuxian seemed to have completely forgotten what morality was — resurrecting corpses and desecrating the dead as he pleased. No one could blame him — they all knew why it had happened — but-

The version before them in Mo Xuanyu's body was the Wei Wuxian they all knew. Someone who would step forward to help Lan Wangji out, regardless of how that might bring unwanted attention to him. No one but Xichen had been able to see the shock in Lan Wangji's expression, but, by this point, they all knew him well enough to guess at his feelings.

'Wei Ying,' Lan Wangji thought, breathless in shock.

Wei Wuxian sat down, and determination returned to Lan Wangji's expression. They made eye contact for a single second, before Wei Wuxian raised his flute and began to play.

The watchers immediately cringed.

The sound was horrid. Every other note was the wrong length, and the pitches changed sporadically at random times. Alone it might not be so bad, but when played side by side with Hanguang-jun's guqin it sounded positively abysmal. The song Wei Wuxian was playing couldn't even be recognized as "Evocation!"

“Very impressive,” Wen Ruohan muttered.

“Is that meant to be a joke?!”

“It’s not. He’s intentionally making it sound worse to disguise himself. The skill required to know how to change the notes of Evocation without changing the effect is astronomical.”

After having listened to the Yiling Patriarch, no one could disagree.

Still-

Lan Qiren huffed, “Does he have to disguise himself like this?”

However, time went on, and the song began to reach its conclusion without a spirit having been summoned. Usually, only a few lines would be needed to summon it, and yet now-

Another wave of energy crashed down, making Jiang Fengmian, Madam Yu, Jin Guangshan, and Madam Jin sway on their feet. They could feel the effects of the song; no spirit should be able to resist this.

However, the arm’s resentment merely continued to climb in strength and potency. If anyone but Wei Wuxian had tried guarding the west side, they would have undoubtedly ended up the same as the simulated Lan Qiren was. To resist the call of the Yiling Patriarch and Hanguang-jun…

‘It’s almost impossible for that to not have worked. Unless… unless this person’s soul has been cut apart along with its corpse.’

Frowning deeply at the thought, Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen both closed their eyes and sent the unknown person in the future a solemn prayer. Whoever they were, the pair had trouble believing they deserved this.

‘...It seems this person’s death was even worse than mine.’

Unconsciously, Jiang Yanli let out a relieved breath of air. Earlier, before the simulation had begun the flashback, the watchers had wondered if Wei Wuxian’s soul had been torn to pieces. It would explain why no one had been able to summon him, and it cleared up why Wei Wuxian didn’t know anything about what happened while he was dead — unlike any other lingering spirit.

But that hadn’t happened.

(Though, if you asked Wen Ruohan, “his soul wasn’t shattered” and “his afterlife was pleasant” were two very different things.)

(The grim displeasure that thought generated within him surprised even himself.)

After a moment’s hesitation, Lan Wangji’s fingers changed rhythm. Evocation wasn’t working, so their best bet was to switch to playing Rest. Wei Wuxian followed his lead.

And the intentionally awful playing continued, to the distress of the three Lans.

Lan Wangji had probably never played with someone so awful before. After a while, he couldn't take it anymore and raised his head to look at Wei Wuxian with an expressionless face.

Wei Wuxian pretended he hadn't seen anything.

Only Lan Xichen could appreciate the scathing degrees of reproach in Lan Wangji's expression.

A particularly sharp screech escaped Wei Wuxian's worthless flute-

One which made even Wen Ruohan wince.

-And the unconscious Lan Qiren gave a violent shake. Woken up by the unbearable sound, Lan Qiren actually sat up and sent Wei Wuxian a terrifying death glare, blood dripping from his face.

"Stop that!" he shouted in a hoarse voice. "Stop playing! Get out! Get out now! Stop-"

He promptly fell unconscious again.

The subdued chuckle that escaped Jiang Fengmian made Lan Qiren's mood worsen even further.

Wei Wuxian gaped. It was clear to anyone who knew the man what Lan Qiren's next words would have been. 'Stop tainting my favorite disciple's guqin with your horrid flute notes!' To think that Wei Wuxian's playing had actually been so awful that it enraged Lan Qiren into waking up.

When Wei Wuxian's mouth became an amused smirk, Madam Yu couldn't help but sarcastically grumble, "At least someone's happy about this."

With a laugh on his lips, Wei Wuxian continued to play. The tornado of resentful and spiritual energy swirled around, Wei Wuxian taking control of the former, and Lan Wangji providing the latter. The arm's desperation became apparent when it pulled its resentment close to condense the energy around itself, meeting resistance as if it was loading up a spring.

A pause.

The energy exploded out in a shockwave which sent the trees all around the back hill of the Mingshi swaying until the weaker ones uprooted.

And sending the weaker watchers flying back.

"A-Li, are you okay?" Jin Zixuan gasped out, running to kneel beside her.

“Ah, y-yes. I’m fine,” she gave a reassuring smile. “It was… it was still nothing compared to the Burial Mounds.”

No one could deny that.

Inside the Mingshi, the arm’s last resistance proved futile. Hanguang-jun had effortlessly put up a powerful barrier around himself made of his bright blue spiritual energy, and the Yiling Patriarch had put up a similar one around himself and the now-unconscious Lan Qiren, glowing a terrifying red with resentment.

“Equals in every way that matters,” Nie Huaisang teased in a hushed stage-whisper to Lan Wangji. Not making eye contact, Lan Wangji tried desperately to not show the flutter of embarrassed joy those words sparked within him.

The black resentment continued to pound on the dome-like shields surrounding the two, but it couldn’t so much as dent the barriers. However, it hadn’t succumb yet either.

Frowning, Wei Wuxian narrowed his eyes, turning them a bright scarlet.

Wen Chao froze and stared at them.

In Mo Xuanyu’s body, with the much more playful personality, it was difficult to associate him with the Yiling Patriarch. Although a lingering fear of the man had remained, Wen Chao had slowly begun to calm down as time went on without Wei Wuxian acting like the demon who had conquered the Burial Mounds.

But now — with those eyes — the flute — the resentment-

Wen Chao collapsed to his knees, mind coming to a screeching halt.

Unaware of the terrified eyes watching him, the simulated Wei Wuxian gave his commands. They were far less powerful than the ones used by the Yiling Patriarch, but the solid, unquestionable control there was impressive in its own right.

And, hearing the command, the resentful energy given off by the arm jumped to attention. The flute music rose in pitch, and so the resentment did as well. It surged together on three sides of the arm, gaining a nearly-physical form with how concentrated it was. Red lightning flashed and the black appendages lunged forward, wrapping around the arm and trapping it in place-

Lan Wangji played a note on his guqin, and the restrained arm was surrounded by spiritual power as well. The blue energy coiled up the black, meeting Wei Wuxian’s red at the top.

A golden array appeared in the sky, high above the Mingshi, where the two energies’ battle had reached. It slowly began to lower itself, dispersing the energy as it went.

In Nie Huaisang’s opinion, it was unfairly pretty. Why was all his training about practicing sword forms when this was an option all along? He sent a glare towards his Da-ge which was immediately ignored.

As the haunting guqin and flute melody continued — made somewhat awkward by Wei Wuxian's intentionally awful playing — the golden array pressed down on the arm.

And made it submit.

Coughing to clear his throat, Lan Qiren turned to his nephew and nodded once, commenting, "Good work, Wangji. You and Young Master Wei work well together."

Lan Wangji gracefully bowed back, but Lan Xichen could see the barely-contained joy in his expression.

"I agree," Jiang Fengmian nodded. "Perhaps, once we're out, we can try a few joint nighthunts between the two of you. It seems highly effective."

There would be unknowns in what the political situation turned into, and there would be unknowns in how to deal with Wei Wuxian, but, for the first time, most of the watchers were able to look toward leaving the simulation with optimism, rather than dread.

Blushing, Lan Wangji nodded in agreement.

Outside the Mingshi, Lan Sizhui, Lan Jingyi, and the other dozen or so Lan disciples gazed in unhidden bewilderment.

Jin Zixuan smirked, "That probably isn't something you get to see every day."

And considering that the Lan disciples mostly knew of "Mo Xuanyu" as a raging lunatic, their thoughts were probably a long string of question marks without any words. Jin Zixuan couldn't blame them; if he didn't already know who "Mo Xuanyu" was, he would be acting the same way.

Inside, as the final the notes began to draw to a close, the golden array disappeared at last. Having been drained of its energy, the arm made no move to attack again.

"What on earth is that arm?" Wen Qing muttered, and Nie Mingjue shrugged in equal confusion.

The doors slammed open.

"Hanguang-jun!" a dozen concerned voices called out.

Despite her best efforts, Wen Qing couldn't shake the feeling that she was watching a swarm of ducklings rush to their parents.

"Hanguang-jun, the gong stopped. Did it succeed?"

"It is suppressed," Lan Wangji responded honestly. "Give aid to uncle and the elders."

"Understood."

As the juniors spread out and began to help the collapsed adults, Wei Wuxian knelt before the arm observing it intently. He tilted his head, his mind searching through the information he had like a thief whose desired treasure was the truth. Then, he stood.

"You… you're okay?!"

"Huh?"

"I thought you were…" Lan Jingyi trailed off.

Wei Wuxian laughed, "Don't underestimate me!"

On the side, a now conscious Lan Qiren got his nephew's attention and asked, "Wangji, who is this Young Master?"

The expressionless Hanguang-jun bowed once and responded, "Shufu, his name… is Mo Xuanyu."

"He knows, doesn't he," Lan Qiren sighed. No one disagreed.

"Mo-gongzi?" Lan Qiren repeated. "...I'm impressed."

"And it doesn't seem like Hanguang-jun is going to punish him either," Nie Mingjue pointed out, smirking as he made eye contact with a smiling Lan Xichen.

"Yes, it seems Wei-gongzi's fears are unfounded."

Just as Lan Xichen had predicted in the second segment, Lan Wangji didn't want to punish Wei Wuxian. The whole reason Wei Wuxian had been trying to escape was to avoid that, but it was never a possibility to begin with.

"Xiao Sizhui?" Wei Wuxian asked. "What's wrong?"

Sizhui, who had been looking at the arm with a downcast expression, glanced over. By now, it had become more than clear that "Mo Xuanyu" wasn't an ordinary person, nor was he just a lunatic like all the rumors claimed. After thinking for a moment, Sizhui took a deep breath and forced himself to respond:

"It's just that I feel guilty."

"Huh? Why?" Jiang Cheng asked.

"Guilty for what?" Wei Wuxian similarly inquired.

"...The hand was coming for us Lan disciples."

"What makes you say that?"

"Spirit attraction flags at different levels are drawn in different ways, and have varying amounts of power. The ones we drew at Mo manor had a range of only 25 meters."

Despite the heavy subject matter, Jin Guangshan couldn't help chuckling at Lan Sizhui's explanation. It wasn't the boy's fault, but there was a certain irony in someone trying to explain how spirit attraction flags worked to their inventor.

However, unaware of that, Sizhui continued, "Despite that, this ghost hand appeared. It's extremely powerful. If it had been within range from the beginning, Mo Village would have become a village of blood long ago. However, it appeared after we arrived… meaning someone set it on us intending to do harm."

Honestly, Nie Huaisang had no idea why anyone would even think of doing something so scary!

"Not bad," Wei Wuxian acknowledged. "Your analysis is quite thorough. You've been trained well."

Both Lan Xichen and Lan Qiren developed a carefully-hidden glow of happiness at those words. Unlike Sizhui, they knew two random Lan disciples were far from the most likely targets who had been at Mo Village. That said, the boy's thought process had merit.

Even Wen Ruohan could admit the boy was impressive. Certainly much more capable than most cultivators his age.

Awkward and unsure of how to respond to Wei Wuxian's praise, Lan Sizhui finished, "So… for the lives lost at Mo Village… I believe we're also responsible. And now Lan-xiansheng and the others have been knocked out because of it as well."

A heavy layer of grief settled over the younger watchers. Lan Wangji, Nie Huaisang, Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, and Jiang Yanli couldn't exactly claim to pity the Mo family, but the guilt Sizhui was feeling was more than understandable. Silently, Wen Qing shifted closer to Sizhui, internally cursing the fact that she couldn't help.

After another moment, Wei Wuxian stepped forward and patted Sizhui's shoulder.

"The ones responsible aren't you, but instead the ones who set the ghost hand. In this world, there are some things impossible for one to control."

"Like getting thrown into the Burial Mounds?" Jiang Cheng muttered, sending a vicious glare toward Wen Chao. Unfortunately, given that Wen Chao had seen the Yiling Patriarch's rage first-hand, the teenage Jiang Cheng's anger didn't register as any sort of threat.

All conversation stopped as Hanguang-jun approached them, and Wei Wuxian turned to face him. With a face from which no emotion could be read, Hanguang-jun spoke:

"Anything?" he asked.

A playful smirk formed on Wei Wuxian's face and he turned a nearly predatory gaze on the arm.

Wen Chao's skin turned an even pastier white.

Using the flute as a pointer, Wei Wuxian directed Lan Wangji's attention toward a mark on the arm and said, "Soul Expeller, a kind of dark cultivation, can ward off the original soul. Based on what I'm seeing, whoever did this to the arm's owner is highly skilled."

"Can we remove it?"

"We can," he twirled the flute in his hand before knocking it against his shoulder. "But removing such a sophisticated array will take time."

"Wow. Even for him?"

"Don't be an idiot," Wen Qing advised with a sharp glare. "Remember: there are plenty of things even he can't do."

In some ways, the fact that he was certain he could remove an array despite being 13 years behind in terms of the cultivation world's inventions was the most impressive thing so far.

Then, Wei Wuxian's smirk was exchanged for a more subdued look of concentration.

'Mo Xuanyu specifically summoned me, and the arm was released at Mo Village right after. And Wen Ning on top of that… it seems like someone doesn't want me to rest in peace.'

"Seems like there's something for us to learn from this thirteen-years later timeline as well," Madam Jin commented, and Lan Qiren nodded in agreement. It had initially seemed like everything important happened during the time Wei Wuxian was alive, but with this and Nie Mingjue's specifically mentioned death….

A feeling of apprehension spread over the watchers.

Kneeling before the arm, Lan Jingyi gave it a curious look-over.

"Get back!" Lan Qiren hissed. The boy might not have half the composure Sizhui did, but if something happened to one of the juniors — who were practically infants at this point — someone would have to pay.

"Huh? Am I seeing things?" Jingyi asked. "I think the arm just… moved."

The hand snapped up, and Jingyi jumped back with a scream.

"Then stay away from it!" Lan Qiren ordered, making Lan Xichen laugh and Lan Wangji clench his fists nervously. Lan Jingyi was actually older than the real Lan Wangji was, but knowing the real version of the boy wasn't even born yet made him seem so impossibly young.

(Especially given how obvious it was that these future juniors were completely innocent to the horrors of war. After what they had all watched happen to Wei Wuxian, they were willing to give up anything to keep it that way.)

With a wave of his hand, Lan Wangji weakened the array suppressing it and allowed the arm to move. It sat upright, then, with a crack of dry skin, pointed.

Nie Huaisang jumped inside his Da-ge, seeking protection from the unknown person's arm.

"So, Hanguang-jun, what do you think?" Wei Wuxian asked, leaning close to give it a look-over.

"We should trace it to the source."

"Good plan. If we reconnect this arm to the rest of the body, we'll probably be able to figure out who it is and save them."

"Great…" Jiang Cheng trailed off. "And how are we going to do that?"

Similarly, and although Lan Jingyi had long since realized that "Mo Xuanyu" wasn't actually a madman, he couldn't help but criticize, "You make it sound so simple. The spirit summoning didn't work, and it's become a big mess! How could we possibly find the rest of it?"

"The Northwest," Hanguang-jun answered.

Jin Zixuan tilted his head, then made questioning eye contact with Jiang Yanli. The two of them were equally lost.

"The Northwest?" Lan Sizhui parroted. "Hanguang-jun, how do you know it's in the Northwest?"

"Hasn't it already pointed us in the right direction?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"Wei-xiong, slow down," Nie Huaisang sighed, lacking experience in night hunts despite his intelligence. "You're leaving everyone else behind."

(Leaving behind everyone except Lan Wangji. Lying was forbidden, so if asked whether that thought made him happy, Lan Wangji would be forced to remain in an embarrassed silence.)

"Shown to us? By who?" Lan Jingyi glared and interrogated. "Who showed us? Hanguang-jun didn't!"

"It."

In synch with the Lan disciples, the watchers who had been left behind suddenly realized that Wei Wuxian was pointing towards the ghost hand.

The arm's movement, which had scared Jingyi, was not just an attack. It had risen itself up to point in a single direction. Curious, a brave disciple reached forward and turned it 50 degrees.

The arm turned back to its original position.

"...Oh."

"I keep forgetting that he's not just an inventor," Jin Guangshan mumbled, and Madam Jin was forced to nod in agreement. As Wei Wuxian's experience with night hunting was mentioned, Madam Yu smirked boastfully.

(Privately, and although he would never say it aloud, Jiang Fengmian thought she didn't have a right to be proud of that when all her contributions had been toward making Wei Wuxian a worse cultivator, rather than a better one.)

The Lan disciples had been frozen, having never seen something even close to an arm that kept pointing in one direction. Their shock was tangible.

Finally, Lan Jingyi asked, "What… what is it pointing towards?"

"What else could it be? If it isn't pointing towards its remaining body parts, then it's pointing towards the culprit who made it this way."

Hearing that, a few boys in the Northwest direction began to shuffle aside.

Jiang Yanli couldn't help but giggle at their fear, making Jin Zixuan smile as well. The two of them made eye contact, the same thought running through both their minds.

'Would Jin Ling have done that too?'

They didn't know their to-be son well enough to tell. They would need to wait and see.

Watching Wei Wuxian frighten the juniors with his words, Lan Wangji gave him a look and stood up.

"Care for Uncle properly."

"Yes," several juniors responded.

Lan Xichen nodded at his brother, proud of Wangji's older-self's actions.

"Hanguang-jun," Sizhui stepped close. "Will you leave the mountain immediately?"

"Mn."

Hearing that, Wei Wuxian sneakily shifted behind him and loudly spoke to himself, "Yes, yes, yes! Now we can finally get off this mountain and elope together!"

"Wangji, what did you-"

"Nothing, Shufu," Lan Wangji bowed more deeply than he ever had before. "Nothing happened. Wei Ying is just trying to… he's trying…."

Lan Wangji couldn't finish.

They all knew Wei Wuxian was just trying to get off the mountain. However, that knowledge just made the teasing hurt so much more. After all, Wei Wuxian was dangling a promise of the very thing Lan Wangji wanted most in front of him, without meaning a single word.

Just like when he had pulled off Lan Wangji's forehead ribbon, tying them together without actually understanding any of it. He almost couldn't believe his older self was accepting these attempts so well.

(Apparently, there was still a lot they didn't understand.)

The world faded away.

"...Wangji-xiong?"

"Yes?"

"Just making absolutely sure, but-"

"Nothing. Happened."

"But Wei-xiong keeps-"

"He's just teasing."

"And everyone else thinks it's weird-"

"Of course they do."

"But your older self isn't reacting at all! The love of his life is flirting and teasing and crawling on top of him and he's doing absolutely nothing in response!"

This time, there was nothing Lan Wangji could say. He was equally confused about his older self's ability to maintain composure. If it had been him, he would have kicked Wei Wuxian out of the Cloud Recesses long ago, even if not for the reason Wei Wuxian thought he would.

(He supposed that was why Wei Wuxian kept trying the same strategy.)

Quietly, this time being sure to not say anything aloud, Jin Guangshan decided he was in complete agreement. No matter how much self control Hanguang-jun had, surely he would at least talk about it with Wei Wuxian. All in all, it was more than a little confusing.

Next, Lan Xichen stepped forward, "In regards to the Concealment Zone, would I be correct in saying that Wangji, Sect Leader Jin, and Wen Chao were all not affected?"

"Correct," Lan Wangji responded.

"Yes, well, surely none of us could have expected it to work like that," Jin Guangshan defended. "It appears Wei Wuxian's invention is much more sensitive than we initially realized."

“I’m not blaming you,” Lan Xichen assured him, sending a look to the annoyed Nie Mingjue to keep the older man quiet. “However, the next time this sort of scene comes about, perhaps you can adjust yourself to be pulled in with us? I don’t see any reason why you wouldn’t.”

“I’m afraid I don’t see any reason why I would.”

It was only his years of practice that kept Lan Xichen’s smile from faltering.

“For one, it’s personal,” Nie Mingjue pointed out, getting involved despite Lan Xichen’s silent request for him to stop. “Those two allegedly haven’t done anything yet-”

“We haven’t,” Lan Wangji hissed.

“But we know their feelings for each other, so there’s no guarantee that will stay true. Now that Wei Wuxian is no longer drunk on resentful energy, there’s no telling what will happen.”

“Ah, but if something does happen, do you really expect Lan-er-gongzi to genuinely tell us?”

The three Lans stiffened at the accusation.

“I highly doubt he would lie,” Jiang Fengmian pointed out. “Wei Wuxian has the utmost confidence in his righteousness. He’s generally a good judge of character.”

“I won’t deny that, but-”

“We don’t need to know,” Madam Jin decided. “So long as they’re happy together, what they do with each other is their own business. He doesn’t need to tell us.”

“And what if it’s important?” Wen Ruohan asked. “Something like that will most likely cause a change in their later actions. If we don’t actually know what happened between them, we might misunderstand something again.”

“But-”

“Besides, I doubt Chao-er will be willing to look away.”

At that, everyone’s eyes fell to the ground where Wen Chao was kneeling. The trembles racking his body were less powerful than they had been earlier, but were still noticeable all the same.

He squeezed his hands together and looked up, bloodshot eyes watering from how desperately Wen Chao kept prying them open, unwilling to miss a single thing. Then, slowly registering what his father had said, he began desperately nodding in agreement.

“I’m not — no. I’m not going to look away.”

“You-”

“I refuse to miss anything they show about Him!”

Silently, both Jin Guangshan and Wen Ruohan made eye contact, grateful that the politically-inept Wen Chao was directing everyone's ire away from them and onto himself.

"What could you possibly need to see that for?" Jin Zixuan accused, standing up fully next to his glaring mother. "Unless Lan-er-gongzi wants you to see those parts of his life, you have no right to!"

"Besides, how would watching that help you?" Lan Qiren demanded.

"'How would it help?' That was the most caught off guard we've ever seen Wei Wuxian! Nothing compares! Why shouldn't I watch him at his weakest!"

"Wait," Jiang Cheng interrupted, cutting off his sister who had been about to protest.

Slowly, he turned his gaze toward Lan Wangji instead.

"What… what exactly did you do to Wei Wuxian?"

"I told you: nothing happened."

"Then what does he mean?!"

Seeing an opportunity to capitalize on his earlier statement regarding Lan Wangji's hesitancy to be honest, Jin Guangshan interjected, "They didn't actually sleep together. However, Hanguang-jun paralyzed Wei Wuxian, and made him sleep on Lan Wangji's chest that night."

Several gazes fell on the Second Jade.

"...He refused to get off," Lan Wangji elaborated. "My older-self asked several times, but Wei Ying was determined. He thought that would be the best way he could go about getting removed from the mountain."

That was fair; none of the watchers had recognized the Lan Wangji who responded to such shameless acts with an equal amount of teasing.

"Whatever," Jiang Cheng snapped. "If you do anything to hurt him, I'll make you wish you only had the Yiling Patriarch to worry about."

Despite it being his future self and not technically "him," Lan Wangji gave an instant nod of agreement.

"There's no need for that," Lan Xichen stepped forward. "I'm sure there's no need to worry."

"Zewu-jun, with all due respect," Jiang Yanli bowed. "I believe A-Cheng is right here. Young Master Lan took A-Xian back to the Cloud Recesses without permission; I believe, given everything that's happened to the Yiling Patriarch, some overprotectiveness is warranted."

Remembering the unfortunate circumstances which brought Wei Wuxian to the Cloud Recesses, the three Lans had nothing to say in response. Outwardly, Jiang Cheng smirked.

Internally, he fumed. He was worried about Wei Wuxian — of course he was, Wei Wuxian didn't seem to be able to go a minute without getting into some sort of life-threatening danger — but there was more than that.

(When he realized what the Concealment Zone had done, some part of him became furious at the fact that there would be yet another thing Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian would share without him. Wei Wuxian was his shixiong, why did someone who had never met Wei Wuxian get to share so many things with him? How did that make any sense?)

(Was this growing divide between the Jiang Cheng and Wei Wuxian the reason the Yiling Patriarch betrayed the Jiang Sect?)

Jiang Yanli was torn. On one hand, she wanted to help her brother in the debate he was having with the Lan Sect. Her concern for Wei Wuxian was somewhat tempered by the fact that he was with Lan Wangji, but it still remained.

On the other hand, her fiance sat frozen beside her. From the far off looks both he and Madam Jin had gained, she was sure they were thinking about the man who would be Sect Leader in twenty years.

Even though Jin Zixuan's death wasn't Jin Guangyao's fault, the feeling of being unfairly replaced would remain.

As the Lan and Jiang Sects continued to argue the schematics of what had occurred between Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji, Nie Huaisang stood up and frowned, losing all of the carefreeness and playfulness he was known for. With determined steps, he spun on his heel and walked straight to Nie Mingjue.

With his presence alone, he ensnared his Da-ge in a net of desperation and pulled his incoperal brother along. Once they were far enough away for some semblance of privacy, he glared.

"So."

"...So?" Nie Mingjue asked.

The longer Nie Mingjue's confused silence dragged on, the more impatient Nie Huaisang became.

"Why aren't you doing anything?"

"About what-"

"We just found out you died and you barely reacted! What am I supposed to think about that?!"

In response, he got a tired sigh.

"Look, Huaisang-"

Despite Nie Huaisang remaining silent and expectant, Nie Mingjue wasn't able to finish his thought. He looked to the ground, showing none of the fearlessness everyone in the cultivation world knew him for.

Somehow, that just scared Nie Huaisang even more.

"Da-ge?" he asked, his voice transitioning to genuine terror.

"Huaisang we… our father died young like that. And our grandmother. And our great grandfather. It's just… not a surprise anymore, right?"

"Da-ge, our father's death wasn't a coincidence, it was a murder," he pointed out. "Neither was our great grandfather's. It's… it's not so common that you can just accept it. I-"

He looked down, voice cracking from the emotion welling up inside it.

"Is there... a reason so many people in our clan have died of qi deviation?"

"Huaisang, there's… it's nothing you need to worry about."

Which was essentially a 'you'll understand when you're older,' and meant Nie Mingjue wasn't going to explain anything to him no matter how much he asked. If he wanted to know, he would have to figure it out himself because Nie Mingjue didn't trust him and-

In Nie Huaisang's humble opinion, this was officially the worst day ever.

This was going to be the best day ever. Nie Huaisang had originally been apprehensive when he received a call to come to the Cloud Recesses, especially given the idiotic plan Hanguang-jun was putting together to force the position of Chief Cultivator onto him. Luckily, that nervousness vanished soon enough. After all, inviting him before they were done laying the groundwork was far too sloppy for a plan Wei Wuxian put together! That left only one thing Lan Wangji could want someone of his "specific expertise" for.

A party, of course!

And it didn't take him long to figure out which one either. He had heard from the cousin of a wife of a seamstress for a messenger at Gusu that the Lan elders were requiring the eloped Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian to have a "proper wedding" worthy of their statuses as Hanguang-jun and the Yiling Patriarch. Although things had been a little tense between him and Wei Wuxian lately, he was sure his former friend at least trusted his artistic expertise — especially when the other option was asking the Lans. In preparation, Nie Huaisang had gone all out.

From the seamstress to the cooks to the cultivators to the painters, there wasn't a single person in Qinghe who hadn't helped him prepare. Now, Nie Huaisang was traveling to Gusu with an entire carriage of fabrics and alcohol and food samples in preparation for any question Wei Wuxian could possibly ask him.

(And besides, while he was there, maybe he would be able to figure out a little more about the emergency Wei Wuxian's most recent invention had caused. Nie Huaisang's disciple's cousin had known a little, but Wei Wuxian was doing a wonderful job of keeping it all very "hush-hush" and creating no shortage of talismans to detect eavesdroppers. Needless to say, Nie Huaisang's curiosity had been piqued.)

Although losing Wei Wuxian's trust was an acceptable (if unexpected) consequence of what he had done, the olive branch Wei Wuxian had sent out was more than welcome. In fact, Nie Huaisang had gotten so excited as he mentally planned out every detail of the wedding's decorations that he had ordered someone to put some of his best liquor in the cart. Today seemed like it would be a day for celebration.

"Sect Leader Nie," Lan Sizhui greeted at the gates of the Cloud Recesses. With his low bow and composed aura, Nie Huaisang almost couldn't believe he had recently been responsible for the mysterious disaster which Wei Wuxian's inventions had been used for. He couldn't wait to find out more.

(It had been forever since he'd last found something this interesting to gossip about!)

"Hanguang-jun asked to see Sect Leader Nie," Nie Huaisang's third in command explained, handing over the letter.

"Yes, I was told. We simply weren't expecting so much… supplies to be brought," Lan Sizhui explained, glancing back at the carts and wagons full of priceless goods.

"Well, of course!" Nie Huaisang cheerily laughed. "We're all very excited for the upcoming discussion. I just wanted to make sure I brought everything I might need. Is it too much? I hope there isn't a problem — I just don't know where I'd put it all if you say I can't keep it here and the Yiling Patriarch would be so disappointed if I couldn't show him-"

"No, no problem at all," Sizhui rushed to say, then turned to the boy beside him. "Wuling, can you please call some people to help with the supplies while I escort Sect Leader Nie inside?"

"Of course," the other boy responded, still somewhat slack jawed as he stared at the piles of riches Nie Huaisang was carrying behind him. After a moment of contemplation, Nie Huaisang had to admit he might have gone slightly overboard with the chests of garnets and sapphires he included, but the colors matched Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji so well that he couldn't resist!

It had been far, far too long since he had been able to attend a party that wasn't also an excuse to convince Jin Guangyao of his absolute incompetence. He shouldn't be blamed for going a little overboard.

"This way, please," Lan Sizhui instructed, directing with a smooth hand motion. With that, Sizhui, Nie Huaisang, and Nie Huaisang's head disciple began walking towards one of the conference halls inside the Cloud Recesses. For a brief moment, Nie Huaisang considered seeing if he could get information about Wei Wuxian's latest invention from Lan Sizhui. However, before he could, they arrived at a building Nie Huaisang had never seen before.

Now, Nie Huaisang didn't know what the room was, but his fourth disciple's cousin worked for the Lan Sect, and had a loose tongue whenever he was outside of the 'no gossip' zone that was the Cloud Recesses. If he wasn't mistaken, Wei Wuxian's private lab was standing tall before him.

An uneasy premonition fell over Nie Huaisang's body, but he knew, having already taken out his best alcohol, it was too late to back out now.

With a heavy heart and skittish feet, Nie Huaisang forced himself to enter.

"Sect Leader Nie," Lan Wangji greeted, bowing as perfectly as always as Wei Wuxian waved goodbye to a departing Sizhui. Left alone with the terrifying couple, Nie Huaisang's 'frightened deer' look became even more obvious.

He really, really hoped this is just a party planner meeting.

Those hopes were promptly dashed when he saw a few papers on Wei Wuxian's desk detailing plans to win the Nie Sect support and get it firmly back in the Great Sect's category after the way Nie Huaisang weakened it in his plan to destroy Jin Guangyao. It didn't seem like them to just directly ask him to become Chief Cultivation — especially given that they surely knew he'd say 'no' — but the chances of that were becoming higher and higher every second.

"...Hello, Hanguang-jun," he pathetically managed to speak out. "I don't suppose I could ask how the wedding is coming along?"

"Ah, no," Wei Wuxian gave a regretful shrug. "Unfortunately, that's been put on hold for now."

"What?" Nie Huaisang gasped out.

'After all the work I did to bring you back to life?' he mentally added on.

"Yeah, a bit of a cataclysmic disaster has occured, and we probably won't be able to get back to planning the wedding for a little while. Sorry."

"Eh? Really?" Nie Huaisang leaned back nervously. "What kind of disaster?"

"Do you really not know?"

"I-I'm not sure what you're talking about, Wei-xiong," he answered, slipping back into their childhood form of address in a desperate attempt to garner mercy.

Unfortunately, the Yiling Patriarch was not known for his mercy.

"...Alright then," Wei Wuxian smirked. "As Sect Leader Nie is so very ignorant about the things around him, I'll keep it vague. If, hypothetically, we had a way to contact a less technology-advanced civilization but no way to physically do anything to them, how would you get them to do what you want them to do?"

“That is… very vague.”

Wei Wuxian just unapologetically shrugged in a ‘you reap what you sow’ way, and Lan Wangji remained completely enamored by his husband’s confidence, and therefore no help at all.

“Then… well, I don’t really know. It was all so vague, I’m not really sure what kind of answer you want me to give.”

“Any answer is fine,” Wei Wuxian’s smile turned vicious. “It’s the least you can do for an old friend, isn’t it?”

‘It’s the least you can do considering you nearly got the juniors killed several times in your crazy revenge scheme,’ Nie Huaisang heard.

Nie Huaisang coughed, “You specifically mentioned that we have progressed further than them. Can I assume you mean in regards to cultivation?”

A nod.

“...Then set yourself up as a center of information. Anyone who wants to use the better technology we have will need to do what you say. If they’re sufficiently far enough back in terms of development, you might be able to pretend to be a deity who is blessing those who serve faithfully with knowledge.”

“Yeah, that’s what I thought too,” Wei Wuxian nodded. “One problem: due to the way the communication is set up, I can only contact one place, and the leader of that place has stopped trusting me.”

“Because they’re incompetent, or-”

“Because they’re intelligent enough to realize we kept things from them,” Lan Wangji answered.

“Oh. Well, if Hanguang-jun is saying that, then it must be true.”

“No, Lan Zhan’s just a flatterer,” Wei Wuxian grumbled, looking away. Nie Huaisang couldn’t see anything in Lan Wangji’s expression, but he had a sneaking suspicion a hint of amusement was appearing on the man’s face.

“You disagree?”

“I don’t disagree, I just don’t think that’s why he’s being a problem.”

“And what would that be?”

Wei Wuxian buried his face in his hands and groaned, “Because he’s the most annoying and impossibly stubborn person I’ve ever met! Like, he’s decided he’s going to do something, and now he‘ll put everything on the line to see it through! Anyone else would have caved in by now, but he’s just… I don’t know how to deal with him!”

“Wow. I thought Lan Wangji was the only person who would ever be able to out-stubborn you.”

There was a nearly undetectable noise from Hanguang-jun, after which Wei Wuxian immediately spun towards him with a shockingly betrayed expression.

“Lan Zhan, are you… laughing at your poor, pitiful husband?”

“No.”

“Lying is forbidden in the Cloud Recesses, Lan Zhan!” Wei Wuxian shouted, reaching forward to squish is husband’s cheeks together. “I can’t believe you would do this to me!”

Lan Wangji nodded his head in a half-bow of apology.

“To be honest,” Nie Huaisang interrupted. “What to do next will depend a lot on what you’re specifically trying to do. The people you need to talk to will change depending on that.”

At that, Wei Wuxian finally turned away from his husband. Nie Huaisang instantly regretted that change when two piercing silver eyes landed on him instead.

Finally, Wei Wuxian spoke:

“I guess I should probably be a little bit more honest with you then. Say, Nie-xiong, what would it take to make you believe in time travel?”

“Eh? You-you mean like going to the past?”

“More… sending messages to the past.”

“...And who are you going to be contacting?”

“The Five Great Sects from before the Sunshot Campaign,” Lan Wangji answered.

“Why?”

“Because a few mischievous radishes sneaked in somewhere they shouldn’t have and sent back information on the entire campaign to them.”

Well, that answered several of Nie Huaisang’s questions.

And created a few dozen more.

Taking a deep breath, Nie Huaisang looked back at Wei Wuxian, staring into the burning grey eyes. On one hand, he could keep playing up the incompetent act despite Wei Wuxian having already seen through it. On the other….

“Are you trying to say that you’ve created a world in which my Da-ge is alive?”

“I have.”

Nie Huaisang directed a glance at Lan Wangji, and found nothing but a man with absolute faith in his husband. After several seconds, Wangji lifted an eyebrow, and Nie Huaisang forced himself to answer.

"...I did hear a few things that would make that believable."

"Of course you did," Wei Wuxian bit out with a dangerous gleam in his eyes.

"Right, well… in that case, I don't suppose the stubborn person you can't deal with is-"

"Himself," Lan Wangji confirmed. "When we found out about the Wen sect being included in the watchers, we asked him to take them out forcefully. He no longer trusts us, so he refuses to."

Wei Wuxian grumpily sank into his arms, pouting heavily until Lan Wangji patted him twice on the head as though he was one of the Cloud Recesses' bunnies.

"Alright then," Nie Huaisang coughed. "I must be honest: I think you're underestimating your… younger self. He is well within his rights to not trust a mysterious voice from a body he doesn't know, and, knowing you, has probably figured out quite a bit. Given that he left the Wens in, we know he doesn't know about the Sunshot Campaign, but he's… what?"

"Fifteen," Lan Wangji answered.

"Okay then. You're probably trying to manipulate him like you would manipulate the juniors. Believe me when I say that a fifteen year old Wei Wuxian is equal to Lan Qiren in terms of stubbornness, my Da-ge in terms of charisma, Jin Guangshan in terms of political sensitivity, and Wen Ruohan in terms of intelligence. If you expect him to do as you tell him to, you haven't been treating him like even half the person he actually is."

Struck into a rare moment of speechlessness, Wei Wuxian floundered for a moment before responding, "At fifteen, my greatest concern was Madam Yu. I barely paid attention to the Great Sects' politics."

"Because you didn't need to."

"I-"

"Wei Ying," Lan Wangji whispered. "He has a point."

When Wei Wuxian pursed his lips instead of agreeing, Nie Huaisang realized he would have to go all-in.

"Wei-xiong, do you still want my advice?" he began, then waited for a nod to continue. "I don't know exactly, but I really think you should be more open and honest with your younger-self. Maybe not all the way to 'this is the future,' but at the very least a somewhat-honest explanation about why you lied."

"I wouldn't have expected you to advocate for honesty."

“Eh? I don’t know what you’re talking about, Wei-xiong.”

“Are you sure about that?”

“Of course! And besides, in that regard, I don’t think you have any room to talk either.”

“Nie-xiong, how could you level such a grievous accusation against someone as delicate as me?” Wei Wuxian asked, swooning into Lan Wangji’s waiting arms like they were fifteen again.

But it was an act of nonchalonce, not genuine trust.

(And everyone there knew it.)

Nonetheless, Nie Huaisang was happy to play along.

“Oh, I’m so sorry! I didn’t mean anything by it! Of course I wouldn’t expect anything from you! I just thought, since your husband’s the Chief Cultivator, maybe something was going on!”

“I won’t be for much longer,” Lan Wangji interjected.

“Eh? Hanguang-jun, I’m not sure what you mean.”

Wei Wuxian snorted, “If you really had a problem with it, you never would have let us get as far as we have.”

“I’m really not sure what you’re talking about,” Nie Huaisang responded, flapping his fan delicately. Then, his fan froze, and his face darkened for a half second before clearing up into casual curiosity.

“Something wrong?”

“Just wondering something. A friend of a friend mentioned to me that er-g… Zewu-jun was helping you out with whatever project you were working on. Can I ask how?”

Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji both froze.

Zewu-jun was in seclusion, trying to understand everything that had happened. If he was smart, his greatest priority when dealing with the past would be keeping Nie Mingjue safe.

If he wasn’t-

“I’m starting to think you already know the answer to that,” Wei Wuxian admitted.

“Oh, I don’t know about that,” Nie Huaisang laughed. “I’d really rather you confirm one way or the other.”

A pause.

Wei Wuxian's smile turned grim as he finally made eye contact again with Nie Huaisang. This time, it was the Yiling Patriarch who was hesitant to meet the Headshaker's eyes.

"...You're not going to like it."

Nie Huaisang's fan snapped closed, and the last of his masks broke apart.

"I know."

Chapter End Notes

I'm now imagining Wen Chao and Jin Guangshan as the angel and devil on Lan Wangji's shoulders, except they're both devils because Lan Zhan is so inherently good that he needs two to balance himself out. 😈😇😈

The looming buildings of the Nightless City were a sight to behold. As Wen Ning escorted Wei Wuxian through the grounds, guards and cultivators and civilians alike watched him with heavy eyes split fifty-fifty between pity and fear.

Wen Xu had allowed the rumors regarding Wei Wuxian to flourish wildly, it seemed. That would be more annoying than the Lans — who had done everything in their power to squash the rumors — but was better than the Jin, who had done everything they could to blacken his reputation beyond repair in Lanling.

(Not that he had expected anything else. It was "beneath them" to view him as an equal, wasn't it?)

"Here's the place you'll be staying, Wei-gongzi," Wen Ning explained, nervously opening a large, exquisitely decorated door. If Wei Wuxian wasn't mistaken, it was significantly higher quality than the buildings where the other three sect representatives were staying, and no explanation had been given for why.

At least this emergency conference would only be two days rather than the usual week. Wei Wuxian wasn't sure he'd be able to survive here that long without blowing something up and/or declaring war on another sect. As things were, he still wasn't sure he'd make it through the night.

"Thanks, Wen Ning," Wei Wuxian nodded, smirking fearlessly and directing the disciples he'd brought with him to set up watch. If Wen Ning hadn't seen first hand how frantic Wei Wuxian was while preparing for the conference, he never would have believed it. All the Jiang disciples clearly thought Wei Wuxian knew exactly what was going on (which was why Wen Ning was the only one who noticed how tense Wei Wuxian became when they heard a set of heavy footsteps approach).

"Welcome, Wei-gongzi," Wen Xu greeted. "I hope the amenities have been to your liking."

"Of course! Thank you, Wen-gongzi. The respect you have for all the visiting sects has not gone unnoticed," he responded with a slightly too-shallow bow. Wen Xu just smirked, not even trying to deny the favoritism shown to the Yunmeng Jiang Sect — to Wei Wuxian, specifically.

"While your disciples settle in, why don't we take a short walk?"

“I wouldn’t want to impose-”

“Please, I insist.”

Not even Wen Ning could see any hesitance in Wei Wuxian’s careless shrug of agreement. The two of them walked off, leaving Wen Ning and the Jiang disciples to make bewildered eye contact with each other, all equally uncertain about what to do next.

As Wen Xu and Wei Wuxian walked through the towering halls of the Nightless City, everyone they passed bowed deeply. Wei Wuxian knew of the things whispered about him outside of Yunmeng.

“That arrogant-”

“Do we even know what he’s doing?”

“Just the son of a-”

And yet, as he walked just a step behind Wen Xu, he could see glee in the faces that had once held fear. The more Wei Wuxian thought about it, the more unsettled he became. Whatever Wen Xu had told them, it didn’t seem good for Yunmeng.

Then, in a show of surprising generosity, Wen Xu glanced over and, noticing his discomfort, he switched paths so that they headed to an empty back garden. Wei Wuxian had never been shy, but he had to admit that he was grateful for the change.

“...Wei-gongzi,” Wen Xu spoke, reclaiming Wei Wuxian’s attention. “May I ask if there has been any update in regards to the Sect Leaders?”

Wei Wuxian had originally been planning on waiting for the conference itself to begin this talk, but he supposed it would work out even better if he could observe Wen Xu one on one.

“Do you remember what I told you about Mo Xuanyu?”

“I do.”

“Well, he contacted me again. Apparently, he miscalculated earlier and the simulation is much more dangerous than he had initially realized. He wants me to force the watchers out.”

Wen Xu froze, and Wei Wuxian kept walking, watching the Wen heir out of a reflective pond to their left.

“That was why I told you to put the Sect Leaders in different rooms. Apparently, it’s necessary for the forceful ejection to work,” Wei Wuxian laughed. “I figured I could bring it up at the conference just to make sure the sect leaders had been put in different rooms before I brought them out.”

“...Did Mo Xuanyu explain why?” Wen Xu asked, forcing himself to start walking again.

“He said the resentful energy the system was based off was corrupting their cores.”

“And do you think that’s true?”

“Sure, why not?” Wei Wuxian decided, shrugging again. “I don’t see why he’d lie about this.”

In the silence that followed, Wei Wuxian could practically taste the thoughts flashing through Wen Xu’s mind like lightning.

“...Have you asked the watchers about this?” Wen Xu inquired.

Always deferring to his father, wasn’t he?

“I sorta implied it, but they seemed a little weird,” Wei Wuxian responded. “I think the extra time they spent inside the simulation has probably messed with their minds, so it seemed safer to not trust them.”

“But you trust Mo Xuanyu?”

“He’s been nothing but honest so far,” Wei Wuxian lied. “Is there a problem?”

“I just wonder if we should think it over a bit more first. He could have another motive for saying that. Have you seen any evidence of corruption in their cores?”

“Nope.”

“Then maybe we should just be patient.”

“What reason could he have for wanting us to stop?” Wei Wuxian asked, waving flirtatiously at a few female Wen disciples he saw in the distance. They all blushed and waved back, laughing amongst themselves, then scurried back to wherever they’d sneaked over to watch him from.

Relaxing at the playfulness Wei Wuxian had just shown, Wen Xu gestured forward and asked, “While we're here, would you like to spend some time socializing with the citizens of Qishan?”

“No thank you,” Wei Wuxian easily responded, refusing to back off. “So, do you think I should let them out today?”

“No, I-I really feel like we should wait a bit longer.”

“Why?” Wei Wuxian asked, spinning on his heel to face the Wen heir. "Something wrong?"

“No, it's just... the simulation, it's... it's giving us information on the place Mo Xuanyu is from,” Wen Xu finally revealed, not seeing another way out of it. “He didn’t mean to send it to us, so I assume he’s only recently realized what, exactly, was sent over.”

“Why?” Wei Wuxian tilted his head. “Does he think we’ll be able to attack him with it? Can we?”

“No, he’s just worried about how it'll change our actions and policies,” Wen Xu responded, making Wei Wuxian nearly laugh out loud at the overly-vague answer. Some of his amusement must have been obvious, because the tension in Wen Xu's body instantly multiplied. Right as Wei Wuxian was about to move in for the kill, he heard the snap of a twig behind him, and turned to see three more people enter the garden. They bowed in greeting, and, before he had time to think about it, Wei Wuxian had responded with the same.

“Welcome,” Wen Xu smiled, grateful for a way out. “Is there something I can help you with?”

“Not necessarily. We happened to run into each other, and heard from one of our disciples that the two of you were meeting,” a woman in Lan robes explained. “We thought we would join you and greet Wei-gongzi.”

Wei Wuxian smiled and nodded back, observing the trio before him.

They were the representatives for the Lan, Nie, and Jin sects. Wei Wuxian wanted to maneuver them away so that he’d be able to speak more with Wen Xu without losing the tension he’d built up, but, right as he was about to, he was distracted by a faint red edge he could see shimmering around the Lan. Upon further examination, he realized what it was: a trace of dormant resentful energy.

Given its inactivity, it didn’t seem to be a problem, but it was odd regardless. It felt very much like the aura around Wen Xu, which Wei Wuxian had assumed was leftover from contact with the simulation.

(What Wei Wuxian didn’t realize was that he already knew the cause. This was Lan Ziming, whose son, Lan Jingyi, had activated the simulation and attached his soul to his parents so that it would enter the appropriate body when the time was right.)

Unfortunately, as Wei Wuxian lacked that knowledge, he could only bookmark the thought for later as the conversation resumed.

“I hope everything has been to your liking,” Wen Xu began.

“Of course. We are grateful for the generosity you have shown,” the Lan woman bowed again, resisting the urge to fidget and generally looking uncomfortable with the situation (unsurprising, given that she wasn’t a member of the Clan’s main branch). Despite Qingheng-jun supposedly not having been affected by the simulation, the Lan Sect Leader had remained in seclusion, refusing to take on the duties of his sect. It seemed likely that the few rumors which had escaped the Cloud Recesses were setting Lan Ziming on edge.

(Wei Wuxian could relate. After all, he was going through the exact same thing; he was just much better at hiding his nerves.)

“I was wondering,” the man in the Nie uniform spoke up. “In regards to the simulation, will you be able to give us a more accurate time frame for when the Sect Leaders will wake up?”

“I can do that right now,” Wei Wuxian confirmed, his mouth sliding into a cocky grin. “They’ve gotten through just over a fourth of the simulation in the past 9 days, so if we let them stay until completion, they’ll most likely be out in three weeks and two days. Whether they’ll be able to immediately get back to work is still unknown, however.”

The man he was speaking to was Nie Zhonghui, Nie Mingjue’s head disciple. He had taken over the Nie Sect while the Clan Leader was unconscious, and had regained the sect’s usual level of effectiveness quickly enough.

“And we’re just supposed to trust that?” the third voice demanded. It took Wei Wuxian a moment to figure out who it was, but the arrogant sneer in the man's expression allowed Wei Wuxian to recall what Wen Ning had told him on the way over: that the Jin sect's representative was Jin Zixun, the Sect Leader Jin’s favorite nephew. Apparently, although his cultivation was lacking, the connections his uncle had helped him create were more than enough to raise him above his opponents. In addition, he was just old enough (and immature enough) to look down on the fifteen year old Wei Wuxian at every turn.

(Or so Wen Ning had warned him. In Wei Wuxian’s opinion, it seemed unlikely that the age difference mattered as much to Jin Zixun as Wei Wuxian's parentage did.)

“Is there a problem, Jin-gongzi?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“The Violet Spider hasn't exactly kept quiet about how your experiments usually end up. Do you really expect us to just hand our leaders over to you? I don't know about you, but I'd sooner believe in time travel than expect that," Jin Zixun sneered, making the entourage of Jins in the distance narrow their eyes at Wei Wuxian.

Resisting the urge to roll his eyes, Wei Wuxian raised an eyebrow and asked, "And what exactly do you think will go wrong?"

“It’s not my job to look into those things," he declared, giving Wei Wuxian a mocking look. "Like the Jiangs, the Jin Sect leaves that to our servants."

“Really? I’m surprised you’d trust just anyone with the lives of your Sect Leaders.”

Lan Ziming snorted. She tried to cover it up with a cough, but Wei Wuxian knew what he had heard. And the well-hidden smile on Nie Zhonghui’s face didn’t go unnoticed either.

“W-well,” Jin Zixun flushed. “Some of us have more important things to do. We can’t be expected to read every notice sent out. I had a sect to run.”

“Of course,” Wei Wuxian agreed, wondering how far he could push. Wen Xu, Lan Ziming and Nie Zhonghui hadn’t stepped forward to back up Jin Zixun, nor had they been visibly bothered by Wei Wuxian’s words. Going a little farther probably wouldn’t ruffle anyone’s feathers except the Jins.

(Given the staggering lack of assistance from them, Wei Wuxian didn't feel particularly bad about that.)

“No need to worry,” he assured. “When we discuss the great sleep tonight, I’ll try to include a bit of review for the people who were too busy to read up on it. I’m sure that’ll be helpful to everyone who found something else ‘more important’ than the lives and safety of their sect leaders.”

A bright flush spread across Jin Zixun’s face.

“Hardly!” he snapped. “But I wouldn’t expect the son of a servant to understand that!”

“I suggest you watch your next words carefully,” Wen Xu interrupted. “An ally of the Wen Sect deserves to be treated as such.”

Wei Wuxian did a double take, swerving his head to face Wen Xu just in time to see the older man step in front of him, protective and possessive in equal amounts.

‘What?’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘Since when were we allies?! You never so much as brought that up-’

“But…” Jin Zixun hastily backed up. “I mean, of course, Wen-gongzi.”

“Wonderful. Tonight's banquet will begin soon. Perhaps we should all separate and take some time to prepare,” Wen Xu suggested. "I hope you enjoy the rest of your stay."

With those parting words and a single nod, Wen Xu left the garden to call over one of his servants, informing them to do one last check over the dinner preparations. The four sect representatives left behind turned to each other, for once united (in confusion over Wen Xu’s actions).

Jin Guangshan and Wen Ruohan were the two strongest allies among the great sects. And yet, for some reason, it seemed like Wen Xu was willing to throw that all away to maintain an alliance with Yunmeng Jiang. He would never do something like that without his father’s approval, but how could he have gotten that? They couldn’t talk to each other now that Wen Xu had left the simulation, so, whatever the cause was, it would have had to have occurred beforehand. Wen Xu had been taken out fairly early, but he’d apparently learned enough to be suspicious of both Mo Xuanyu's forced separation and the Jin sect. Were they related, somehow? Had something happened between Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan? Or was there a new agreement between him and Jiang Fengmian that Wei Wuxian didn't know about?

Perhaps he should talk to Wen Ning about this.

The watchers' jubilant mood hadn’t yet faded when the simulation started again.

“When cultivators from prominent clans go out on night hunts, there are usually crowds of people around them like a parade. Hanguang-jun, however, always prefers going alone because he’s the absolute best and-”

“Jingyi, that’s not in the script,” Lan Sizhui pointed out, cutting his friend off.

Lan Xichen sent a proud smile his brother’s way, making the real Lan Wangji look away as a rush of emotion poured through his veins. The embarrassment and pride warred with each other until he lost all clarity of thought.

(He had spent his life being praised as the Second Jade, but, somehow, it felt completely different when it was from his future students. A warm feeling spread through his chest.)

Coughing to clear his throat, Lan Jingyi continued, “The arm was quite strange, and could possibly harm other people if it wasn’t handled with caution. Therefore, he didn’t bring any Lan disciples with him. Instead, he brought Wei Wuxian, watching him as closely as he could.”

The world shifted and an illusion of a city faded into existence. It was late at night, and the streets were only lit by the red glow of celebratory lanterns put up for a local festival.

“Wei Wuxian had originally planned on sneaking away during their expedition off the mountain. However, every time he tried to run away, it always ended the same.”

A foreboding shiver ran up Jiang Cheng’s spine and he crept closer to his sister.

On the streets of the red-lit town, a watchman began to make an announcement.

“The weather is dry, be careful of fire,” he sang, banging a drum several times. Nearby, in one of the brightly decorated taverns, a second floor window cracked open, and the Yiling Patriarch jumped outside.

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli squeaked, watching Wei Wuxian flawlessly land on the hard ground.

Although Mo Xuanyu’s body was significantly weaker than Wei Wuxian’s had been, his instincts and reactions had remained. Combined with the fact that Mo Xuanyu was still stronger than the average person, Wei Wuxian felt confident in his ability to escape from Hanguang-jun.

Lan Wangji frowned, a conflicted bubble of emotions tumbling within him at the sight of Wei Wuxian trying to run away.

Letting out a relieved sigh, Wei Wuxian began his trek down the streets and thought, ‘Thank god! I’m finally going to be able to escape him!’

He turned a corner and immediately knocked into a towering body.

“Ah!” he yelped, stumbling back and then sighing. “Hanguang-jun, it’s already late. Why aren’t you asleep?”

“Go back,” Hanguang-jun ordered.

When Jin Guangshan chuckled lightly, Lan Wangji felt a terrified chill sink through his bones.

"I don't want to — Ah!"

Lan Wangji had tied him up!

"Lan-er-gongzi, what do you think you're doing?!" Jiang Cheng shouted. Beside him, Jiang Fengmian and Jiang Yanli were sending disapproving looks his way.

Wei Wuxian shouted and sobbed exaggeratedly, flailing his limbs and trying to kick Lan Wangji away.

"Save me!" he screamed. "Somebody! Please save me!"

"Who is screaming like the ghost in the middle of the night?!" a woman shouted, throwing open her door.

"Is she not at all worried about the fact that he's shouting for someone to save him?" Nie Mingjue wondered incredulously. Nie Huaisang just shrugged in response, while Wen Qing scoffed at the lady in disbelief.

"Auntie! Hurry up and save me! This man is trying to kidnap me!" he got out of Lan Wangji's hold just enough to turn to her, pleading with his watering eyes.

"Huh?" she scowled. "What are you saying? He's trying to kidnap you?!"

"Of course! He's been keeping me captive for several days now! He doesn't let me escape!"

The old woman spat at him, "Don't be ridiculous! Are you trying to fool me? That man right there looks like a prince. Who do you think you are?"

"Huh?"

"Don't be fooled, you idiot!" Jiang Cheng shouted at her, glaring viciously at Lan Wangji as the second jade did everything he could to not shrink in on himself in shame.

Jin Zixuan rolled his eyes, "It's like they're blind! Anyone should be able to see that Wei Wuxian is the victim here!"

Everyone was in complete agreement.

The woman huffed again, "Honestly. Him wanting you? It looks like you're just being clingy and refusing to leave!"

"Huh?" Wei Wuxian repeated.

'How dare you speak that way to him?' Lan Wangji glared. 'My future self is the one in the wrong! You aren't worthy to breathe the same air as Wei Wuxian.'

A moment later, he realized the pettiness and vindictiveness in what he had just thought, and added another copy of the rules to his mental list of punishments for himself.

Footsteps approached from the right, and the three people in the street glanced over to see the earlier watchman marching towards them, an annoyed glare on his aging face.

"It's already so late, why are you still out here causing trouble?" he demanded, then glanced at Lan Wangji. "Young master, is this ruffian bothering you?"

"No."

"This is just sad," Nie Huaisang muttered, pity for his friend overflowing. The other watchers were in agreement. The longer Lan Qiren spent watching the wrongful accusations, the more outraged he felt.

"Why does everyone always assume the worst of him?"

The moment after he asked that, he noticed Lan Xichen's eyes on him and flinched back. Although neither of them would say it out loud, the same thought rang in their minds nonetheless.

(Wasn't assuming the worst exactly what Lan Qiren had done to him time and time again?)

As the watchman and older woman continued to prod Lan Wangji for answers, Wei Wuxian sighed, 'Ah, I'm the only one in trouble. He refuses to let me go — how did that get twisted into me refusing to let go of him?'

"The audacity," Madam Yu hissed. "Who do they think they are?"

"Do you people have any conscience or sense of morality at all?!" Wei Wuxian whined.

"Rubbish!" the man responded. "No matter how you look at it, you're the one trying to switch the blame onto this young master! Do you want to be hit?"

"That's right!" the woman added. "Young Master, these rascals are very common here. Do you want us to help you?"

After a moment of shocked speechlessness, Wei Wuxian laughed, "Alright, fine. How about you people help him chase me away?"

"No need," Lan Wangji countered.

"Poor, pitiful, Wei-xiong," Nie Huaisang muttered.

"You really don't need our help, Young Master?"

"That's right! If you have any more trouble with him, contact us right away!"

"This is a personal matter."

“That’s unbelievably unfair,” Madam Jin was forced to acknowledge. She knew Koi tower placed a much higher emphasis on social class than most of the other sects, but even she couldn’t believe what was happening.

However, even as she thought that, she found her eyes unconsciously drifting towards Yu Ziyuan and Lan Qiren. Right now, both of them could scoff at the easily-misled civilians, but, just a few days ago, they would have probably been the same. And Madam Jin would have agreed with them.

(What did that say about the things she must have done to the bastard child who became the next Sect Leader Jin?)

Nodding farewell to the two people who had come to help him out, Lan Wangji used his unbeatable Lan strength to grab Wei Wuxian by the collar and drag him along like a mother cat with a kitten.

“Ah — hey! Help me! Auntie and Uncle don’t just stand there refusing to help a dying man!”

“Eh? What was that just now?”

“What exactly is the relationship between those two?”

“How strange.”

It wasn’t as though they expected the civilians to be able to do anything to a cultivator, but the sheer indifference they showed in regards to Wei Wuxian’s safety was more than a little annoying.

(Especially after having watched the simulated Jiang Cheng show a similar lack of regard during his reunion with the Yiling Patriarch a few segments ago.)

Back at the hotel room, the door was pulled open and a resisting Wei Wuxian was thrown inside. As he was tossed on the bed, he whined dramatically and glared over.

Lan Wangji merely sighed.

“This is the twelfth time,” he muttered.

“Wow,” Nie Huaisang blinked. “I’m not sure whether to be more impressed by Wei-xiong’s or Lan-xiong’s persistence.”

“Sleep,” Hanguang-jun ordered.

‘Ah, Lan Zhan, oh, Lan Zhan,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘You should be the one resting. I’ve tried escaping 12 times, and 12 times you’ve tied me up and forcefully brought me back. You may not be tired, but I’m already exhausted!’

His cries echoed into the night.

Lan Xichen smiled warmly, “My, Wangji. You’re certainly quite forward-”

The violent glare Lan Wangji shot him cut off what he was about to say and surprised both Lan Xichen and their uncle with its viciousness. Unbeknownst to them, all Lan Wangji could hear were Jin Guangshan’s and Wen Chao’s words.

‘Oh? Are you going to have your way with him?’

‘Hanguang-jun should have at least considered it.’

An embarrassed, humiliated, ashamed flush spread across Lan Wangji’s face, and he glared at his other-self with the ferociousness of a thousand suns.

This time, it was Ouyang Zizhen’s voice which narrated with a dreamy, excited quality: “Due to Wei Wuxian’s escape attempts resulting in repeated failures, he decided to change his strategy. Instead of running away, he began to stick as close to Lan Wangji as he could, especially at night.”

Another disgusted shiver began to run up Jiang Cheng’s spine.

It was once again twilight, and Hanguang-jun stepped into his room at a new inn. The glow of a few outside lamps poured in through the paper window on the wall, illuminating a spectacularly lumpy bed.

Knowing that there was a less than 0 chance Hanguang-jun was responsible for that bed, the nearby watchers began to cautiously take steps back. Their wariness only increased when the lump on the bed began to move.

With a sigh, the simulated Lan Wangji approached.

“Ah, Hanguang-jun!” Wei Wuxian said, peeking his head out from under the covers to meet Lan Wangji’s deadpan expression.

Several of the sect heirs snorted at the sight, but Lan Wangji was too busy being mesmerized by how adorable Wei Wuxian looked to pay them any mind.

“Aiyo, you’re finally back. Do you have any idea how long I spent waiting?” he pouted, then brightened up and patted an empty space on the bed. “Come here. I already warmed up the bed for us, you see? Come, come, come.”

“Oh?” Jin Guangshan murmured.

As soon as he heard that, frantic, high-pitched sirens began to go off in Lan Wangji’s mind and he shut his eyes, refusing to allow himself to become corrupted in the same way his older self obviously had been.

The temptation being laid out before him far outclassed anything he had ever experienced before.

However, to the great surprise of the real Lan Wangji, the simulated Hanguang-jun merely sighed.

"Your room is next door," he said, apparently not at all tempted by seeing the Yiling Patriarch in only a thin inner robe asking him to come close.

Lan Qiren truly and honestly did not get it. Did the future version of his nephew have no self control, or infinite self control? Every time he thought he knew, he was proven wrong yet again.

"What 'next door?'" Wei Wuxian asked, faking innocence. "Your room is better. I like it here."

After a pause, Lan Wangji turned back toward the door and began to walk.

"Eh? Don't go!" Wei Wuxian protested, jumping out of bed and latching onto Lan Wangji's arm.

'Do not think about it.' Lan Wangji told himself. 'He said no. He doesn't like you, he likes girls. He tried to run. Do not think about it. Do not think about it. Do not think about it. Do not think-'

"We'll change rooms," Lan Wangji responded.

"Why would we change rooms?"

'Do not think about it. Do not think about it. Do not think about it. Do not think about it. Do not think about it. Do not-'

"If you like this one, it's yours."

"Eh?" he glanced back. "Ah, that's too much trouble. We can just share the room."

'DO NOT THINK ABOUT IT. DO NOT THINK ABOUT IT. DO NOT THINK ABOUT IT. DO NOT THINK ABOUT-'

This time, when Lan Wangji sighed, it was in reluctant compliance.

"As you wish."

'DO NOT! DO NOT!! DO NOT!!! DO NOT!!! DO NOT!!! DO NOT!!!! DO NOT!!!! DO NOT!!!!'

Smiling brightly, Wei Wuxian hopped back on the bed and pulled the covers up. His eyes closed, he had no way of seeing the beautiful, warm smile Lan Wangji sent down to him.

"Oh, my. You two really are the perfect couple," Jin Guangshan laughed, looking the scene up and down appreciatively. When he didn't get the outraged response he had been expecting, he glanced to the side.

An endless stream of error messages poured through Lan Wangji's brain, leaving him frozen in his spot.

As Wei Wuxian settled in, he smiled and thought to himself, 'Those people said I'm clinging to you, didn't they? Now that I really am clinging to you, what will they say next? Let's see who'll lose patience with the other first.'

Finally, he opened his eyes to see Lan Wangji still standing above him.

"Hey, Hanguang-jun, aren't you going to sleep?"

"Mn."

"Then come on in, let's sleep together."

"...Okay."

Still mentally falling apart, Lan Wangji was unable to notice the red glow under most of the watchers.

(Now that it had been activated by the voice command Nie Huaisang had given, the Concealment Zone no longer needed anything to be said aloud. The reflection of Wen Ning's ghost general consciousness had been added on, giving the Zone the ability to look ahead and judge which scenes would need to be skipped — activating automatically once it got there. If it had really been for skipping past unrelated information, it would have worked perfectly every time.)

(Unfortunately for them, it had been activated to pick up on their embarrassment, rather than indifference.)

Just when the real Lan Wangji's brain had finally started to function again, he noticed Wei Wuxian cracking his eyes open from where he laid next to the simulated Lan Wangji. They closed, then opened again. It happened over and over, increasing the real Lan Wangji's wariness each time.

"What — what is he going to do?" Wen Chao gasped out, shaking in his boots at the smirk growing on Wei Wuxian's face. The real Lan Wangji also wanted to know the answer, but it seemed like the only person able to predict the Yiling Patriarch was his older self; the real Lan Wangji stood no chance.

In correlation with Wen Chao's rising terror, Wei Wuxian repeatedly glanced back at the man sleeping beside him, his excitement visibly growing.

"Oh no," he sat up. "My pillow isn't in the best position. I need to change."

He reached back, then, in an act so natural it would have seemed real if it weren't for the fact that this was Wei Wuxian, his elbow knocked against the window sill and the pillow went flying out.

“Oh no!” he cried out, gasping in shock as the pillow vanished from their sight. The look on Hanguang-jun’s face perfectly matched the one on the real Lan Wangji’s.

Just a little while ago, Lan Wangji had watched Wei Wuxian catch an arrow Wen Ning had mistakenly shot with one hand. No matter how good Wei Wuxian was at playing the fool, no one who had seen the former would ever buy the clumsy performance on display now.

“Aiya, what do I do now?” Wei Wuxian thought aloud, tilting his head in exaggerated consideration. “How am I going to sleep without a pillow?”

Breathing out sharply through his nose in a barely-contained sigh, Lan Wangji glanced over and ordered, “Get another one.”

“It’s too late to ask for another one,” Wei Wuxian laughed. “I’ll just share yours. Scoot over a little.”

Unable to stand it for a second longer, Lan Wangji turned away. By now, he had accepted his budding feelings for Wei Wuxian. That didn’t change the fact that Wei Wuxian had told him time and time again that he wasn’t interested in men.

Which meant the thoughts he was having were absolutely not okay.

~~But the collar of Wei Wuxian’s inner robe was slipping down and Lan Wangji could see far too much of his chest and if he slipped a hand in there he would never be able to face his uncle again.~~

With another barely-repressed sigh, Hanguang-jun complied.

As Wei Wuxian snuggled closer to Lan Wangji’s body, Jin Guangshan raised an expectant eyebrow. At this point, Hanguang-jun would have to be insane to not take advantage of the opportunity given to him. With Wei Wuxian hanging onto his side like that, it would be child’s play for someone as strong as the second jade to turn over and pin Wei Wuxian in place against the bed. Surely, not even Lan Wangji would be able to resist.

“Wait, wait, Hanguang-jun!” Wei Wuxian called out. “Why are you sleeping in so many layers? So uncomfortable. Here, I’ll help you take them off.”

“What?!” Lan Wangji shrieked out, slamming a hand over his mouth when he realized how undisciplined he had been. To his left, Jin Guangshan licked his lips.

“Wait-”

Ignoring Lan Wangji, Wei Wuxian reached over and slipped his hands inside Lan Wangji’s outermost robe, making the older man freeze like he’d been restrained by Zidian. Wei Wuxian’s hands began peeling off the first robe and reached down to Lan Wangji’s waist.

“Wow, your belt is so tightly fastened,” he observed, gritting out the last word as he clenched his teeth in concentration from the exertion of pulling.

Finally, a hand snapped down and halted Wei Wuxian's movement.

"Why on earth would your older-self do that?" Jin Guangshan wondered.

"Because he's — it — that shameless-"

"He's the one initiating it. If your older self wants to continue, why would he stop him?"

By this point, Lan Wangji was too consumed by embarrassment to answer.

"How am I supposed to help you if you grab my hands like that?" Wei Wuxian protested.

Hanguang-jun was forced to take yet another calming breath (though, this time, it was to combat a growing arousal rather than anger).

"It's after nine."

"Yes, yes, I understand."

With a dejected expression, Wei Wuxian forced himself to lay back down and close his eyes, attempting to sink into the realm of unconsciousness once again.

Wen Chao finally let out the breath of air he had been holding, panting in his relief that the Yiling Patriarch was slipping into a peaceful slumber.

That relief vanished a moment later, as Wei Wuxian began tossing and turning in bed, too full of adrenaline to rest properly. For several minutes he shifted around, and yet the call of sleep eluded him.

Soon enough, he gave up.

"Hanguang-jun, are you awake? I can't sleep."

Golden eyes cracked open once again.

"Calm your mind," he suggested.

Instead, Wei Wuxian sat up again, turning to face him as he whispered, "Hanguang-jun, I know why I can't sleep. Ah, I can't bear it anymore. Here, touch here. Listen."

And with that, he pulled Lan Wangji's hand to his chest so that every heartbeat could be felt. To help the remaining watchers, the spirits had amplified the sound so that it rang in their ears.

Du-dun. Du-dun. Du-dun.

"Wei Ying!" Lan Wangji shouted in protest. This was almost as bad as the teasing Wei Wuxian had done during his punishment in the library. No, because of the physical nature of the teasing, this was even worse.

And yet Hanguang-jun's only reaction was a slight flush to his ears.

Clearly, Lan Wangji's older-self was a disgraceful, shameless, indulgent-

"Hanguang-jun, can you hear it?" Wei Wuxian asked, his half-lidded eyes dripping with seduction.

Raising a somewhat disbelieving eyebrow, Jin Guangshan greedily took in the sight being offered to him.

Wei Wuxian opened his mouth to speak again, only for Lan Wangji to pull his hand out of Wei Wuxian's reach and snap his fingers. A moment later, muffled sounds of protest escaped Wei Wuxian again as the silencing and body-binding spells kicked in. Those exclamations of shock soon turned into annoyed grumbles as Wei Wuxian glared over, cursing Lan Wangji with his mind. As cool and calm as always, the adult Lan Wangji just closed his eyes.

"Rest," he repeated.

"There was really no need to cut that off," Jin Guangshan protested, sighing in disappointment. Really, was letting it go a little longer too much to ask for? Jin Guangshan hadn't abstained this long in years! Everyone else was getting information they wanted; why couldn't he get even just a short show?

Paralyzed and silenced, Wei Wuxian could only grumble to himself and whine inside his own thoughts:

'Hmph. The silencing and body binding spells again. Honestly, how did Lan Zhan become so tolerant of things like this? He used to be embarrassed with just a little bit of teasing.'

The real Lan Wangji knew full well just how true that was. It was official: nothing could possibly be worse than this. Lan Wangji's life was over.

'It was fun to watch him get embarrassed,' Wei Wuxian recollected. 'But now, not only does everything I try to do to him fail, but he keeps getting back at me. If this continues, when will he let me go?'

"Wangji?" Lan Qiren asked, waking up from the Concealment Zone.

"Hello, Uncle," Lan Wangji forced himself to bite out, not wanting to raise unnecessary concern.

"Did the Concealment Zone activate again?" Nie Mingjue asked. "But… no one said anything to initiate it this time?"

"I assume this was a continuation of the last time," Jiang Fengmian commented. "If the same people feel the same… emotions, maybe it activates automatically?"

To the watchers, who knew nothing about the Ghost General's consciousness nor what Wei Wuxian could do with that, Jiang Fengmian's theory was the most likely possibility. As the idea that it could start at any time settled in, Madam Yu frowned deeply and glared.

“What happened?” she demanded. “What did that boy do?”

“Nothing happened,” Lan Wangji repeated. “I… Wei Ying tried to disgust me — my older self — again, so Hanguang-jun paralyzed and silenced him.”

This time, neither Jin Guangshan nor Wen Chao disagreed, so the watchers were forced to accept that as the truth. Lan Wangji’s completely dead eyes seemed like a bit of an overreaction in that case, but they were well aware of how proper the Second Jade of Lan had been raised to be, so maybe that explained it.

(On the other hand, Jiang Cheng rolled his eyes, feeling that Lan Wangji was finally reacting appropriately to just how incomparably shameless Wei Wuxian had become. It was aggravating that there were things Lan Wangji was sharing with Wei Wuxian that Jiang Cheng was being excluded from, but he supposed it wasn’t entirely bad. He had absolutely no desire to see two men acting in such a way.)

Finally, as the world switched to a town at noon, the watchers heard Jin Ling’s haughty narration begin:

“Every time Wei Wuxian tried disgusting him, Hanguang-jun would paralyze Wei Wuxian’s body and stuff him in another set of blankets for the night, where he would remain until daylight broke. Gradually, as he encountered loss after loss and was forced to endure a sore body every morning, Wei Wuxian began to give up.”

‘Thank god,’ Lan Wangji thought.

“The two followed the hand’s directions, duetting Rest every single day in order to temporarily calm its killing intent. As their travels neared Qinghe, the direction the arm had been pointing suddenly changed. Its index finger curled back so that it was forming a fist instead.

“They were near.”

“Do you think it’ll be hard to find?” Jiang Yanli asked, frowning in consideration. After everything they had just watched the teenaged Wei Wuxian go through, she was certain that he (and, to a lesser extent, the watchers themselves) deserved a break.

“It would be best to temper our expectations,” Wen Qing advised. “I’d rather be pleasantly surprised than disappointed.”

After a moment of thought, Jiang Yanli was forced to nod in agreement.

“Huaicang Mountain,” Jin Ling explained, and a cloudy sky over a fairly overgrown town formed before their eyes.

At an inquiring gaze from Lan Xichen, Nie Mingjue explained, “It’s a mountain on the outskirts of Qishan. The town right next to it is on the poorer side, but there’s a bustling trade district not too far from there.”

Lan Xichen nodded, hoping that the not-quite-yet-but-maybe-soon couple would get to spend some time together in that town. The Yiling Patriarch and Hanguang-jun had (allegedly) been enemies; now there was finally a chance for that to change.

Laundry hung to dry rose in the wind, and leaves danced to the same tune. Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian stepped into the desolate street, the former's pure white robes looking out of place amongst all the dust.

Once again, Huaisang found himself mourning that he didn't have his paints with him.

"The arm was been pointing northeast before it stopped," Lan Wangji thought aloud. "If we continue heading this way, we shouldn't be far off."

Wei Wuxian nodded in agreement, his eyes cautiously scanning their surroundings. Then, some ways behind the pair, an approaching foot knocked a small rock aside.

Lan Wangji spun around, but there was no one in his line of sight.

The footsteps retreated to the outskirts of one of the nearby houses. Eyes narrowing, Wei Wuxian spun on his heel and vanished — sprinting forward. In less than a second, he landed several meters beyond the man's hiding spot, snatching something out of the air. Just as the unknown man was about to stand up, a flash of white impaled the ground in front of him.

It was Bichen. And Lan Wangji following after.

"What the-" Nie Huaisang jumped back with a yelp. "I didn't even see you move!"

Raising an eyebrow, Wen Ruohan gave an impressed hum and sent the real Lan Wangji an assessing look which caused Lan Xichen to flinch and move between them, glaring Wen Ruohan down.

Hanguang-jun's robes, ribbon, and hair all eased, landing flat against his back right as two golden eyes turned toward the unknown man.

"Why are you following us?" he asked.

On trembling limbs, the man instantly lowered himself to the ground.

"Hanguang-jun, please spare me!" he shouted. "I'd heard rumors of a strange castle up ahead, so I came… to try my luck!"

'A 'strange castle?'' Nie Mingjue repeated. 'In Qinghe?'

He really, really hoped it wasn't the one he was thinking of.

"What do you mean? Are you looking for something?" Wei Wuxian asked, standing up from where he had crouched on the floor behind the man. In his hand was a dirty spirit attracting talisman painted in blood, created by the man who had been following after them.

“I-I practice demonic cultivation, and seek weapons left by the Yiling Patriarch!”

Wei Wuxian’s eyes widened and he sucked in a gasp of air.

“He…” Lan Qiren couldn’t believe his ears. “He just admitted it?”

“And Lan-er-gongzi didn’t even blink!” Jin Zixuan pointed out.

“I…” Jiang Fengmian shook his head. “Part of it might be that he’s low leveled? I… couldn’t feel anything.”

And that was true. Next to Wei Wuxian, the spirits registered the man as a raindrop beside a hurricane, only detectable after an intense study.

(However, he was clearly a demonic cultivator all the same.)

“...Wow, when you look at it like this, it’s almost like Wei-xiong started a whole new sect after he left the Jiangs, isn’t it?”

Jiang Cheng flinched at the reminder.

Meanwhile, realizing that there was no threat, Lan Wangji re-sheathed his sword and stepped back, lessening his intimidating presence and silently encouraging the man to continue speaking.

After several seconds to make sure he wasn’t about to be killed, the demonic cultivator cleared his throat:

“People say that the Ghost General, the Stygian Tiger Amulet, Wei Wuxian’s manuscripts, and his other powerful weapons were all destroyed long ago, but the Ghost General is rumored to have appeared on Dafan Mountain recently! Maybe the other weapons are still in existence.”

Wei Wuxian looked to the side and awkwardly scratched his cheek, unable to make eye contact with them while knowing that this was his fault.

A growl.

“You might not be real, but if you refer to my brother as a ‘weapon’ again I’ll take out your eye,” Wen Qing promised, annoyance rising. As a dark aura developed around her, Nie Huaisang began warilly stepping back.

(Despite that, Nie Mingjue remained calm. She had half expected him to start a fight over her scaring his brother — jokingly or not — and yet Nie Mingjue had simply rolled his eyes in response.)

(Perhaps she didn’t need to be quite so worried for Wen Ning after all.)

“The-the treasures will contain untold power. If we could find them-”

He cut off as Wei Wuxian began to laugh, "You think you can find one of the Yiling Patriarch's weapons in a deserted place like this?"

"You never know!" the man protested. "They can't be easy to find."

'And yet,' Jin Guangshan thought. 'You don't recognize the man in front of you — the greatest prize of all. How are you planning on identifying his weapons if you can't even do that?'

As he watched his father's expressions, a shiver ran up Jin Zixuan's spine.

(What would Jin Guangyao do if he was in this situation?)

"So, you came here to find some sort of castle?" Wei Wuxian checked.

"I… I don't know much about it. I was going to the center of town to… ask around?" he responded hesitantly, quickly realizing that if the powerful beings before him wanted to check out the castle, there was no chance of him getting anything there.

"Poor guy," Jiang Cheng muttered, understanding the feelings of inadequacy, even if on a different scale.

"Hanguang-jun, what do you say we go check that out?" Wei Wuxian smirked, making the pitiful demonic cultivator's expression instantly fall.

"Mn."

The man collapsed in on himself in disappointment.

Nie Huaisang snorted, then covered up the following laughs with fake-coughs. However, as the world faded to black in a transition, he found himself frowning deeply.

"Say, if demonic cultivation is practiced by other people, doesn't it seem unlikely that Wei Wuxian was actually corrupted by it?" he pointed out. "I mean, after what he went through, those personality changes should be expected, right? Maybe he gets back to normal pretty quickly, and we're just confused."

"You think everyone is lying about my daughter's death?" Madam Yu hissed.

Squeaking and scrambling to hide inside his Da-ge, Nie Huaisang responded, "I don't really know! I just — they were wrong about the fall of Lotus Pier, weren't they?"

There was nothing Madam Yu could say to that.

"We don't know enough to say for sure," Lan Xichen pointed out. "Right now, all we can do is keep watching."

On the main street of the town, numerous people strolled leisurely in the afternoon light. Watching them, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji walked through the street, traveling in the general direction the demonic cultivator had pointed them towards.

“It’s actually quite crowded at Qinghe,” Wei Wuxian observed, glancing around the marketplace.

Realizing the location’s closeness to a certain castle, Nie Mingjue stepped back and gritted his teeth, wondering what to do next. On one hand, maybe they weren’t actually going to that castle and saying anything would reveal their weakness to ~~Wen Ruohan~~ the other clans.

On the other hand, had the simulation ever showed them anything unimportant?

A large number of people were traveling in every direction, their bustling somehow creating a wide gap around the tall, intimidating man dressed in all white robes. The obvious conclusion was that the citizens were just nervous about offending a young master. However, soon enough, two of the passing men paused and turned to Lan Wangji, acknowledging him with a bow and a respectful, “Hanguang-jun."

None of the townspeople were surprised by the greeting.

“Wow, Wangji-xiong, you’re really famous,” Nie Huaisang gaped in awe. Outside of their own territories, he wasn’t sure anyone would be recognized by an entire town of people. Then again, the future Jiang Cheng had mocked him for always being “where the chaos is,” so maybe it wasn't quite as surprising as he had-

“Huaisang,” Nie Mingjue spoke out.

Suddenly, a powdery, artificial fragrance attracted Wei Wuxian’s attention and he spun around.

“Da-ge?” Nie Huaisang asked.

Nie Mingjue hesitated for a moment, before shaking his head and forcing himself to look up. He refused to be a coward; not in this. Not now, when all the people around him had already gotten their secrets revealed.

“What comes next might be about our clan,” he forced himself to bite out. “Just… prepare yourself. You might not like it.”

A cold dread began to sink into the Sunshot Campaign watchers. Nie Huaisang and Lan Xichen made eye contact with each other, wondering why Nie Mingjue thought whatever he was talking about would be more scaring than his death.

Unaware of that concern, Wei Wuxian frowned: ‘Recently, I’ve become used to the mild sent of sandalwood from spending so much time with Lan Zhan. Comparing to that, this new scent is unbearable!’

Grimacing, he located the source of the smell.

“What are you selling?” he blurted out, glaring at the owner of the stall.

Lan Wangji knew consciously that whatever Sect Leader Nie had meant should probably be occupying his attention. Unfortunately, when compared against Wei Wuxian’s repeated thoughts on the smell of sandalwood, fear and logic stood no chance.

The stall was owned by a charlatan, who wore the robes of a cultivator and had the word 'deceiving' plastered all over his face. He carried a chest full of items to sell to passerbys.

Seeing that someone had asked, he beamed, "I sell everything! The rouge and powder here are both cheap and fine. Young masters, is there anything you want?"

"Sure, I'll take a look."

"Alright. For your wife?"

"For myself."

As most of the kids laughed and Jiang Cheng gave a heavy sigh, Lan Wangji sat frozen. He really shouldn't. He should have more discipline — he knew that — but, after Wei Wuxian's comment about sandalwood….

Suddenly, without his consent, his mind conjured up an image. It was Wei Wuxian, his cheeks flushed with skillfully-applied rouge. Then, a moment later, he shifted into the Yiling Patriarch — hair down, eyes red, but cheeks just as rosy pink and lips just as plump-

'Come back to Gusu with me,' Lan Wangji could hear his other-self say.

And the Yiling Patriarch looked away, expression falling in submission as he caved into Hanguang-jun's request. The red dusting across his face become even darker with genuine blush, so Lan Wangji reached forward and cupped his face and then-

He stepped back, beyond ashamed at his own thoughts and ears bright red with humiliation.

(As Jin Guangshan watched Lan Wangji's reaction, he couldn't help but think that the boy's resulting fantasies were probably much more tame than his own had been.)

"Do not bother him if you have no plans to buy it," Hanguang-jun ordered, making the charlatan's befuddled 'are you messing with me?' face relax at last. However, a moment later, he tensed up again. The charlatan was a fake cultivator, but he still knew a few things about that world. Just like the men they had passed in town, Hanguang-jun was a person who all could recognize.

(And who no one wanted to mess with.)

He began packing up his chest.

Noticing that, Wei Wuxian protested, "Hey, what are you running away for? I really wanted to buy it!"

"Do you have any money?" Lan Wangji asked.

"I'll use some of yours."

Then, before Lan Wangji could react to those words, Wei Wuxian had pounced on him and groped around until he found the desired money pouch (ignoring the aghast look forming on the charlatan's face).

"It's like you're married already," Lan Xichen teased with a misleadingly kind smile despite his evil, evil words. Lan Wangji's already flushed ears turned an even darker shade of red.

However, when Wei Wuxian pulled the money pouch out, he was forced to stop and stare for a while. He hadn't actually expected to find anything, and the bag's pink and flowery design was even more surprising.

It seemed somewhat familiar.

"Wait, isn't that… MianMian's?" Jiang Yanli realized with a gasp.

Wen Qing lifted an eyebrow towards the second jade and recited, "Emperor's Smile, the rabbits, and now this. I get that you two were constantly arguing before he died, but you think he'd make the connection."

Lan Xichen sighed in agreement, "MianMian was quite some time ago, but he did manage to realize the rabbits were from him. Why is he so skilled at deducing everything except this?"

"Well, considering everything that's happened," Jiang Fengmian's smile fell. "I doubt he's had much time to think about romance — or even having allies in general. Maybe he just needs a bit of time to adjust to the possibility."

(And Wei Wuxian hadn't trusted even Nie Huaisang. After that, how could this be a surprise?)

"Hey, Huanguang-jun, let me borrow some," Wei Wuxian requested. "I'll pay you back in the future, when I have money."

"Mn."

Jiang Cheng nodded, thinking, 'Once my future self gives him back his position in the Jiang Sect, he'll have all the money he needs.'

"Well then, since this young master is so generous… Owner, give me two of your rouge please!"

"Got it!"

'I've already gone so far. I can't believe Lan Zhan can still endure it!'

"Here," the stall owner said.

"Ah, thank you!"

"I can't believe he's actually buying it," Jin Zixuan muttered.

“Actually, A-Xian’s quite good with makeup,” Jiang Yanli explained. “A few years ago, I hurt my hand and he wanted to help me out until I recovered. It was a little messy at first, but he ended up becoming quite good at it.”

“...Wow,” Jin Zixuan responded, almost having trouble believing someone like Wei Wuxian could exist.

(‘And then you let father get away with saying something like that about him,’ a voice inside his head whispered.)

As Jin Zixuan felt the black dye of guilt seep into his soul, Wei Wuxian continued pondering over the mystery of the changes in Lan Wangji.

‘At this point, if it wasn’t for the fact that Hanguang-jun’s reputation is still impeccable, I would have thought he and Mo Xuanyu had a helpless, chaotic entanglement!’

“Foolish, Wei-xiong,” Nie Huaisang tsked. “Lan-er-gongzi has never wanted anyone but you!”

“Huaisang!” Nie Mingjue shouted.

“The Yiling Patriarch!” a voice called out. “Five coins for one and ten coins for three! Come here and take a look! You won’t regret it! Buy the Yiling Patriarch!”

“...Who?” Wei Wuxian asked.

Unable to help themselves, the watchers joined Wei Wuxian in walking towards the source of the sound.

(No matter how many times he saw it, it still astounded Wen Ruohan that Wei Wuxian’s relevance in day to day discussion had lasted so long after his death.)

“Such a low price won’t cost you anything! I recommend you buy three! One for your front door, one for your hall, and one for your bedroom!” the fake cultivator had put away his jars of cosmetics and switched them out for sheets of paper.

Door guards, it seemed.

“Yiling Laozu Evil-Suppressing Portraits! The dense evil energy fights poison with poison, and makes sure no evil beings can come near you!”

“Huh, that’s actually not a bad idea,” Nie Huaisang mumbled.

Wen Qing raised an eyebrow, “I highly doubt they actually work.”

“Of course, of course, But think about how beautiful Wei-xiong and Wangji-xiong look together!” Nie Huaisang pointed out, causing Lan Wangji to do a double take. “I certainly wouldn’t mind putting up a painting of the Yiling Patriarch and Hanguang-jun in my house!”

Just then, the charlatan held one of the portraits up for prospective customers to see.

“What is that?!” Nie Huaisang shrieked.

“Uh, Huaisang-”

“How dare he?!” the Nie heir added on, too enraged to listen to Nie Mingjue’s poor attempts at placating him. “Why that’s… that’s… an insult to everything art stands for!”

Nie Huaisang had never been so offended in his life.

Similarly, as Wei Wuxian stared at the bug-eyed, hairy, unkempt figure before him, he found himself unable to accept that the person in the painting was meant to be himself.

“This portrait harnesses the Yiling Patriarch’s power, and will keep monsters of all levels away from your homes!”

‘If it was really that powerful, you wouldn’t be selling them for five coins, would you?’

Either way, Wen Chao couldn’t understand why anyone would want a reminder of that being inside their house at all times. Just the thought of it left him shivering.

Snatching the poster from the man’s outstretched hand, Wei Wuxian shouted, “Wei Wuxian was a man famous for his good looks! What’s this drawing?!”

“I — have you ever seen Wei Wuxian before? How would you know what he looks like?!”

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli laughed helplessly, amused by her brother’s affronted pride. However, both Nie Huaisang and Lan Wangji simultaneously and indignantly nodded in agreement:

‘That looks nothing like him! He has every right to be angry over that!’

“How dare you?!” a young boy’s voice shouted. In the next instant, the charlatan was kicked back by a teenager wearing golden robes with a Sparks Amidst Snow motif on the front.

“"Jin Ling?!”” Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan shouted in unison.

‘Jin Ling?’ Wei Wuxian thought, copying them. ‘What is he doing here?’

A moment later, Jin Ling began a rampage and crushed everything in the charlatan’s stall.

“Hey, what are you-”

“The fact that you dared to mention Wei Wuxian in front of me means you should be grateful I haven’t killed you already!”

The charlatan wanted to shout back, but, seeing that the person who had destroyed his stall was the young master of a Great Sect, he held his tongue.

“Not to mention selling these portraits on the streets!”

Seeing that, Jiang Yanli found herself frowning minutely. It was true that the man profiting off Wei Wuxian was a grave insult to both his victims and Wei Wuxian himself, but attacking a defenseless civilian wasn’t something that felt warranted given the situation (especially since it seemed like everyone in this world couldn’t go five minutes without bringing up the Yiling Patriarch). Actually, now that she was taking the time to think of it, hadn’t his introduction been like this too?

“The spirit nets,” Jin Zixuan muttered, thinking along the same line as her.

The rogue cultivators — middle aged men, women, and even teenagers like himself — had begged to be let down. In response, Jin Ling had turned his anxiety over not having found the prey at them.

‘You guys should just stay here. I don’t want you messing around and getting in my way again!’

And, after that, Jin Ling had been merciless in his shouts against the person who he thought was Mo Xuanyu. “Crazy guy.” “Lunatic.” “Damn gay.” Jin Ling was still a child — he would surely grow out of such behavior — but seeing it now made it extremely apparent that Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan hadn’t been there to raise him.

They made slow, hesitant eye contact.

‘We’ll be there for him,’ they both promised. ‘We’ll help raise him. We won’t die and leave him an orphan. Not him; not our son.’

Similarly, as he watched, Wei Wuxian thought, ‘This child isn’t like Shijie at all.’

“You’re seeking your own death!”

‘Proud, headstrong, condescending — he’s learned all of his father’s and uncle’s bad qualities, and none of his mother’s good ones!’

“Honestly,” Madam Yu huffed. “I’m sure LanlingJin did just as much to raise Jin Ling, but I still expected better from you, A- Cheng.”

Her son flinched and looked away.

“He’s behaving absolutely disgracefully — causing a scene like this in the middle of town-”

“San-niang,” Jiang Fengmian began warningly.

‘This arrogant, selfish, rude behavior… if I don’t teach him better, he’ll definitely suffer a lot in the future.’

“What, you disagree? I thought you were against cultivators who threw around their names like this. Isn’t that why you always rejected my suggestions regarding the patrol formations?

And now look at how those common folk are judging my grandson. If A- Cheng had just raised him correctly-"

"You have no right to say that."

Madam Yu cut off completely, unable to even continue arguing in her shock. That had not been the usual request to move into a different room when she started an argument around their children; that had been an accusation. She almost couldn't believe his insolence. She had already admitted her hatred of Wei Wuxian was somewhat unearned, what else could that man possibly expect from her?

('An apology,' her mind whispered, but that thought was locked away easily enough.)

Angered, it seemed like Jin Ling was about to walk a few more steps toward the man on the ground when Wei Wuxian interrupted.

"Jin Ling!"

"Mo Xuanyu?" the young Jin heir checked. "You still haven't run away? Ha, fine."

"Aiyo… I wonder just who was lying on the ground unable to get up last time."

Despite the amusing words from Wei Wuxian, no one laughed. The growing tension between Jiang Fengmian and Madam Yu filled every watcher with either apprehension or excitement (in the case of Wen Ruohan, Wen Chao, and Jin Guangshan).

And Madam Yu was seething.

Her glare sharpened, 'Who does he think he is, to tell me I can't give parenting advise to my own children?! And here I thought he was finally coming around. He apologized to A-Cheng and A-Li, or did he not really mean it when he promised to be more open with them?! Is he going to pick Wei Wuxian again?'

Yes, after everything that had happened, Madam Yu had learned enough to admit she was wrong (to herself, at least). She had constantly singled out Wei Wuxian, and she had punished him specifically on the most minor of infractions whenever they came into contact. The little time she spent at Lotus Pier was regularly consumed by giving out such punishments, which, in hindsight, was a bit of a waste of time.

So she would stop — or try to, at least. And then all the fights that had constantly divided their family would be over.

Or so she had thought.

But, after Jiang Fengmian's words, she wasn't so sure. Was he accusing her of parenting her children improperly? It was true she wasn't around as often as she could be, but at least they had never doubted that she cared for them. Unlike Jiang Fengmian, their children had always known that they were her priority.

(So why couldn't she get Jiang Fengmian's words out of her head?)

As the stare off between an enraged Jin Ling and an amused Wei Wuxian continued, it became clear that not even Jin Ling's rank was enough to intimidate "Mo Xuanyu." Seeing that, Jin Ling's rage increased and, when Wei Wuxian raised a questioning eyebrow, he sneered and whistled.

A moment later, there was a bark in the distance.

"Oh, no," Jiang Fengmian whispered, focus immediately pulled away from his wife.

Wei Wuxian glanced in the direction of the noise, and his eyes widened in fear.

"Lan Zhan!" he shouted, sprinting behind the other man. "Help! Help me! Lan Zhan! Lan Zhan, Lan Zhan, Lan Zhan save me! Help!"

All Lan Wangji had to do was narrow his eyes slightly, and the large dog instantly whimpered and lowered its head, backing up in fear. However, a moment later, Lan Wangji froze.

Terrified, Wei Wuxian had switched his grip from Lan Wangji's shoulder to a better hiding spot. He had ducked down, wrapping his arms around Lan Wangji's waist and burying his head in Lan Wangji's back.

The real Second Jade promptly felt his mind shut down.

"H-Hanguang-jun?" Jin Ling asked. "Wh-what are you doing here?"

'Normally, when people hear that my dog is from the Chief Cultivator they back off, but Hanguang-jun… is a different story.'

Lan Qiren nodded once at his (frozen) nephew, pleased that the future Lan Wangji was known to enforce righteousness, even in cases as minor as this. Hanguang-jun's actions around Wei Wuxian had made Lan Qiren uncertain, but it seemed as if his nephew had continued to be worthy of his title even so many years later.

After taking a moment to calm his racing heart, Lan Wangji glanced up, "...Your spiritual dog is causing trouble."

"I'll take her away immediately!" Jin Ling responded, spinning on his heel and ordering, "Fairy, let's go."

"...Fairy?" Jin Zixuan checked.

"What's wrong with that? It's a perfectly good name!" Jiang Cheng shouted back, feeling certain that his own names would be judged as soon as they were found out.

They turned back to the simulation, joining everyone else in staring as Wei Wuxian hung onto Lan Wangji body like it was a lifeline. Hanguang-jun glanced back — face blank to all except Lan Xichen — and waited for Wei Wuxian to finally notice that he'd literally crawled on top of the second jade of Lan.

Two seconds passed. Then, with a surprised yelp, Wei Wuxian jumped off. His eyes were wide, and his breathing heavy.

"Wait… was he actually scared?" Madam Jin gaped, not believing her own eyes.

'It's just the dog comment,' Jiang Cheng explained, having just watched Lan Wangji bite Wei Wuxian inside the Xuanwu cave. 'He hates them. He can't stand even tiny little puppies!'

"I thought you were exaggerating!" Nie Huaisang declared with a disbelieving laugh, to which Jiang Cheng just rolled his eyes and shook his head. "Seriously? The dreaded Yiling Patriarch is scared of dogs?"

Nie Mingjue and Lan Xichen made eye contact, equally shocked looks on their faces.

"That dog was so scary!" the stall owner declared. "Disciples from prominent clans these days really are unbelievable! Unbelievable, I say!"

Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan both wilted at the words, a bit of an embarrassed flush forming on their cheeks despite the fact — or perhaps because of the fact — that they hadn't been the ones to raise Jin Ling.

"Uh, that's right!" Wei Wuxian laughed, trying desperately to regain his cool. "It's getting worse day by day! Men are not what they were in the past."

The charlatan glared down at his disturbing Yiling Patriarch posters and hissed, "These bring so much bad luck! I'm not selling them anymore! Ah, Brother, thank you so much for earlier. I'll give you these 10 Yiling Patriarch Portraits as a sign of my appreciation. If you sell them for 5 coins apiece, you can earn fifty coins for a meal!"

"What kind of gift is this?!" Wei Wuxian protested. "If you really want to show your gratitude, make them look prettier!"

Rolling his eyes, the charlatan turned away.

"A-ah, wait, don't go!" Wei Wuxian rushed forward. "Brother, look, there's a tea booth over there. Why don't I treat you to a cup of tea for the shock earlier?"

A laugh, "That's sounds great!"

"And how exactly are you going to pay for that?!"

"I would assume Hanguang-jun will be paying," Wen Qing answered with a small, indulgent smile.

Nie Huaisang gave a dreamy sigh, "Wei Wuxian can do the talking, Lan Wangji can back him up. Don't they make such a perfect team?"

"Please stop," Lan Wangji requested, his earns burning red despite his stone-cold face.

After exchanging a glance with Lan Wangji to make sure it was okay, Wei Wuxian brought the stall owner over to the tea shop and sat down, treating the man like they were old friends.

“Owner!” he called out.

“Coming!”

As the owner began to pour their tea, Wei Wuxian leaned close to the fake cultivator and gave an inviting smile, “Brother, may I ask you about something?”

“Ask away.”

Despite all the time they had spent in the past, they had never gotten to see Wei Wuxian leading a simple night hunt. Now that they had, the combination of him and Lan Wangji became all the more impressive.

“You’re right,” Lan Qiren turned to Jiang Fengmian. “Perhaps we should try to arrange something like this when we get out.”

Lan Wangji stubbornly remained blank, but Lan Xichen could tell just how ecstatic the prospect made him.

“You’ve been doing business here for a long time. Have you ever bumped into anything strange or seen anything odd?”

“Something strange?” a laugh. “You asked the right person. I stay here most of the year. They call me the Qinghe know it all!”

“...Do they?” Wen Qing muttered skeptically.

“What kind of strange things?” the man asked.

“For example… hauntings of evil creatures, events like dismembered corpses. Oh, and on the way over we heard about a mysterious castle. Do you know anything about it?”

Sensing the growing stress in Nie Mingjue’s body, Lan Xichen moved close to his friend to offer some silent support.

“Hm… there’s nothing like that over here, but if you walk about two miles that way there’s an area of a mountain called the Xinglu Ridge. They also call it the Man-Eating Ridge.”

Nie Mingjue cursed, and Nie Huaisang turned to face him, staring desperately. He had no idea what was making his brother react in such a way, but, whatever it was, it couldn’t be good.

“Is there a monster there that eats humans?”

“That’s right,” the man smirked, embellishing his story with a terrifying voice. “They say that there’s a Man-Eating castle in that ridge. Inside, there’s a monster that eats humans. Anyone who enters will be devoured until there’s not even a bone left behind. You won’t be able to find a single corpse left inside! There are no exceptions!”

As Nie Huaisang squeaked in fear, Nie Mingjue frowned deeper, wondering where on earth the man had gotten information like that.

“Scary, right?’

“So scary!” Wei Wuxian agreed. “But… if no bones are left behind and no corpses could be found, then may I ask how people are so sure the victims were eaten?”

Wen Ruohan’s lips cracked up into a smile at the question. He had already been fairly sure based on the boy’s intelligence, but it was nice to get confirmation that Wei Wuxian was an experienced investigator as well.

“I — someone saw it, of course!”

“But didn’t you say that people who enter that place are eaten until there are no bones left behind, without exception? Then how could someone have gotten out to spread the legend?”

“That’s… that’s just how the legend goes. How would I know?”

“Then may I ask if you know how many people were eaten and where it happened?”

“Age?” Lan Wangji added on. “Gender? Name and surname? Where do they come from?”

“N-no.”

Wei Wuxian raised an eyebrow, “Qinghe’s know it all, huh?”

“The legend doesn’t say anything about that!”

“Ah, Wei-xiong, you’re truly a terrible audience member.”

“Huaisang, they’re not there for fun,” Nie Mingjue lectured. “Perhaps you could learn something from their example!”

Lan Qiren nodded, “Wangji and Wei-gongzi’s older selves should be inspiration for you all. Try to follow what they do when you conduct an investigation on a night hunt. These are the sorts of questions you need to ask.”

JIn Zixuan, who had always had people to investigate for him and therefore had never gotten the opportunity, nodded with a near-religious devotion.

Annoyed, the man stood up, “I really can’t have a conversation with you-”

“No, no, no, no, no,” Wei Wuxian grabbed the man’s hand and sat him back down. “Don’t be mad. Let me ask one more question! That Xinglu ridge should still be in the Qinghe region, right? Isn’t Qinghe under the protection of the Nie Sect? If there’s really a man eating monster at Xinglu ridge, why aren’t they doing anything about it?”

“The Nie Sect? If it was the old Nie Sect of course they wouldn’t ignore it! But the former Sect Leader died of a qi deviation. The current leader of the Nie Sect….”

Numerous eyes turned Nie Huaisang’s way.

“Well, there’s a reason he’s known as The Headshaker.”

A loud, mocking laugh escaped Wen Chao’s throat, the first gleeful sound he’d made since watching his own death. Hearing that, rage filled Nie Mingjue’s body and he turned to the hated Wen heir with burning eyes.

“What?” Wen Chao laughed. “It’s him. We all knew this was going to happen.”

And no one could deny that.

“The current Sect Leader is Nie Huaisang, right?” Wei Wuxian asked. “Why are you calling him the Headshaker?”

“...If I have to be straightforward, the current leader really is hopeless. Whenever he’s asked a question, all he can say is ‘I don’t know.’”

Wen Chao’s smirk increased in arrogance.

All of the watchers were well aware of who Nie Huaisang was. In fact, this was probably the expected outcome. But still.

“It took all your sects and the Yiling Patriarch to take us down, but Nie Huaisang was all it took to destroy the Nie Sect all on his own, it seems,” Wen Chao laughed again. “And to think you were so proud of a victory you got only by luck-”

“You say that as if you wouldn’t have destroyed the Wen Sect in half the time if you had become Sect Leader,” Nie Mingjue growled. “Or have you forgotten how many times Wei Wuxian was able to beat you?”

“You damn-”

“Is Wei Wuxian supposed to be indicative of your side?” Wen Ruohan asked, cutting his son off. “After all, you all took part in a siege against him, and were merely ‘allies’ during the Sunshot Campaign.”

“Regardless, he was on our side at the time,” Lan Xichen pointed out. “Just like Wangji was on our side during the archery competition. And like Mingjue was on our side when he took out Wen Xu.”

Wen Ruohan’s smile turned arctic cold.

Nie Mingjue laughed, “And besides, if you think a single one of you Wen dogs is worth half of what we are-”

“I hope that phrase isn’t meant to be all-inclusive,” Wen Qing bit out, halting all conversation. Every pair of eyes in the room swung her way, but her eyes were focused only on Nie Mingjue.

The simulation continued, and the man went on to describe the way any attempts to ask Nie Huaisang questions would go. The three “I don’t know”s were especially exaggerated by the man, but the watchers were all too preoccupied to pay it any mind.

Normally, Wen Qing wouldn’t be so stupid as to directly antagonize Nie Mingjue and ask him to make a decision. Normally, she would have allowed them to argue amongst themselves until they finally came to their own conclusions. However, over the past few days, the ice between her last name and Nie Mingjue had been chipped away bit by bit.

Now, she needed to know where she and her family would stand once this was over. Was she just a “Wen dog” to him, or….

“A-Qing,” Wen Ruohan spoke. “Can I take that to mean you intend to completely separate from your family?”

“My family will always have my loyalty,” she responded. “However, I will not kill, and I will not allow them to be put in danger. So, why don’t you tell me, Your Excellency: do I need a complete separation from the sect?”

“Not at all,” Wen Ruohan responded instantly. “You’re a Wen, after all. We won’t kick you out.”

For the loyalty she could inspire in Wei Wuxian, if nothing else.

Now, every eye was being turned on Nie Mingjue, including an internally cursing Wen Qing. She had miscalculated slightly, and had assumed Wen Ruohan would agree to the division. Instead, he had increased the ties between them, and left the final decision up to Nie Mingjue. Wen Qing wouldn’t become an direct enemy of the Wen Sect if she had a choice — it had too many people she loved for her to do that — but she wouldn’t help them either.

(But, if Wen Ruohan’s claim on her stopped the Sunshot Campaign from offering any support, then-)

“...It was not,” Nie Mingjue finally acknowledged.

“Not what?” Wen Qing snapped.

“Not inclusive,” he continued. “So long as you personally don’t take up arms against us, the Qinghe Nie Sect won’t take up arms against you. I swear on my honor.”

The two of them made eye contact, and the mountain of pressure Wen Qing had been carrying since the simulation started suddenly seemed to lift off her shoulders and vanish.

Nie Mingjue had made his choice.

And he'd picked them, over his hate.

Finally, they could turn their attention back towards the simulation.

"Then, brother, can you tell us where we can find that Xinglu ridge?" Wei Wuxian asked.

"Are you two planning on going?"

"Mmhm."

The man clicked his tongue as though he was speaking to a disobedient child, "That's so brave. Alright, you just need to follow that path for about two miles."

"Thank you," Lan Wangji said, giving the man a respectful nod.

"Your adult self seems fairly honorable, doesn't he?" Lan Xichen whispered to his brother. "Maybe you don't need to worry so much about him."

"No," Lan Wangji disagreed, not even trying to deny the worry he was feeling. "No, he's crafty and shameless and audacious and-and insane."

"But Wangji-"

"No," he shook his head. "I'll never become like him."

Leaving Wei Wuxian at the end of the Yiling Patriarch's return was clearly the right decision. He had no idea why his older self was acting in such a manner, but keeping Wei Wuxian captive was not an option. He refused to become like the adult version of Hanguang-jun.

~~Or like his father.~~

~~Except Lan Wangji couldn't be sure of that, because he still didn't know what had happened between his parents. He didn't know which sides were willing, and he didn't know which sides were right. Somehow, that made the unknowns regarding his other self's behavior even more terrifying than before.~~

Wei Wuxian and Lan Wanji stood up to go, and, watching them, the fake cultivator sighed, "You guys are going to such a dangerous place, why don't you take a few portraits of the Yiling Patriarch as a protective amulet?"

"I think I'd rather have the real Yiling Patriarch," Nie Huaisang laughed. Although he smiled slightly at Nie Huaisang's comment, Nie Mingjue didn't add anything either.

(He had just sided with Wen Qing. He sided with someone who had benefited from his father's death. The research materials she had were brought with the blood of minor sects, and he had supported her.)

(What was he supposed to do now?)

“We get along so well,” the charlatan held the posters out. “How about just three coins for each?”

Wei Wuxian coughed out a wheezing laugh, unable to believe that the fake cultivation was truly that shameless, and responded, “No, thank you. Let’s go, Hanguang-jun.”

“Mn.”

And with that, he and Lan Wangji began their journey towards the mysterious castle.

“Well, if there’s one up side to having seen the Yiling Patriarch’s power, it’s that we don’t have to worry when he goes to do things like this. Nothing he encounters could possibly be a bigger monster than him,” Madam Yu mumbled.

Three pairs of shocked eyes turned to stare at her, and she glared back at her family until her children flinched backed off. At that, Jiang Fengmian’s gaze turned disapproving.

She internally fumed. What was that look supposed to mean? She was practically praising Wei Wuxian, wasn't she? And why were her children so quick to lose eye contact with her, it wasn’t like she would actually hurt them!

(But knowing that hadn't been enough to stop Jiang Cheng from trembling every time she shouted at Wei Wuxian in front of him.)

The scene switched to a large cedarwood forest where Fairy sprinted forward, leaving a panting Jin Ling behind.

“Stupid dog! There’s no meat over there!” he shouted.

Jin Zixuan snorted, happiness reluctantly bubbling up in them. Despite the fact that the current Jin Ling was a bit of a brat, he was still Zixuan's son. Seeing Jin Ling with a dog so much like his own....

Jin Zixuan’s conflicted gratitude for his half brother seemed to be growing by the hour.

“Why are you running so fast?” Jin Ling complained. Despite his young age, Jin Ling was still a cultivator. For the spiritual dog to have been that much faster was a testament to its high worth.

After panting for a few seconds, Jin Ling straightened up and forced himself to follow Fairy deeper into the forest. Crows cawed in the trees, and clouds moved to cover the sun again.

“Sect Leader Nie?” Jiang Yanli spoke up. “You… you have an idea of what the simulation might be building up to, right? Is it… likely to be dangerous?”

After a moment of thought, Nie Mingjue responded, “It shouldn’t be. So long as he doesn’t recklessly destroy-”

He cut off, realizing who he was talking about. Would the boy who had dared the goddess statue to show him a soul-eating monster hesitate before destroying something dangerous?

“Well, it’s possible nothing will happen,” Nie Mingjue muttered, somewhat hesitant. In response, Madam Jin gave a long, tired sigh.

Luckily for the Jin and Jiangs’ growing nervousness, the next transition brought them to Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji, walking through the same forest Jin Ling had just entered.

’No wonder Jin Ling came,’ Wei Wuxian thought. ‘He couldn’t catch that Soul-Consuming Goddess Statue, so he must have come here for the monster of Xinglu Ridge.’

Somehow, it seemed that the insecurities plaguing her brother had passed down to her son as well. Squeezing her hands together, Jiang Yanli glanced over at Wei Wuxian and silently requested his help. If anyone could bring Jin Ling away from that, it was her shidi.

A sigh, ‘We’ve been walking around for a while now, but we haven’t seen even a shadow of the monster yet. Not that it was likely from the beginning.’

“Huh?” Jiang Cheng tilted his head.

‘If frightening legends in any area are true, there is always detailed information. At Dafan Mountain, it was easy to find where the victims lived and their personal information. But, as the charlatan was unaware of the details, this is most likely a case of exaggerated hearsay.’

“...Oh. Duh.”

The more he saw, the more Lan Qiren kept thinking that his nephew and Wei Wuxian made an excellent team. He could only hope that the latter’s lack of knowledge of the simulation wouldn’t prevent the real versions from having this once they got out.

‘Has the Nie Sect really not sent anyone to check this out? From what I remember from our time in the Cloud Recesses, Nie Huaisang wasn’t an unkind person. And it’s not that he’s not smart either, it’s just that his heart was set on other things. He’d rather use his intelligence to paint fans, search for birds, skip classes, and catch fish, rather than practice cultivation. And now, it seems, he has to go around asking everyone for help, especially his brother’s two sworn brothers.’

With each word, the tension which had been growing in Nie Mingjue lessened slightly. Yes, the other Clan leaders were probably about to find out the Nie Sect’s most carefully hidden secret, but at least he was here to take care of that. In the future being shown, the Yiling Patriarch and Hanguang-jun were most likely going to find out and confront Nie Huaisang about it.

With this — those surprisingly kind words that had left the real Nie Huaisang gaping for several seconds — Nie Mingjue felt assured that Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian would treat his brother fairly.

Though it did make him happy that his sworn brothers were helping out as well. Perhaps he and Lan Xichen could try to find Meng Yao once this was over and get to know him.

'Oh, well. Qinghe seems to be doing well enough, and I'm sure the other sects will help out if anything major-'

Wei Wuxian cut off, seeing seven or eight figures staggering towards him.

"A-Xian?" Jiang Yanli asked. Those figures in ragged clothing were slow and thin — the weakest level of fierce corpses. Even a non cultivator wouldn't feel especially threatened by them.

"Wei Wuxian can't possibly be scared of them too, right?" Wen Qing asked. It felt a bit silly to do so, but she would never have expected him to be scared of dogs.

(And besides, hadn't they all seen fierce corpses similar to these ones fighting to tear him apart in the Burial Mounds? Even if Wei Wuxian was scared of them, she wasn't sure she could judge him for that.)

Worry instantly spreading across his expression, Wei Wuxian ducked behind Lan Wangji.

"Wei Ying?" the real one asked, clenching his fists and subconsciously preparing for a fight.

Then, the walking corpses wobbled about twenty meters from the pair. As soon as they laid eyes on Wei Wuxian, they shot away in terror, nearly climbing over each other in their haste to retreat.

Wei Wuxian laughed nervously, "Wow, Hanguang-jun, you're so cool! They were so scared when they saw you that they ran away at once!"

For the first time, both the simulated Hanguang-jun and the real watchers were rendered speechless. Not even the adult Lan Wangji could have expected Wei Wuxian to be this shameless.

"...I've never seen low leveled corpses move so fast," Wen Ruohan commented, watching their still retreating forms. Though, in all honestly, he couldn't say he was surprised.

(Even now, they could all feel the all-encompassing power lurking beneath Wei Wuxian's skin. All the low leveled spirits in the area would instinctively know better than to cross him.)

Seeing that Hanguang-jun was still speechless before the Yiling Patriarch's weak excuse, Wei Wuxian laughed and pushed Lan Wangji's shoulder, adding, "Let's go, let's go. Let's get off this ridge. Those are probably the only monsters there were. The people here are so gossipy that a few useless walking corpses became ruthless monsters in their mouths. Their so-called 'man-eating castle' must have been the same, don't you think?"

After a few more shoves from Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji finally started walking. Wei Wuxian was about to continue the conversation when he suddenly heard a bark in the distance.

With a high-pitched squeal, Wei Wuxian darted behind Lan Wangji again.

Jin Zixuan, Jiang Cheng, Nie Mingjue, and Wen Qing all snorted at the dramatic reaction.

"I… is he serious?" Lan Qiren checked. When the Jiangs all nodded without hesitation, Lan Qiren's nephews frowned deeply. No matter how silly it seemed, Lan Wangji wouldn't be able to view something that caused Wei Wuxian distress with humor.

After a moment of silence, they stepped next to his virtual self and the simulated Wei Wuxian, wishing there was some way for Wangji to transfer the comfort he was trying to offer.

(In the back of his mind, some part of Jiang Cheng was trying very, very hard not to be smug. He had no right to be — Wei Wuxian was terrified — but he couldn't help but think that if Wei Wuxian had gone with him instead of Lan Wangji, he'd be there to chase the dogs away for him.)

After a few seconds without the dog getting any louder, Wei Wuxian hesitantly peaked out from behind Lan Wangji. Despite that, his arms were still hanging onto Hanguang-jun's torso for dear life, and his whole body was racked by shivers.

"It's still far away. What are you hiding for?"

"I-I-I-I-I-I-I'm gonna hide first then see. Where is it? Where is it?"

After listening for a moment, Lan Wangji observed, "It's Jin Ling's black haired spiritual dog."

Worry seeping into her heart, Jiang Yanli began to look around desperately.

Similarly, having heard Jin Ling's name, Wei Wuxian straightened up at once, only to collapse into hiding again when the barks resumed. Seeing that, Lan Wangji frowned and continued:

"If his spiritual dog is barking in such a way, something must have happened."

"Then go check on him!" Jin Zixuan snapped, worry boiling over. "It's just a dog, it won't hurt you!"

Agreeing, Wei Wuxian said, "Th-then… then we'll-then let's… let's g-go and see."

Despite that suggestion, the pair remained still.

Growing impatient, Madam Jin and Madam Yu glared. Despite Wei Wuxian's obvious terror, they weren't feeling a call or reaction from the nearby resentful energy. They knew that even Wei Wuxian's control wasn't perfect, so they could be fairly sure that Wei Wuxian was just playing up his reactions to disgust Lan Wangji again.

~~Right?~~

Finally, Wei Wuxian realized that Lan Wangji wasn't planning on taking initiative. Fear raising his voice at least three octaves, he began to shout:

"Hanguang-jun, walk! Start moving! If you don't move, how am I going to?!"

"You… let go first," Lan Wangji requested, unable to think clearly with Wei Wuxian hanging on. After a brief, reluctant pause, Wei Wuxian forced himself get off, and the two of them began to walk.

Lan Wangji glanced back.

"You… fear dogs?"

"...Yes," Wei Wuxian responded, glancing down. "I've… had a few nasty experiences."

Snow fell from the sky, and the world shifted again to reveal a winter in Yiling, an unknown amount of time ago (though presumably before Wei Wuxian's death). A thick blanket of white covered the ground, so heavy that footprints nearly half a meter deep were imprinted there.

"Those below, move out of the way!" a man's voice shouted. "Firecrackers are going off!"

"...What?" several people asked, looking around. Some turned to the Jiangs for answers, but they could only shake their heads in equal confusion.

"Happy New Year!" someone in the crowd shouted.

"Wishing you happiness and prosperity!"

"All the best! May all things go well for you!"

"Happy New Year!"

The excited shouts continued, and the large crowd scampered this way and that, phasing through the watchers as they went. There was so much chaos and noise and light that it was hard to make out anything in the crowd.

Then, the simulation shifted, and focused their attention on a beggar boy in an unlit street alley.

"Who's that?" Jiang Cheng asked, frowning in distaste upon seeing the boy's state of dress. Jin Guangshan also unconsciously stepped back, well accustomed to needing to look out for street rats and thieves on his trips through Lanling.

Other than his unusually-attractive features, there was nothing that separated this boy from any other homeless child. He had messy hair, dust-covered cheeks, and limbs so thin it looked like they would snap under the slightest force. There was some fat rounding his cheeks into an adorable shape, but the rest of him might as well have been made out of twigs.

Wen Chao scoffed, scooting away from the disgustingly dirt-drenched boy, and everyone else wondered what this child could have to do with Wei Wuxian's fear of dogs. Had he seen the child get hurt by them?

"Steam buns!" a shopkeeper shouted. "Freshly made steam buns! Steam buns! Fresh and hot steam buns! Ay! Have a look! Freshly made steam buns! Steam buns!"

Frowning in concern, Jiang Yanli found herself wishing she could buy some for the kid. Similarly, Lan Wangji and Wen Qing were overcome with a thick layer of worry for the boy. They sincerely hoped his story would not end in tragedy.

"Hey, kid!" the shopkeeper called out, noticing the boy despite the latter not saying anything. "Say, do you want a hot steam bun?"

In response to the man's question, the boy's stomach gave a pitiful sound of agreement.

Jiang Yanli seemed to shine with happiness at the offer, and Jin Zixuan mentally promised to give that shopkeeper a year of the man's earnings in exchange. Now the boy would be able to eat-

"It's fine. I'm not hungry," the boy responded.

His stomach whined in protest.

"Well, that's-"

"Obviously a lie!" Wen Qing finished, glaring down at the boy. Given the state of his appearance and the malnutrition of his body, it was undeniable that the boy didn't have the luxury of refusing such a gift.

"You're not hungry?" the man repeated, laughing. "I can hear your stomach growling all the way over here! Here, the bun will be a gift. What filling would you like?"

"...R-really?" the boy's eyes lit up in hope. "I-"

"Hey!" the shopkeeper's wife shouted, stepping out from behind another stall. "Do you think our household is so well off that we can do this? Xiao Bao is going to school next year, and we haven't earned enough money for that yet!"

Somehow, despite how unrelated it seemed, the Jiangs couldn't help but remember themselves at those words. And the comparison was not one they liked.

'You damn brat, I hate you!' the simulated Madam Yu had shouted. 'Look what our sect has turned into because of you!'

'Why did you have to save Lan Wangji?!' Jiang Cheng agreed. 'Why did you do that? I don't care if Lan Wangji or Jin Zixuan dies! Just let them die! What's their deaths got to do with us?'

The situation was very different. The shopkeeper was being practical for a small issue, Jiang Cheng had been reacting in grief to a large one. However, and despite their best attempts, no one could resist drawing the connection between them.

“Where did this little beggar come from?” the shopkeeper’s wife continued. “Aiya, so dirty! Shoo! Don’t get in the way of our business!”

“Oh, I’m sorry,” the child said, picking himself up off the ground and running off.

“Oh no!” Jiang Yanli gasped out.

“Hey, hey! Kid, wait!” the shopkeeper called out. “Wait!”

“Huh?”

“Here, a bun. I said I’d give you one. Go on, eat it.”

“What are you doing?!” his wife exclaimed.

“Thank you, it’s okay. I’m not really hungry,” the boy repeated, smiling brightly and running off.

Watching him go, the shopkeeper sighed, “Aiya, it’s New Years. The kid is quite well behaved; it’s not like he’s bothering anyone for food. What’s wrong with giving away a bun?”

However, under his wife’s steely gaze, he didn’t run after the boy either.

Seeing that, Jiang Fengmian had to look away. The situation was much more complicated at the Jiang manor — and Jiang Fengmian had succeeded at bringing Wei Wuxian back — but how many times had he backed off in about the same way? How many times had he allowed Wei Wuxian to stop kneeling for the crime of “speaking too loud,” without ever confronting Madam Yu about the punishments she gave?

Yes, he was trying to change now, but he could help but feel that it was too little, too late.

However, as that parallel entered his mind, he looked over at the retreating child again.

“I can’t walk anymore,” the boy sighed, slowing down to a barely-there stumble and panting heavily. He was trembling all over from the fatigue of sprinting away when he hadn’t eaten in days, but there was no resentment or hate in his expression.

“...A-Xian?” Jiang Fengmian asked, staring at the young boy.

Several people glanced over, “...What?”

“I’m too full to eat any more of this,” a lady complained, holding a delicious-looking steam bun and gazing at it with a heartbroken expression.

“If you can’t, then don’t force yourself to eat any more of it! We don’t want to make that child in your belly uncomfortable,” her husband laughed, then glanced over at the boy. “Hey, little begger over there! Come, come!”

The lady smiled as well, “Come over here, little boy. You can have this bun.”

“Thank you!” the boy smiled brightly, scarfing down the bun hungrily. With a smile like that, it was hard to imagine that the boy had ever felt even the slightest inconvenience — so innocent and warm that it seemed to banish all troubles and evil from the worldly earth.

They had only ever seen one other smile that looked like that.

“Wait, A-Die,” Jiang Yanli looked back and forth between her father and the simulated child. “Do you mean… is that-”

“Wei Wuxian?” Jiang Cheng asked. “No. No, it can’t be. He’s not — I mean, I know he was on the streets for a while, but he’s not… he’s a….”

He’s a member of the gentry, Jiang Cheng was trying to say. He’s a young master like the rest of us — fourth ranked in terms of desirability. First in terms of archery. One of the best of our generation. That can’t be him.

Lan Qiren looked over, “...He spent four years on the streets, didn’t he?”

Lan Wangji flinched.

Pursing his lips together, Jiang Fengmian nodded, “His parents died when he was five. I didn’t find him until he was nine.”

Even the Jiang children had only been introduced to Wei Wuxian after he had been taken back by their father. He had been cleaned and dressed and fed when they’d met. Yes, he’d been somewhat small, but-

As the couple walked off, they began to whisper to each other happily, the wife mentioning, “I wonder if the one in my belly will as handsome as they boy.”

“Good looking or not, it’s still our child, right?” the man responded. “It’s fine as long as they can grow up safely. As parents, what else can we ask for?”

Hearing that, Wei Wuxian seemed to wilt slightly and paused in his eating.

‘Father…’ he thought. ‘Mother….’

The shock in their expressions quickly made way for pity. Wei Wuxian deserved silence as he mourned his parents.

(It must have been nicer before Madam Yu started accusing his mother of betraying his father and sleeping with Jiang Fengmian. No matter how much she tried to ignore it, bile crept up in her throat at the thought.)

Then, in the distance, they heard a dog bark.

Wei Wuxian froze.

"No," Lan Wangji whispered, suddenly remembering what had prompted the flashback. "No, no, no, no-"

Silent as a snake in the grass, a large, drooling dog stepped out from behind a corner. Its pitch black fur made it stand out against the snow, leaving no doubt as to what it was.

"Stay away…" the little, tiny, weak, six year old Wei Wuxian shook his head. "Stay away!"

The dog pounced.

"Help!" he screamed, and the dog bit into his fragile arm. "Help! Go away! It hurts! I'll give you the bun, stop!"

Blood dripped down from where the teeth sank in to ivory flesh, painting it a violent red. It was so, so much bigger than Wei Wuxian. It tugged him this way and that without resistance, flinging the young boy around and ignoring the cries of pain in its battle to establish dominance.

Lan Wangji sat frozen on the ground. It was one thing when it was the Xuanwu, or the Wens, or the Burial Mounds. Then, it was an unstoppably powerful force that Lan Wangji could only barely imagine taking on.

But this was a common dog. Even someone without cultivation could help. If Lan Wangji was there, it could be dealt with using a single glare.

And yet there was still. Nothing. He. Could. Do.

"Wei Ying," he whispered, and-

A laugh broke off his train of thought. He glanced back, and saw Wen Chao snickering to himself about the helplessness of the dreaded Yiling Patriarch before a single dog.

Wei Wuxian was slammed into the ground, and he cried out in pain. The dog — so much bigger and stronger and heavier than him — growled as it crawled on top.

"Da Huang!" the dog's owner called out, finally finding it and moving to pull it off Wei Wuxian's body. "Da Huang!"

"Thank god," Jiang Yanli whispered. "Thank god. Thank god."

Jin Zixuan was frozen. Wei Wuxian was his peer — had been his enemy when they fought at the Cloud Recesses. He was Jin Zixuan's equal — his better, even, in terms of cultivation.

So, somehow, it had never occurred to him or Nie Huaisang or Lan Xichen or Lan Wangji or even Jiang Cheng what "Wei Wuxian lived on the streets" meant. They had never been able to see any traces of it in his personality.

But if he was still scared of dogs to this day-

“Help me!” Wei Wuxian cried out.

Wen Chao snorted in glee.

“Let go!” the man shouted, and finally — finally — the owner managed to pull his dog off Wei Wuxian. Big, fat tears fell down Wei Wuxian’s face, and he trembled in his spot on the ground.

The man paid him no mind.

“Aiya, really,” the owner sighed. “Go back now, Da-Huang! I stop watching you for a second and you go and cause trouble for me! Good thing it’s just a little begger. If you’d bitten someone’s kid and their parents came over to make trouble, what would you expect me to do?”

He pulled the dog away, leaving Wei Wuxian trembling on a blood-soaked spot of snow.

“That-that doesn’t…” Nie Huaisang was speechless. “That doesn’t make it okay!”

Wen Chao opened his mouth, about to speak up, and instantly felt his soul leave his body as Lan Wangji, Jiang Cheng, Nie Mingjue, and Jin Zixuan glared, just daring him to speak up.

Wei Wuxian sniffed, then wiped his tears and glanced back:

“Oh, the steam bun!” he realized, grabbing it and taking another bite.

Grateful that it had been left, rather than upset at what had happened because of it.

This time, when Cangse Sanren’s words rang in their heads, neither Jiang Fengmian nor Lan Qiren could view it positively.

‘Remember the things others do for you, not the things you do for others. Only when people don't hold so much in their hearts can they finally feel free.’

But that didn’t mean ‘don’t get upset,’ or ‘don’t focus on the negatives at all.’ After this, how could Wei Wuxian not be angry? How could he not desire retribution?

How could he keep smiling to matter what?

The seasons changed, and the snow disappeared. It was now mid-summer, still in Yiling, and still with an orphaned, abandoned Wei Wuxian. A watermelon seller spoke out to the crowd:

“Watermelons! Freshly picked watermelons! Big and sweet! Come have a taste!”

A merchant who had bought some from the man gave a pleased hum as he bit in.

Right then and there, Lan Wangji promised that he would shower Wei Wuxian with so many piles of pork buns and watermelon slices that Yunmeng's head disciple wouldn't be able to see past them.

The merchant smiled, "You grow the sweetest watermelons after all! This year's summer is so hot! Just one trip pulling a cart and I'm already covered in sweat!"

He grinned.

"Hey, hand over another slice!"

The watermelon seller did, then leaned closer to say, "Hey, when you're done eating, don't just throw the peel away. Put it over there. There's a kid who often collects them to eat."

While recounting stories about Lan Wangji to Jiang Cheng, Wei Wuxian had mentioned 'It's fun to think of him. You have no idea — he's just way too amusing. I told him 'Your sect's food is disgusting. I'd rather eat stir fried watermelon peel than eat your food!''

Wei Wuxian was a young master. He had truly and honestly seemed unaffected by his past on the streets. And yet, the closer they looked, the more clues seemed to appear.

(It was four years of his life. No one would be unaffected by that. And yet they'd never asked.)

The merchant, who had looked over to where the watermelon seller had pointed, finally turned back and asked, "A kid?"

"Yeah, a little street urchin. Well behaved and likes to smile."

'Well behaved?' Lan Qiren wanted to scoff, but felt the grim humor in his mind instantly die. After all, he had seen time and time again that Wei Wuxian knew how to hold his tongue.

And when he did, it was always out of desperation, rather than respect.

"Oh, look, he's here."

And indeed, Wei Wuxian was scampering along — older now, but his clothes just as dirty as before. Upon closer inspection, the watchers realized another difference: the scars of bite marks on his body seemed double the number that had been there before.

"Here," the watermelon seller said, offering out a few of the rinds.

"Thank you!"

'Huh, he really does like to smile,' the merchant thought. 'Born with a nice face too. If I'd known about that, I'd have left a few more bites for him.'

Hearing that, Lan Xichen stepped closer to his brother, hoping to provide some comfort with, "At least all this implies that it wasn't as bad for him as it could have been. He had food; he had some people to help him out, and-"

"Xiongzhang, please," Lan Wangji shook his head. "I just… I need a moment."

Understanding instantly, Lan Xichen backed off.

Winter came again, the snow covering the ground in a field of blinding white.

Jin Zixuan and Nie Huaisang had always associated snow with fun. It was snowmen and rolling down powdery hills and throwing snowballs at Nie Mingjue and getting new clothes from Madam Jin. It was less training for Nie Huaisang, and more challenging training for Jin Zixuan. It was exciting.

Now, all they could wonder was how much harder winter made it for Wei Wuxian to survive.

The simulation brought them forward, past the bundled up merchants and shoppers, and into a much more desolate part of town. In the back of an alley, four large, wild dogs towered over a quivering child.

"...A-Xian?" Jiang Yanli asked.

The dogs loomed above the shivering nine year old, barking fiercely and slowly cornering him, their mouths watering in hunger. The sight made Wei Wuxian whimper and try to scoot farther away, but he was too paralyzed by fear to move. In a moment of desperation, he grabbed a small rock and threw it at the dogs.

It landed on the floor at least a meter away from the wolf's snout.

Jiang Cheng and Jin Zixuan were frozen as they watched the wolves approach. They loved dogs — they truly did — but, now….

As they looked over at the narrowed eyes, the dark, mangled coats, and the warning growls, all they could focus on was how large the dogs' teeth were, and how easily they would be able to snap a weak child's leg in two.

The largest dog took another step closer, and Wei Wuxian's shaking legs kept him chained to the ground.

Wei Wuxian's first year in Lotus Pier, he had been meek and hesitant. Never taking too much, never asking for anything, and always on the lookout for something that would get him kicked out. When he had finally started to relax — to realize that his placement there wasn't a temporary state of things — Yu Ziyuan had taken it as proof that Wei Wuxian was just as arrogant ~~and fearless~~ as his mother had been.

But now, remembering the muted way he had always carried himself in her presence, she wondered whether he had actually been as confident in his place as she'd thought.

(And whether this was what he imagined returning to every time she got angry at him.)

The largest dog pulled back in a growl, then yelled out a vicious bark. Two more approached from behind an alley, until there were six dogs all staring the boy down.

Lan Wangji flinched in synch with Wei Wuxian.

“Are those all bite marks?” Wen Qing asked, looking down at the boy. If she had thought there were a lot when he was getting watermelon, then the number now was as endless as the stars. Bile rose up in her throat as she stared at the constellations of red dots on Wei Wuxian’s pale, thin, twig-like legs. And arms. And side. And-

The dogs jumped forward, and Wei Ying looked away, covering his face with his arms. A moment later, however, the dogs’ growls were replaced with whimpers, and a person’s shadow covered Wei Ying instead.

“A-Die!” Jiang Cheng gasped out, relief spreading across his face.

Wei Ying hesitantly looked up, and found Jiang Fengmian’s kind face smiling down at him. The Jiang clarity bell on his waist swayed lightly as he knelt before Wei Wuxian.

“Calm down,” he whispered. “Don’t be scared. It’s alright now. You must be A-Ying.”

'A-Ying?' Wei Ying thought. 'My name had a 'Ying' in it... right?'

“Who….”

“Ah, my name is Jiang Fengmian. I was a friend of your parents.”

“You.. know my parents?” he asked, hope sneaking into his expression.

How had he felt, Madam Yu wondered, when she first accused her husband of Wei Wuxian’s true origin?

‘Both my parents are real people!’ Wei Wuxian shouted. ‘I won’t let anyone assign me to other Clans!’

“I do. Your father was Wei Changze, right?’

“Right!”

Jiang Fengmian smiled, and held a hand out for Wei Wuxian to take.

“Come. Let’s go home.”

It took less than a second for the fear on Wei Wuxian’s face to make way for a blinding joy. With the brightest smile any of them had ever seen, Wei Wuxian nodded and took Jiang Fengmian’s offered hand.

Wen Ruohan could only curse that Jiang Fengmian had gotten to the boy first. It had been so easy to convince Wei Wuxian to go back with him. Life on the streets was paramount to torture for someone that young, of course he would take the first hand offered to him.

~~And then he got to Lotus Pier, and met Madam Yu. Life with them was still better than life on the streets, but, now, she couldn't help but wonder how much better it actually was.~~

The memory faded away, returning them to the forest with Wei Wuxian in Mo Xuanyu's body. A moment later, there was another, even louder bark, making Wei Wuxian squeak and grab on to Lan Wangji's arm tightly.

His eyes were bloodshot and terrified, and his breath came out in panicked little gasps.

And suddenly, every time Jiang Cheng had teased him about dogs seemed much less funny.

"W-well, maybe we should look on the positive side of things," Nie Huaisang suggested.

Jiang Cheng glared and snapped, "What positive side?!"

"Er… you know… if he hadn't had this experience of having little to no food and still running from things trying to bite him… maybe even he wouldn't have been able to survive the Burial Mounds. Or maybe not. I don't really know anything about this and-"

As Nie Huaisang continued to ramble on, an even more solemn air fell over the Sunshot Campaign warriors.

Another loud bark, and Wei Wuxian flinched again, battling a long trained fight-or-flight instinct. Breathing heavily, he seemed to curl in on himself as he hid behind Lan Wangji, scanning their surroundings warily.

"H-Hanguang-jun," he began. "I think we've passed this place twice already."

Looking around, the watchers were forced to admit that it did look suspiciously similar to an area of the forest they had walked through before. Then again, every section of the forest looked pretty similar, so it was hard to tell.

"And-" another bark made Wei Wuxian flinch and duck behind Lan Wangji again. "Why does the dog keep switching between sounding close and far away?"

Lan Wangji and Wei Wuxian made eye contact.

"Do you think there's a maze array here?"

Should Lan Wangji be grateful that Wei Wuxian had gotten just used enough to the barking to not stammer, or should he be enraged that his other self was letting Wei Wuxian listen at all?

(Why did his other self get all of Wei Ying's time and presents and attention? What had he done to deserve that? Why wasn't there a Wei Ying here for the real Lan Wangji?)

Lan Xichen glanced over and had to stifle a smile at the barely-visible pout on his brother's face.

After a pause, Lan Wangji stepped forward and reported, "The spiritual dog sounds the loudest here. That's most likely where it is. Let's go."

They marched forward.

Despite the very-real fear Wei Wuxian had of dogs, he was walking forward. Jin Zixuan couldn't help but feel like the debt he owed his 'to-be pseudo brother in law' was growing and growing.

"What's that?" Wei Wuxian asked, narrowing his eyes at the space before them. It had at first appeared to be an empty grotto in the forest, but, upon closer inspection, the light around it bent oddly, lighting Wei Wuxian's instincts on fire.

In the privacy of his mind, Nie Mignjue began a string of the most violent, dirty curses he knew.

After a brief instant of eye contact, Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji stepped through the barrier, allowing them to see the silhouette of a large stone castle.

Every other sect had already gotten things revealed. Lan Wangji's love, the Jiang family's issues, Jin Guangshan's cause of death, and Wen Ruohan's failure were all details they wouldn't want the other clans to know. In all honesty, Nie Mingjue had no right to keep this from them.

Still, it wouldn't be fun.

"So there really is a castle," Wei Wuxian muttered, surprise apparent on his face. "Then the legend isn't based off nothing. Though it's hard to say if it's a 'Man-Eating' castle…."

He pursed his lips, the never-ending barks sending his nerves tingling in fearful anticipation.

"Why isn't it going away?" Wei Wuxian whined pitifully. "Where is its owner? Why isn't its owner here?"

Biting his tongue nervously, Jin Zixuan began to twiddle his fingers, fear for Jin Ling rapidly consuming his mind. If it weren't for the fact that Jin Ling was responsible for the simulation (and therefore going to be fine), Jin Zixuan was sure he or his fiancee would have fainted from the stress by now.

Then, from behind a wall of the mysterious castle, the large dog entered their line of sight.

"...Spiritual dogs are loyal guardians," Lan Wangji commented. "It wouldn't leave its master's side. He must be nearby."

Wei Wuxian flinched back, "Why is it coming over here?!"

And indeed, the dog had sped through the watchers and pounced, shocking many into jumping back.

Its powerful jaws snatched onto the ends of Wei Wuxian's robes.

“Lan Zhan!” he shouted, squeezing tighter. “Lan Zhan Lan Zhan Lan Zhan!”

Fairy pulled, dragging a terrified Wei Wuxian, who himself dragged an outwardly impassive Hanguang-jun, back in the direction Fairy had come from. When they finally stopped, they were greeted to the sight of the massive hole Jin Ling had presumably blasted open in the wall.

“Stupid brat!” Nie Mingjue cursed, and the Jins and Jiangs were too much in agreement to oppose the statement. After a moment of standing frozen in terror, Jiang Yanli glanced over.

“Uh… Chiheng-zun, what do you… think will happen to him?”

The Nie Sect Leader pursed his lips together, then bowed:

“I apologize. He is in danger partly because of the Nie Sect. However, it would have killed without injuries if it worked, so I am certain that the Yiling Patriarch and Hanguang-jun found him in time.”

Seeing that Nie Mingjue’s words of assurance had done little to calm the others’ nerves, Lan Xichen silently moved beside him. After a moment of hesitation, Wen Qing followed as well, making sure Nie Mingjue didn't stand alone.

“Why does that brat keep trying to take on things he isn’t ready for?” Jin Zixuan grumbled, then shot his to-be wife a look. “I know he was dead for thirteen years, but I swear to god that’s Wei Wuxian’s influence somehow!”

Bichen unsheathed on its own by an inch, the cold glow it gave off illuminating the dark castle. After giving everything a quick look-over, Lan Wangji stepped inside.

Wei Wuxian skittishly followed after him.

Luckily for Wei Wuxian’s sanity, when Fairy tried entering as well, it slammed into an unknown force. There was a barrier blocking its entrance, forcing it to impatiently sit down outside. The relief that spread across Wei Wuxian’s face was vibrant enough to light up the whole castle.

‘Do not look at it. Do not look at it. Do not look at it,’ Lan Wangji told himself, heart beating at three times its usual speed.

The second Wei Wuxian stepped deeper inside the stone corridors, and he was immediately greeted by an ear-piercing shriek.

“Ah!” Jiang Yanli cried out, covering her ears tightly. She was far from alone in her discomfort.

However, neither Lan Wangji nor Wei Wuxian reacted to it beyond a slight wince from the latter. They continued to walk, and soon they could no longer see the light from the door. A chilly wind swept through Wei Wuxian’s bones, making him shiver. The walls were suffocating and top of the castle was spherical, making it resemble a tomb.

Worst of all, the shriek they could hear was gradually becoming louder and louder.

"How is your other self so disciplined?!" Jin Zixuan complained, shouting so that he could be heard over the laughter. By now, Wei Wuxian's brows were furrowing and even the real Lan Wangji had to cover his ears, but the simulated Hanguang-jun remained impassive.

Like with most things regarding his older self, Lan Wangji had no answer to give.

The further into the castle they went, the more excruciating the sound became. It was sharp and high — like a novice playing on a broken flute — and was accompanied by hundreds of cackling voices. The further they went in, the more unbearably loud the noise became.

Finally, even Wei Wuxian couldn't take it anymore and winced, covering his ears. The laughter found his attempt amusing and the shrieking wail rose again and-

"What's wrong?" Lan Wangji asked.

"It's just — it's so loud."

Lan Wangji frowned.

'I don't hear anything.'

"Huh?"

"Wait, so this isn't a this-place thing, it's just another Wei Wuxian thing?"

"It's definitely just another Wei Wuxian thing," Nie Mingjue, the only one who had been to the castle before, confirmed.

"It's just the voices of dead spirits," Wei Wuxian finally explained, forcing himself to continue moving. "It's too noisy. I can't figure out where it's coming from."

"I'm not the only one who thinks it's a little weird that he can hear something no one else can, right?" Nie Huaisang checked, glancing around. Several people nodded in agreement, now understanding how the spirits which had put together the memories had gone unnoticed for so long.

No matter how spiritually sensitive they thought they were, it seemed like even the best cultivators had nothing on Wei Wuxian's ability.

After a moment of thought, Wei Wuxian pulled out an intricate compass that the watchers recognized as the kind they had seen in the second segment: the Compass of Evil. The arrow pointed to the left, then swung over to the right, then simply began spinning counter clockwise too fast for an untrained eye to follow.

"Wei Wuxian can't figure out where everything's coming from, and his compass can't either…" Lan Qiren turned to look at Nie Mingjue. "What exactly is this place for?"

Nie Mingjue paused, warring with himself on how much to say. This was a secret he had been told to keep at all costs — one which his ancestors had hidden as well. It was his duty to remain silent.

But there was nothing he could do to stop everyone from finding out.

(And, presumably having decided that the watchers got the point, the spirits had artificially lowered the volume of the laughter in the simulation, so it wasn't like Nie Mingjue could pretend he hadn't heard the question.)

"...It's not malicious," he finally grit out. "It's not intended to hurt people. If that kid hadn't broken down the wall, it wouldn't have bothered anyone. It's just…. It's a burial grounds, of sorts."

And Jin Ling had just smashed it open.

Unlike the watchers, Wei Wuxian had no one to quiet the laughs and giggles and whispers and shouts, which had instead continued to grow in volume. Luckily, apparently well-accustomed to things like this, the Yiling Patriarch was able to keep going without complaint. Pressing a hand to his temple and moving it in a soothing gesture, he finally acknowledged that the compass wasn't going to work and put it back in a guqin pouch.

"Jin Ling!" he called out, worry evident in his expression. "Jin Ling!"

As expected, there was no response.

"Don't worry so much," Lan Xichen whispered, leaning close to his soon-to-be sworn brother. "We saw him in the future, didn't we? I'm sure the Jin heir is fine."

"I know, I just…" Nie MIngjue tsked. "I wish I had gotten more time to prepare Huaisang before leaving him alone."

"A trap door," Hanguang-jun reported, and Wei Wuxian looked up to see part of the wall slowly slide open, revealing a previously hidden passageway. He and Lan Wangji stepped forward and watched as the torches lining the wall blazed with fire, lit by the talisman in Lan Wangji's hand.

They walked forward.

Nervous and apprehensive about the other clans' reactions to whatever his Da-ge was hiding, Nie Huaisang began to step close again, resuming his previous habit of phasing inside his brother's body to hide.

At the end of the hallway was a large coffin made of deep black wood and carved with skilled craftsmanship. Giving the coffin an appreciative look, Wei Wuxian reached forward and knocked against it twice.

Seeing that, Wen Ruohan couldn't help but wonder how being near coffins would make Wei Wuxian feel. After all, he had no doubt that Wei Wuxian had never gotten a coffin of his own.

(He had been torn apart, after all. Even if someone was willing to, there was nothing left to bury.)

At that thought, an unfamiliar sour feeling spread through Wen Ruohan's body, leaving him quite confused.

"Don't tell me Jin Ling is inside," Wei Wuxian muttered.

"We'll know after we open it."

Nodding at each other, the two pried open the lid.

And the screams doubled in volume.

"Gah!" Nie Huaisang jumped, covering his ears. The sound of the screaming was much lower than whatever Wei Wuxian was experiencing (thanks to the spirits), but even they could tell how unbearable it was.

As she watched her shidi cover his ears and wince in pain, Jiang Yanli found herself wondering why he would keep using demonic cultivation after the Sunshot Campaign. Even if it wasn't as inherently corruptive as they thought, it clearly wasn't pleasant.

Finally, however, the noise faded slightly, and Wei Wuxian was able to look into the coffin. He had prepared to defend himself in accordance with the frenzied sound going on in his head, but, surprisingly, nothing had happened. He looked over. Within the coffin, there was only a large, unsheathed saber.

Every gaze swung questioningly towards Nie Mingjue, and he shifted awkwardly in his spot. Combined with the grumpy expression on his face, no one bothered to voice their questions.

They would likely be answered soon enough.

"What?" Wei Wuxian frowned. "I've never seen a coffin for a blade before."

He spun on his heel and entered an adjacent room, finding another coffin. He opened it, but the contents were the same. And yet another, and another. They all held blades.

Not a single coffin had Jin Ling.

"Why can't you just show us where he is?! Why keep it a secret?!" Jin Zixuan shouted, anxiety building. The mystery was even worse than an answer.

(Then again, what had ended up happening to Wei Wuxian in the Burial Mounds was beyond their wildest nightmares, so maybe that wasn't always true.)

"Where's Jin Ling!" Wei Wuxian demanded, worry growing.

Lan Wangji joined back up with him, eyes narrowed in determination, and answered, "We'll know soon."

With a graceful flourish, the guqin Wangji was removed from his back and placed across his lap. With an elegant flick of his wrist, Lan Wangji strummed, and the first notes of Inquiry were played.

“I suppose, if there’s any positive side to all this, it’s that Hanguang-jun and the Yiling Patriarch are the ones looking for him,” Madam Jin commented. No one disagreed; if they couldn’t find Jin Ling, no one would be able to.

Lan Wangji stepped forward, watching his other-self with wide eyes. He had been labeled as one of the best guqin players in the sect, despite his young age. Even his teachers could barely match him now, and the other sects had no one who could compare. It had been years since he’d met so much as an equal.

So it had been even longer since he’d heard someone whose skill completely eclipsed his own.

And this, unquestionably, did.

At Wei Wuxian’s request, Lan Wangji set out to ask the found spirit what the castle was, and who had built it. After only a few seconds of playing, the strings began to vibrate on their own, signifying that the spirits were responding. Wei Wuxian, like many of the watchers, did not know the qin language, and so could only ask:

“What did it say?”

“I do not know.”

“Huh? But-”

“What?”

Lan Wangji glanced over and responded, “It said, ‘I do not know.’”

Nie Mingjue snorted, and soon joined Lan Xichen, Nie Huaisang, and Jin Zixuan in their slack jawed laughter. Lan Qiren simply stared in open-mouthed shock at his nearly unrecognizable nephew.

“What?” Lan Wangji asked. “He-but that — shameless!”

Hearing that, Wei Wuxian recalled their conversation about ‘Whatever’ as they were fighting the abyss. With that, he smiled.

‘What a person Lan Zhan has become. He’s even learned how to make me speechless!’

“Oh my god, you two are perfect for each other!” Nie Huaisang laughed out, making Lan Wangji’s shocked face turn a beautiful shade of pink at the ears. He deeply envied his other-self’s ability to maintain a blank face in all situations.

Lan Wangji played another question, and got the same response.

“What did you ask this time?” Wei Wuxian wondered.

“How it died.”

“...Maybe it was secretly killed while it was distracted. Ask if it knows who killed it.”

Lan Wangji did, and yet the answer was the same.

“What a useless spirit!” Jiang Cheng grumbled.

“...Then ask it if it’s a man or a woman. There’s no way it doesn’t know that.”

“A man,” Lan Wangji translated.

“We finally know something, huh,” Wei Wuxian sighed. “Then ask it whether or not a boy of fifteen to sixteen entered this building recently.”

“Yes.”

Jin Guangshan had to admit, the idea of keeping Wei Wuxian around as a Wen Zhuliu-esque guard dog for his heirs was seeming more appealing by the second. Even without Jin Guangshan’s involvement, the Yiling Patriarch clearly had plenty of personal motivation to protect Jin Ling.

“Alright, then where is he now?”

Lan Wangji paused, not translating for a moment, and Wei Wuxian asked, “What did it say?”

“It said, ‘Right here.’”

The watchers looked around, but they couldn’t see Jin Ling anywhere. If the answer was ‘right here,’ then it couldn’t be far, but there was no sign of him. Nie Mingjue held his tongue, unwilling to voice anything that might be wrong during such a tense situation.

“It can’t lie, right?” Wei Wuxian asked.

“I am here, so it cannot.”

“That’s so cool,” Nie Huaisang muttered, sending Lan Wangji a somewhat starstruck look. Although Nie Huaisang wasn’t interested in nighthunting, following along with the Yiling

Patriarch and Hanguang-jun while knowing that nothing here could hurt him was genuinely enjoyable. 10/10, would do again.

(Besides, it was helping him find out about the apparent library worth of secrets his Da-ge had decided to keep from him.)

Curious and increasingly desperate under his perfectly blank expression, Lan Wangji began again. This time, after he got a response, he froze.

"What?" Lan Xichen breathed out, and Lan Wangji turned towards Jiang Yanli and Jin Zixuan, eyes wide.

"What did you ask this time?"

"How old it was, and where it was from."

"And?"

"...Fifteen, from Lanling."

"No," Jiang Yanli whispered. "No, no, no. He can't — he can't, he-"

Jin Zixuan swayed on his feet, looking nauseous. Yes, Jin Ling's behavior was far from perfect, but he was a child. He still had room to grow. Wei Wuxian and Jiang Cheng had changed so much throughout the simulation, Jin Ling could too.

Except he couldn't because if he was dead then their son-

"Jiang-guniang, Jin-gongzi!" Lan Xichen shouted, hurrying over. "It's fine, he might not be dead. Inquiry will still pick him up if he's near death and-"

"I know!" Jin Zixuan snapped. "We saw him; we know he can't be dead. Shut up!"

Although Lan Qiren frowned at the disrespect towards his nephew, he didn't bother to raise his voice. The simulation was quite good at pouring gallons of stress into the watchers and letting them flounder like fish on land.

Closing his eyes — a grim expression on his face — Wei Wuxian began to listen. The cries, whispers, and shouts of the spirits, on closer inspection, contained a familiar voice. It was faint, and hard to hear, but it was undeniable that there were muted shouts coming from Jin Ling.

"So, Hanguang-jun can talk to them and Wei Wuxian can hear them," Nie Huaisang muttered, excitement building despite the tense situation. "Can you imagine a more perfect-"

"Huaisang!" Nie Mingjue shouted. "Now is not the time."

"Sorry, sorry! I didn't realize. I'll stop," Nie Huaisang rushed to say, holding his hands up in surrender and reminding many of his future self's title of the Headshaker.

(Though, if pressed, Wen Ruohan would say he had trouble believing Nie Huaisang had genuinely become that incompetent. Then again, he knew Nie Huaisang had never cared about the rank his sect held, so maybe it wasn't entirely faked either.)

(It was hard to tell with that one.)

Meanwhile, Hanguang-jun had begun playing the guqin again, asking Jin Ling for a precise location. This time, the answer came a bit slower, each note being played one by one rather than a short song like it would usually be.

"Stand where you are," Lan Wangji ordered. "Face southwest, and listen to the strings. After each note is played, walk forward one step. When the sound stops, he will be in front of you."

Wei Wuxian complied. Seven times, he heard notes from the guqin, so seven times, he stepped forward. When the sound completely ended, he was standing in front of one of the walls. It was made of grey-white rock bricks, and was pieced together tightly.

At the confirmation of what had happened to Jin Ling, Nie Mingjue used his full willpower to resist the urge to curse the boy out for his stupidity. Yes, Jin Ling was only a child, but still. At his age, Wei Wuxian had been a valiant rescuer of bunnies and predictor of the Wens' eventual attack.

(Then again, comparing anyone to Wei Wuxian wasn't fair for them, so maybe the simulation had just warped Nie Mingjue's sense of normalcy.)

Frowning, Wei Wuxian raised a hand and let it light up with the red sparks of resentment. With a flick of his wrist, the resentment sprang forward and carved out pieces of the wall. Wei Wuxian and Lan Wangji then reached forward to remove the bricks, finding a sheet of black dirt behind them.

"What's even the point of a double-layered castle made of dirt?" Madam Jin hissed, annoyed at the danger her grandson was constantly ~~putting himself~~ in.

Reaching forward, Wei Wuxian scooped away the dirt with his bare hands as fast as he could. A few seconds later, a face was revealed from behind the rubble.

The body fell forward, and a coughing — alive — Jin Ling landed in Wei Wuxian's waiting arms.

Nearly collapsing on the ground in relief, Jiang Yanli squeezed her hands together and mumbled, "Thank you, A-Xian." It was true that being an orphan had likely contributed to the kind of person Jin Ling had become, but, even if that was Wei Wuxian's fault, that didn't erase the fact that he had saved her son's life two times in the past week or so.

"...He'll be a great martial uncle for Jin Ling," Jin Zixuan told her, blushing as he said it.

Smiling lightly, Jiang Yanli responded, "Then I suppose you'll have to get to know each other once we get outside."

The world faded to black.

As light returned them to the in-between zone, everyone hesitated, having far too much to say. Gratitude, fear, nervousness, understanding, and callous annoyance (on Wen Ruohan's part) swirled within the watchers, making them all hesitant to speak.

Seeing that no one was moving to get anything done, Wen Qing stepped forward.

"Why don't we go chronologically," she suggested, glancing over to Lan Wangji. "What happened when the Concealment Zone activated for the rest of us?"

"Not much happened," Lan Wangji repeated. "Wei Ying tried to disgust me, but my other self knew he wasn't serious so he — I — continued to reject the advances."

"Are you sure he isn't serious?" Madam Jin asked. "I know he's trying to get away because he thinks you're going to punish him, but his feelings for you are obviously more complicated than...."

She trailed off, noticing the weight of the look on Lan Wangji's face.

"I'm sure. My other self knows as well."

Sorrow coated Lan Xichen's expression, which Lan Wangji resolutely ignored. Despite all the ways Hanguang-jun had surprised Wangji, there was one thing they completely agreed on: Wei Wuxian did not want a relationship with them.

(And yet his older-self was still forcing Wei Wuxian to stay with him.)

As Lan Wangji felt despair and self-hate boil over within himself, Jiang Cheng felt relief spread through his chest. After leaving the Jiang sect, Wei Wuxian had gotten himself killed. It was clear that Hanguang-jun wasn't about to start anything with Wei Wuxian, so maybe Wei Wuxian being brought back to life was an opportunity for Jiang Cheng's other-self to do better.

However, not everyone agreed.

"Maybe your other self just isn't interested anymore?" Nie Mingjue suggested, raising an eyebrow at Lan Wangji.

"I can assure you that's not the case," Jin Guangshan interjected. "I know interest when I see it. Something else is keeping the future's Lan Wangji from taking what's offered to him."

Lan Qiren glared at that comment, while Wen Ruohan huffed in amusement. All the while, his father's words simply rang in Jin Zixuan's head.

'I know interest when I see it.'

Had he recognized the 'interest' in whoever Jin Guangyao's mother was? Was that all it had taken for Jin Guangshan to turn away from them? Why? Why did he keep doing that? What was so bad about Jin Zixuan's mother that Jin Guangshan needed to sleep with people who were practically strangers? What was so awful about their family that Jin Guangshan couldn't be satisfied? Why did he have to keep creating new ones?

~~What had Jin Zixuan done wrong?~~

He was shaken out of his thoughts when his mother asked, "And after that was Qinghe?"

"Well, there was the demonic cultivator before that," Lan Qiren reminded, frowning deeply. "He just… he just admitted it. To Wangji, even. I don't… why would he just…."

"It seems demonic cultivation is significantly less rare than we expected," Lan Xichen agreed. "Given that and the fact that Wangji's future self has no problems with Wei Wuxian's continued use of demonic cultivation, I think it seems likely that it is far less corruptive than we feared."

"But then why would Wei Wuxian go back to normal after his death?" Nie Mingjue asked. "His soul wasn't severed, but it's not as though he lived those thirteen years. Not like a normal soul, anyways. How could he possibly go from killing Jiang Yanli-"

"Supposedly," Nie Huaisang pointed out.

"...Right. Supposedly killing Jiang-guniang. Regardless, doing things so awful that the four great sects had to lead a siege against him. He 'supposedly' massacered the cultivators at Nightless City too. While a thousand is clearly an exaggeration, it seems likely that something happened there."

"Something bad enough that he's still spoken of regularly over a decade later," Wen Ruohan agreed, making Nie Mingjue scowl. The two of them made eye contact for several seconds, but Nie Mingjue was forced to concede to his point.

When they first started watching, their goal had been to figure out why Wei Wuxian fell to demonic cultivation. With the quivering mess Wen Chao had turned into, none of them would ever forget what Wei Wuxian was capable of or how he'd become that way.

Then, after the demonic cultivator, the watchers had seen fragments of Wei Wuxian's childhood. Luckily, the only ones willing to talk about that were *un*willing to face the wrath they would generate if they tried to do so, and thus remained silent.

"Anyways, next was Qinghe," Jiang Cheng commented, trying to hurriedly move past the subject of Wei Wuxian's childhood. "And Jin Ling. Who, of course, decided to fight a castle."

"He's already tried to fight a goddess statue," Nie Huaisang pointed out. "Maybe he thought a castle was the next logical step."

"He lost to the statue and had to be bailed out by Wei Wuxian," Jiang Cheng pointed out. "Honestly, how does he keep getting into these situations?"

However, as soon as he asked that, he felt certain that he knew the answer. His future self's angry words echoed in his ears:

'Why are you still standing there? Are you waiting for prey to walk into your blade? If you can't capture something presentable tonight, don't bother coming back!'

"Stupid boy," Madam Yu muttered, too low for anyone else to hear. "Honestly, don't you have any sense of responsibility? Why aren't you offering Jin Ling more support? It's disgraceful."

Especially in comparison to what Hanguang-jun had said to the Lan juniors immediately after. It was like he was trying to embarrass the Jiang sect. How dare they do that? And it didn't help Yu Ziyuan that her own mind seemed to be working against her now.

No matter how hard she tried to ignore it, Madam Yu couldn't stifle the voice in her head (one that sounded a lot like Jiang Fengmian) from whispering to her, "A-Cheng's probably learning to parent by example. It's not as though you ever helped him with that. All the insecurities you put in him, he's now putting in Jin Ling."

But that wasn't true. She loved her children — unlike with her husband, they had never doubted that of her. She wasn't the one who had made her son insecure; that was Wei Wuxian, however unintentionally. Her children knew she loved them, and she knew they loved her. And with Jin Ling — her grandson clearly knew Jiang Cheng loved him. It was fine.

(How dare Jiang Fengmian suggest otherwise?)

And-

"Clan leaders, Madams, young masters," Wei Wuxian greeted, a nervous tension in his voice instantly setting the watchers on edge.

"A-Xian?" Jiang Yanli asked.

"Yup! And I brought friends!"

"Hello Sect Leader, young master."

"Lan-xiansheng. Lan-gongzi. Lan-er-gongzi."

"Uncle!"

"Father."

"Zhonghui?" Nie Mingjue asked, doing a double take towards the ceiling (where the voices were coming from). Similarly, the Jins, who had recognized Jin Zixun, and the Lans, who had recognized Lan Ziming's voice, froze.

"Xu-er," Wen Ruohan smirked. "Update me on the situation."

“Of course, father. The Wen Sect hosted a conference to make sure the Great Sects were all up to speed on the simulation. The claims that Wei-gongzi was making were a little hard to believe, so he suggested that we contact you directly. Have your fears been assuaged, Jin-gongzi?”

“Ah, y-yes,” Jin Zixun responded.

Those words allowed Jin Guangshan to instantly understand what was happening. Nodding at Wen Ruohan in thanks for the tip, he stepped forward and spoke:

“A-Xun.”

“Yes, Uncle?”

“We’re all trusting Wei-gongzi to help us with any problems that might occur. I expect you to give him the Jin Sect’s full support, am I understood?”

By the silence on the other side, he was pretty sure the answer to that was ‘no.’ Nevertheless, always the dutiful follower, Jin Zixun eventually forced himself to agree.

“Yes, Uncle.”

Jin Guangshan doubted Jin Zixun would actually follow through with that, but at least now Wei Wuxian would know Jin Zixun was not indicative of the whole Jin sect.

Sensing that everyone else needed some time to process the orders Jin Guangshan had just given, the one who spoke next was Nie Zhonghui:

“Sect leader, you described the information being presented to you as important, correct? Can I take that as confirmation that you want to be left inside?”

“Yes,” Nie Mingjue responded. “It’s important enough that we can’t afford to miss any of it.”

“I see,” was the easy acceptance. The Nie Sect’s head disciple had complete faith in his sect leader, and accepted the request without complaint, even as the Lan and Jin representatives took in a shocked intake of breath.

So, although probably not saying it outright, Wei Wuxian had implied that they might need to be taken out. Good, that meant they could explain once and for all that they had to stay.

“I expect you to leave us in here as long as possible,” he concluded.

“Of course, Sect Leader.”

“Lan-xiansheng,” Lan Ziming spoke, trying desperately to remain calm despite the nervousness wracking her body. “Is it truly so important that all of you have to stay? I… surely at least one more person can come out.”

Instantly, the Jiangs, Lans, Nie, Jin Zixuan, Wen Qing, and Madam Jin turned to look at Wen Chao, brainstorming as fast as possible for some way — any way — to force him to leave.

Eventually, Wen Ruohan spoke up, “There’s no way for you to force a specific one of us to leave, correct?”

“Correct.”

Silence.

“...So, Lan-xiansheng?” Lan Ziming asked.

“Ah, no-”

“I’m afraid we’ll all be staying. Apologies, Wei Wuxian,” Wen Ruohan concluded.

‘But… Lan Ziming is the one who asked,’ Nie Zhonghui, Lan Ziming, Jin Zixun, and Wei Wuxian thought simultaneously. Despite himself, Wei Wuxian was somewhat pleased that everyone except Wen Xu was just as confused as him. If nothing else, it was an assurance that he wasn’t the only one who thought the sect leaders may or may not be going crazy.

Clearing his throat, Wei Wuxian spoke again: “Well, I think that’s everything. I’ll check in with you soon, okay?”

“Alright,” Jiang Fengmian agreed. “Be careful out there. Don’t push yourself too hard, and don’t… don’t allow anyone to punish you unjustly-”

“Oh, because that’s what I always do to him?” Madam Yu snapped, tension finally boiling over.

“I don’t… think he meant it that way, Madam Yu?” Wei Wuxian interjected in an attempted appeasement.

“Oh, of course. Because you know my husband better than I do-”

“San Niang!” Jiang Fengmian interjected, but didn’t deny what she’d said either. Because it was true, wasn’t it? Wei Wuxian understood the Sect’s motto. Wei Wuxian would be selfless. Cangse Sanren wouldn’t have looked at an orphaned child who had been bitten by dogs and decided that child was her enemy.

“Ziyuan,” Madam Jin whispered, making Madam Yu glance over. After Madam Yu’s ‘you should have left Jin Zixuan to die’ comments, their friendship had been fractured. However, they still understood each other better than anyone else could, and Madam Jin’s meaning was clear.

(You consciously understand that you were wrong. You know he doesn’t deserve it. You want to change. But you’re still treating him the same way, Ziyuan.)

Like she’d been slapped, Madam Yu flinched back and looked away.

“Right, well…” Wei Wuxian took a deep breath. “We’ll be going then.”

“A-Xian!” Jiang Yanli spoke up.

“Shijie?”

“You… you have to eat a lot, okay? As many steam buns as you want. Use Yunmeng’s money — as much of it as you want. You have to eat, okay. I don’t want you getting… hungry.”

As though the starving five year old Wei Wuxian had been could be described as simply “hungry.” And he had still rejected the stall owner’s bun to save the man some trouble.

“Lots of protein,” Wen Qing added on. “And bread; simple sugars will help.”

She knew it was silly to tell that to the teenage version of Wei Wuxian, but he had been eating watermelon rinds and fighting dogs for his bun. She wouldn’t allow that to happen again.

“...Okay?” Wei Wuxian agreed. “Sure… I will. Thanks?”

“Good,” Wen Qing and Jiang Yanli nodded at him, temporarily appeased with his promise.

“Great. Um… bye?”

And with that, they left.

Chapter End Notes

To anyone wondering, the first scenes in the simulation are from the Audio Drama Extras, “Escape” and “Sleep Together.” Shortly after that is the extra “Eating Melon.” They were recommended to me, and then I thought they were too cute (or sad) to not include! Hope you enjoyed!

Three hurried knocks disrupted Lan Xichen's meditation, instantly replacing his earlier sereneness with worry. It wasn't that he disliked such interruptions — in fact, he quite enjoyed them. With Lan Qiren at a diplomatic negotiation, the person outside could only be Wei Wuxian or Lan Wangji. Every time he visited, Wangji had been as courteous, considerate, and respectful as he always was, and the more recent visits from Wei Wuxian had been shockingly pleasant. He supposed that shouldn't be a surprise (Wei Wuxian had been the 4th most sought after young master largely on the basis of his personality), but it was such a large divergence from Lan Xichen's memories of him as the Yiling Patriarch that it surprised him every time.

(Then again, Lan Xichen wasn't too arrogant to not admit that his opinion of Wei Wuxian during that time might have been slightly colored by how Wei Wuxian's actions had affected Lan Wangji.)

Regardless, it wasn't the knocking that concerned him, but rather the frantically fast pace at which the knocking happened. No matter how severe the situation, Lan Xichen couldn't imagine Wangji ever knocking in such a manor. That left only Wei Wuxian, who could either be excited over an invention working, or worried about someone's safety.

Lan Xichen opened the door.

The first thing that occurred to him was that he had been right: the person who had been doing the knocking was Wei Wuxian. The second was that, in his deeply meditative state, he hadn't noticed two additional presences: a pair of people who were now waiting out of sight behind a large hill.

Lan Xichen sent a questioning look Wei Wuxian's way.

"Hi, Zewu-jun," Wei Wuxian greeted, giving a chipper smile.

'Don't be so formal. You can call me, Da-ge, if you want,' Lan Xichen tried to say, only to find the words already dead by the time they reached his mouth. After everything Wei Wuxian had done to help him — after all the talks they'd had and all the times Wei Wuxian pulled him away when he got lost in a maze of thoughts — Lan Xichen knew it was the least he could do. However, no matter how much he wanted to, he didn't think he'd ever be able to think of anyone other than Nie Mingjue when someone said that.

“Zewu-jun?”

“Ah, my apologies,” Lan Xichen cleared his throat, annoyed at himself for becoming lost in thought for what seemed to be the thousandth time. “Is something wrong?”

“Sorta,” Wei Wuxian shrugged. “A bit of an issue came up, and I was wondering if you felt up to getting involved. You don’t need to leave seclusion, of course. And you don’t have to if you don’t want to.”

That was very little information, but Lan Xichen couldn’t bring himself to blame Wei Wuxian. If it was about the simulation, then the sensitive nature of the information justified the secrecy. If Lan Xichen wanted to no more, all he’d have to do is say ‘yes.’

And it was Wei Wuxian. If there was one thing Lan Xichen had come to understand about him, it was that he wouldn’t ask Lan XIchen for anything he wasn’t willing to do.

“Thank you, I… I would be honored to help however I can,” Lan Xichen finally answered, and some of the tension that had been building in Wei Wuxian’s shoulders vanished at the offer.

“Okay, great. Here’s the issue,” he clapped his hands together. “Nie Huaisang may or may not have found out that you want to help Jin Guangyao. Lan Zhan and I managed to convince him to at least talk about it before he sped off to make plans, and I thought you would maybe want to be involved?”

His body tensed again when he realized that Lan Xichen had stopped moving entirely, but the first jade was too distracted to respond.

Nie Huaisang knew?

‘Er-ge, behind you!’

‘Yes! You said so! But did I move?’

“Zewu-jun.”

Lan Xichen snapped out of the memories, turning at once to face his brother in law. Wei Wuxian had raised his voice to attract Lan Xichen’s attention, and yet the tone had remained astonishingly calm. Despite his concerned expression, he hadn’t stepped closer or tried to reach out to Lan Xichen.

“Breathe, Zewu-jun. You’re okay.”

(When Wei Wuxian and the juniors went inside the simulation to see if Wen Ruohan was actually there, he had come out screaming. A tearful verbal report from Sizhui had given Lan Xichen a general idea of what had sparked that reaction.)

(Exactly how much had the cultivation world at large wronged the man in front of him?)

"...Are you alright?" Wei Wuxian asked. "We can hold this off for another day, if you'd prefer. No one would judge if you backed out now."

Then, slowly, Lan Xichen shook his head, "It's fine. It… isn't a surprise that he'd have objections to my plan. I don't mind speaking with him about it."

As soon as he said that, the two figures who had been waiting from behind the nearby hills stepped out. A clearly concerned Lan Wangji faced him, but Lan Xichen only had eyes for the nervously fidgeting Nie Huaisang to Wangji's right.

"...Please," he said at last. "Come inside."

Somehow, the silence of Lan Xichen sitting alone in seclusion was less oppressive than the not-quite-silence of sitting with Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji, and Nie Huaisang. They all knew what they had to talk about, but none of them knew where to start.

That didn't mean Wei Wuxian wasn't going to try regardless:

"So," he clapped his hands together and forced a smile. "Let me start with a summarization. Feel free to correct me if I'm wrong, but if I'm understanding correctly, Sect Leader Nie doesn't think leaving Meng Yao alive is worth the risk, and Zewu-jun thinks that, since he hasn't technically done anything yet, he should be given another chance. That sound good?"

Lan Xichen nodded, and Nie Huaisang laughed nervously before responding, "I-I guess."

"Okay. I feel like I should first mention that little-me still doesn't trust me right now, so I don't actually have a way to interfere with the parallel dimension the Píngxíng gateway created."

"Don't worry about that, I'm sure you'll figure it out," Nie Huaisang assured him, snapping a fan open. Despite the nervous demeanor he used, Lan Xichen, Lan Wangji, and Wei Wuxian all heard Nie Huaisang's words as a promise: if it started going south, Nie Huaisang would make it happen.

"Alright," Wei Wuxian allowed. "...Alright. Zewu-jun, I think it goes without saying that — whether we kill Jin Guangyao or not — we probably don't want him to do the same things he did in our world, right?"

"Of course," Lan Xichen answered instantly. Wei Wuxian had (naively) hoped that Xichen's answer would calm Nie Huaisang's invisible rage.

If anything, that only seemed to make it grow.

"If you think that, then why are you trying to help him?" Nie Huaisang asked. "I mean, I could be wrong, I guess, but wouldn't the safest and most reliable method of dealing with that be to just… remove him?"

"To punish someone who hasn't done anything is inhumane!"

"But this is someone we know will do something."

“Not necessarily,” Lan Wangji spoke up. “What we do to Meng Yao is not isolated. The world created by the Píngxíng Gateway is a form of chaos theory: a scenario with hundreds of different factors. So many things have changed that it’s difficult to predict how anything we do will impact that world. The Wen Sect might not even start the war.”

“And if they don’t,” Wei Wuxian continued. “Meng Yao will have no way of jumping up through the ranks. He’s already… what, sixteen in that world? Far too late to get a strong core.”

“I’m pretty sure you’re the last person who can say that, Wei-xiong,” Nie Huaisang laughed, glancing over at the Yiling Patriarch with a raised eyebrow. And he had a point; Mo Xuanyu’s initially pathetically weak core had been turned into one that was above average for a man Mo Xuanyu’s age (thanks to the continued diligence and love Lan Wangji had turned his way).

Giving a forced cough, Wei Wuxian continued, “Regardless, unless I find a way to erase their memories without being able to go into that world — which, believe me, I’ve looked into; not gonna happen — then they’ll make different decisions. Little-me isn’t responding right now, so all of the watchers are probably still inside. I just finished something that’ll make it easier for me to talk to little-me, so let’s assume we’re about to make second contact. What do we want to do?”

“That depends on how much they know,” Lan Wangji pointed out. “If they don’t know him at all we can make something up, but if they know he kills Wen Ruohan….”

“Then he’s either killed or protected, depending on who finds him first,” Lan Xichen finished, frowning grimly.

Looking as calm as can be, Nie Huaisang fanned himself lightly and wondered, “If they do learn he kills Wen Ruohan, then do you think he’ll be accepted into the Jin Sect immediately?”

Wei Wuxian cursed, “And brought right back under Jin Guangshan’s influence.”

Paling instantly, Lan Xichen thought for a moment before asking, “What about the Nie Sect? Would Da-ge have any chance of taking him in instead?”

Nie Huaisang shook his head, “Meng Yao was raised hearing thousands of lies from his mother about how brilliant and perfect his cultivator father was. He’d never be satisfied not being a cultivator, and he’ll never be content at the Nie Sect.”

“Besides,” Wei Wuxian added. “Chifeng-jun’s trust was broken when he realized how far Meng Yao could go. To get out of going to trial for a murder he carefully and maticulously planned, he pretended to commit suicide and tricked the former Sect Leader Nie. I have trouble believing he’d be accepted again.”

“What if they don’t know that yet?” Lan Wangji asked.

“It wasn’t too long after I came back from the Burial Mounds,” Wei Wuxian pointed out. “With how long they’ve been in there… no, Sizhui said it wasn’t necessarily in chronological order, didn’t he?”

Hanguang-jun nodded.

“Wouldn’t that be confusing?” Lan Xichen asked. “Maybe they won’t be able to follow along with any of it.”

“I really — I mean, I don’t think we should assume that,” Nie Huaisang suggested, laughing awkwardly. “Best to prepare for the worst, rather than have trust and hopes that ruin everything.”

Lan Xichen flinched, registering the carefully-hidden barb despite Nie Huaisang’s cheery voice, and saw Lan Wangji frown as well. The only one who seemed unaffected by the statement was Wei Wuxian, who had expected something like this to happen.

“So, does that mean you think a sixteen year old is impossible to change?” Wei Wuxian asked. “I’d say it’s likely that working under Wen Ruohan and Jin Guangshan left him a worse person than he came in as.”

“Do we know that?” Nie Huaisang wondered. “Or are you just hoping for an idealistic solution? It’s not like Meng Yao didn’t have other choices once things started going south in the Jin. He could have become a rogue cultivator, or gone back to my sect, or joined a temple, or joined a smaller sect, or even started his own. His mother’s stories mean he feels he’s entitled to a position in the Jin Sect, specifically.”

“You can’t possibly know that,” Lan Xichen disagreed. “Just because that’s what happened doesn’t mean it was inevitable. He had no-”

“Choice?” Nie Huaisang suggested, eyes darkening to a steely gray. “Of course, that’s always the case with him, isn’t it? He had ‘no choice’ but to kill his Jin supervisor. ‘No choice’ but to send Jin Zixuan after Jin Zixun on the off chance that one of them might die. ‘No choice’ but to kill my Da-ge. ‘No choice’ but to kill his own son-”

“That isn’t what I meant,” Lan Xichen protested.

“Then what did you mean?”

“That he’s a product of his upbringing. We can help him! He’s a human whose actions are impacted by circumstances around him. You saw for yourself just how quickly people turned on him because of his mother. If he had just been safe-”

“There is nothing that will cause that to happen,” Wei Wuxian shook his head, then smiled and shot Hanguang-jun a flirtatious wink. “Even my darling Lan Zhan over here experienced everyone turning against him when he sided with me at Koi Tower. He wasn’t vilified, but there is no position in the world that would make Meng Yao completely safe, and I think I speak for everyone when I say I want him as far away from a position of power as possible.”

Pleased at the support, Nie Huaisang nodded and added, “So, are you agreeing to killing him?”

“Lan Zhan and I think we should stay uninvolved,” Wei Wuxian corrected.

Hanguang-jun nodded, “It’s their lives on the line. We can tell them what happened, but we should allow the residents of that dimension to decide what to do with him.”

“And if that results in that Jin Guangyao doing the same things he did in our dimension?”

“Then that’s what happens. It’s not our choice to make.”

“But,” Lan Xichen paused, then sent an apologetic glance Wei Wuxian’s way. “...Sect Leader Nie, considering the trust you placed in my brother and Wei Wuxian to solve your mystery, would I be correct in saying that you trust them to be righteous?”

“I’m not sure what you’re talking about?” Nie Huaisang denied. “But… yes, I think we can all agree on that.”

“Then, have you read the reports on what Wei Wuxian did to Wen Chao?”

“Xiongzhang!” Lan Wangji snapped, stunned that his brother would bring that up.

“Lan Zhan, it’s fine,” Wei Wuxian said, smiling reassuringly. “Let him finish.”

“...I have,” Nie Huaisang answered. “Da-ge got them from you, didn’t he?”

“He did. And if even Wei Wuxian could be driven to that point, can you really call what A-Y… Meng Yao did during the Sunshot Campaign inhumane? He was a spy.”

Making eye contact with Wei Wuxian, Lan Wangji decided he couldn’t let that go:

“Wei Ying never went so far again,” Lan Wangji reminded him. “And he only did that after Wen Chao had killed his Sect Leader, destroyed Jiang Wanyin’s core, and thrown him into the Burial Mounds. It wasn’t a lack of capabilities that prevented him from doing the same to Jin Guangshan; he knew better by then.”

“And besides, what he did during the war isn’t the part we’re concerned about,” Wei Wuxian nodded. “It’s what he did when he was part of the Jin Sect that really worries me. His loyalty to any one person has always seemed relatively… fickle. Though, you know the most about how he was while working in the Wen Sect. What do you think?”

“About what?”

“Would he have chosen our side if we weren’t winning already? The Jin Sect had remained fairly neutral and probably would have survived even if the Wens won. He barely knew you when the war started; if you’d stopped being useful-”

“He would never hurt me.”

“Oh, so killing Da-ge didn’t bother you at all?” Nie Huaisang snapped. “And even ignoring that, he was willing to do plenty to Hanguang-jun without considering how you’d feel! Or does emotional damage not count?”

“Those were extreme situations. When pressed, we’ve all done things we may regret-”

“Enough,” Lan Wangji shook his head, furious at the way Lan Xichen kept using Wei Wuxian as an example. “It was different.”

“I don’t know, Lan Zhan. Your brother might have a point.”

“Wei Ying?”

Wei Wuxian leaned back, allowing himself to more easily observe all three of his conversation partners at once. He didn’t regret killing Wen Chao — he never would — but the torture he did to the various Wen Officers on the way was not his most justifiable plan of action.

(Ironic, then, that Lan Zhan was the only one in the great sects who criticized him for that.)

Wei Wuxian cleared his throat, “Sect Leader Nie, we’re not asking whether it was wrong to kill him in our world, we’re asking if it’s necessary over there. You’re right, he had other choices, but thousands of people worked for the Wen and did all sorts of terrible things. I don’t think we’ll be able to hunt them all down.”

“They were on the wrong side of a war. I find that to be a much more justifiable motivation than what Jin Guangyao and Xue Yang had,” Nie Huaisang disagreed.

“Xue Yang?” Lan Xichen asked. “I… I never said anything about a plan for him. What does he have to do with this?”
